Trustees reelected were Albert Spalding of Great Barrington and New York, Mrs. William Felton Barrett of Rye and North Egremont, Prof. Philip Marshall Brown of Washington, D. C. and Williamstown, William L. Bull of Lenox, Mr. Edman, Mrs. Charles C. Griswold of New York and Stockbridge, Miss Robinson Smith.

Plans for next year were discussed including the possibility of eight concerts, four each week, the first two weeks in August, but action was deferred pending a report from the Boston Symphony Orchestra trustees and the conductor, Serge Koussevitzky.

According to reports of officers the 1938 festival was an outstanding success and the concerts were self-sustaining.

Anyone interested in memberships which make it possible to secure tickets at preferred prices and any one wishing to contribute to the building fund is requested to write to the Berkshire Symphonic Festival Inc., Stockbridge, Mass.

QUINCY, MASS.
PATRIOT LEDGER

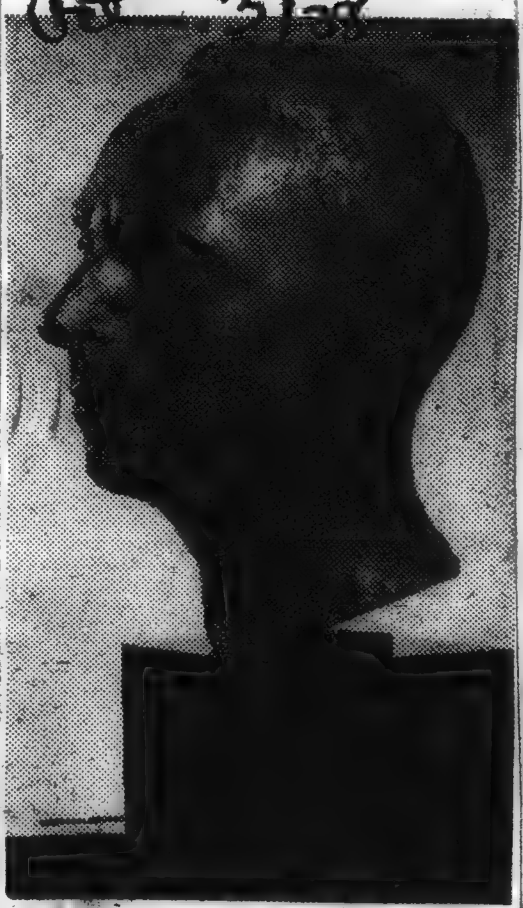
OCT 1 - 1938

Ludwig Juht, contra-bass soloist and member of Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will be presented in a concert by the Naomi Girls' Society of the Swedish Congregational church Friday evening, Oct. 7 at 8 o'clock at the church.

---

aft Shown

Oct 3/38



Serge Koussevitzky

Who will open his fifteenth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon and Saturday evening; from the portrait head by Gitou Knoop.

Tran Oct 6

Notes of Music And the Dance

Aaron Copland's "El Salon Mexico" will be played for the first times in Boston at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week. The program will begin with Mozart's Divertimento in B-flat major (K. 287) for strings and horns, and end with Dvorak's Symphony in E minor, "From the New World." The Divertimento is the same as was played, under Arthur Fiedler's direction and with Richard Burgin playing the important solo violin part, for Victor records, reviewed in last Tuesday's Transcript.

NORWALK, CONN.
HOUR

OCT 4 - 1938

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL SEATS TO BE RESERVED

All seats in the Berkshire Symphonic Festival's new music shed at Tanglewood will be reserved for the concerts next year by the Boston Symphony Orchestra according to action taken by the trustees this week. There will be no increase in prices.

The trustees point out that the advantages of the new policy are obvious but since the number of seats is limited to 5700, it is essential for music lovers who wish to have first choice of locations to send in their memberships at once. Memberships are available only to Nov. 1. Already there are more than 1100 members and 95 boxes have been sold. These figures are much ahead of last year at this time indicating continued interest in the Festival.

Plans for next year were discussed including the possibility of eight concerts, four each week, the first two weeks in August, but action was deferred pending a report from the Boston Symphony Orchestra trustees and the conductor, Serge Koussevitzky.

According to reports of officers, the 1938 Festival was an outstanding success and the concerts were self-sustaining.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

OCT 3 - 1938

It's This Way

• • •

In Hospital Once More, Veteran Has Dog Worries

• • •

ON THE DESK—A handsomely printed announcement of the opening of the 58th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Oct. 7. [illegible] season, says the brochure, will continue until Apr. 29, 1939. This will be Serge Koussevitzky's 15th year with the Boston orchestra

---

LEADER WILL LAUNCH NEW SEASON

B. Post - Oct 2/38

Dr. Koussevitsky's 15th Year With Hub Symphony

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

NEXT Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dr. Koussevitzky will begin his 15th season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Appropriately he has placed upon his initial programme the three numbers which made the first half of that with which he introduced himself to the American public. These numbers are a Concerto in D Minor by Vivaldi, originally written for strings and organ, and edited by Alexander Siloti for orchestra and organ; Berlioz' overture, "The Roman Carnival," and Brahms' Variations on a Theme of Haydn. In place of Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstacy" and Honneger's "Pacific 231" (then a novelty here), which formed the balance of the programme with which the Koussevitzky regime was inaugurated, the conductor has taken from his second Boston list the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven.

On Saturday, Oct. 11, 1924, the Post, speaking through its music critic, expressed itself as not greatly impressed by Vivaldi's concerto, but it found the performance of Berlioz' overture one "that for expressiveness and coruscating brilliance must have come to each individual in the hall as a revelation both of the potentialities of Berlioz' thrice familiar music and of the powers and the prowess of the Boston Symphony Orchestra." Aware that Brahms' variations had been known to seem to him longwinded and occasionally dull, the Post's reviewer found them engrossing in Dr. Koussevitzky's hands, and he waxed quite lyrical over the performances of Scriabin's poem and of the locomotive piece of Honneger.

Much water has flowed under the bridge since Dr. Koussevitzky's memorable American debut, but there has been no occasion to regret the early enthusiasm over his gifts as conductor. At the very outset he made the Boston Symphony Orchestra sound as it had not sounded for many years. Yet in the intervening years it has been possible to record a steady gain, both in the eloquence of the conductor and in the responsiveness of his manifold instrument. Surely, we of this city have reason to consider ourselves fortunate.

While on the subject of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it is pertinent to announce that again there will be a supplementary series of six pairs of concerts on Monday evenings and Tuesday afternoons, beginning on Oct. 24-25. Soloists to appear at these concerts will include Pierre and Genia Luboschutz, who will be heard in a two-piano concerto of Mozart, and Myra Hess. The series will have two notable guest-conductors, Georges Enesco and Igor Stravinsky. As at the regular concerts, the eminent Russian will appear also as piano soloist in music of his own.

To reread criticism, and particularly music criticism, that is 10 years old or older, is very often to be glad that opinions then recorded are likely not to be preserved for posterity. It is a risky thing to embalm music criticism between the pages of a book, or even of a magazine. A day or so ago this writer stumbled on some copies of Modern Music dating back from 1925, '26 and '27. As a magazine of propaganda, Modern Music is necessarily free from the violent condemnation of contemporary works that are later accepted as classics. It would not, as did Mr. Krehbiel of the New York Tribune, have characterized Prokofieff as a writer of "filthy music," whose orchestral compositions were "contributions not to the art of music, but to

Continued on Page 27

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
DESERET NEWS

OCT 8 - 1938

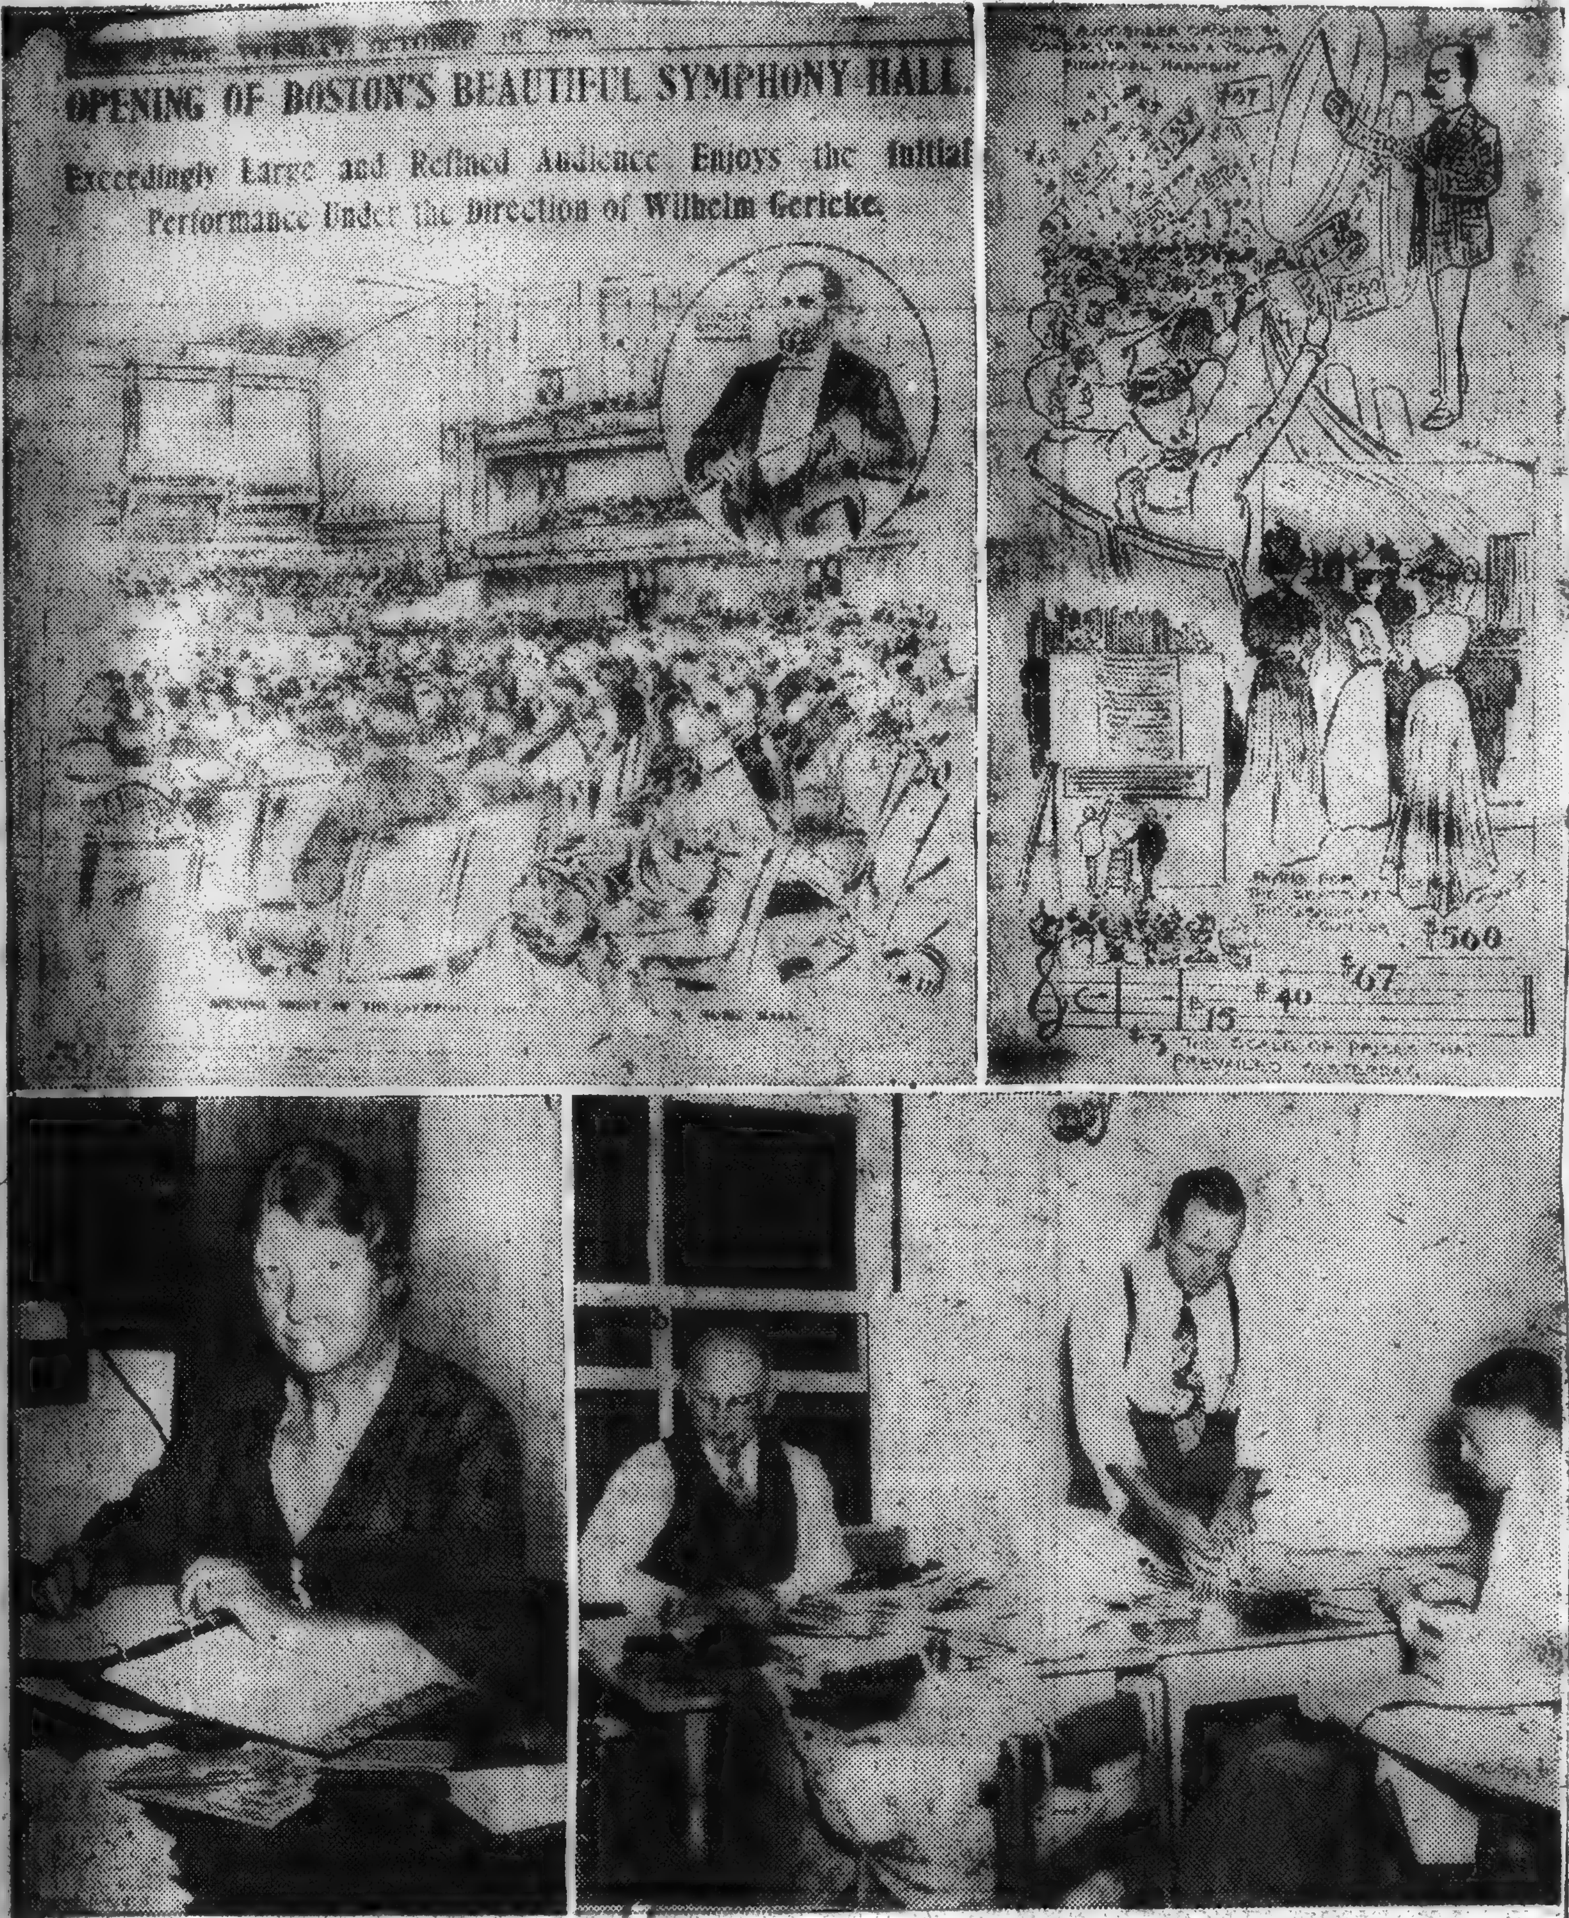
Kolisch Quartet Opens Season Here Saturday, Oct. 15

PIERRE Luboschutz and Genia Nemenoff, duo pianists, who played for civic music members here at Kingsbury Hall last winter will play two concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, October 25 and 26, with Koussevitzky conducting.

Meal Ticket System for Concerts When Symphony Hall Opened

B. Globe Oct. 2/38

Back in 1910 Mrs. Jack Gardner Paid $1120 For a Pair Worth $12—In 1910 200 Ladies Brought Camp Stools and Waited For Doors to Open



OPENING OF BOSTON'S BEAUTIFUL SYMPHONY HALL.
Exceedingly Large and Refined Audience Enjoys the Initial Performance Under the Direction of Wilhelm Gericke.
$560
$67
$40
$15

Upper (Left and Right)—How Boston newspapers greeted the opening of Symphony Hall in 1900. Below (Left)—Mrs. Emma Kelliher, who receives frantic cables from Shanghai for concert reservations. Right—Charles McCarthy, Frank and Paul Cuniff triple checking every ticket that goes out. That is why every patron gets his own ticket.

By MARJORIE WATTS

Going, going, gone. To Mrs. Jack Gardner, for the sum of $1120 one pair of $12 Symphony tickets. Auctioneer Walter Jackson put down his hammer and a murmur of excited speculation rose from the fashionable audience gathered in Symphony Hall that 26th day of September in the year 1900.

Many of Boston's best necks, encased, masculine or feminine, in the high collars of that era, craned for another look at the empty first balcony, as their owners counted in to seats 15 and 16 of Row A, and wondered, audibly, what on earth Isabella Gardner wanted THOSE seats for.

Epochal Auction

They never knew, but want them she did, and pay for them she did—just $560 more apiece than the $12 printed neatly on the pale blue face of each ticket, tickets which were, incidentally, large and square, and which were punched around the edge, meal-ticket fashion, a punch a concert.

That epochal auction, never again to be equaled in the decade or so that these spirited "advance sales" continued, not only began the 20th season of the Boston Symphony, but it also marked the opening of the new Symphony Hall, just christened amid a storm of dissension from the old Music Hall patrons, who had been shuddering into print for days with impassioned pleas to change the "fancy" and "hifalutin'" new name (Symphony Hall) back to the familiar, dignified "Music Hall."

They had to be content, however, with nostalgic gazings at the intertwined B. M. H. appearing at intervals in the beautiful old wrought iron balustrade brought intact from the Music Hall, which still curves up the wide winding front stairs to the right of the Huntington-av. entrance. And even those fanatics who bore off the number and letter plates of their Music Hall seats, and in not a few cases, the seats themselves, succumbed to the charm and superior acoustics of the handsome new grey and gold hall after the memorable dedicating performance on Oct. 15.

Names Remain

A great many of the names which will fill the society pages on next Saturday after the opening Friday of the Boston Symphony's 58th season, were listed in that long-ago October story. And if some of the Endicotts and Shaws and Saltonstalls of that audience of 38 years ago are no longer here, their children and their children's children have taken their places, in seats guarded and handed down, like heirlooms, from generation to generation.

Maj. Higginson's center aisle seats in Q, set aside with the opening concert in 1900's new hall, are still used by the Higginson family, and Mr. Henry F. Sears has kept his Symphony seats for over half a century, as has Mrs. Charles G. Mixter, and also on the list for both 1900 and 1938 are Blakes and Hemenways, Wolcotts, Wendells, and Dexters, Paines and Putnams, Wheelwrights, Coolidges, and Ameses, Lowells, Gardners, and Grews, Kidders, Thorndikes, and Spauldings, Fays, Hoopers, Rices, and Howes, Curtises, Lothrops, Lees, and Whitneys, Hallowells, Birds, Lawrences, and Bradleys, and many many more, whose treasured seats are theirs for the mere signing of a card, white for the Friday series, blue for Saturday, yellow for Monday, and pink for Tuesday.

Ladies and Camp Stools

No longer must those arduous, expensive four days of auction sales preface the securing of desired seats, nor will this coming Friday morning find 200 ladies and camp stools waiting on the front steps of Symphony, as did the rainy Oct. 7 of 1910, when more than 400 had gathered in the pouring rain before the 2:30 o'clock opening concert began.

A quiet, tireless person named Emma Kelliher has changed all that. Keeper of the neat black books that list each of Symphony Hall's 2631 seats, she knows many a location and its owner by heart, and frantic cables from Shanghai or Ceylon from subscribers who forgot to sign their little renewal card, always bring soothing, intelligent answers.

Audiences, she thinks, are a lot younger than they were when the Friday afternoon concert was called a public rehearsal and the conductor could—and frequently did — stop in the middle of Haydn's Symphony in B Flat to rehearse a difficult passage. Nor are there the family feuds that used to arise over the old auction days when coveted seats, unwittingly bid in shoulder to shoulder, would be promptly returned to the box office with four tickets' worth of consternation and complication.

Neil Patterson who helped open the doors of the old Music Hall on the historic Oct. 22 of 1881 that marked the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, looks forward to Oct. 7, 1938, with an anticipation undimmed by 58 years of opening concerts, and he thinks that with hats the way they are this Fall, it might be a good idea to revive the old statute about their removal, current at the time when the second balcony seats immediately above Mrs. Jack Gardner's were commanding a much higher premium at the auctions than any other seats in that balcony, probably so that their owners might look down on the wondrous creations of fur and feathers and flowers that usually adorned her head, often in complete defiance of the respectful reminder tucked in a corner of the program.

And what with the current season's high tide of hats, perched on curled crests that could compete, inch for inch, with any of the old pompadours, it might indeed be a good idea to remind the ladies, in the lyric legal language of nearly half a century ago:

City of Boston, revised regulation of Aug. 5, 1888, Chapter 3, relating to the covering of the head in places of public amusement.

Every licensee shall not, in his place of amusement, allow any person to wear upon the head a covering which shall obstruct the view of the exhibition or performance in such place of any person seated in any seat therein provided for spectators, it being understood that a low head covering, without projection, which does not obstruct such view, may be worn. Attest:

J. M. GALVIN, City Clerk.

HENRY THE ORIGINAL ROMEIKE PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU NEW YORK
220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

MAY 2 - 1939

Dr. Koussevitzky Presented Silver Samovar

Marking the conclusion of the 15th consecutive season of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—longest term of any leader in its history—a richly designed silver samovar was presented to him at the end of the Saturday concert. Amid the applause of a capacity audience, the presentation was made by Ernest B. Dane, president of the orchestra's trustees. Mr. Dane spoke briefly on behalf of the donors, who comprised the trustees and a group of friends. He voiced their appreciation of "fifteen years of unsurpassed achievement."

The samovar was made by one of the most noted artisans of modern times, Carl Faberge, who was silver and gold smith to the late Czar and Czarina of Russia.

were re-elected as follows: president, Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith of New York and Stockbridge; vice president, Norval H. Busey, jr. of Lee and New York; executive vice president, Mrs. George W. Edman of Pittsfield; treasurer, Henry W. Dwight of Stockbridge; clerk, George W. Edman of Pittsfield. Trustees re-elected were Albert Spalding of Great Barrington and New York, Mrs. Willaim Felton Barrett of Rye and North Egremont, Prof. Philip Marshall Brown of Washington, D. C. and Williamstown, William L. Bull of Lenox, Mr. Edman, Mrs. Charles C. Griswold of New York and Stockbridge, Miss Robinson Smith.

Plans for next year were discussed including the possibility of eight concerts, four each week, the first two weeks in August, but action was deferred pending a report from the Boston Symphony orchestra trustees and the conductor, Serge Koussevitzky.

According to reports of officers, the 1938 festival was an outstanding success and the concerts were self-sustaining.

It was reported that $50,000 is needed for improvements at Tanglewood and to complete the shed. Members of the board were urged to solicit anyone who might be interested to aid the cause.

Anyone interested in memberships and anyone wishing to contribute to the building fund may write to the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc., Stockbridge, Mass., or contact the local chairman, Mrs. Bertrand G. Peck.

B. Herald - Oct. 2/38

KOUSSEVITZKY'S SUCCESS

Serge Koussevitzky begins today his fifteenth year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. When he arrived for his first season he faced a divided public and, it is easy to understand, a divided orchestra. Loyalty to Pierre Monteux, the excellent French musician who had led the orchestra out of strike and war and launched it anew without the comforting security of Maj. Higginson's presence and backing, must have weighed with many to induce them to distrust the newcomer.

Others, who are ever keen for a change, are not always the stuff of which intelligent audiences are made. Would they find the new conductor to their taste after a dozen concerts? And the ultra-conservatives who dislike all music less than thirty years old, what were they to think of the new leader's terrifying reputation for offering compositions abounding in wild cacophonies and crabbed canons?

For a while, as we all know, there were doubts and moods of dissension. Aesthetic arguments took the place of gossip. People even wrote letters to the papers on musical, rather than political, questions.

When Koussevitzky faces his audiences this week, he will receive an ovation based not only on the popularity that he currently enjoys but also on approval for his work in the past. He has brought the Boston Symphony to renewed heights of technique and spiritual achievement. He has ventured into new fields and not dipped his flags to the forces of rutted convention. He has done a fine and a courageous job and well earned the applause which will greet him.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

OCT 2 - 1938

MONDAY AND TUESDAY SYMPHONY HALL SERIES

Notable events are announced for the shorter series of six Monday evening and six Tuesday afternoon concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Symphony hall, opening October 24 and 25. Distinguished soloists, two guest conductors of the highest standing in the musical world, and four programmes under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky are announced for this series in which, occurring approximately once a month, the programme of the Monday evening concert will be repeated on the following Tuesday afternoon.

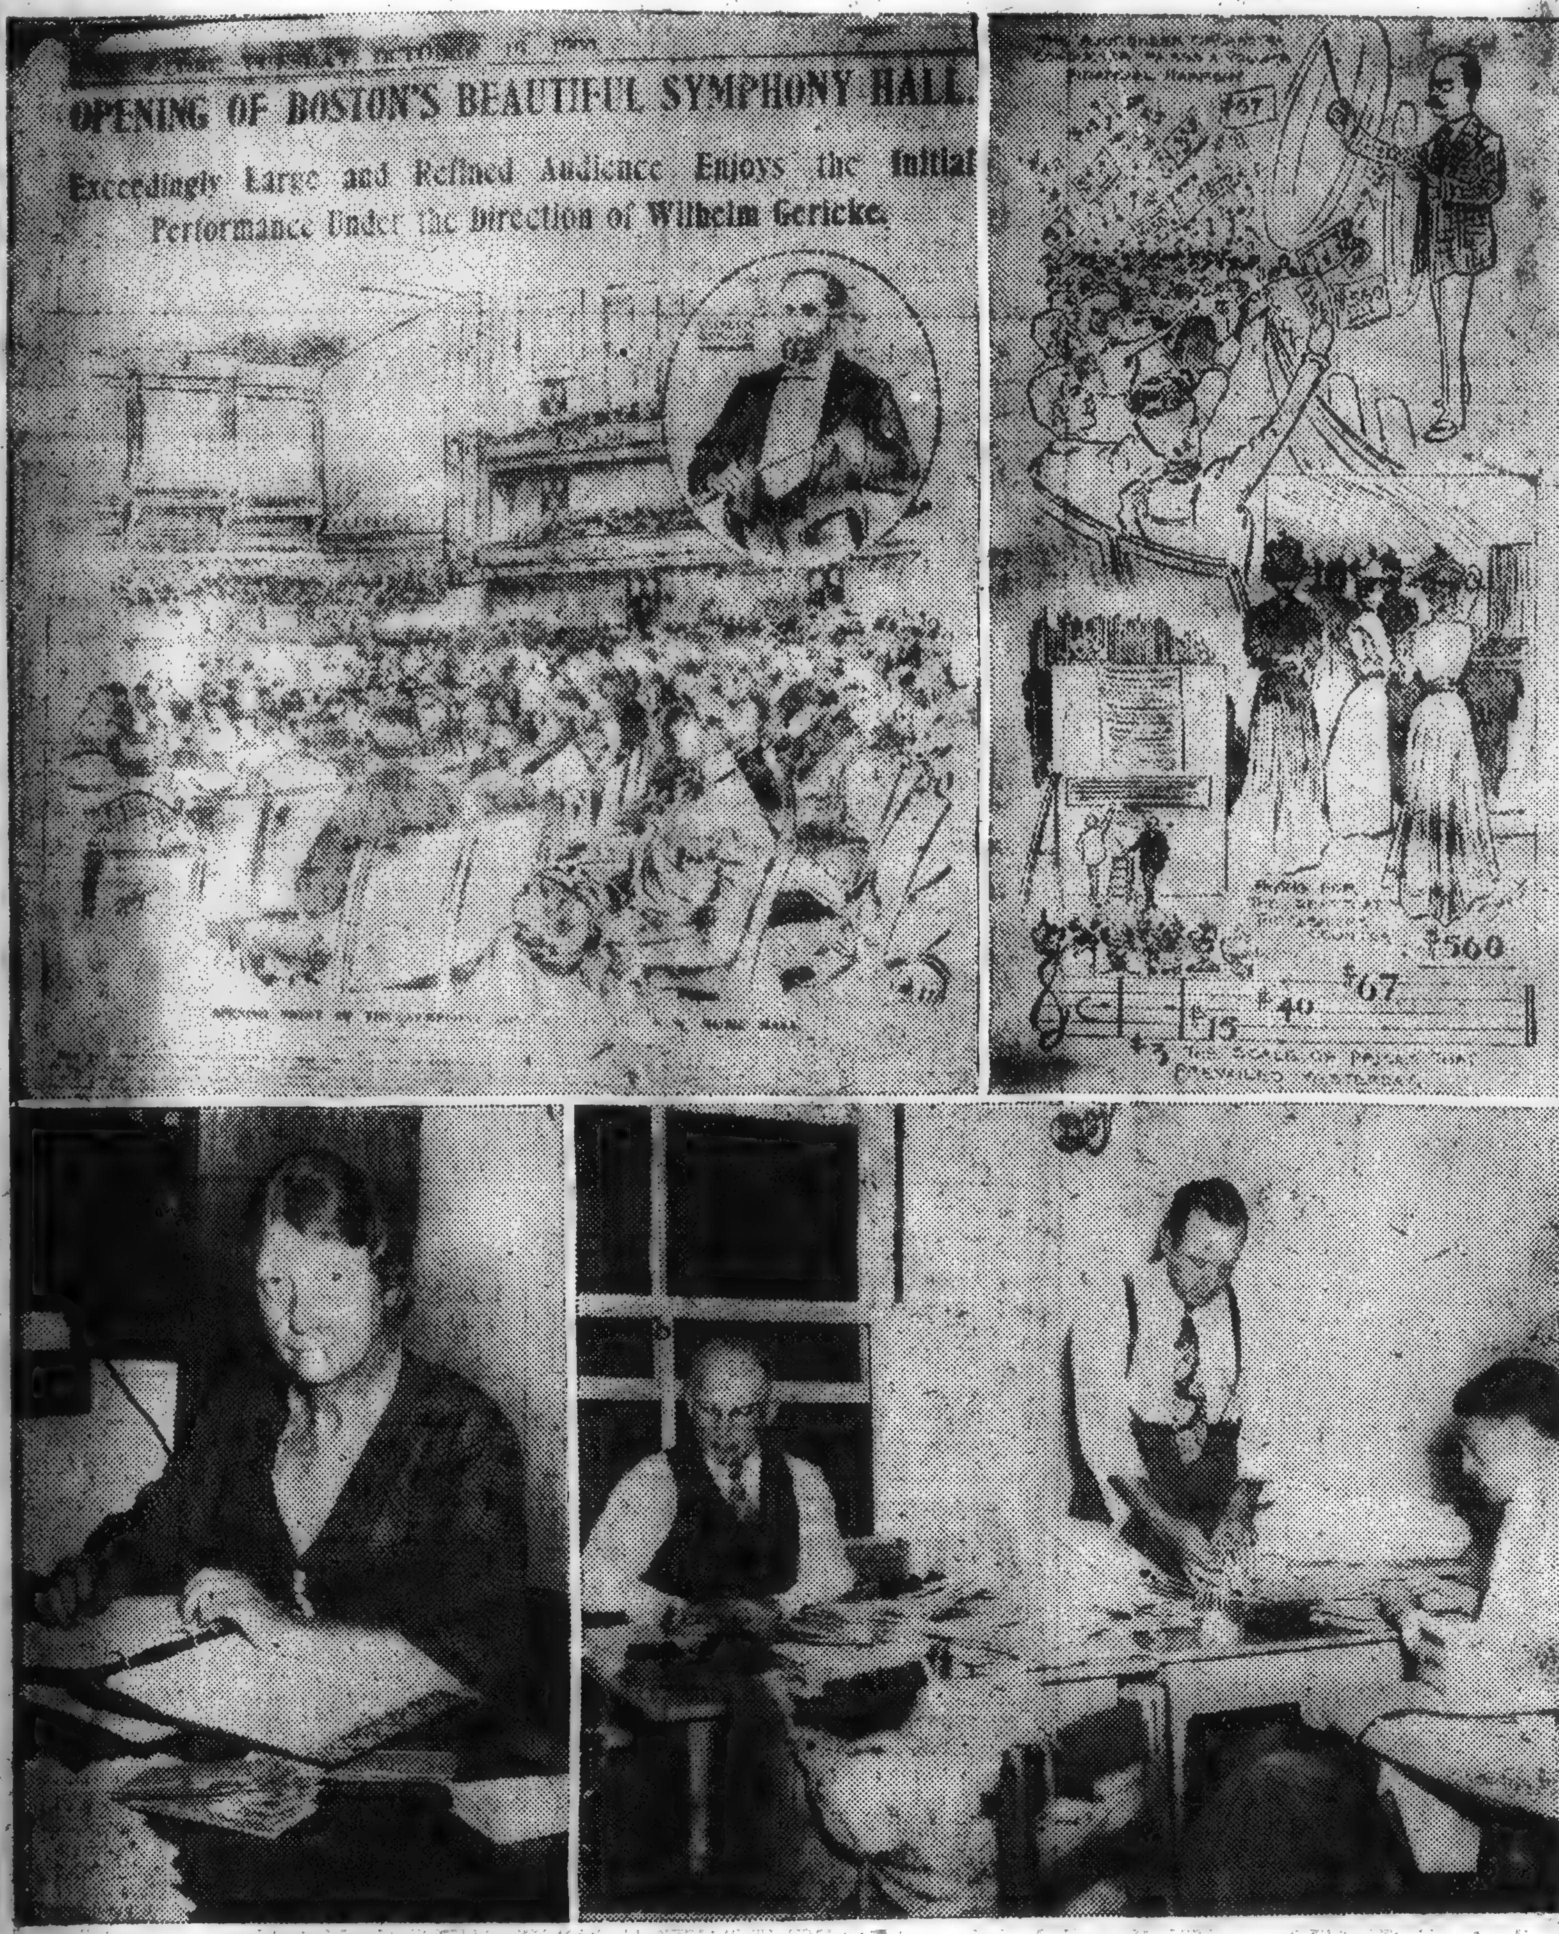
The soloists will include Pierre and Genia Luboshutz, who will appear with the orchestra in the Concerto for Two Pianos, of Mozart. Myra Hess, the famous English pianist, will appear as soloist in another pair of concerts. Georges Enesco, the Roumanian composer, conductor and violinist, whose visit as guest conductor was one of the events of the longer series last year, will return to conduct this season in the shorter series as well. Another guest of the highest distinction will be Igor Stravinsky, who, visiting America next March, will conduct concerts of both series, appearing likewise as piano soloist in music of his own.

The Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon concerts will be given on: October 23-25, December 26-27, January 16-17, February 20-21, March 20-21, April 17-18. Season tickets are now obtainable at the subscription office in Symphony Hall.

Meal Ticket System for Concerts When Symphony Hall Opened

B. Globe — Oct. 2/38

Back in 1910 Mrs. Jack Gardner Paid $1120 For a Pair Worth $12—In 1910 200 Ladies Brought Camp Stools and Waited For Doors to Open



OPENING OF BOSTON'S BEAUTIFUL SYMPHONY HALL.
Exceedingly Large and Refined Audience Enjoys the Initial Performance Under the Direction of Wilhelm Gericke.
$67
$560
$15
$40
$67

Upper (Left and Right)—How Boston newspapers greeted the opening of Symphony Hall in 1900. Below (Left)—Mrs. Emma Kelliher, who receives frantic cables from Shanghai for concert reservations. Right—Charles McCarthy, Frank and Paul Cuniff triple checking every ticket that goes out. That is why every patron gets his own ticket.

By MARJORIE WATTS

Going, going, gone. To Mrs. Jack Gardner, for the sum of $1120 one pair of $12 Symphony tickets. Auctioneer Walter Jackson put down his hammer and a murmur of excited speculation rose from the fashionable audience gathered in Symphony Hall that 26th day of September in the year 1900.

Many of Boston's best necks, encased, masculine or feminine, in the high collars of that era, craned for another look at the empty first balcony, as their owners counted in to seats 15 and 16 of Row A, and wondered, audibly, what on earth Isabella Gardner wanted THOSE seats for.

Epochal Auction

They never knew, but want them she did, and pay for them she did—just $560 more apiece than the $12 printed neatly on the pale blue face of each ticket, tickets which were, incidentally, large and square, and which were punched around the edge, meal-ticket fashion, a punch a concert.

That epochal auction, never again to be equaled in the decade or so that these spirited "advance sales" continued, not only began the 20th season of the Boston Symphony, but it also marked the opening of the new Symphony Hall, just christened amid a storm of dissension from the old Music Hall patrons, who had been shuddering into print for days with impassioned pleas to change the "fancy" and "hifalutin'" new name (Symphony Hall) back to the familiar, dignified "Music Hall."

They had to be content, however, with nostalgic gazings at the intertwined B. M. H. appearing at intervals in the beautiful old wrought iron balustrade brought intact from the Music Hall, which still curves up the wide winding front stairs to the right of the Huntington-av. entrance. And even those fanatics who bore off the number and letter plates of their Music Hall seats, and in not a few cases, the seats themselves, succumbed to the charm and superior acoustics of the handsome new grey and gold hall after the memorable dedicating performance on Oct. 15.

Names Remain

A great many of the names which will fill the society pages on next Saturday after the opening Friday of the Boston Symphony's 58th season, were listed in that long-ago October story. And if some of the Endicotts and Shaws and Saltonstalls of that audience of 38 years ago are no longer here, their children and their children's children have taken their places, in seats guarded and handed down, like heirlooms, from generation to generation.

Maj. Higginson's center aisle seats in Q, set aside with the opening concert in 1900's new hall, are still used by the Higginson family, and Mr. Henry F. Sears has kept his Symphony seats for over half a century, as has Mrs. Charles G. Mixter, and also on the list for both 1900 and 1938 are Blakes and Hemenways, Wolcotts, Wendells, and Dexters, Paines and Putnams, Wheelwrights, Coolidges, and Ameses, Lowells, Gardners, and Grews, Kidders, Thorndikes, and Spauldings, Fays, Hoopers, Rices, and Howes, Curtises, Lothrops, Lees, and Whitneys, Hallowells, Birds, Lawrences, and Bradleys, and many many more, whose treasured seats are theirs for the mere signing of a card, white for the Friday series, blue for Saturday, yellow for Monday, and pink for Tuesday.

Ladies and Camp Stools

No longer must those arduous, expensive four days of auction sales preface the securing of desired seats, nor will this coming Friday morning find 200 ladies and camp stools waiting on the front steps of Symphony, as did the rainy Oct. 7 of 1910, when more than 400 had gathered in the pouring rain before the 2:30 o'clock opening concert began.

A quiet, tireless person named Emma Kelliher has changed all that. Keeper of the neat black books that list each of Symphony Hall's 2631 seats, she knows many a location and its owner by heart, and frantic cables from Shanghai or Ceylon from subscribers who forgot to sign their little renewal card, always bring soothing, intelligent answers.

Audiences, she thinks, are a lot younger than they were when the Friday afternoon concert was called a public rehearsal and the conductor could—and frequently did—stop in the middle of Haydn's Symphony in B Flat to rehearse a difficult passage. Nor are there the family feuds that used to arise over the old auction days when coveted seats, unwittingly bid in shoulder to shoulder, would be promptly returned to the box office with four tickets' worth of consternation and complication.

Neil Patterson who helped open the doors of the old Music Hall on the historic Oct. 22 of 1881 that marked the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, looks forward to Oct. 7, 1938, with an anticipation undimmed by 58 years of opening concerts, and he thinks that with hats the way they are this Fall, it might be a good idea to revive the old statute about their removal, current at the time when the second balcony seats immediately above Mrs. Jack Gardner's were commanding a much higher premium at the auctions than any other seats in that balcony, probably so that their owners might look down on the wondrous creations of fur and feathers and flowers that usually adorned her head, often in complete defiance of the respectful reminder tucked in a corner of the program.

And what with the current season's high tide of hats, perched on curled crests that could compete, inch for inch, with any of the old pompadours, it might indeed be a good idea to remind the ladies, in the lyric legal language of nearly half a century ago:

City of Boston, revised regulation of Aug. 5, 1888, Chapter 3, relating to the covering of the head in places of public amusement.

Every licensee shall not, in his place of amusement, allow any person to wear upon the head a covering which shall obstruct the view of the exhibition or performance in such place of any person seated in any seat therein provided for spectators, it being understood that a low head covering, without projection, which does not obstruct such view, may be worn. Attest:

J. M. GALVIN, City Clerk.

TORRINGTON, CONN.
REGISTER

OCT 6 - 1938

New Seating Plan For 1939 Festival

All seats in the Berkshire Symphonic festival's new music shed at Tanglewood will be reserver for the concert next year by the Boston Symphony orchestra according to action taken by the trustees this week.

The trustees point out that the advantages of the new policy are obvious but since the number of seats is limited to 5,700, it is essential for music lovers who wish to have first choice of locations to send in their memberships at once. Memberships are available only to November 1. Already there are more than 1,100 members and 95 boxes have ben sold. These figures are much ahead of last year at this time indicating continued interest in the festival.

Deferred until the next meeting was the generous invitation received from the selectmen of Lenox to occupy free of charge the former post-office quarters in the Lenox town hall, as an office for the festival.

Miss Mary Parsons of New York and Lenox was elected a new member of the board this week. Officers were re-elected as follows: president, Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith of New York and Stockbridge; vice president, Norval H. Busey, jr. of Lee and New York; executive vice president, Mrs. George W. Edman of Pittsfield; treasurer, Henry W. Dwight of Stockbridge; clerk, George W. Edman of Pittsfield. Trustees re-elected were Albert Spalding of Great Barrington and New York, Mrs. Willaim Felton Barrett of Rye and North Egremont, Prof. Philp Marshall Brown of Washington, D. C. and Williamstown, William L. Bull of Lenox, Mr. Edman, Mrs. Charles C. Griswold of New York and Stockbridge, Miss Robinson Smith.

Plans for next year were discussed including the possibility of eight concerts, four each week, the first two weeks in August, but action was deferred pending a report from the Boston Symphony orchestra trus~~tees and the conductor~~, Serge Koussevitzky.

According to reports of officers, the 1938 festival was an outstanding success and the concerts were self-sustaining.

It was reported that $50,000 is needed for improvements at Tanglewood and to complete the shed. Members of the board were urged to solicit anyone who might be interested to aid the cause.

Anyone interested in memberships and anyone wishing to contribute to the building fund may write to the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc., Stockbridge, Mass., or contact the local chairman, Mrs. Bertrand G. Peck.

B. Herald - Oct. 2/38

(1)

KOUSSEVITZKY'S SUCCESS

Serge Koussevitzky begins today his fifteenth year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. When he arrived for his first season he faced a divided public and, it is easy to understand, a divided orchestra. Loyalty to Pierre Monteux, the excellent French musician who had led the orchestra out of strike and war and launched it anew without the comforting security of Maj. Higginson's presence and backing, must have weighed with many to induce them to distrust the newcomer.

Others, who are ever keen for a change, are not always the stuff of which intelligent audiences are made. Would they find the new conductor to their taste after a dozen concerts? And the ultra-conservatives who dislike all music less than thirty years old, what were they to think of the new leader's terrifying reputation for offering compositions abounding in wild cacophonies and crabbed canons?

For a while, as we all know, there were doubts and moods of dissension. Aesthetic arguments took the place of gossip. People even wrote letters to the papers on musical, rather than political, questions.

When Koussevitzky faces his audiences this week, he will receive an ovation based not only on the popularity that he currently enjoys but also on approval for his work in the past. He has brought the Boston Symphony to renewed heights of technique and spiritual achievement. He has ventured into new fields and not dipped his flags to the forces of rutted convention. He has done a fine and a courageous job and well earned the applause which will greet him.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

OCT 2 - 1938

MONDAY AND TUESDAY SYMPHONY HALL SERIES

Notable events are announced for the shorter series of six Monday evening and six Tuesday afternoon concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Symp~~hony hall~~ opening October 24 and 25. Distinguished soloists, two guest conductors of the highest standing in the musical world, and four programmes under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky are announced for this series in which, occurring approximately once a month, the programme of the Monday evening concert will be repeated on the following Tuesday afternoon.

The soloists will include Pierre and Genia Luboshutz, who will appear with the orchestra in the Concerto for Two Pianos, of Mozart. Myra Hess, the famous English pianist, will appear as soloist in another pair of concerts. Georges Enesco, the Roumanian composer, conductor and violinist, whose visit as guest conductor was one of the events of the longer series last year, will return to conduct this season in the shorter series as well. Another guest of the highest distinction will be Igor Stravinsky, who, visiting America next March, will conduct concerts of both series, appearing likewise as piano soloist in music of his own.

The Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon concerts will be given on: October 23-25, December 26-27, January 16-17, February 20-21, March 20-21, April 17-18. Season tickets are now obtainable at the subscription office in Symphony Hall.

Music News

B. Herald - Oct. 2/38

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will open its 58th season at Symphony Hall with the usual Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts this week.

Monday, Tuesday Symphonies

Notable events are announced for the shorter series of six Monday evening and six Tuesday afternoon concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, opening Oct. 24 and 25. Distinguished soloists, two guest conductors of the highest standing in the musical world, and four programs under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky are announced for this series in which, occurring approximately once a month, the programs of the Monday evening concert will be repeated on the following Tuesday afternoon.

The soloists will include Pierre and Genia Luboshutz, who will appear with the orchestra in the Concerto for two pianos, of Mozart. Myra Hess, the famous English pianist, will appear as soloist in another pair of concerts. Georges Enesco, the Roumanian composer, conductor and violinist, whose visit as guest conductor was one of the events of the longer series last year, will return to conduct this season in the shorter series as well. Another guest of the highest distinction will be Igor Stravinsky, who, visiting America next March, will conduct concerts of both series, appearing likewise as piano soloist in music of his own.

The Monday evening and Tuesday afteroon concerts will be given on Oct. 24-25, Dec. 26-27, Jan. 16-17, Feb. 20-21, March 20-21, April 17-18. Season tickets are now obtainable at the subscription office in Symphony Hall.

AKRON, O.
BEACON - JOURNAL

OCT 2 - 1938

New Deal For Music Comes To Akron University;

By OSCAR SMITH
Beacon Journal Music Editor

THERE'LL never be a time at Akron university, so long as C. Neil Starr directs the glee clubs, band and orchestra, when boy and girl students won't have an opportunity to exercise their musical talents.

No student will ever receive that dread message, a curt note in his mailbox, to the effect that he is no longer in the glee club, the band or the orchestra, according to Starr.

The 30-year-old music instructor is a graduate of the University of Cincinnati music conservatory, and has just come to Akron from Northwestern university's music department, where he received his master's degree and taught in the conservatory.

One doesn't need to talk with Starr more than a few minutes to be convinced that he has great dreams and plans for making music an important subject at Akron university.

"Everyone interested in music will be given an opportunity," he said. "I don't believe in hurting a student by kicking him out of the glee club, band or orchestra, perhaps discouraging him for his entire college course. We'll find a way, somehow, for every boy and girl to study music and participate in musical activities."

Now, there's a program that has this department's hearty support. Perhaps there never has been a college or university in the country in which favoritism, or "politics," has not played a part in the selection of candidates for glee clubs, bands and orchestras. If only the favored few are permitted to participate in these organizations, school music is bound to suffer.

Starr said there are about 75 or 80 in the combined men's and women's glee clubs at the university, and that from that group he will select a specialized group for an a cappella choir. Then he will further break down that group into the University Singers, an organization that has been in existence for several years.

Glee clubs now are made up almost entirely of freshmen, with a few sophomores and juniors. Starr explained that the large glee club organization is a "feeder or friendmaker." The singer who is not selected for the choir or University Singers need not feel discouraged. He still is in the glee club, still is wanted as a singer.

Band

THIS YEAR, according to Starr, the Akron university band is going to be strictly a university organization. In the past, high school students have played at times with the university musicians in bands and orchestras.

C. NEIL STARR
. . . new director

JASCHA HEIFETZ
. . . opens course

From now on all university musical groups will be for university students and alumni only. Starr is hopeful over the way enrollment in the band is increasing.

Twenty signed up at the beginning of the school year; at the first rehearsal there were 21; at the second, 29; at the third, 34, and at the fourth, 42.

"Our battle cry for the band is 100 musicians on Buchtel field when Akron university plays Xavier on Oct. 8," Starr said.

The band needs good piccolo players. Starr explained that if the band gets too large, another one will be started.

"Of course, this means more work for the director," he said. "But it is a system that will make friends. I'll be able to say to a student, 'John, I may not be able to use you in my large organization, but I can in a smaller one.'"

Orchestra

STARR BELIEVES the university orchestra should have 60 or 70 pieces. It hasn't been that large in the past.

"There's no reason why this university shouldn't have a fine, large, complete symphony orchestra — violas, 'cellos, plenty of basses, oboes, tympani and bassoons. There's a scarcity of flute players at Akron university. Why, I don't know," Starr said.

We hope that he will be able to realize his ambition in that direction. Several unsuccessful attempts have been made to maintain symphony orchestras here. Since we have no municipal symphony, there is an excellent opportunity for Akron university to make a name for itself in that field.

STARR HAS AN ambitious program mapped out for himself. He has youth, enthusiasm and a background of good training. Furthermore, he will find there is a great deal of musical talent in Akron, waiting to be developed.

AKRON'S TUESDAY MUSICAL club and the Cleveland concert course, under the direction of Mrs. Emil Brudno, both open their fall activities in November.

The Akron course opens at the armory on Nov. 1, with the Mordkin Ballet, a company of 60, and the Cleveland course on Nov 4 with Jascha Heifetz, noted violinist. Both cities will have Vronsky and Babin, Russian duo pianists, Akron on Jan. 24 and Cleveland on Jan. 20.

Different talent is offered on all the other programs. The Cleveland course, opening its sixth season under the auspices of the Cleveland Museum of Art, will be given at the public music hall.

There are no conflicts between the two cities' courses, for the benefit of music lovers. The other artists to appear in Akron are Robert Virovai, violinist, Nov. 15; Anna Kaskas, contralto, and Richard Bonelli, baritone, Dec. 6; Grace Moore, soprano, March 14, and the Cleveland orchestra, April 11.

Other artists in Cleveland are Argentinita and her Spanish ballet, Nov. 18; the Boston Symphony orchestra, direct~~ed by Serge Kous~~sevitsky, Dec. 9; Yehudi Menuhin, violinist, Jan. 6; Marian Anderson, great Negro contralto, Feb. 3, and Robert Casadesus, French pianist, in his Cleveland debut, Feb. 17.

Two extra events in Cleveland are a benefit performance for the diabetic camp for children on Dec. 16, with Harriet Eels, soprano, and Beryl Rubinstein and Arthur Loesser, duo pianists, and a solo dance recital by Harold Kreutzberg on Feb. 22 in the Little Theater of the public music hall.

TORONTO, CAN.
SATURDAY NIGHT

OCT 8 - 1938

LOCAL music lovers had a unique experience last week when they heard a recital on the double bass viol by Ludwig Juht, leader of that section in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the foremost Esthonian musician in America. The occasion was a Finnish-Esthonian evening in Margaret Eaton Hall organized by A. K. Graham, K.C., Honorary Consul for Finland. Many leading orchestral musicians were present to enjoy what was for them a new sensation.

Virtuosity on the double bass, or "bull-fiddle," as it is known in Wessex, is so rare that musical histories record but two experts, Domenico Dragonetti (1765-1846) and Sergei Koussevitsky, Mr. Juht's chief at ~~Boston, who as~~ a young man made a fortune in Eastern Europe with double-bass recitals. Two of the latter's compositions, a Chanson Triste and a Valse Miniature, were a feature of the program. The instrument used by Mr. Juht is a Ruggieri which was in possession of a noble family in Scotland for 200 years; and listeners (especially 'cellists) were literally amazed by the cantilena and legato quality the soloist was able to attain from the roughest of instruments. Tuned a full tone above ordinary orchestral pitch, he made it literally sing in works by such composers as Couperin, Lully and Greig. The most extended work was a tuneful Sonata by a forgotten Englishman, H. Eccles, composed probably for Dragonetti, but the number which seemed most suited to the nature of the instrument was "Ase's Death" by Greig, which as played by Mr. Juht had a quality of abysmal grief.

Musical historians of Dragonetti's viol made by Gasparo da Salo of Cremona as amazing in perfection. In 1846 it was bequeathed by the musician to St. Mark's in Venice, where he was born. It subsequently passed into the hands of collectors and was finally acquired by the late R. S. Williams of Toronto. It now stands in the Royal Ontario Museum at Toronto. This was the instrument used by Dragonetti in the first performance of the Ninth Symphony, Vienna, 1824, in which he went from London to take part at the invitation of his friend, Beethoven.

HENRY
THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
NEW YORK

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN

APR 30 1939

SAMOVAR IS GIVEN TO KOUSSEVITZKY

End Of 15th Season In Symphony Noted

Boston, April 29—(AP)—A richly-designed silver samovar was presented to Serge Koussevitzky tonight at the close of a concert which marked the end of his 15th season as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Ernest B. Dane, president of the orchestra's trustees, made the presentation on behalf of the trustees, and voiced appreciation for Koussevitzky's "15 years of unsurpassed achievement."

Carl Faberge, famous artisan who was silver and gold smith to the late Czar of Russia, made the samovar. Art patrons consider it an unusual work because most samovars are made of copper or brass.

WAUKEGAN, ILL.
NEWS - SUN

OCT 7 - 1938

Bruno Walter to Appear in U. S. as Guest Conductor

New York Philharmonic Will Open Ninety-seventh Season October 20.

New York, (U.P.)—Bruno Walter, exile from Nazi Germany and Austria, has accepted an invitation of Dr. Hans Kindler, director of the National Symphony Orchestra, to appear in Washington as guest conductor during the coming season.

An open letter from Kindler last May in the Musical Courier, urging American conductors to make a place for the famous German musician on their winter programs, received wide attention.

Since the Nazi invasion of Austria, Walter has conducted summer concerts at Monte Carlo, and at a special festival in Lucerne, Switzerland.

• • •

One of the few events of its kind ever held in the South, a three-day chamber music festival, is expected to attract many visitors from Dixie states to Birmingham October 7-9.

Intended, according to its sponsors, to demonstrate that "the South is not allergic to chamber music," the festival will consist of four concerts. Two performances will be by the Curtis String Quartet and two by Birmingham musicians.

The program will be sponsored by the Birmingham Chamber Music Society, an organization of professional musicians. Ottokar Cadek, well known violinist, is its director.

The concerts, to be presented in the Birmingham Little Theater, will include works of Bach, Mozart, Tschaikowsky, Gluck, Hindemith, Beethoven, Mason and Brahms.

Proceeds will be used for the establishment of a Memorial Library of Chamber Music.

Orchestra News

Trans Oct 6

The fifty-eighth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its fifteenth under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky will begin with the concerts of tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening with a program consisting of Vivaldi's Concerto in D minor for orchestra with organ, Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" Overture, Brahms' Variations on a Theme of Haydn and Beethoven's Symphony in C minor.

Music News

B. Herald - Oct. 2/38

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will open its 58th season at Symphony Hall with the usual Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts this week.

Monday, Tuesday Symphonies

Notable events are announced for the shorter series of six Monday evening and six Tuesday afternoon concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, opening Oct. 24 and 25. Distinguished soloists, two guest conductors of the highest standing in the musical world, and four programs under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky are announced for this series in which, occurring approximately once a month, the programs of the Monday evening concert will be repeated on the following Tuesday afternoon.

The soloists will include Pierre and Genia Luboshutz, who will appear with the orchestra in the Concerto for two pianos, of Mozart. Myra Hess, the famous English pianist, will appear as soloist in another pair of concerts. Georges Enesco, the Roumanian composer, conductor and violinist, whose visit as guest conductor was one of the events of the longer series last year, will return to conduct this season in the shorter series as well. Another guest of the highest distinction will be Igor Stravinsky, who, visiting America next March, will conduct concerts of both series, appearing likewise as piano soloist in music of his own.

The Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon concerts will be given on Oct. 24-25, Dec. 26-27, Jan. 16-17, Feb. 20-21, March 20-21, April 17-18. Season tickets are now obtainable at the subscription office in Symphony Hall.

AKRON, O.
BEACON - JOURNAL

OCT 2 - 1938

New Deal For Music Comes To Akron University;

By OSCAR SMITH
Beacon Journal Music Editor

THERE'LL never be a time at Akron university, so long as C. Neil Starr directs the glee clubs, band and orchestra, when boy and girl students won't have an opportunity to exercise their musical talents.

No student will ever receive that dread message, a curt note in his mailbox, to the effect that he is no longer in the glee club, the band or the orchestra, according to Starr.

The 30-year-old music instructor is a graduate of the University of Cincinnati music conservatory, and has just come to Akron from Northwestern university's music department, where he received his master's degree and taught in the conservatory.

One doesn't need to talk with Starr more than a few minutes to be convinced that he has great dreams and plans for making music an important subject at Akron university.

"Everyone interested in music will be given an opportunity," he said. "I don't believe in hurting a student by kicking him out of the glee club, band or orchestra, perhaps discouraging him for his entire college course. We'll find a way, somehow, for every boy and girl to study music and participate in musical activities."

Now, there's a program that has this department's hearty support. Perhaps there never has been a college or university in the country in which favoritism, or "politics," has not played a part in the selection of candidates for glee clubs, bands and orchestras. If only the favored few are permitted to participate in these organizations, school music is bound to suffer.

Starr said there are about 75 or 80 in the combined men's and women's glee clubs at the university, and that from that group he will select a specialized group for an a cappella choir. Then he will further break down that group into the University Singers, an organization that has been in existence for several years.

Glee clubs now are made up almost entirely of freshmen, with a few sophomores and juniors. Starr explained that the large glee club organization is a "feeder or friend-maker." The singer who is not selected for the choir or University Singers need not feel discouraged. He still is in the glee club, still is wanted as a singer.

Band

THIS YEAR, according to Starr, the Akron university band is going to be strictly a university organization. In the past, high school students have played at times with the university musicians in bands and orchestras.

C. NEIL STARR
. . . new director

JASCHA HEIFETZ
. . . opens course

From now on all university musical groups will be for university students and alumni only. Starr is hopeful over the way enrollment in the band is increasing.

Twenty signed up at the beginning of the school year; at the first rehearsal there were 21; at the second, 29; at the third, 34, and at the fourth, 42.

"Our battle cry for the band is 100 musicians on Buchtel field when Akron university plays Xavier on Oct. 8," Starr said.

The band needs good piccolo players. Starr explained that if the band gets too large, another one will be started.

"Of course, this means more work for the director," he said. "But it is a system that will make friends. I'll be able to say to a student, 'John, I may not be able to use you in my large organization, but I can in a smaller one.'"

Orchestra

STARR BELIEVES the university orchestra should have 60 or 70 pieces. It hasn't been that large in the past.

"There's no reason why this university shouldn't have a fine, large, complete symphony orchestra — violas, 'cellos, plenty of basses, oboes, tympani and bassoons. There's a scarcity of flute players at Akron university. Why, I don't know," Starr said.

We hope that he will be able to realize his ambition in that direction. Several unsuccessful attempts have been made to maintain symphony orchestras here. Since we have no municipal symphony, there is an excellent opportunity for Akron university to make a name for itself in that field.

STARR HAS AN ambitious program mapped out for himself. He has youth, enthusiasm and a background of good training. Furthermore, he will find there is a great deal of musical talent in Akron, waiting to be developed.

AKRON'S TUESDAY MUSICAL club and the Cleveland concert course, under the direction of Mrs. Emil Brudno, both open their fall activities in November.

The Akron course opens at the armory on Nov. 1, with the Mordkin Ballet, a company of 60, and the Cleveland course on Nov 4 with Jascha Heifetz, noted violinist. Both cities will have Vronsky and Babin, Russian duo pianists, Akron on Jan. 24 and Cleveland on Jan. 20.

Different talent is offered on all the other programs. The Cleveland course, opening its sixth season under the auspices of the Cleveland Museum of Art, will be given at the public music hall.

There are no conflicts between the two cities' courses, for the benefit of music lovers. The other artists to appear in Akron are Robert Virovai, violinist, Nov. 15; Anna Kaskas, contralto, and Richard Bonelli, baritone, Dec. 6; Grace Moore, soprano, March 14, and the Cleveland orchestra, April 11.

Other artists in Cleveland are Argentinita and her Spanish ballet, Nov. 18; the Boston Symphony orchestra, direct~~ed by Serge Kou~~ssevitsky, Dec. 9; Yehudi Menuhin, violinist, Jan. 6; Marian Anderson, great Negro contralto, Feb. 3, and Robert Casadesus, French pianist, in his Cleveland debut, Feb. 17.

Two extra events in Cleveland are a benefit performance for the diabetic camp for children on Dec. 16, with Harriet Eels, soprano, and Beryl Rubinstein and Arthur Loesser, duo pianists, and a solo dance recital by Harold Kreutzberg on Feb. 22 in the Little Theater of the public music hall.

TORONTO, CAN.
SATURDAY NIGHT

OCT 8 - 1938

LOCAL music lovers had a unique experience last week when they heard a recital on the double bass viol by Ludwig Juht, leader of that section in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the foremost Esthonian musician in America. The occasion was a Finnish-Esthonian evening in Margaret Eaton Hall organized by A. K. Graham, K.C., Honorary Consul for Finland. Many leading orchestral musicians were present to enjoy what was for them a new sensation.

Virtuosity on the double bass, or "bull-fiddle," as it is known in Wessex, is so rare that musical histories record but two experts, Domenico Dragonetti (1765-1846) and Sergei Koussevitsky, Mr. Juht's chief at ~~Boston, who as~~ a young man made a fortune in Eastern Europe with double-bass recitals. Two of the latter's compositions, a Chanson Triste and a Valse Miniature, were a feature of the program. The instrument used by Mr. Juht is a Ruggieri which was in possession of a noble family in Scotland for 200 years; and listeners (especially 'cellists) were literally amazed by the cantilena and legato quality the soloist was able to attain from the roughest of instruments. Tuned a full tone above ordinary orchestral pitch, he made it literally sing in works by such composers as Couperin, Lully and Greig. The most extended work was a tuneful Sonata by a forgotten Englishman, H. Eccles, composed probably for Dragonetti, but the number which seemed most suited to the nature of the instrument was "Ase's Death" by Greig, which as played by Mr. Juht had a quality of abysmal grief.

Musical historians of Dragonetti's viol made by Gasparo da Salo of Cremona as amazing in perfection. In 1846 it was bequeathed by the musician to St. Mark's in Venice, where he was born. It subsequently passed into the hands of collectors and was finally acquired by the late R. S. Williams of Toronto. It now stands in the Royal Ontario Museum at Toronto. This was the instrument used by Dragonetti in the first performance of the Ninth Symphony, Vienna, 1824, in which he went from London to take part at the invitation of his friend, Beethoven.

HENRY THE ORIGINAL ROMEIKE PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU NEW YORK

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN

APR 30 1939

SAMOVAR IS GIVEN TO KOUSSEVITZKY

End Of 15th Season In Symphony Noted

Boston, April 29—(AP)—A richly-designed silver samovar was presented to Serge Koussevitzky tonight at the close of a concert which marked the end of his 15th season as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Ernest B. Dane, president of the orchestra's trustees, made the presentation on behalf of the trustees, and voiced appreciation for Koussevitzky's "15 years of unsurpassed achievement."

Carl Faberge, famous artisan who was silver and gold smith to the late Czar of Russia, made the samovar. Art patrons consider it an unusual work because most samovars are made of copper or brass.

WAUKEGAN, ILL.
NEWS-SUN

OCT 7 - 1938

Bruno Walter to Appear in U. S. as Guest Conductor

New York Philharmonic Will Open Ninety-seventh Season October 20.

New York, (U.P.)—Bruno Walter, exile from Nazi Germany and Austria, has accepted an invitation of Dr. Hans Kindler, director of the National Symphony Orchestra, to appear in Washington as guest conductor during the coming season.

An open letter from Kindler last May in the Musical Courier, urging American conductors to make a place for the famous German musician on their winter programs, received wide attention.

Since the Nazi invasion of Austria, Walter has conducted summer concerts at Monte Carlo, and at a special festival in Lucerne, Switzerland.

• • •

One of the few events of its kind ever held in the South, a three-day chamber music festival, is expected to attract many visitors from Dixie States to Birmingham October 7-9.

Intended, according to its sponsors, to demonstrate that "the South is not allergic to chamber music," the festival will consist of four concerts. Two performances will be by the Curtis String Quartet and two by Birmingham musicians.

The program will be sponsored by the Birmingham Chamber Music Society, an organization of professional musicians. Ottokar Cadek, well known violinist, is its director.

The concerts, to be presented in the Birmingham Little Theater, will include works of Bach, Mozart, Tschaikowsky, Gluck, Hindemith, Beethoven, Mason and Brahms.

Proceeds will be used for the establishment of a [illegible] Library of Chamber [illegible]

Orchestra News

Tran Oct 6

The fifty-eighth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its fifteenth under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky will begin with the concerts of tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening with a program consisting of Vivaldi's Concerto in D minor for orchestra with organ, Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" Overture, Brahms' Variations on a Theme of Haydn and Beethoven's Symphony in C minor.

Famed Maestro Snapped Conducting Symphony

B. D. Record – Oct. 6/38

R. SERGEI KOUSSEVITSKY, L.; VIOLINIST RICHARD BURGIN

"GET READY THERE"

"CAREFUL NOW, CAREFUL"

"LET'S HAVE THAT MELODY"

"VERY NICE—VERY NICE"

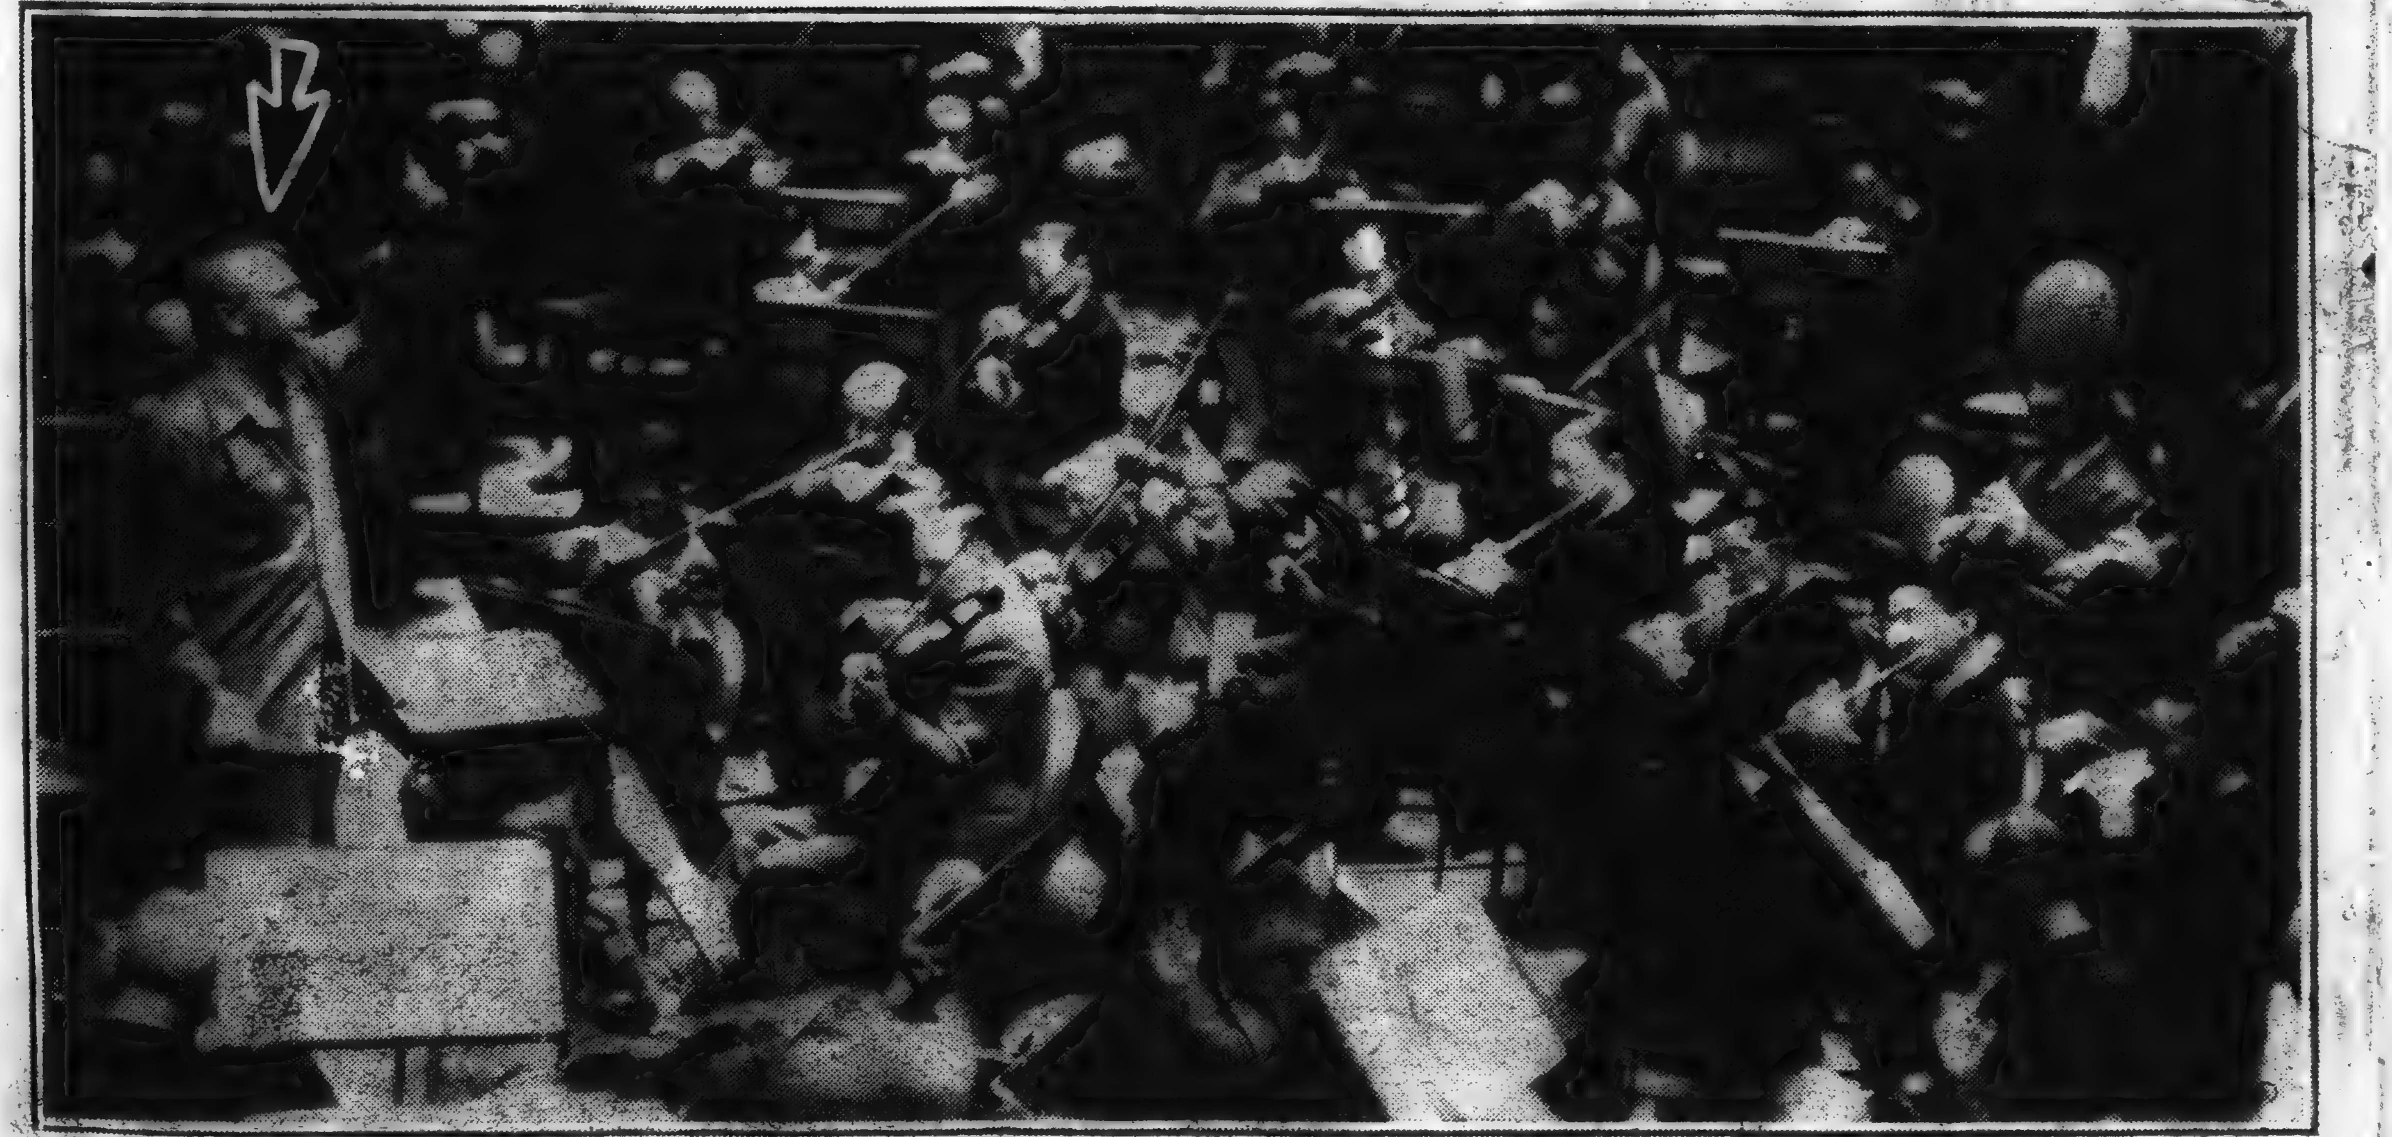
"MAKE THOSE VIOLINS SING"

Exclusive

Pictured for first time ever, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Sergei Koussevitsky, famous conductor, is seen in these photos made during rehearsal of the group yesterday.

Candid

Dr. Koussevitsky, indicated by arrow, as he led his group in rehearsal yesterday. Annual series at Symphony Hall includes performances each Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.



(All Photos by Larry McDavitt, Daily Record Staff Photographer)

"Eet Mus' Zing, Gentlemen!"

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

International

Koussevitzky at Rehearsal

Koussevitzky Thanks Public

Koussevitzky Thanks Public For Support

Monitor - Oct. 8/38

The Arts in Boston

By L. A. Sloper

To celebrate the opening of his fifteenth year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky made a speech yesterday afternoon from the platform of Symphony Hall. It was a characteristic little speech, warmly thanking the audience of the orchestra for its material and particularly for its moral support of music. "This," he said, "is our greatest stimulation."

This was not the first speech Dr. Koussevitzky had made in America. He spoke at the fifteenth anniversary of the orchestra, in honor of Sir George Henschel, its first conductor. He spoke at the Beethoven Festival. He spoke last summer, very effectively, at the Berkshire Festival. He has submitted a few words on other occasions. But he has never cultivated the lecture-recital habit, and his remarks have usually been to the point. They were so yesterday. Here is what he said:

"As you know, I do not like to speak from the stage. But in 15 years, once you will permit me to say a few words to you.

"Your orchestra is now one of the greatest orchestras in the world, if not the greatest, as the whole musical world recognizes it today. If we have realized this, it is not only because we work hard and we have your material support, but also because we have your moral support, your profound understanding, your deep feeling of the importance and necessity of musical art. That is our greatest stimulation. And today, we express to you our gratitude."

* * *

Of course he was warmly applauded by audience and orchestra, and the orchestra's fifty-eighth season was thus opened with generous manifestations of good will on all sides. Dr. Josef Hofmann contributed to the jubilation with the following telegram:

"Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Care Boston Symphony Orchestra: My heartiest congratulations and sincere admiration for the lifetime of musical triumphs you have accomplished in 15 years, and I join all others in hoping that you will celebrate jubilee after jubilee at the helm of your superb orchestra.

"Josef Hofmann."

Certainly there was complete justification for all these felicitations. The orchestra remains at the top of its form, which is unsurpassed. The personnel is unaltered in any important particular from last year. The most noticeable change is the restoration of a tenth doublebass, missing for several years. Dr. Koussevitzky continues at the height of his powers as program-maker and interpreter, after by far the longest service on the podium in the orchestra's history and one of the longest records of service as conductor in America. The musical public, moreover, seems firm in its loyalty to this great orchestra and its leader. Indeed, we have much to be thankful for musically.

* * *

The opening program of the season, which will be repeated this evening, was made up of the first three items of Dr. Koussevitzky's first program in Boston, and the first symphony he conducted in America. The works are: Vivaldi's Concerto in A minor for orchestra with organ, edited by A. Siloti; Berlioz's Overture, "The Roman Carnival"; the Brahms Variations on a Theme of Haydn, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

A program which called for a wide catholicity of taste in the director, and a full flexibility in the players, demands which were fulfilled in the manner with which we are familiar. Neither the works nor the performances require detailed comment at this date, but it was interesting to note that Dr. Koussevitzky has restored to its place the rest which follows the first four notes in the score of the Fifth Symphony.

In addition to the cordial greetings at the opening, there was warm applause for the several items of the program, and an ovation at the close of the symphony.

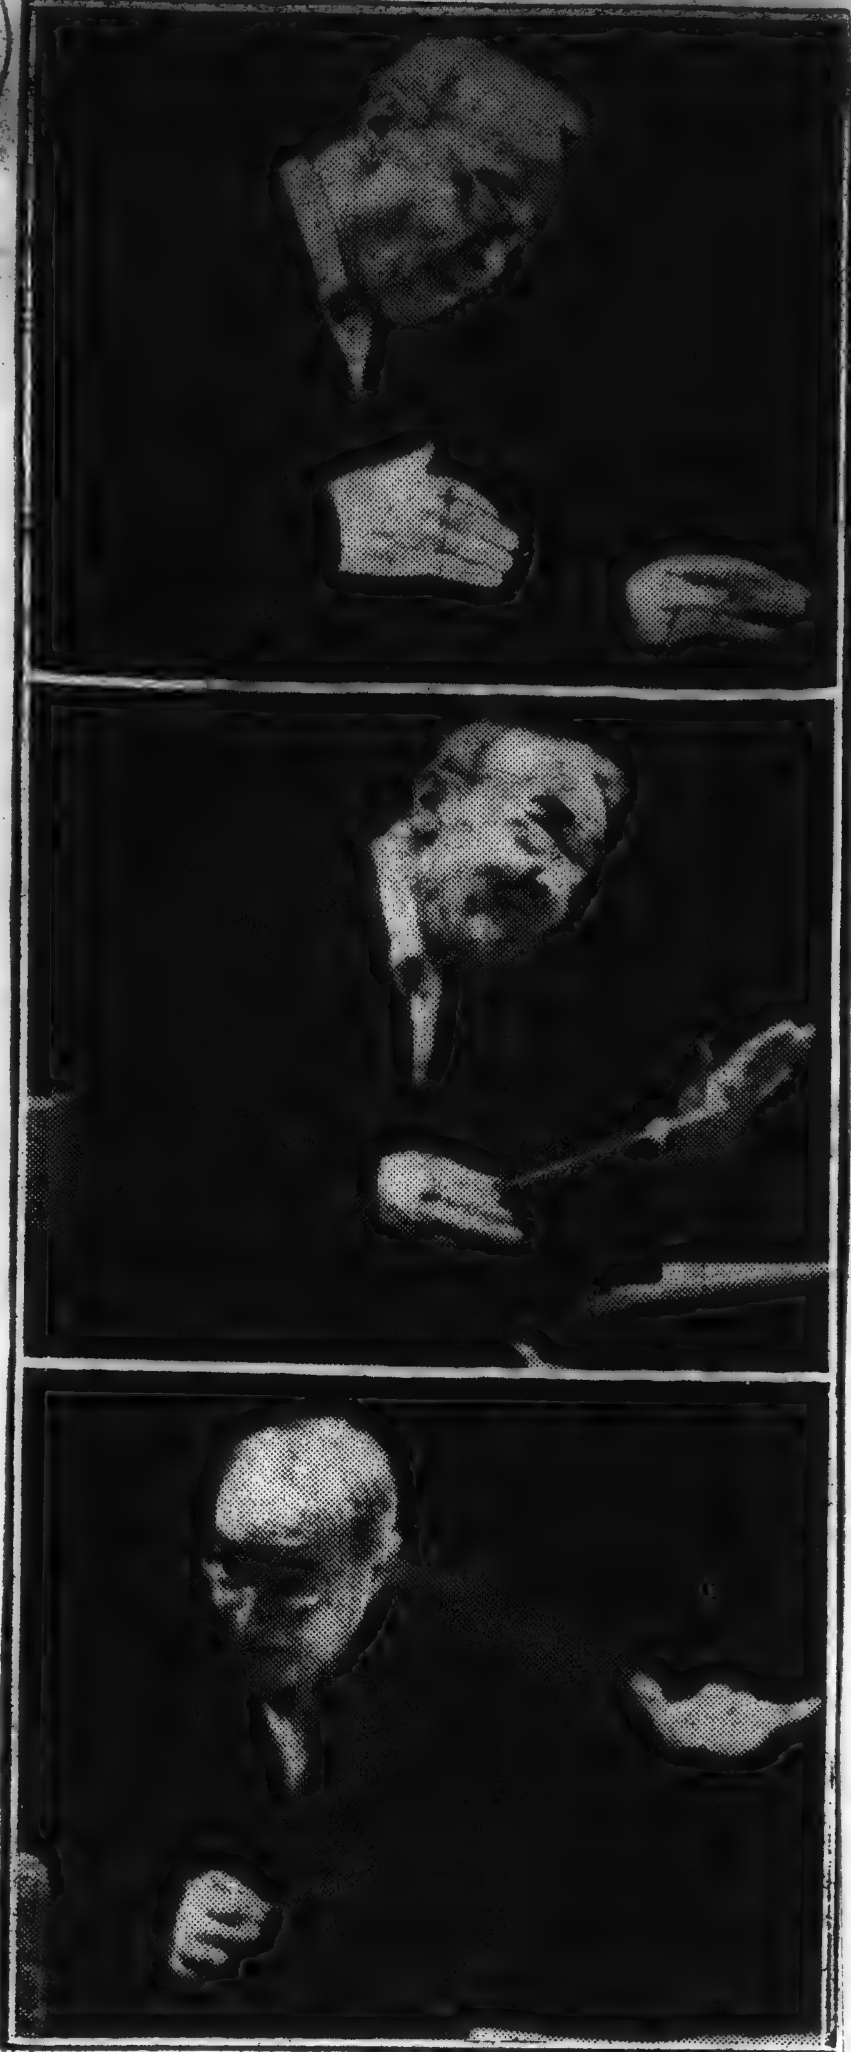
SOUTH BEND, IND.
TRIBUNE

OCT 7 - 1938

STRAVINSKY TO CONDUCT.

By United Press.

BOSTON, Mass., Oct. 7.—Igor Stravinsky, composer and conductor, will lead the Boston Symphony orchestra for two weeks during the annual mid-winter vacation of Serge Koussevitzky. The latter will have his 15th season as conductor of the orchestra.



Maestro in action.—Famed Conductor Serge Koussevitzky is snapped by American cameraman in characteristic poses as he rehearses Symphony orchestra.

B. American Oct. 6/38

RADIO GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.

OCT 8 - 1938

New Celebratory Book Of Tributes to Gershwin

NEWSPAPERS, magazines and radio recently celebrated the memory of George Gershwin to emphasize the first anniversary of his untimely death, which came as a painful shock to all who admired his music.

Now comes a new book, "George Gershwin" (Longmans, Green & Co., New York and Toronto), edited and designed by Merle Armitage of Los Angeles. The volume has no single author, but is written by friends of Gershwin, who reminisce about the phases of his life, work or personality which they knew best. The result is a series of variegated sketches as many-sided as the man who exerted such powerful influence upon the lighter music of his land.

The opening contribution in Mr. Armitage's collection is a poem by Oscar Hammerstein, and Irving Berlin also expresses his sentiments in verse. Some of the other contributors are Beverly Nichols, the novelist; Olin Downes, New York music critic; Eva Gauthier, concert soprano; Sam H. Harris, theatrical manager; and Paul Whiteman, Walter Damrosch, Harold Arlen, Arnold Schoenberg, Rudy Vallee, Leonard Liebling, Jerome Kern, Du Bose Heyward (author of "Porgy and Bess"), Rouben Mamoulian, Serge Koussevitzky, and Ira Gershwin, who wrote most of the lyrics for his brother's songs. Unusual illustrations enrich the book; facsimiles of oil paintings from Gershwin's brush, including self-portraits and general subjects in oil, pencil and water-color; and a picture of several of the sculptures he fashioned. It has been said by experts that George Gershwin might have been a great painter had he not been wooed and won by music.

The book is filled with luminous anecdotes of this vivid and grandly gifted personage.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS
STANDARD-TIMES

OCT 8 - 1938

Koussevitzky Opens 15th Concert Season

BOSTON, Oct. 8 (UP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, now recognized as the ranking United States conductor, inaugurated his 15th season yesterday as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

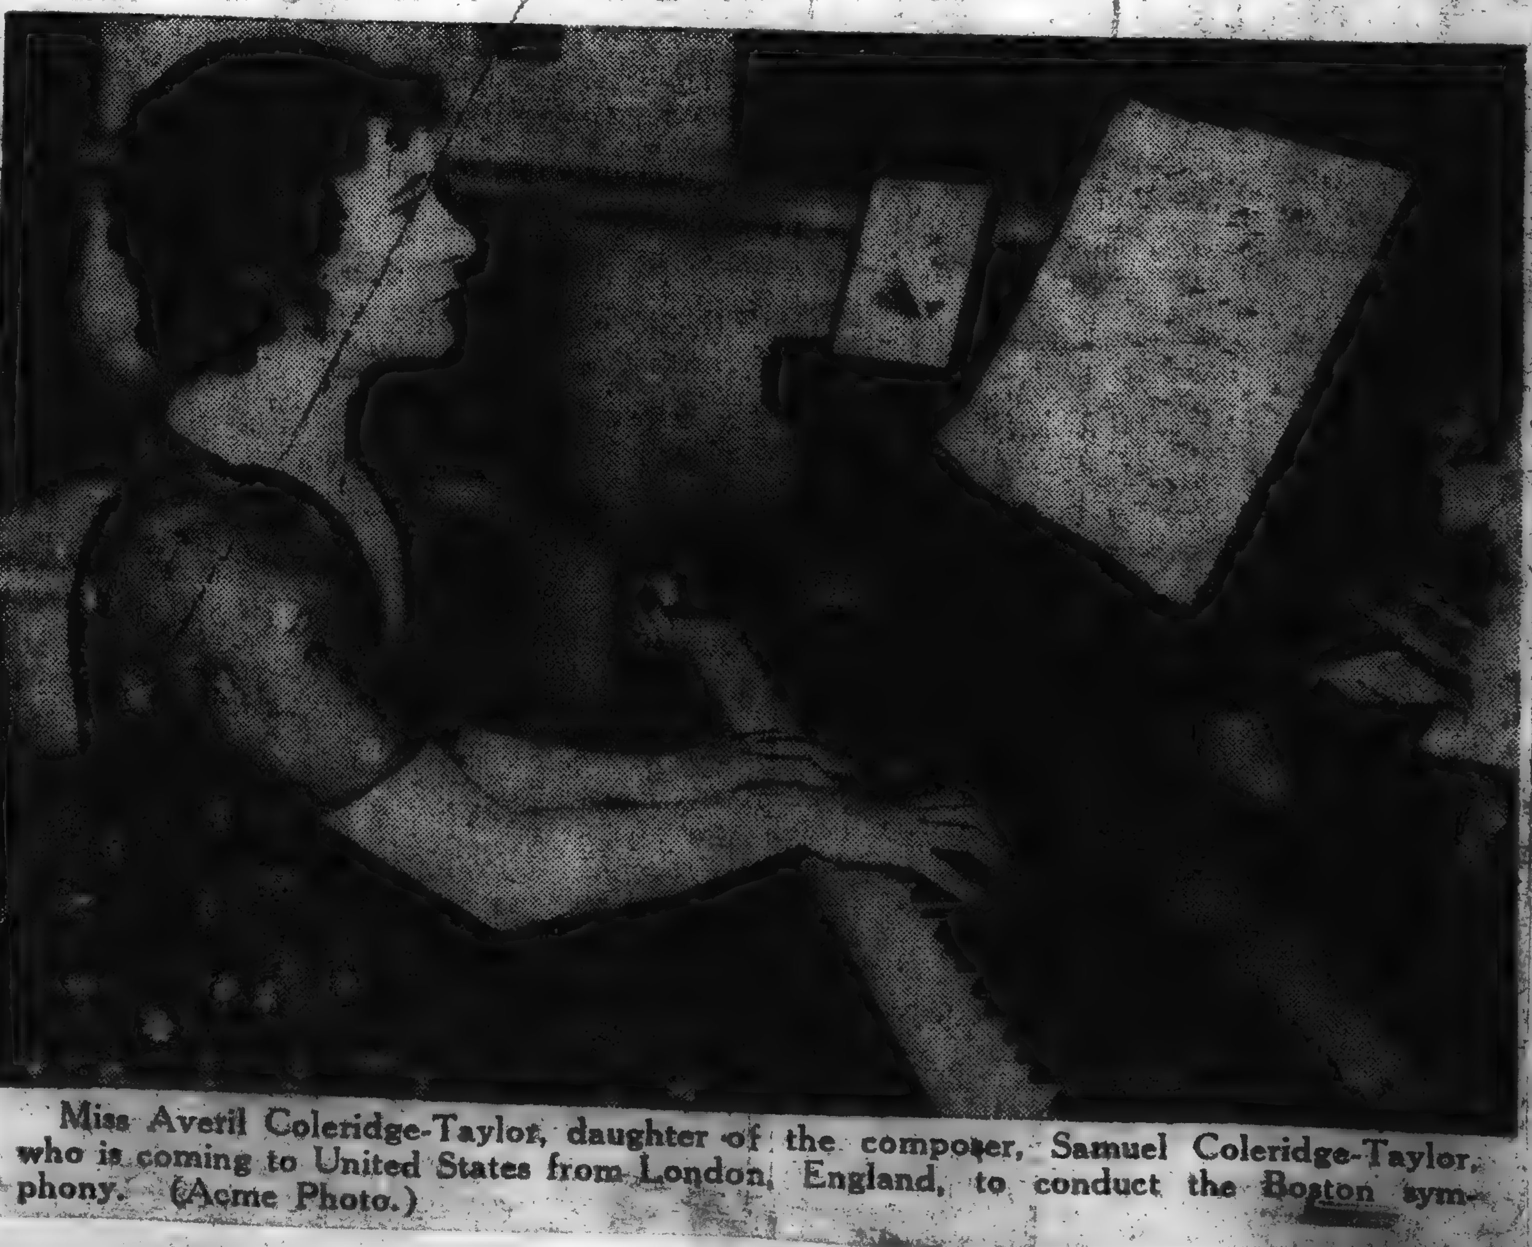
Before the season's opening concert yesterday afternoon, Dr. Koussevitzky, who rarely speaks from the stage, addressed the audience briefly, thanking it for its moral support and praising the members of his orchestra.

SOUTH BEND, IND.
NEWS-TIMES

OCT 7 - 1938

[illegible]

Daughter Of Composer To Lead Orchestra



Miss Averil Coleridge-Taylor, daughter of the composer, Samuel Coleridge-Taylor, who is coming to United States from London, England, to conduct the Boston symphony. (Acme Photo.)

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

Serge Koussevitzky Starts 15th Season with Symphony

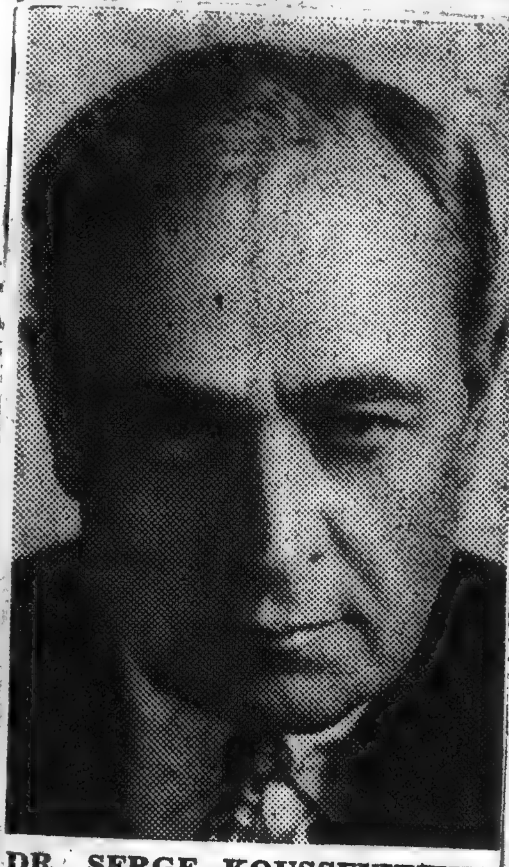
Leader Hails Players And Music-Lovers for Great Orchestra

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

Special to The Hartford Times

Boston—Said Dr. Serge Koussevitzky from the podium yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall on the occasion of the first concert of the 1938-39 season:

"I am not one of those conductors who make speeches, but just once in 15 years you must permit me to say a few words. You now have one of the greatest orchestras in the world (applause) —if not the greatest (more applause)—and it is only partly because of the great work these men have done. It is such material and the moral support as you people have given that is the prime necessity for the achievement of the greatest in art."



DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Koussevitzky Exhibition

In the first balcony gallery before the concert and during intermission was to be seen the Koussevitzky exhibition, a collection of portraits in oils and watercolors, sculptures and photographs all on the one subject of Koussevitzky. Programs and scores dedicated to the Boston Symphony leader are also on display.

Reminiscent of his first American appearance in 1924 was the program for Friday afternoon's concert, the first half of which was identical with the one which comprised his Boston debut, that is, Vivaldi's D minor Concerto, the Roman Carnival Overture of Berlioz and the Haydn Variations of Brahms. Instead of Scriabine's Poeme d'Extase and Honegger's Pacific 231, the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven was used to complete the present list.

There's a commentary in this alteration. In the first place it indicates that from the beginning Koussevitzky's mind has been open to the publication of new works. a virtue which he vigilantly retains today. Secondly, Dr. Koussevitzky's ministry is a more enduring art than Scriabine or Honegger's early novelty, for what conductor would think of programing either of these works in 1938? Perhaps Koussevitzky chose the venerable Fifth of Beethoven as a diplomatic hint to contemporary composers that here was a landmark which they had not yet passed for all their modernity.

Its Thrills Remain

Koussevitzky's performance of the Fifth is a very special thing anyway. He has a Jovian conception of the work and it literally shakes him to produce it. Every listener is left somewhat limp and chastened at the experience and the last permissible thought would be that it is overfamiliar and desiccated. Its juices still are ruddy and intoxicating.

It was good to be able to shake hands with the Brahms Variations again after the nodding salutation one was afforded with them at Silvermine in August because of acoustical handicaps. Down in Norwalk there was a young woman who remarked of the final page that she didn't like it much because the entrance of the triangle suggested that someone ought to answer the telephone.

The observation was perfectly pertinent then but its application was utterly erased in the confines of Symphony Hall where each nuance and material component was audible in its true sigificance. This performance was wholly restorative.

It was easy to imagine that concert in 1924 when Koussevitzky opened up with the Berlioz overture an unfailing aid to any new conductor. It was on the program of John Barbirolli when he made his first appearance in Bushnell Hall. At that time the work flattered both Barbirolli and Berlioz. Friday afternoon it drew particular attention to the players and from the standpoint of sensuous art some of the finest tones of the concert were compressed into those spectacular pages.

Violins' Opportunity

The D minor was the fifth concerto of Vivaldi to be played by the Boston Orchestra and it is doubtful that any other American group can count as many. The bare opening statement afforded an opportunity to the upper strings to demonstrate the cutting edge which. when that timbre is required, distinguishes the Boston violins.

Symphony Hall was well filled with a crowd whose enthusiasm was infectious and must have heartened both leader and orchestra at the beginning of another season.

GLOUCESTER, MASS.
TIMES

OCT 8 - 1938

GIRLS GOING TO BOSTON CONCERTS

Twenty members of the Girls' Glee club, attending the Youth concert, will leave for Boston on Wednesday, October 19. This concert, the first of three, is sponsored by the Youth Concerts association and is not open to the general public, but to the boys and girls of junior and senior high school age who are interested in music. The other two concerts will be held on the Wednesdays of November 9 and December 14. These the same girls will also attend.

Wheeler Beckett, who has conducted these concerts for young people in San Francisco and Richmond, Va., will conduct the concerts in Boston. Seventy members of the Boston Symphony orchestra will comprise Mr. Beckett's orchestra. Each program will present music inspired by various aspects ofthe one general subject, and will follow the development of musical expression from the early, relatively simple and direct manner to the modern, subtle and complex.

The program of the first concert will consist of music inspired by imagination and fantasy.

The second concert will consist of music inspired by nature; the third, music inspired by love.

The interest in these concerts was so keen that it was necessary to limit the seats for each school. The number of reservations allotted to Gloucester was 20.

Among girls who will attend these concerts are Cynthia Crowe, Jean Fitzpatrick, Dorothy Flygare, Joanne Hartford, Ruth Josephson. Elaine Lopez, Patricia Lufkin, Eleanor Mattos, Melba McKay, Jane McLaughlin. Jean McLean, Jean McPhee, Juanita Parks, Priscilla Parkhurst, Pauline Presson, Katherine Savage, Geraldine Stickney and Charlotte Woodbury.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

OCT 8 - 1938

Koussevitzky Starts 15th Year With Symphony

BOSTON, Oct. 7 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky began his 15th season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra today by departing from custom and making a brief pre-concert speech from the podium at Symphony Hall.

Asserting the musical world recognized the Boston group as "one of the greatest orchestras in the world—if not the greatest," the Russian-born conductor attributed it to his listeners' "deep feeling of the importance and necessity of art."

For the anniversary, Koussevitzky chose four numbers that appeared on his first two programs in 1924—when he made his debut here. They were Vivaldi's orchestral concerto, Berlioz' Roman carnival overture, Brahms' variations on a theme by Haydn, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony—the latter the first symphony that he performed in this country.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
JOURNAL

OCT 8 - 1938

HOW TO LEAD A SYMPHONY

MAESTRO AT WORK--These excellent candid camera shots show how Dr. Sergei Koussevitsky conducts the famed Boston Symphony orchestra. This is his fifteenth year on the podium.

BANGOR, ME.
NEWS

OCT 8 - 1938

Boston Symphony Opens Its Season

BOSTON, Oct. 7—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky began his fifteenth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra today by departing from custom and making a brief pre-concert speech from the podium of Symphony Hall.

Asserting the musical world recognized the Boston group as "one of the greatest orchestras in the world—if not the greatest," the Russian-born conductor attributed it to his listeners' "deep feeling of the importance and necessity of art..'

For the anniversary, Dr. Koussevitzky chose four numbers that appeared on his first two programs in 1924—when he made his debut here. They were Vivaldi's orchestral concerto, Berlioz' Roman Carnival overture, Brahms' variations on a theme by, Hayden, and Beethoven's fifth symphony—the latter the first symphony that he performed in this country.

NYACK, N. Y.
JOURNAL - NEWS

OCT 7 - 1938

AUDIENCE JOINS CHORUS

STOCKBRIDGE, Mass., Aug. 7. (INS—When the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its season at "Tanglewood" here, an old custom was revived and the audience was invited to join the Cecelia Chorus of Boston in singing the second verse of Bach's magnificent old hymn, "Ein Feste Burg Ist Unser Gott."

HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript Telegram

OCT 8 - 1938

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, now recognized as the ranking United States conductor, inaugurated his 15th season yesterday as conductor of the Boston Symphony odchestra. Before the season's opening concert in Boston yesterday afternoon, Dr. Koussevitzky, who rarely speaks from the stage, addressed the audience briefly, thanking it for its moral support and praising the members of his orchestra.

NORWICH, CONN.
BULLETIN

OCT 8 - 1938

Serge Koussevitzky began his fifteenth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra by departing from custom and making a brief pre-concert speech from the podium at Symphony hall.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

OCT 8 - 1938

KOUSSEVITZKY CONDUCTING.—Pictured for the first time conducting Boston's famed symphony orchestra is Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky, the tyrannical genius who is starting his 15th consecutive year on the Boston podium. In rehearsal, here, he appears as few of his greatest admirers ever have seen him, in his old sweater.

NEWARK, N. J.
LEDGER

OCT 8 - 1938

12

SLAVE-DRIVER—That's what they call Dr. Sergei Koussevitsky, tyrannical genius pictured here for first time conducting Boston's famed symphony orchestra. Photos show maestro as few ever have seen him, in old coat sweater instead of immaculate white tie and tails. Koussevitsky rages at his musicians when things go wrong, but breaks out in eruptions of encomium when they give him the effect he is striving for. This season marks his 15th on the Boston podium

---

BOSTON GLOBE—SATURDAY, OCTOBER

Koussevitzky Opens 15th Year As Symphony Conductor Here

Warmth of Welcome Prompts Him to Note Anniversary With Brief, Gracious Speech

FELICITATIONS EXTENDED CONDUCTOR
Dr. Serge Koussevitzky (left) receives congratulations of Edward A. Taft, chairman of the Society of Friends of Boston Symphony.

For the 15th time, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky mounted the conductor's stand at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, to begin a season of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The afternoon was, therefore, an occasion, with the Friday audience welcoming this illustrious musician with a warmth evident and gratifying. Except in a few cases, the terms of conductors among American orchestras have been relatively short. Fourteen years as leader of a major symphonic organization is a substantial length of time. In the present instance it is a record, the longest tenure in the history of the Boston Symphony.

As usual upon his first appearance, applause for Dr. Koussevitzky was hearty and continuing. Once again all in the auditorium arose to greet him; once again he made his graceful little self-effacing gesture, thereby asking the audience to resume their seats. Up to this point the beginning of another Symphony season proceeded according to established ritual.

Makes Gracious Speech

A 15th anniversary, however, demands some departure from custom. It was forthcoming in a short speech by the conductor.

"As you know," he said, "I do not like to speak from the stage. But in 15 years once you will permit me to say a few words to you. Your orchestra is now one of the greatest orchestras in the world—if not the greatest, as the whole musical world recognizes it today. If we have realized this, it is not only because we work hard and we have your material support, but also because we have your moral support, your profound understanding, your deep feeling of the importance and necessity of musical art. That is our greatest stimulation. And today, we express to you our gratitude."

Fittingly, Dr. Koussevitzky chose for this opening program three scores which he conducted at his Boston debut in 1924—the orchestral Concerto of Vivaldi as edited by Alexander Siloti; Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" Overture, and the set of variations which Brahms wrote upon the "St. Antoni" chorale of Haydn. After intermission came the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven, which stood upon Dr. Koussevitzky's second Boston program and was the first symphony he conducted in the United States.

"Serge Koussevitzky will make the Boston Symphony Orchestra once more first in the world, if the deep impression he made on his first Boston audience yesterday afternoon is any test," wrote the Globe's music reviewer on Oct. 11, 1924. Prophetic words, indeed. Long since his achievements were recognized by musical authorities who, as far back as the 50th anniversary season, spoke of the Boston orchestra as "perhaps the best in the world today."

Attains Olympian Grandeur

The rich, intense tone, the technical perfection of the players; Dr. Koussevitzky's emotionally intense readings of masterpieces of all periods have been the subject of thousands of laudatory words. No doubt orchestra and conductor have mutually benefited by their long association, until the one has become the alert and sensitive instrument of the other. If Dr. Koussevitzky's dominating characteristics were once fire and vivid contrasts, his work as a whole may now be said to exhibit Olympian repose and grandeur, the natural result of continued work with a single orchestra.

Yesterday, as usual, the afternoon was one of superb performances. This reviewer could not imagine a more breath-taking account of Berloiz' overture—surely among the most brilliant of all overtures. Here was a performance in which elegance, precision and fire were equally mingled. Dr. Koussevitzky sems to take the first two of Brahms' variations a little slower than he used to—perhaps too slow, for one remembers more enthralling interpretation of the work from him. Vivaldi again showed off the fabulous tone of the strings. As for the Beethoven Fifth, that has always been among Dr. Koussevitzky's personal triumphs.

Next week Aaron Copland's "El Salon Mexico" will be played for the first time here. The program will include a Mozart Divertimento and Dvorak's "New World" Symphony.

C. W. D.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

OCT 9 - 1938

SECOND SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

The second pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will take place in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The programme will open with a Divertimento in B flat, K. No. 287, by Mozart, written in six parts for four string instruments and two horns. The first violin part of this divertimento is brilliantly written, and was performed by the composer in Munich in 1777, the year in which the piece was composed. In the coming performances, the combined string sections will be used.

Aaron Copland's "El Salon Mexico" will have its first Boston performance in the same programme. Copland wrote this rhapsody upon popular melodies which he heard during a sojourn in Mexico, and named it, after a famous dance hall in Mexico City. "El Salon Mexico" has been performed in Mexico City, and in London at the Festival of contemporary music last summer. The Symphony, "From the New World," by Dvorak, the Czech composer, will complete the programme.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

OCT 9 - 1938

MONDAY-TUESDAY SYMPHONY SERIES

The series of six programmes by the Boston Symphony Orchestra given on Monday evenings and repeated on the following Tuesday afternoon will begin October 24-25 in Symphony Hall. Myra Hess, the famous English pianist, will appear as soloist at one pair of concerts, and at another Genia and Pierre Luboshutz. The paired pianists will appear with the Orchestra in Mozart's Concerto. Two outstanding guests are announced for two pairs of programmes—Georges Enesco, and Igor Stravinsky. Four pairs of concerts will be conducted by Serge Koussevitzky.

13

BETTY ALDEN B. Amer. Oct 8/38

On Beacon Hill

Fashionable Socialites Flock to Concert

By BETTY ALDEN

BOSTON HOSTESSES need plan no more Friday afternoon affairs for quite some time . . . for with unanimous acceptance, like nothing else in Boston, the Symphony Orchestra takes over, and in social circles nothing is considered a greater faux pas than to issue invitations for an affair which would conflict with the regular Friday afternoon concerts in Symphony Hall . . .

Yesterday's opening concert of the new season was an auspicious occasion, especially since it marked the beginning of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's fifteenth year as conductor of this famous orchestra . . . The whole audience stood up and applauded warmly when the conductor and his musicians appeared on the stage before the opening measures of the program . . .

Every seat was occupied and during intermission the lobbies were crowded with music lovers strolling around to greet old friends and reiterate over and over again "Isn't it wonderful to be back again?" . . . Among the hundreds of socialites in the throng were Mrs. Eliot Codman, the former Mary Louise Spaulding, who has just returned from her honeymoon to attend the concert with her sister-in-law, Mrs. Daniel Codman . . . Mary Louise's mother, Mrs. Bartlett Harwood, was another fashionable concert-goer, her dark ensemble brightened by a tiny turban edged with a puff of shirred crimson velvet . . . The bride wore a sheer black wool dress with a silver fox scarf and Mrs. Daniel Codman's beige wool was enhanced by a beautiful scarf of beige lynx . . .

* * *

Fur Trimmed Hats Popular

MR. AND MRS. GUY MURCHIE of Dedham, who spend most of their time in the tropics, were warmly welcomed by many Boston friends as they strolled through the lobby . . . Mrs. Murchie's wine red suit topped by a small feathered turban . . . Mrs. George Tyson of Louisburg Square, who has just returned from her summer home in Newport, set off her blonde curls with a smart black costume and a tiny hat tipped with crimson ostrich feathers . . .

Flattering little fur trimmed hats were popular with the smartly dressed women . . . Mrs. Dudley Pickman, Jr., who attended with Mr. Pickman, wore one of mink to match her mink cape, and Nancy Richards of Groton also had a band of fur framing her face and dark hair . . . Mrs. E. Wiley Robb attended with her daughters, Roberta and Betsy, and Mrs. Frederick Ayer came up from Hamilton with her daughter, Anne . . . Evidently chilly breezes were a dime a dozen on the North Shore yesterday morning, for both Mrs. Ayer and Anne, as well as many other North Shoreites, were turned out in beautiful fur coats . . .

Husbands returning from State street and wives who had spent the afternoon at the concert, met at the Ritz Bar around five . . . where much attention was directed toward Anne Clark Roosevelt who was in a little party with Mrs. James Roosevelt and the latter's brother and sister-in-law, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Cushing . . . Anne had her little dachshund, Percy, in tow . . . and looked very pretty in a beige tailored coat and small brown hat . . .

* * *

Edith Shaw, Lilian Fernald Plan Debuts

THE RITZ will be lively on the evening of October 26 when Mrs. Sohier Shaw gives a dinner dance there for her daughter, Edith, and the latter's close friend, Lilian Fernald . . . This party will be Edith's official debut and will precede by a couple of days the tea which her grandfather Sohier is giving to celebrate her eighteenth birthday . . . Edith and Lilian have been friends since childhood and are constant companions at deb luncheons and teas . . . Lilian is the daughter of the Fred Fernalds of Beacon street and Marblehead Neck . . .

* * *

Junior League songbirds who would like to join the Glee Club will have to sing their do, re, mi's before officers of the club at the opening tea and tryouts of the Glee Club next Tuesday at the League. Arthur Fiedler, who has consented to conduct the concerts this year, will be guest of honor at the tea, and pourers will be Geraldine Field, the league's popular vice-president, and Mrs. Joseph Quarles, head of the arts and interests group . . .

Musical

Greet Orchestra at First Concert

MRS. ELIOT CODMAN MRS. DANIEL S. CODMAN

THE BEETHOVEN FIFTH SYMPHONY and the latest trends in interior decoration were the chief topics of conversation of this attractive pair as they enjoyed a smoke during intermission at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's opening concert yesterday. They are Mrs. Eliot Codman (Mary Louise Spaulding) and her sister-in-law, Mrs. Daniel S. Codman. The former has just returned from her honeymoon.

Boston Evening American Photo.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
OCT 9 - 1938

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serg[illegible]sevitzky, will perform Aaron Copland's "El Salón México," a rhapsody on Mexican popular songs named after a dance hall in México City, at its pair of concerts this Friday and Saturday in Boston. The composition was heard in London last Summer at the festival of the International Society of Contemporary Music. The program also includes Mozart's divertimento (K. 287) and Dvorak's "New World" symphony.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
OCT 11 1938

Mr. John B. Archer will give a free public lecture Sunday afternoon at the Providence Public Library at 4 o'clock on the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert. The lecture is being given under the auspices of the Monday Morning Musical Club.

Mrs. Mary Colt Gross and Mrs. Ada Holding Miller will be the hostesses.

BANGOR, ME.
NEWS
OCT 12 1938

Ernest Dane Elected President Boston Symphony Orchestra

BOSTON, Oct. 11—(AP)—Ernest B. Dane, one of the original trustees of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, today was elected its president, succeeding Bentley W. Warren, president since 1932, will continue as a member of the board.

Henry B. Sawyer was reelected vice president and Edward A. Taft was renamed clerk. Dane, who has been treasurer of the corporation since the 1919-1920 season, will continue in that office, also.

DAYTON, O.
NEWS WEEK
OCT 10 1938

¶ The Boston Symphony also opens this week—for its 58th season and the fifteenth under Serge Koussevitzky's baton. Guest conductors include Georges Enesco, Eugene Goossens and Igor Stravinsky, who will also be soloist in the American première of his new piano concerto.

SYMPHONY GREATEST IN WORLD

Koussevitzky Makes Speech at Opening Concert

B. Post. Oct 8/38

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

This present is a big week for Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. Not only is he inaugurating his 15th season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he may see his likeness on the cover of the current issue of Time and read within that the retirement of Messrs. Toscanini and Stokowsky leave him undisputably the ranking United States conductor.

MAKES A SPEECH

Yesterday afternoon before the season's opening concert began and after the audience, which had risen in greeting, had seated its collective self, Dr. Koussevitzky made, at one and the same time, a speech and Symphony Hall history. Having stated that he was not one of the conductors who delight in speaking from the stage, Dr. Koussevitzky continued: "But in 15 years, once you will permit me to say a few words to you. Your orchestra is now one of the greatest orchestras in the world, if not the greatest, as the whole musical world recognized today. If we have realized this, it is not only because we work hard and we have your material support, but also because we have your moral support, your profound understanding, your deep feeling of the importance and necessity of musical art. That is our greatest stimulation. And today, we express to you our gratitude."

From Josef Hofmann

While on the subject of the background of the concert and before turning to the concert itself—which was not, truth to tell, of absorbing interest—it is pertinent to quote a telegram sent to Dr. Koussevitzky by his distinguished colleague, Josef Hofmann: "My heartiest congratulations," read the message, "and sincere admiration for the lifetime of musical triumphs you have accomplished in 15 years, and I join all others in hoping that you will celebrate jubilee after jubilee at the helm of your superb orchestra."

As much for sentimental as for material reasons (probably more), Dr. Koussevitzky derived part of yesterday's and this evening's programme from the list of pieces which he offered at his Symphony Hall debut and the balance of it from the second programme of that season of 1924-5. The pieces culled from the first were Vivaldi's Concerto in D minor for orchestra with organ, as edited by Siloti, Berlioz' overture, "The Roman Carnival" and Brahms' variations on a theme of Haydn. There followed Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, the first work in its particular form to be conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky in this country.

Tonal Resources Not Shown

It will be readily seen that none of these numbers afforded great opportunity for display of the orchestra's tonal resources, the sort of opportunity that would have been presented, say, by Schriabin's "Poem of Ecstacy," which made the tonal climax of Dr. Koussevitzky's first concert. But of what opportunity there was the conductor made the most. At times, indeed, he seemed to be straining for color at the expense of line and rhythmic flow, though it should be said that the reading of the Fifth Symphony was the most straightforward that he has ever given us. For once he seemed almost content to let the composer speak for himself, with no interpretative aid.

No Super Music

The Fifth Symphony aside, there was no music yesterday that could lay claim to greatness. Vivaldi's Concerto is hardly more than routine writing of an era when routine chanced to be extraordinarily good. The "Roman Carnival," like nearly everything which Berlioz wrote, is a mixture of the good and the bad. If its brilliant portions remain unsurpassed in their particular field, and they were played with super-brilliance yesterday, the theme for the English horn has the curious awkwardness of so many of Berlioz' melodies, and when he adorns it with rythmic trappings and the tinkle of tambourines the result comes close to twaddle.

In the variations of Brahms, Dr. Koussevitzky's was an uphill task. Only the ingratiating and celebrated seventh makes now an irristible appeal to the listener. As for the afternoon's applause, it was heartier in the first half of the concert than at the end. Is it possible that the fifth is too old a story, even for Boston?

13

BETTY ALDEN

B. Am. Oct 8/38

On Beacon Hill

Fashionable Socialites Flock to Concert

By BETTY ALDEN

BOSTON HOSTESSES need plan no more Friday afternoon affairs for quite some time . . . for with unanimous acceptance, like nothing else in Boston, the Symphony Orchestra takes over, and in social circles nothing is considered a greater faux pas than to issue invitations for an affair which would conflict with the regular Friday afternoon concerts in Symphony Hall . . .

Yesterday's opening concert of the new season was an auspicious occasion, especially since it marked the beginning of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's fifteenth year as conductor of this famous orchestra . . . The whole audience stood up and applauded warmly when the conductor and his musicians appeared on the stage before the opening measures of the program . . .

Every seat was occupied and during intermission the lobbies were crowded with music lovers strolling around to greet old friends and reiterate over and over again "Isn't it wonderful to be back again?" . . . Among the hundreds of socialites in the throng were Mrs. Eliot Codman, the former Mary Louise Spaulding, who has just returned from her honeymoon to attend the concert with her sister-in-law, Mrs. Daniel Codman . . . Mary Louise's mother, Mrs. Bartlett Harwood, was another fashionable concert-goer, her dark ensemble brightened by a tiny turban edged with a puff of shirred crimson velvet . . . The bride wore a sheer black wool dress with a silver fox scarf and Mrs. Daniel Codman's beige wool was enhanced by a beautiful scarf of beige lynx . . .

* * *

Fur Trimmed Hats Popular

MR. AND MRS. GUY MURCHIE of Dedham, who spend most of their time in the tropics, were warmly welcomed by many Boston friends as they strolled through the lobby . . . Mrs. Murchie's wine red suit topped by a small feathered turban . . . Mrs. George Tyson of Louisburg Square, who has just returned from her summer home in Newport, set off her blonde curls with a smart black costume and a tiny hat tipped with crimson ostrich feathers . . .

Flattering little fur trimmed hats were popular with the smartly dressed women . . . Mrs. Dudley Pickman, Jr., who attended with Mr. Pickman, wore one of mink to match her mink cape, and Nancy Richards of Groton also had a band of fur framing her face and dark hair . . . Mrs. E. Wiley Robb attended with her daughters, Roberta and Betsy, and Mrs. Frederick Ayer came up from Hamilton with her daughter, Anne . . . Evidently chilly breezes were a dime a dozen on the North Shore yesterday morning, for both Mrs. Ayer and Anne, as well as many other North Shoreites, were turned out in beautiful fur coats . . .

Husbands returning from State street and wives who had spent the afternoon at the concert, met at the Ritz Bar around five . . . where much attention was directed toward Anne Clark Roosevelt who was in a little party with Mrs. James Roosevelt and the latter's brother and sister-in-law, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Cushing . . . Anne had her little dachshund, Percy, in tow . . . and looked very pretty in a beige tailored coat and small brown hat . . .

* * *

Edith Shaw, Lilian Fernald Plan Debuts

THE RITZ will be lively on the evening of October 26 when Mrs. Sohier Shaw gives a dinner dance there for her daughter, Edith, and the latter's close friend, Lilian Fernald . . . This party will be Edith's official debut and will precede by a couple of days the tea which her grandfather Sohier is giving to celebrate her eighteenth birthday . . . Edith and Lilian have been friends since childhood and are constant companions at deb luncheons and teas . . . Lilian is the daughter of the Fred Fernalds of Beacon street and Marblehead Neck . . .

* * *

Junior League songbirds who would like to join the Glee Club will have to sing their do, re, mi's before officers of the club at the opening tea and tryouts of the Glee Club next Tuesday at the League . . . Arthur Fiedler, who has consented to conduct the concerts this year, will be guest of honor at the tea, and pourers will be Geraldine Field, the league's popular vice-president, and Mrs. Joseph Quarles, head of the arts and interests group . . .

Musical

Greet Orchestra at First Concert

MRS. ELIOT CODMAN — MRS. DANIEL S. CODMAN

THE BEETHOVEN FIFTH SYMPHONY and the latest trends in interior decoration were the chief topics of conversation of this attractive pair as they enjoyed a smoke during intermission at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's opening concert yesterday. They are Mrs. Eliot Codman (Mary Louise Spaulding) and her sister-in-law, Mrs. Daniel S. Codman. The former has just returned from her honeymoon.

Boston Evening American Photo.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
OCT 9 - 1938

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will perform Aaron Copland's "El Salón México," a rhapsody on Mexican popular songs named after a dance hall in México City, at its pair of concerts this Friday and Saturday in Boston. The composition was heard in London last Summer at the festival of the International Society of Contemporary Music. The program also includes Mozart's divertimento (K. 287) and Dvorak's "New World" symphony.

BANGOR, ME.
NEWS
OCT 12 1938

Ernest Dane Elected President Boston Symphony Orchestra

BOSTON, Oct. 11—(AP)—Ernest B. Dane, one of the original trustees of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, today was elected its president, succeeding Bentley W. Warren, president since 1932, will continue as a member of the board.

Henry B. Sawyer was reelected vice president and Edward A. Taft was renamed clerk. Dane, who has been treasurer of the corporation since the 1919-1920 season, will continue in that office, also.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
OCT 11 1938

Mr. John B. Archer will give a free public lecture Sunday afternoon at the Providence Public Library at 4 o'clock on the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert. The lecture is being given under the auspices of the Monday Morning Musical Club.

Mrs. Mary Colt Gross and Mrs. Ada Holding Miller will be the hostesses.

DAYTON, O.
NEWS WEEK
OCT 10 1938

¶ The Boston Symphony also opens this week—for its 58th season and the fifteenth under Serge Koussevitzky's baton. Guest conductors include Georges Enesco, Eugene Goossens and Igor Stravinsky, who will also be soloist in the American première of his new piano concerto.

SYMPHONY GREATEST IN WORLD

Koussevitzky Makes Speech at Opening Concert

B. Post. Oct 8/38

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

This present is a big week for Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. Not only is he inaugurating his 15th season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he may see his likeness on the cover of the current issue of Time and read within that the retirement of Messrs. Toscanini and Stokowsky leave him indisputably the ranking United States conductor.

MAKES A SPEECH

Yesterday afternoon before the season's opening concert began and after the audience, which had risen in greeting, had seated its collective self, Dr. Koussevitzky made, at one and the same time, a speech and Symphony Hall history. Having stated that he was not one of the conductors who delight in speaking from the stage, Dr. Koussevitzky continued: "But in 15 years, once you will permit me to say a few words to you. Your orchestra is now one of the greatest orchestras in the world, if not the greatest, as the whole musical world recognized today. If we have realised this, it is not only because we work hard and we have your material support, but also because we have your moral support, your profound understanding, your deep feeling of the importance and necessity of musical art. That is our greatest stimulation. And today, we express to you our gratitude."

From Josef Hofmann

While on the subject of the background of the concert and before turning to the concert itself—which was not, truth to tell, of absorbing interest—it is pertinent to quote a telegram sent to Dr. Koussevitzky by his distinguished colleague, Josef Hofmann: "My heartiest congratulations," read the message, "and sincere admiration for the lifetime of musical triumphs you have accomplished in 15 years, and I join all others in hoping that you will celebrate jubilee after jubilee at the helm of your superb orchestra."

As much for sentimental as for material reasons (probably more), Dr. Koussevitzky derived part of yesterday's and this evening's programme from the list of pieces which he offered at his Symphony Hall debut and the balance of it from the second programme of that season of 1924-5. The pieces culled from the first were Vivaldi's Concerto in D minor for orchestra with organ, as edited by Siloti, Berlioz' overture, "The Roman Carnival" and Brahms' variations on a theme of Haydn. There followed Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, the first work in its particular form to be conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky in this country.

Tonal Resources Not Shown

It will be readily seen that none of these numbers afforded great opportunity for display of the orchestra's tonal resources, the sort of opportunity that would have been presented, say, by Schriabin's "Poem of Ecstacy," which made the tonal climax of Dr. Koussevitzky's first concert. But of what opportunity there was the conductor made the most. At times, indeed, he seemed to be straining for color at the expense of line and rhythmic flow, though it should be said that the reading of the Fifth Symphony was the most straightforward that he has ever given us. For once he seemed almost content to let the composer speak for himself, with no interpretative aid.

No Super Music

The Fifth Symphony aside, there was no music yesterday that could lay claim to greatness. Vivaldi's Concerto is hardly more than routine writing of an era when routine chanced to be extraordinarily good. The "Roman Carnival," like nearly everything which Berlioz wrote, is a mixture of the good and the bad. If its brilliant portions remain unsurpassed in their particular field, and they were played with super-brilliance yesterday, the theme for the English horn has the curious awkwardness of so many of Berlioz' melodies, and when he adorns it with rythmic trappings and the tinkle of tambourines the result comes close to twaddle.

In the variations of Brahms, Dr. Koussevitzky's was an uphill task. Only the ingratiating and celebrated seventh makes now an irristible appeal to the listener. As for the afternoon's applause, it was heartier in the first half of the concert than at the end. Is it possible that the fifth is too old a story, even for Boston?

THE BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 8, 1938

(14)

Boston Symphony Opens Its 58th Season

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The first concert of the 58th seaso of the Boston Symphony Orchestr was given yesterday afternoon i Symphony Hall. Serge Koussevitzky, who enters his 15th year a regular conductor of the orchestra conducted. The program was a follows:

Vivaldi
Concerto in D minor for orchestra an organ (edited by A. Siloti)
Berlioz
Overture, "The Roman Carnival," Op.
Brahms
Variations on a theme by Haydn, Op 56a
Beethoven
Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 67

Dr. Koussevitzky stood upon the stage of Symphony Hall yesterday, the platform where he is entering on his 15th year of service as conductor of the Boston Symphony, and graciously addressed the Friday afternoon audience that had previously stood and applauded his appearance. He pointed out that the orchestra and himself had just as much reason to be thankful that there was the necessity for music in Boston as the public could be grateful for the high standards that the orchestra had succeeded in maintaining.

Those were not Dr. Koussevitzky's exact words, but that is the gist of what he put with far less brusqueness, and many men have enjoyed great prestige for a long time and made far less sensible remarks. For it the public does not come instinctively to feel the need for music, the qualities and the very existence of such music as there may once have been will vanish.

In this sense the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the guardian and high priest, as it were, of our musical culture. We do not constitute here a vast, international, artistic center. We depend on a concentration of our artistic life, and it is the high or low standard, the intellectually honest success or failure, of that concentration which gives character to that life. As we see it, Dr. Koussevitzky regards his work here in some such light.

Other cities choose other means. Some prefer the brilliance of the star system whereby one great luminary will swing down in his orbit for a brief visitation and the rest of the season will be varied by half a dozen lesser lights. Others prefer to have all their music in one dose for a week or two, rather in the manner that the expense of opera has to be shared in these days. But the point is that an orchestra and a conductor in the long run establish their value by the manner in which they lead the musical life of the community. Let it be said that the excellence of the Boston Symphony and Dr. Koussevitzky lies not so much in their interpretations as in their fulfillment of this larger purpose.

The editorial mind is a queer one, ever absorbed in its own theories. We have been writing some editorials this summer and are not quite ready to assume the sharper practice and objective hair-splitting of the critic. To that end we have consumed our allotted space with reflections that have nothing to do with the music in hand.

Was the Berlioz "Roman Carnival brilliantly played? Yes, it was. Was the interpretation of the fifth Symphony eloquent and sincere? Again, yes. Were the Brahms Variations better performed than in 1934 or than by other orchestras? We don't know, but they could hardly have sounded with more sonority and clarity. Such are the questions a reader has the right to demand, and such the answers—ordinarily clothed more adroitly—that the critic should give.

The program, as every one knows, was the same in the first part that Dr. Koussevitzky conducted at his first concert here in October, 1924. The Beethoven fifth was the first symphony he led. It is, then, an anniversary, and such occasions demand words, if not rhetoric. It is in this spirit that we have passed over the music for the man. Next week is time enough to get down to brass tacks.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Mozart's Divertimento in B flat; Aaron Copland's "El Salon Mexico" and Dvorak's "New World" symphony will be heard.

B. Trans. MUSIC Oct 8/38

Symphonic Year Begins On a Sentimental Note

Serge Koussevitzky Celebrates an Anniversary by Making a Speech

By MOSES SMITH

The symphonic season began with a speech. It was a short speech that Serge Koussevitzky delivered to the audience crowding Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon for the first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. But not too short to be interrupted twice by applause—when the conductor referred to "your orchestra" as "one of the greatest," "if not the greatest" of the world. Not too short to contain a sly dig at conductors who are chronic speech-makers, and a request for permission to break verbal silence once in fifteen years. Nor too short for expression of the gratitude of the conductor and orchestra for the audience's material and moral support, "profound understanding" and "deep feeling of the importance and necessity of musical art" through the fourteen years during which the conductor has sojourned among us.

It was a happy and charming way of reversing the mirror. But the audience, which, as customarily at the beginning of a season, had risen together with the musicians from their chairs to greet the conductor, could, without at all questioning Dr. Koussevitzky's sincerity continue in the conviction that the principal force in the building of a superlative orchestra was the conductor himself. And if the audience had helped conductor and orchestra by the manifestation of those qualities to which he alluded, he again was largely responsible. On a largely new generation of concert-goers he has made the imprint of his own personality, as he has obviously done on his orchestra.

* * *

The subsequent concert was thus a testimonial—from the standpoint of conductor as an expression of gratitude; from that of the audience as an indication of the justification of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's high place. Some years ago here and even now elsewhere, it might have been dangerous to subject the orchestra to such a test at the first concert of the season. An organism of a hundred independent parts requires normally some exercise before it works at top efficiency. Rehearsing, to be specific, and playing together for some weeks are needed to bring even a seasoned orchestra to its top form after a lay-off. Even now, about the highest compliment that can be paid an orchestra is to say that it has played at an opening concert in mid-season form.

But the Boston Orchestra now has no mid-season. It comes as close to being an all-the-year-round symphonic organization as we have in America. Exactly when the season begins and when it leaves off is becoming more and more difficult to determine. For the majority of the members of the Boston Orchestra, for example, the few weeks elapsed between the end of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival and the beginning of rehearsals this week were the only appreciable holiday of the year. That is a good deal different from the prevailing condition in the case of many American orchestras, with half a year between seasons.

* * *

And so the quality of performance yesterday was almost sure to be high. In actuality it exceeded expectations. There was an exceptional glint in the playing of the orchestra as it traversed music garnered from Dr. Koussevitzky's first two programs on these shores: Vivaldi's Concerto in D minor (edited by Siloti), Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" Overture, Brahms' Variations on a Theme of Haydn and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. There was nothing new in the program, but unless these ears were mistaken, there was something new in orchestral performance.

From beginning to end there was apparently no variation in the wondrous precision, flexibility, expressiveness and, above all, beautiful tone of the co-ordinated musicians. The praises of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's string section have been sung before, but there was yesterday, as particularly to be observed in the Vivaldi piece, an altogether unwonted brightness. The assorted and fused instrumental colors were lavishly (but not too lavishly) on display, especially in the Berlioz Overture. The solo wind instruments seemed all at their very best. More spectacular than anything else, perhaps, the intonation was unexceptionably pure, in a way that we have scarcely a right to hope from a hundred men playing through an entire program.

There is nothing new to be said about the music and nothing in the conductor's approach to it, except to confirm recent observations about his increasing mellowness. The performance of the Brahms Variations, indeed, may have seemed to some a little too restrained. But if some of the sharper contrasts in the early sections have disappeared, the sacrifice was more than justified by the magnificent poise accordingly gained by the last variation and coda, taken by Dr. Koussevitzky absolutely "straight." Similarly some of the superficial storm and stress have gone out of his presentation of the Beethoven Symphony. What remains is an epic.

New Series of Orchestral Concerts for the Young

B. Trans. Oct. 8/38

Wheeler Beckett Will Present Three Unit-Programs with Boston Symphony Orchestra

A series of three symphony concerts for youth will be given by an orchestra of at least seventy members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Wheeler Beckett in Symphony Hall on Wednesday afternoons, Oct. 19, Nov. 9 and Dec. 14. The conductor, resident hereabouts for some months, has been leader of the Richmond (Va.) Symphony Orchestra and of the Young People's Concerts of the San Francisco Orchestra, as well as guest-leader of principal European orchestras.

The concerts—so runs the prospectus—are not open to the general public, being designed for boys and girls active in music and of an age to attend junior and senior high schools (or the equivalent in terms of private schools). Adults will be tolerated at the concerts only as escorts. Because of the age and previous training required of the prospective auditors, Mr. Beckett will dispense with demonstration of instruments, lantern slides and related paraphernalia of many children's concerts. His oral remarks, if any, will not be explanation so much as brief and succinct expressions of his own enthusiasm generated by the music in question. As a corollary, program notes will be distributed to each subscriber some time in advance of the concerts.

Each program will be modelled as a unit, tending to follow the chronological development of expression of a single general subject. The subject inspiring the first program, for example, was love; the second, nature, and the third, imagination and fantasy. The first program accordingly traverses Mozart's Overture to "The Abduction from the Seraglio," Beehoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet," "Cupid and Psyche" by Franck, the Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde" and "Finlandia" by Sibelius.

The prospectus indicates certain encouraging feaures. Of 2630 seats available, all but 800 were priced at one dollar for the entire three concerts. Half of the remainder were set at three dollars for the series, the other half at sixty cents. Aside from 100 of the highest-priced tickets, everything has been sold out, even though no single admissions were sold. The tickets have been distributed through the various schools. First preference was given to music students, who accordingly constitute about four-fifths of the enrollment. The few remaining tickets are on sale at Symphony Hall. The concerts, says Mr. Beckett, will be given for enjoyment, not as an adjunct to education. Finally, the name of the sponsoring organization is Youth Concerts Association of Boston.

The venture, which may be expanded by a second series in the spring, is not the entire realization of a long-felt want, but it is something in that direction. Children's or young people's orchestral concerts in Boston have not had a fortunate history. The modest ventures of the Boston Symphony Orchestra some years ago did not last long. The Schelling concerts lagged and were finally discontinued. There are excellent concerts for juniors on Saturday mornings in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, under the direction of Russell Ames Cook, but their number as well as the potential size of the audiences is small.

It is not a question of placing the blame but merely a matter of stating a fact that Boston has been badly supplied in comparison with other cities having large orchestras. In Chicago there are six children's concerts per season by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, and that is a common number elsewhere. Planning audiences for the future is accepted by these institutions as a matter of course. It ought to be in Boston.

The difficulties are many, but they ought to be, and indeed must be, overcome by the Boston Orchestra. The ironical fact is that in other regards it has the most complete schedule of concerts of all the American orchestras—"luxury" concerts for thousands at home and on the road during the main season; popular concerts in the spring; free concerts on the Esplanade and festival concerts in the Berkshires during the summer. Mr. Beckett, by assiduous toil, has proved that at least a new start toward concerts for a more youthful as well as democratic audience is possible. Whether it will be more than a beginning will depend probably as much on others as on himself. M. S.

Youth Is Served

Among the 102 members of the New York - Philharmonic-Symphony Society seven will be new this season. Three are violists, two double bass players, one a 'cellist and one an oboist. The vacancies had been created either by deaths or by retirements on pension. The youngest of the newcomers is nineteen, and almost all are under thirty.

COMPLIMENTS OF
The Tech
Tuesday, October, 18, 1938

Reviews and Previews

SYMPHONY HALL — The Coolidge String Quartet will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the third regular pair of concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. At this time will be given the first public performance of Nicolai Berezowsky's Toccata, Variations, and Finale for String Quartet and Orchestra. The programme will open with Glazounov's Symphonic Poem, "Stenka Razin", based upon the popular Russian story of the 17th century Cossack marauder. The closing number will be the Fourth Symphony of Brahms in E minor. The series of six concerts on Monday evenings and Tuesday afternoons will open October 24-25. Two pairs of concerts are to be conducted by Georges Enesco and Igor Stravinsky.

OCT 18 1938

(14)

Boston Symphony Opens Its 58th Season

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The first concert of the 58th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Serge Koussevitzky, who enters his 15th year as regular conductor of the orchestra conducted. The program was as follows:

Vivaldi
Concerto in D minor for orchestra and organ (edited by A. Siloti)
Berlioz
Overture, "The Roman Carnival," Op.
Brahms
Variations on a theme by Haydn, Op 56a
Beethoven
Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 67

Dr. Koussevitzky stood upon the stage of Symphony Hall yesterday, the platform where he is entering on his 15th year of service as conductor of the Boston Symphony, and graciously addressed the Friday afternoon audience that had previously stood and applauded his appearance. He pointed out that the orchestra and himself had just as much reason to be thankful that there was the necessity for music in Boston as the public could be grateful for the high standards that the orchestra had succeeded in maintaining.

Those were not Dr. Koussevitzky's exact words, but that is the gist of what he put with far less brusqueness, and many men have enjoyed great prestige for a long time and made far less sensible remarks. For it the public does not come instinctively to feel the need for music, the qualities and the very existence of such music as there may once have been will vanish.

In this sense the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the guardian and high priest, as it were, of our musical culture. We do not constitute here a vast, international, artistic center. We depend on a concentration of our artistic life, and it is the high or low standard, the intellectually honest success or failure, of that concentration which gives character to that life. As we see it, Dr. Koussevitzky regards his work here in some such light.

Other cities choose other means. Some prefer the brilliance of the star system whereby one great luminary will swing down in his orbit for a brief visitation and the rest of the season will be varied by half a dozen lesser lights. Others prefer to have all their music in one dose for a week or two, rather in the manner that the expense of opera has to be shared in these days. But the point is that an orchestra and a conductor in the long run establish their value by the manner in which they lead the musical life of the community. Let it be said that the excellence of the Boston Symphony and Dr. Koussevitzky lies not so much in their interpretations as in their fulfillment of this larger purpose.

The editorial mind is a queer one, ever absorbed in its own theories. We have been writing some editorials this summer and are not quite ready to assume the sharper practice and objective hair-splitting of the critic. To that end we have consumed our allotted space with reflections that have nothing to do with the music in hand.

Was the Berlioz "Roman Carnival brilliantly played? Yes, it was. Was the interpretation of the fifth Symphony eloquent and sincere? Again, yes. Were the Brahms Variations better performed than in 1934 or than by other orchestras? We don't know, but they could hardly have sounded with more sonority and clarity. Such are the questions a reader has the right to demand, and such the answers—ordinarily clothed more adroitly—that the critic should give.

The program, as every one knows, was the same in the first part that Dr. Koussevitzky conducted at his first concert here in October, 1924. The Beethoven fifth was the first symphony he led. It is, then, an anniversary, and such occasions demand words, if not rhetoric. It is in this spirit that we have passed over the music for the man. Next week is time enough to get down to brass tacks.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Mozart's Divertimento in B flat; Aaron Copland's "El Salon Mexico" and Dvorak's "New World" symphony will be heard.

B. T. MUSIC Oct 8/38

Symphonic Year Begins On a Sentimental Note

Serge Koussevitzky Celebrates an Anniversary by Making a Speech

By MOSES SMITH

The symphonic season began with a speech. It was a short speech that Serge Koussevitzky delivered to the audience crowding Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon for the first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. But not too short to be interrupted twice by applause—when the conductor referred to "your orchestra" as "one of the greatest," "if not the greatest" of the world. Not too short to contain a sly dig at conductors who are chronic speech-makers, and a request for permission to break verbal silence once in fifteen years. Nor too short for expression of the gratitude of the conductor and orchestra for the audience's material and moral support, "profound understanding" and "deep feeling of the importance and necessity of musical art" through the fourteen years during which the conductor has sojourned among us.

It was a happy and charming way of reversing the mirror. But the audience, which, as customarily at the beginning of a season, had risen together with the musicians from their chairs to greet the conductor, could, without at all questioning Dr. Koussevitzky's sincerity continue in the conviction that the principal force in the building of a superlative orchestra was the conductor himself. And if the audience had helped conductor and orchestra by the manifestation of those qualities to which he alluded, he again was largely responsible. On a largely new generation of concert-goers he has made the imprint of his own personality, as he has obviously done on his orchestra.

* * *

The subsequent concert was thus a testimonial—from the standpoint of conductor as an expression of gratitude; from that of the audience as an indication of the justification of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's high place. Some years ago here and even now elsewhere, it might have been dangerous to subject the orchestra to such a test at the first concert of the season. An organism of a hundred independent parts requires normally some exercise before it works at top efficiency. Rehearsing, to be specific, and playing together for some weeks are needed to bring even a seasoned orchestra to its top form after a lay-off. Even now, about the highest compliment that can be paid an orchestra is to say that it has played at an opening concert in mid-season form.

But the Boston Orchestra now has no mid-season. It comes as close to being an all-the-year-round symphonic organization as we have in America. Exactly when the season begins and when it leaves off is becoming more and more difficult to determine. For the majority of the members of the Boston Orchestra, for example, the few weeks elapsed between the end of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival and the beginning of rehearsals this week were the only appreciable holiday of the year. That is a good deal different from the prevailing condition in the case of many American orchestras, with half a year between seasons.

* * *

And so the quality of performance yesterday was almost sure to be high. In actuality it exceeded expectations. There was an exceptional glint in the playing of the orchestra as it traversed music garnered from Dr. Koussevitzky's first two programs on these shores: Vivaldi's Concerto in D minor (edited by Siloti), Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" Overture, Brahms' Variations on a Theme of Haydn and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. There was nothing new in the program, but unless these ears were mistaken, there was something new in orchestral performance.

From beginning to end there was apparently no variation in the wondrous precision, flexibility, expressiveness and, above all beautiful tone of the co-ordinated musicians. The praises of the Boston Symphony Orchestra string section have been sung before, but there was yesterday, as particularly to be observed in the Vivaldi piece, an altogether unwonted brightness. The assorted and fused instrumental colors were lavishly (but not too lavishly) on display, especially in the Berlioz Overture. The solo wind instruments seemed all at their very best. More spectacular than anything else, perhaps, the intonation was unexceptionably pure, in a way that we have scarcely a right to hope from a hundred men playing through an entire program.

There is nothing new to be said about the music and nothing in the conductor's approach to it, except to confirm recent observations about his increasing mellowness. The performance of the Brahms Variations, indeed, may have seemed to some a little too restrained. But if some of the sharper contrasts in the early sections have disappeared, the sacrifice was more than justified by the magnificent poise accordingly gained by the last variation and coda, taken by Dr. Koussevitzky absolutely "straight." Similarly some of the superficial storm and stress have gone out of his presentation of the Beethoven Symphony. What remains is an epic.

New Series of Orchestral Concerts for the Young

B. T. Oct 8/38

Wheeler Beckett Will Present Three Unit-Programs with Boston Symphony Orchestra

A series of three symphony concerts for youth will be given by an orchestra of at least seventy members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Wheeler Beckett in Symphony Hall on Wednesday afternoons, Oct. 19, Nov. 9 and Dec. 14. The conductor, resident hereabouts for some months, has been leader of the Richmond (Va.) Symphony Orchestra and of the Young People's Concerts of the San Francisco Orchestra, as well as guest-leader of principal European orchestras.

The concerts—so runs the prospectus—are not open to the general public, being designed for boys and girls active in music and of an age to attend junior and senior high schools (or the equivalent in terms of private schools). Adults will be tolerated at the concerts only as escorts. Because of the age and previous training required of the prospective auditors, Mr. Beckett will dispense with demonstration of instruments, lantern slides and related paraphernalia of many children's concerts. His oral remarks, if any, will not be explanation so much as brief and succinct expressions of his own enthusiasm generated by the music in question. As a corollary, program notes will be distributed to each subscriber some time in advance of the concerts.

Each program will be modelled as a unit, tending to follow the chronological development of expression of a single general subject. The subject inspiring the first program, for example, was love; the second, nature, and the third, imagination and fantasy. The first program accordingly traverses Mozart's Overture to "The Abduction from the Seraglio," Beehoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet," "Cupid and Psyche" by Franck, the Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde" and "Finlandia" by Sibelius.

The prospectus indicates certain encouraging feaures. Of 2630 seats available, all but 800 were priced at one dollar for the entire three concerts. Half of the remainder were set at three dollars for the series, the other half at sixty cents. Aside from 100 of the highest-priced tickets, everything has been sold out, even though no single admissions were sold. The tickets have been distributed through the various schools. First preference was given to music students, who accordingly constitute about four-fifths of the enrollment. The few remaining tickets are on sale at Symphony Hall. The concerts, says Mr. Beckett, will be given for enjoyment, not as an adjunct to education. Finally, the name of the sponsoring organization is Youth Concerts Association of Boston.

The venture, which may be expanded by a second series in the spring, is not the entire realization of a long-felt want, but it is something in that direction. Children's or young people's orchestral concerts in Boston have not had a fortunate history. The modest ventures of the Boston Symphony Orchestra some years ago did not last long. The Schelling concerts lagged and were finally discontinued. There are excellent concerts for juniors on Saturday mornings in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, under the direction of Russell Ames Cook, but their number as well as the potential size of the audiences is small.

It is not a question of placing the blame but merely a matter of stating a fact that Boston has been badly supplied in comparison with other cities having large orchestras. In Chicago there are six children's concerts per season by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, and that is a common number elsewhere. Planning audiences for the future is accepted by these institutions as a matter of course. It ought to be in Boston.

The difficulties are many, but they ought to be, and indeed must be, overcome by the Boston Orchestra. The ironical fact is that in other regards it has the most complete schedule of concerts of all the American orchestras—"luxury" concerts for thousands at home and on the road during the main season; popular concerts in the spring; free concerts on the Esplanade and festival concerts in the Berkshires during the summer. Mr. Beckett, by assiduous toil, has proved that at least a new start toward concerts for a more youthful as well as democratic audience is possible. Whether it will be more than a beginning will depend probably as much on others as on himself. M. S.

Youth Is Served

Among the 102 members of the New York - Philharmonic-Symphony Society seven will be new this season. Three are violists, two double bass players, one a 'cellist and one an oboist. The vacancies had been created either by deaths or by retirements on pension. The youngest of the newcomers is nineteen, and almost all are under thirty.

COMPLIMENTS OF
The Tech
Tuesday, October, 18, 1938

Reviews and Previews

OCT 18 1938

SYMPHONY HALL — The Coolidge String Quartet will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the third regular pair of concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. At this time will be given the first public performance of Nicolai Berezowsky's Toccata, Variations, and Finale for String Quartet and Orchestra. The programme will open with Glazounov's Symphonic Poem, "Stenka Razin", based upon the popular Russian story of the 17th century Cossack marauder. The closing number will be the Fourth Symphony of Brahms in E minor. The series of six concerts on Monday evenings and Tuesday afternoons will open October 24-25. Two pairs of concerts are to be conducted by Georges Enesco and Igor Stravinsky.

15

THE BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 8, 1938

Dr. Koussevitzky Wins Ovation on Return to Conductor's Stand

PAGE NINE

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
OCT 9 - 1938

Music Season Soon to Get Under Way

Boston Symphony Will Open Fall Activities Oct. 18.—Providence Orchestras to Give Series.—Concert Calendar.

BY P. B. H.

PROVIDENCE'S concert season will open Oct. 18, a week from Tuesday night, with a program by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, in the Metropolitan Theatre.

Concert Schedule

As so far arranged the schedule of dates and attractions for the season is as follows:

Oct. 18—Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; Metropolitan Theatre, evening.

Oct. 19 — Providence Community Concert Association, Richard Crooks, tenor; Metropolitan Theatre, evening.

Nov. 8—Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; Jascha Heifetz, violinist, soloist; Metropolitan Theatre, evening.

Nov. 10—Pawtucket Civic Music Association, Pierre Luboschutz and

---

COMPLIMENTS OF
The Tech
Tuesday, October 11, 1938

Reviews and Previews

SYMPHONY—The second pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will take place in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The programme will open with a Divertimento in B flat, K. No. 287, by Mozart, written in six parts for four string instruments and two horns. The first violin part of this divertimento was performed by the composer in Munich in 1777, the year in which the piece was composed. In the coming performances, the combined string sections will be used.

Aaron Copland's "El Salón México" will have its first Boston performance in the same programme. Copland wrote this rhapsody upon popular melodies which he heard during a sojourn in Mexico, and named it after a famous dance hall in Mexico City. "El Salón México" has been performed in Mexico City, and in London at the festival of contemporary music last summer. The symphony "From the New World", by Dvórák, the Czech composer, will complete the programme.

The series of six programmes by the Boston Symphony given on Monday evenings and Tuesday afternoons will begin October 24-25. Soloists who will appear include Myra Hess, English pianist. Georges Enesco and Ivor Stravinsky will each appear for one set of programmes.

Audience Throngs Symphony Hall At First Concert of 58th Season

Mrs. Charles Goddard Weld, Mrs. Horace H. Soule, Mrs. Galen L. Stone and Mrs. Robert Treat Paine Among Many Noted

By ALISON ARNOLD

Another year has rolled around, and once again the first Symphony concert marked the official opening of the winter season in town. This is the fifty-eighth season of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and the vast audience that filled Symphony Hall rose in one great body to greet Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. Before taking up his baton to conduct Vivaldi's Concerto in D minor, he, in turn, greeted the audience and made a graceful speech of thanks for the inspiration and enthusiasm of the subscribers. From now until spring, Friday afternoons will be strictly reserved for the Symphony concerts, and no hostess would ever think of planning anything to conflict with this important date. Many seats in the lofty hall hold the same occupants as in the early days of the concerts and will be passed on with the family portraits and silver from mother to daughter.

The audience yesterday came from seashore and country estates and from travels far and wide to be present for this auspicious occasion. Greetings were exchanged on all sides and plans for the approaching winter were the topics of conversation during the intermission. As the last roar of applause died down following the Beethoven Symphony No. 5 in C minor and the audience departed in the gleaming motors waiting outside, it was with a firm conviction that, in spite of hurricanes and threats of war, their beloved Symphony will continue to stand out like a flaming beacon in a changing and troubled world to enrich and brighten their lives.

It would be like reading pages from the Social Register to name every one present as practically every one was there. Sitting together in familiar seats were Mrs. Charles Goddard Weld, her snow white hair set off by her black costume and sable stole, and her sister, Mrs. Horace H. Soule, who wore a tricorne hat with her navy coat. Very distinguished all in black was Mrs. Galen L. Stone, and in her favorite black and white with a sumptuous silver fox cape about her shoulders was Mrs. Robert Treat Paine, who has just returned from a visit to the Berkshires.

Most attractive in black with touches of crimson was Mrs. George Saltonstall West, and also in black with a silver fox collar was Mrs. Edwin S. Webster. Mrs. Robert H. Stevenson, who has recently returned from Bar Harbor, wore a good-looking navy ensemble and was chatting with Mrs. William Dana Orcutt, in beige with a hat of teal blue. Mrs. Moses Williams, Jr., brightened her black costume with a yellow blouse, and Mrs. Ralph Hornblower topped her hyacinth blue tweeds with a mink cape.

Miss Charlotte Rantoul was smartness personified in black with a high-crowned black hat banded with purple ribbon perched atop her upswept coiffure. Miss Dorothy Preston had an enormous orchid fastened to the lapel of her black coat, and Mrs. Richard King Thorndike, Jr., was in black with a dusty pink bow on her hat. Mrs. Phineas Shaw Sprague, in brown, brought her young daughter, Lucy, along with her to enjoy the concert.

Mrs. Edward A. Taft wore a gold linked necklace with her brown ensemble, and Mrs. Daniel A. de Menocal wore sables with her black coat. With Mrs. Sydney Harwood was her daughter-in-law, Mrs. Bartlett Harwood, and Mrs. Howard C. Turner, wearing pearls with her black costume, was accompanied by her daughter, Miss Constance Turner, in a becoming combination of royal blue and wine. Another mother and daughter attending together were Mrs. William B. Long, a silver fox cape topping her suit of raspberry tweed and a navy blue snood holding her smart pill-box hat to her dark hair.

Sitting way down in front was Miss Betty Albers, her exquisite blonde coloring heightened by her black frock. Also in a front seat was Mrs. Guido Perera, in teal blue. Miss Rose Dexter sat in her usual aisle seat, and sitting with Mrs. James A. Garfield was Mrs. Augustus W. Soule. Mrs. Dudley L. Pickman wore a mink cape with her black ensemble, and her daughter, Miss Lucy Cochrane, had a tiny black pill-box atop her long blonde bob and her [illegible] black frock was brightened [illegible] sequins.

Miss Faith Kidder, an attractive debutante of this season, wore black with accents of lipstick red, and chatting with her during the intermission was her sister-in-law, Mrs. Alfred Kidder, 2nd. Mrs. Alfred R. McIntyre was as chic as usual in a gray tailleur, her brown felt hat banded with red. Strolling about the foyer with Mrs. J. Colby Bassett were Mrs. Edmund Sears Kelley and her daughter, Mrs. Bradford Price.

Still others we noted were Mrs. Palfrey Perkins, Mrs. Robert Cushman, Mrs. H. Nickerson Sears, Mrs. Harry Hill Thorndike, Mrs. Elizabeth C. Leland, Mrs. James J. Minot, Jr., Miss Beatrice Talbot, Mrs. Charles Gaston Smith, Miss Gertrude L. Peabody, Miss Barbara Bremer, Mrs. Henry Erhard, Miss Mary Gilman, Mrs. Roswell Parish, Mrs. Harry B. Stebbins, Mrs. Robert Belknap, Miss Ellen Bottomley, Mrs. Charles P. Howard, Mrs. Jaffray de Hauteville Bell, Miss Olive Perry, Mrs. William H. Coburn, Mrs. Arthur E. Grannis, Miss Harriette Blake, Miss Lucy Pope, Mrs. Paul F. Clark and her daughter, Miss Jean Clark, Mrs. Carl Dreyfus, Miss Rosamond Pierce, Mrs. Phister Cowin and her daughter, Miss Jean Cowin, Miss Constance Learned, Mrs. Adams Sherman Hill, Mrs. Faneuil Adams, Miss Jane Megrew, Mrs. Franklin W. Hobbs and Mrs. Malcolm Bradley French.

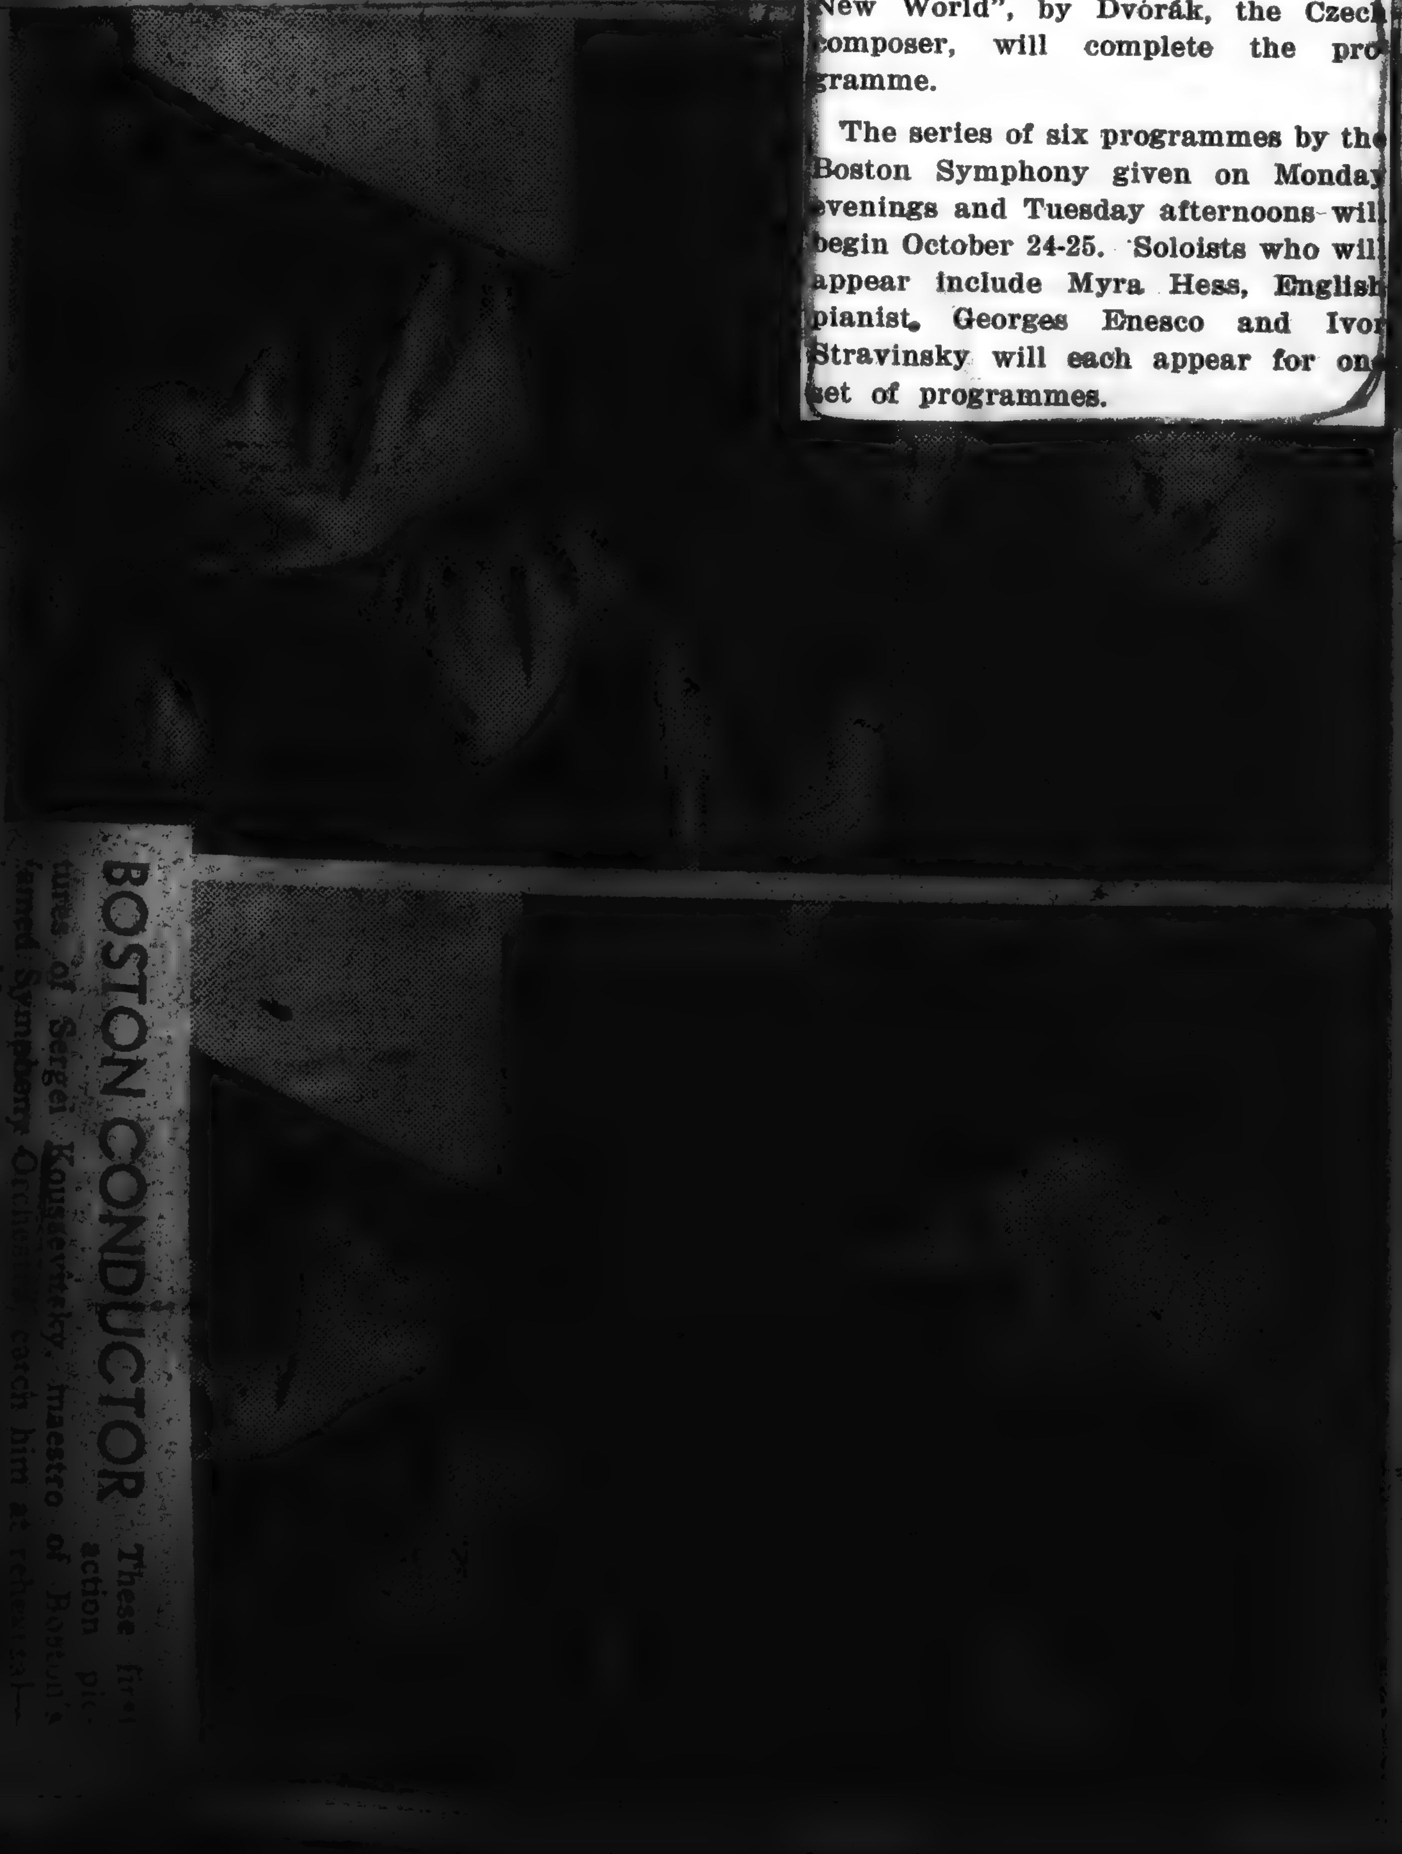
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER
OCT 8 - 1938

Symphony to Play Copland Work This Week

The second pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will take place in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The program will open with a divertimento in B flat, K. No. 287, by Mozart, written in six parts for four string instruments and two horns. The first violin part of this divertimento is brilliantly written, and was performed by the composer in Munich in 1777, the year in which the piece was composed. In the coming performances, the combined string sections will be used.

Aaron Copland's "El Salon Mexico" will have its first Boston performance in the same program. Copland wrote this rhapsody upon popular melodies which he heard during a sojourn in Mexico, and named it after a famous dance hall in Mexico City. "El Salon Mexico" has been performed in Mexico City and in London at the festival of contemporary music last summer. The symphony, "From the New World," by Dvorak, the Czech composer, will complete the program.

The series of six programs by the Boston symphony orchestra given on Monday evenings and repeated on the following Tuesday afternoon will begin Oct. 24-25 in Symphony hall. Myra Hess, the famous English pianist, will appear as soloist at one pair of concerts, and at another Genia and Pierre Luboshutz. The paired painists will appear with the orchestra in Mozart's concerto. Two outstanding guests are announced for two pairs of programs—Georges Enesco and Igor Stravinsky. Four pairs of concerts will be conducted by Serge Koussevitzky.



BOSTON CONDUCTOR These first action pictures of Sergei Koussevitzky, maestro of Boston's famed Symphony Orchestra, catch him at rehearsal— in an old coat sweater instead of the white tie and

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 9 - 1938

Music Season Soon to Get Under Way

Boston Symphony Will Open Fall Activities Oct. 18. — Providence Orchestras to Give Series.—Concert Calendar.

BY P. B. H.

PROVIDENCE'S concert season will open Oct. 18, a week from Tuesday night, with a program by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, in the Metropolitan Theatre.

Concert Schedule

As so far arranged the schedule of dates and attractions for the season is as follows:

Oct. 18—Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; Metropolitan Theatre, evening.
Oct. 19 — Providence Community Concert Association, Richard Crooks, tenor; Metropolitan Theatre, evening.
Nov. 8—Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; Jascha Heifetz, violinist, soloist; Metropolitan Theatre, evening.
Nov. 10—Pawtucket Civic Music Association, Pierre Luboschutz and

---

COMPLIMENTS OF
The Tech
Tuesday, October 11, 1938

Reviews and Previews

SYMPHONY—The second pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will take place in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The programme will open with a Divertimento in B flat, K. No. 287, by Mozart, written in six parts for four string instruments and two horns. The first violin part of this divertimento was performed by the composer in Munich in 1777, the year in which the piece was composed. In the coming performances, the combined string sections will be used.

ting last Friday evening in Room 0. At this lecture, which was nsored jointly by the TCA and the Technology Peace Federation, Dr. Deutch clarified the situation in Czechoslovakia and the sentiments of its citizens.

Dr. Deutch, a Social Democrat from Prague, explained that the Sudetens were mainly for the stronger side and hat they had been coerced by the BOSTON CONDUCTOR These first action pictures of Sergei Koussevitsky, maestro of Boston's famed Symphony Orchestra, catch him at rehearsal—in an old coat sweater instead of the white tie and tails.

---

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER

OCT 8 - 1938

THE BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 8, 1938

PAGE NINE

Dr. Koussevitzky Wins Ovation on Return to Conductor's Stand

Audience Throngs Symphony Hall At First Concert of 58th Season

Mrs. Charles Goddard Weld, Mrs. Horace H. Soule, Mrs. Galen L. Stone and Mrs. Robert Treat Paine Among Many Noted

By ALISON ARNOLD

Another year has rolled around, and once again the first Symphony concert marked the official opening of the winter season in town. This is the fifty-eighth season of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and the vast audience that filled Symphony Hall rose in one great body to greet Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. Before taking up his baton to conduct Vivaldi's Concerto in D minor, he, in turn, greeted the audience and made a graceful speech of thanks for the inspiration and enthusiasm of the subscribers. From now until spring, Friday afternoons will be strictly reserved for the Symphony concerts, and no hostess would ever think of planning anything to conflict with this important date. Many seats in the lofty hall hold the same occupants as in the early days of the concerts and will be passed on with the family portraits and silver from mother to daughter.

The audience yesterday came from seashore and country estates and from travels far and wide to be present for this auspicious occasion. Greetings were exchanged on all sides and plans for the approaching winter were the topics of conversation during the intermission. As the last roar of applause died down following the Beethoven Symphony No. 5 in C minor and the audience departed in the gleaming motors waiting outside, it was with a firm conviction that, in spite of hurricanes and threats of war, their beloved Symphony will continue to stand out like a flaming beacon in a changing and troubled world to enrich and brighten their lives.

It would be like reading pages from the Social Register to name every one present as practically every one was there. Sitting together in familiar seats were Mrs. Charles Goddard Weld, her snow white hair set off by her black costume and sable stole, and her sister, Mrs. Horace H. Soule, who wore a tricorne hat with her navy coat. Very distinguished all in black was Mrs. Galen L. Stone, and in her favorite black and white with a sumptuous silver fox cape about her shoulders was Mrs. Robert Treat Paine, who has just returned from a visit to the Berkshires.

Most attractive in black with touches of crimson was Mrs. George Saltonstall West, and also in black with a silver fox collar was Mrs. Edwin S. Webster. Mrs. Robert H. Stevenson, who has recently returned from Bar Harbor, wore a good-looking navy ensemble and was chatting with Mrs. William Dana Orcutt, in beige with a hat of teal blue. Mrs. Moses Williams, Jr., brightened her black costume with a yellow blouse, and Mrs. Ralph Hornblower topped her hyacinth blue tweeds with a mink cape.

Miss Charlotte Rantoul was smartness personified in black with a high-crowned black hat banded with purple ribbon perched atop her upswept coiffure. Miss Dorothy Preston had an enormous orchid fastened to the lapel of her black coat, and Mrs. Richard King Thorndike, Jr., was in black with a dusty pink bow on her hat. Mrs. Phineas Shaw Sprague, in brown, brought her young daughter, Lucy, along with her to enjoy the concert.

Mrs. Edward A. Taft wore a gold linked necklace with her brown ensemble, and Mrs. Daniel A. de Menocal wore sables with her black coat. With Mrs. Sydney Harwood was her daughter-in-law, Mrs. Bartlett Harwood, and Mrs. Howard C. Turner, wearing pearls with her black costume, was accompanied by her daughter, Miss Constance Turner, in a becoming combination of royal blue and wine. Another mother and daughter attending together were Mrs. William B. Long, a silver fox cape topping her suit of raspberry tweed and a navy blue snood holding her smart pill-box hat to her dark hair.

Sitting way down in front was Miss Betty Albers, her exquisite blonde coloring heightened by her black frock. Also in a front seat was Mrs. Guido Perera, in teal blue. Miss Rose Dexter sat in her usual aisle seat, and sitting with Mrs. James A. Garfield was Mrs. Augustus W. Soule. Mrs. Dudley L. Pickman wore a mink cape with her black ensemble, and her daughter, Miss Lucy Cochrane, had a tiny black pill-box atop her long blonde bob and her slim black frock was brightened with bands of red and white sequins.

Miss Faith Kidder, an attractive debutante of this season, wore black with accents of lipstick red, and chatting with her during the intermission was her sister-in-law, Mrs. Alfred Kidder, 2nd. Mrs. Alfred R. McIntyre was as chic as usual in a gray tailleur, her brown felt hat banded with red. Strolling about the foyer with Mrs. J. Colby Bassett were Mrs. Edmund Sears Kelley and her daughter, Mrs. Bradford Price.

Still others we noted were Mrs. Palfrey Perkins, Mrs. Robert Cushman, Mrs. H. Nickerson Sears, Mrs. Harry Hill Thorndike, Mrs. Elizabeth C. Leland, Mrs. James J. Minot, Jr., Miss Beatrice Talbot, Mrs. Charles Gaston Smith, Miss Gertrude L. Peabody, Miss Barbara Bremer, Mrs. Henry Erhard, Miss Mary Gilman, Mrs. Roswell Parish, Mrs. Harry B. Stebbins, Mrs. Robert Belknap, Miss Ellen Bottomley, Mrs. Charles P. Howard, Mrs. Jaffray de Hauteville Bell, Miss Olive Perry, Mrs. William H. Coburn, Mrs. Arthur E. Grannis, Miss Harriette Blake, Miss Lucy Pope, Mrs. Paul F. Clark and her daughter, Miss Jean Clark, Mrs. Carl Dreyfus, Miss Rosamond Pierce, Mrs. Phister Cowin and her daughter, Miss Jean Cowin, Miss Constance Learned, Mrs. Adams Sherman Hill, Mrs. Faneuil Adams, Miss Jane Megrew, Mrs. Franklin W. Hobbs and Mrs. Malcolm Bradley French.

Symphony to Play Copland Work This Week

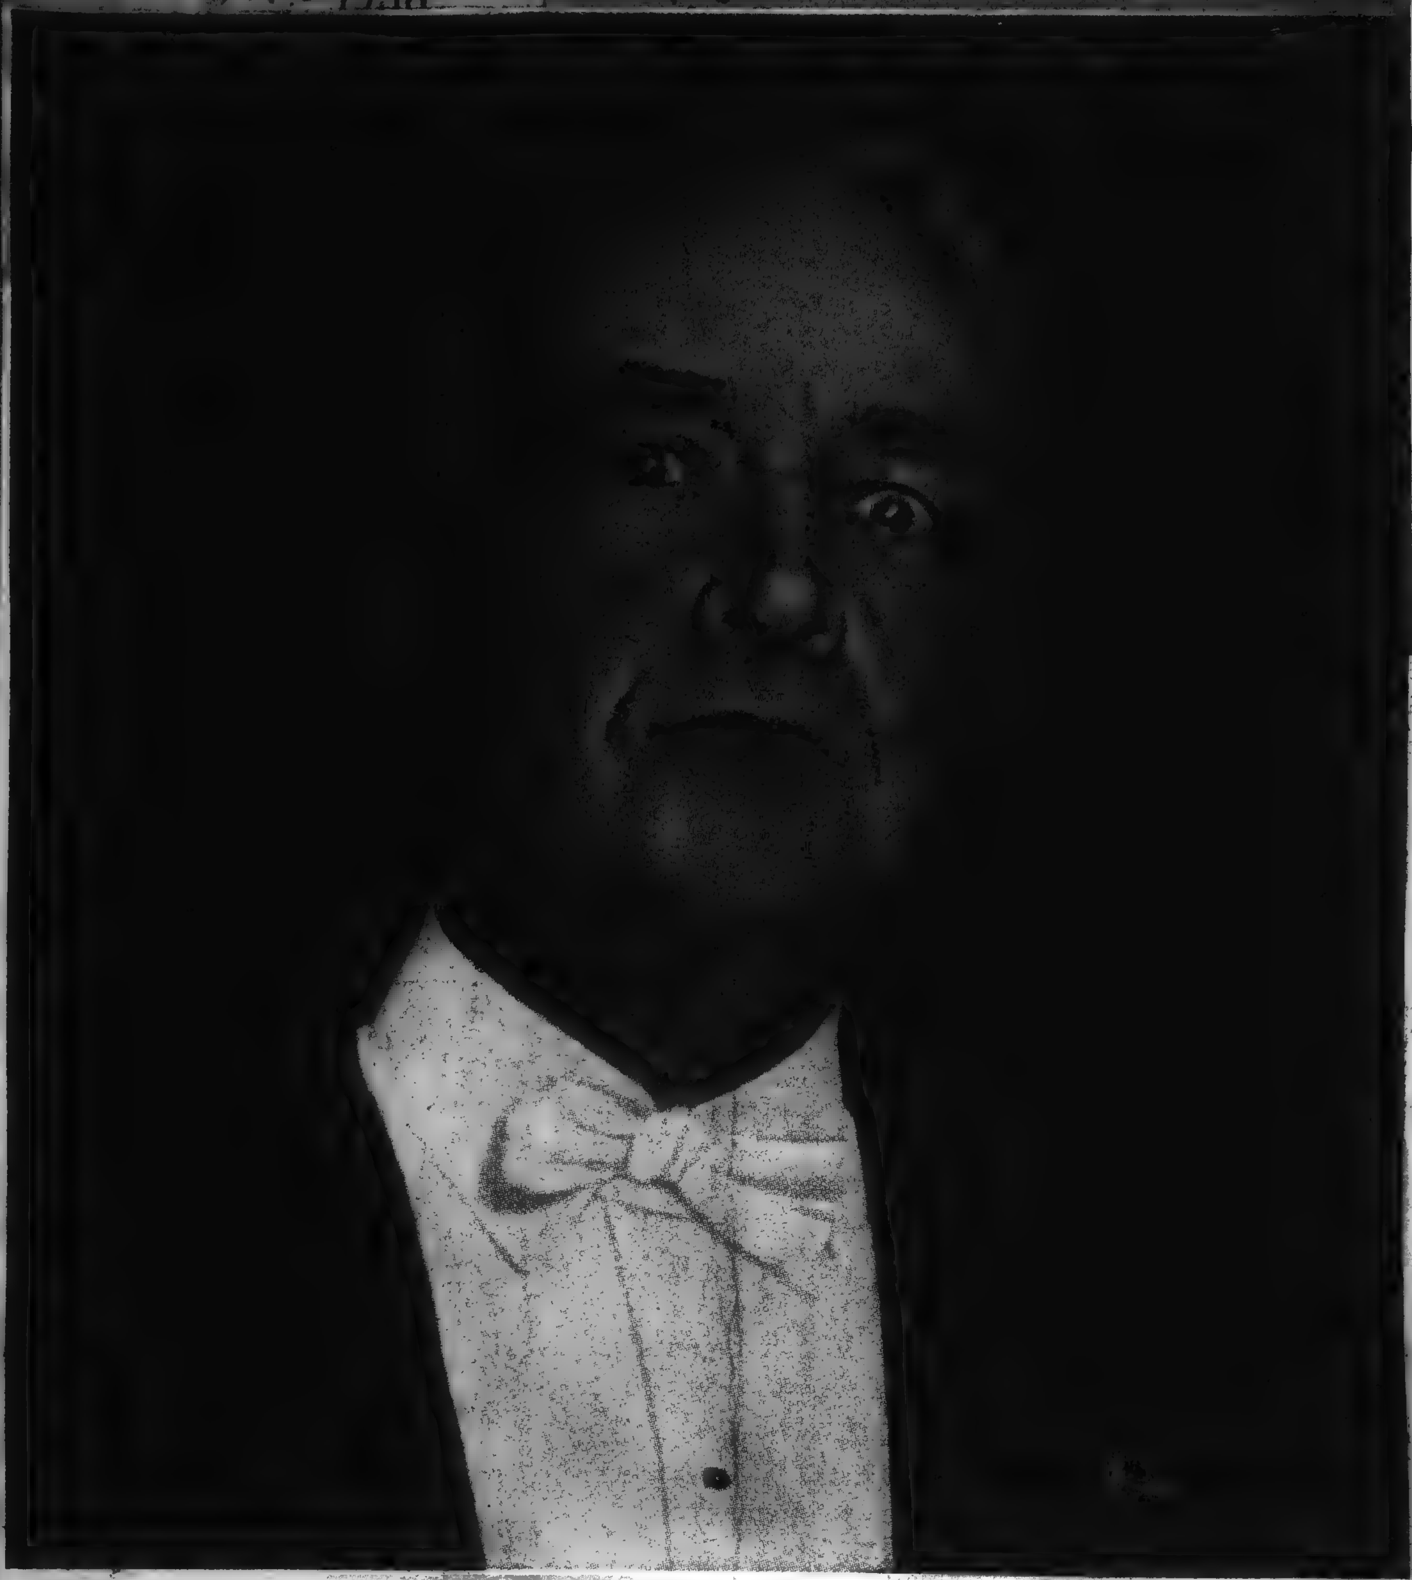
The second pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will take place in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The program will open with a divertimento in B flat, K. No. 287, by Mozart, written in six parts for four string instruments and two horns. The first violin part of this divertimento is brilliantly written, and was performed by the composer in Munich in 1777, the year in which the piece was composed. In the coming performances, the combined string sections will be used.

Aaron Copland's "El Salon Mexico" will have its first Boston performance in the same program. Copland wrote this rhapsody upon popular melodies which he heard during a sojourn in Mexico, and named it after a famous dance hall in Mexico City. "El Salon Mexico" has been performed in Mexico City and in London at the festival of contemporary music last summer. The symphony, "From the New World," by Dvorak, the Czech composer, will complete the program.

The series of six programs by the Boston symphony orchestra given on Monday evenings and repeated on the following Tuesday afternoon will begin Oct. 24-25 in Symphony hall. Myra Hess, the famous English pianist, will appear as soloist at one pair of concerts, and at another Genia and Pierre Luboshutz. The paired painists will appear with the orchestra in Mozart's concerto. Two outstanding guests are announced for two pairs of programs—Georges Enesco and Igor Stravinsky. Four pairs of concerts will be conducted by Serge Koussevitzky.

TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.
OCT 10 1938

16



Paul Dorsey

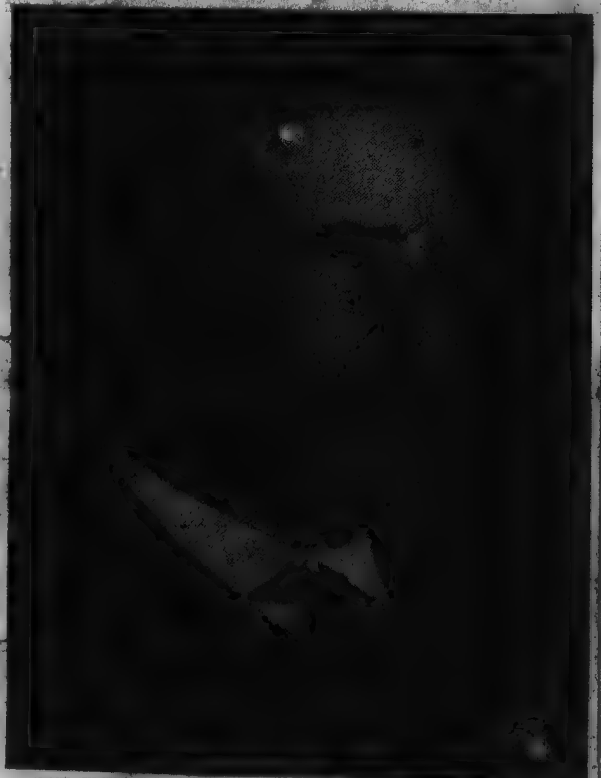
CONDUCTOR SERGEI KOUSSEVITZKY
"If you spik, I go home."
(Music)

MUSIC

Boston's Boyar

(See Cover)

In the first half of the 19th Century, when such men as Philosopher Ralph Waldo Emerson, Preacher Theodore Parker and Pundit Bronson Alcott were generating a whole kaleidoscope of intellectual sparks, Boston was in truth the cultural powerhouse of the U. S. Since then Boston's cultural graph has shown a decline. Her writers and painters, once the most pioneering, are now for the most part complacent. But to the Back Bay Brahmins Boston's past glories are still present, her old-fashioned way of life still sacredly up-to-date.



THE LATE HENRY LEE HIGGINSON
His million-dollar idea still stands.

One of Boston's hoary monuments to Brahmin gentility, that still stands like the Great Pyramid, is the Boston Symphony Orchestra. At its Friday afternoon concerts in venerable Symphony Hall, bald, spade-bearded oldsters and their classically corseted wives sit complacently, laved in the patrician strains of Beethoven and Brahms. So have they sat every week since the late Major Henry Lee Higginson, in 1881, materialized the expensive idea that Boston ought to have a good symphony orchestra. That idea cost Major Higginson a million dollars.

Higginson's Band. The fame of Henry Lee Higginson's orchestra has not been limited to Boston. Long before the Philadelphia Orchestra was heard of, connoisseurs rated the Boston Symphony the finest organization of its kind in the U. S., some said in the world. Although it has been rivaled in recent years by at least two other U. S. orchestras,* it has held its place fairly steadily for more than half a century. Only once in its history did it fall behind the front rank, and that was when its greatest conductor, razor-faced, German-born Karl Muck, was charged with espionage by New England patrioteers and interned during the World War.

There followed a six-year interlude of trouble. Aging Major Higginson, disgusted with the hue & cry over innocent, crotchety Dr. Muck, turned the orchestra's management over to a board of directors, died a year later. Many of the orchestra's best players had been deported as "enemy aliens." In turn, two more acceptable but less capable French conductors, Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux, strove vainly to regain the lost ground. A strike, supported by the American Federation of Musicians, though won by the management, further depleted the orchestra's ranks. But by 1924 the Boston Symphony, recovered from its wartime jitters, was being reorganized for a comeback. Soon it was back in its old place among the finest of U. S. symphonic organizations.

The man largely responsible for this comeback was a pince-nezed Russian who strongly resembles a diplomat of the Napoleonic era, Sergei Alexandrovich Koussevitzky. Imported by the Symphony's board of directors from Europe, where he had caused some loud critical quacks in the concert halls of London and Paris, Conductor Koussevitzky's first season was in the nature of a tryout. He was not at that time one of the towering figures of European music. Conservative Bostonians, in fact, found him at first somewhat exaggerated and theatrical. But soon Boston began to admit that Conductor Koussevitzky had two things: 1) an uncannily transparent tone that only he seemed able to elicit from the orchestra, 2) a repertory that was larger and more varied than that of any other conductor in the U. S. Insatiable in his search for good music by contemporary composers, he introduced the U. S. to such important modernist figures as William Walton, Paul Hindemith and Zoltán Kodály, provided Boston with a better balanced symphonic diet than any other U. S. city was enjoying. While other orchestras were splitting up their seasons under successive guest conductors, the Bostonians made out with Koussevitzky all winter long.

Last week the 106 members of the Boston Symphony, like thousands of symphonic musicians all over the U. S., polished their brasswork and rosined their bows for the start of a new season. For Boston's orchestra, second oldest in the U. S.,* this was to be their 58th winter, their 15th consecutive year under Koussevitzky's baton.

Tyrant's 15th. When Boston's concertgoers gather in Symphony Hall this week for the season's opening consert, they will see a haughty, grey-haired, tyrannical aristocrat stride to the podium in faultlessly tailored morning clothes, bow to the audience, then turn imperiously to the orchestra. As he raps for attention he will clap a pince-nez to his nose. Before he turns again to the audience to take his bow, the pince-nez will be removed. During the performance his rear view will present the most thoroughly studied and poised appearance to be seen on any symphonic podium in the U. S. Even in climaxes where the average maestro would be fighting the air with fury, Conductor Koussevitzky's well-preserved figure well preserves a Vere de Vere calm.

This remarkably poised exhibition gives no hint of the scenes that preceded it. Koussevitzky on parade and Koussevitzky in rehearsal are as different as night and day. While trombonists sweat, fiddlers fidget, and horn players dump saliva from their hard-worked instruments, Tyrant Koussevitzky, hunched in an old sweater, shouts, sings, gesticulates, lunges and paddles with his baton, grins froglike at pleasant sounds, scolds frantically in heavily battered English. "You must zing," he admonishes, "you must blay the nuts." "Vonderful, vonderful!" he exclaims, when the orchestra's tone suits him. "Don't spik!" he furiously warns some innocent player who is trying to make a suggestion. "If you spik, I go home!"

Associated Press

MRS. KOUSSEVITZKY
The serenade was groaning, mournful.

Since the Boston Symphony is the only important non-union orchestra in the U. S., musicians who cross Tyrant Koussevitzky risk their jobs. Stories of his tyranny (sometimes apocryphal) have become legend among musicians. Typical is that of the musician who persisted in playing sour notes. Exasperated, Koussevitzky finally shouted: "You are fired. Ged out. Ged out!" That ended the rehearsal. On his way out the discharged musician passed the dressing room, where the conductor was sitting gloomily hunched over a desk. The musician stopped. "Nuts to you, Koussevitzky!" he bellowed. Koussevitzky turned his haughty head. "It's too late to abologize," he snapped.

To Boston's John Q. Public, Koussevitzky is merely a funny name. But to Back Bay he is an idol, firmly pedestaled. If he showed signs of sociability, Boston's ladies would launch him in a flood of tea. But Conductor Koussevitzky has little time for fripperies, and his intimate friends are few. Few also are his hobbies. When he is not conducting, or studying the scores he keeps scattered about the living room of his home, he spends his time either walking or reading heavy tomes on metaphysics and philosophy. When walking he is accompanied by two joyfully yapping cocker spaniels named (in French) Bémol (flat) and Dièse (sharp).

Conservative in his tastes, 64-year-old Sergei Koussevitzky lives in a large rented house in the quiet, substantial, somewhat stuffy Boston suburb of Brookline. Its furnishings and decoration are completely American, its staff completely Russian. Chief factotum is a blond, grinning, gangling valet named Victor, who follows his master about with serf-like devotion. Strapping, slant-eyed Victor has many duties, among them that of drying off his master who is always drenched with perspiration at the end of each concert. Victor's wife is the cook, who prepares Koussevitzky's regular and carefully-chosen meals. Regularly and carefully apportioned are all his daily habits, with so much time allowed for rehearsing, so much for walking, so much for studying his scores, for the Boston Symphony's aging master takes systematic and excellent care of himself.

Though he is a tyrant on the podium, Koussevitzky in private life is an affable, courtly, talkative, rather posey Russian boyar* of the old school. While his tastes in music range from the 18th Century up to the streamlined present, his tastes in nearly everything else are old-worldly. Temperamentally a romantic, he loves to brood over the oniony ideas of such dank German philosophers as Schopenhauer and Nietzsche, considers them his teachers. But his manner, far from gloomy, is as enthusiastic as champagne. And his conversation, always accompanied by violent gesticulation, is loaded with rhetorical "Ah!'s," and wreathy superlatives. Though he has long been a champion of the works of young Soviet composers, he has little enthusiasm for Russia's present form of government. Always loud in his praise of the U. S. and its institutions, he took out his first U. S. citizenship papers three years ago.

Bull Fiddler. Koussevitzky has taken few of life's bumps. One good reason has been Natalya Konstantinovna Koussevitzkaya, his pleasant, portly, beak-nosed Russian wife. Koussevitzky is her career. Once a sculptress, she has not only spent the best part of her life smoothing out her husband's path; she also played an important part in putting him on the path in the first place.

The facts of Sergei Alexandrovich Koussevitzky's life belie his haughty mien but not his profession. He was born in 1874 in the tiny bedraggled central Russian village of Vyshny Volochek. His mother, who died shortly after he was born, was a pianist; his father gave lessons on the violin. A poor boy destined by a traditionally musical family for a musical career, he was soon on his way to Moscow in search of a scholarship at Moscow's Philharmonic Conservatory. Because he was late in applying, and because there were only a few places left in the conservatory orchestra, the only scholarships open to him were for instruction on 1) the trombone, 2) the bassoon, 3) the string bass. As the least of three evils, young Koussevitzky chose the bull fiddle (string bass). So expert did he become that eventually he toured Europe as a soloist on this clumsiest of instruments, was widely hailed as the world's No. 1 bull fiddler.*

It was during his days as a mustachioed virtuoso on the string bass that he met Natalya Konstantinovna. While sawing the thick strings of his groaning instrument at a Moscow concert, he noticed a girl in the front row, gazing at him in maidenly admiration. Koussevitzky's heart jumped, he sawed away more sweetly than ever. After the concert he searched for his admirer, but she had gone. For weeks romantic Koussevitzky was in a lovesick daze. Months later, at another concert, he spied her again in the audience, made his pachydermatous instrument serenade her with mournful and passionate moans. Again she eluded him. It was not until two years afterward that they met and married.

SERGEI KOUSSEVITZKY (AET. 22)
He and Bob Haggert are the tops.

Like many a successful conductor's wife, Natalya Konstantinovna was a woman of means. Together they financed an orchestra for Koussevitzky to practice on, and gave a series of concerts in Moscow and St. Petersburg. The Koussevitzky Concerts began to catch on with the Russian public. The Koussevitzkys chartered a ferryboat, made a tour of the Volga. By

---

* The Philadelphia Orchestra, the New York Philharmonic-Symphony.

* Oldest: the New York Philharmonic-Symphony (founded 1842).

* In Tsarist Russia, a gentleman not of noble rank.

TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.

OCT 10 1938

16

Paul Dorsey

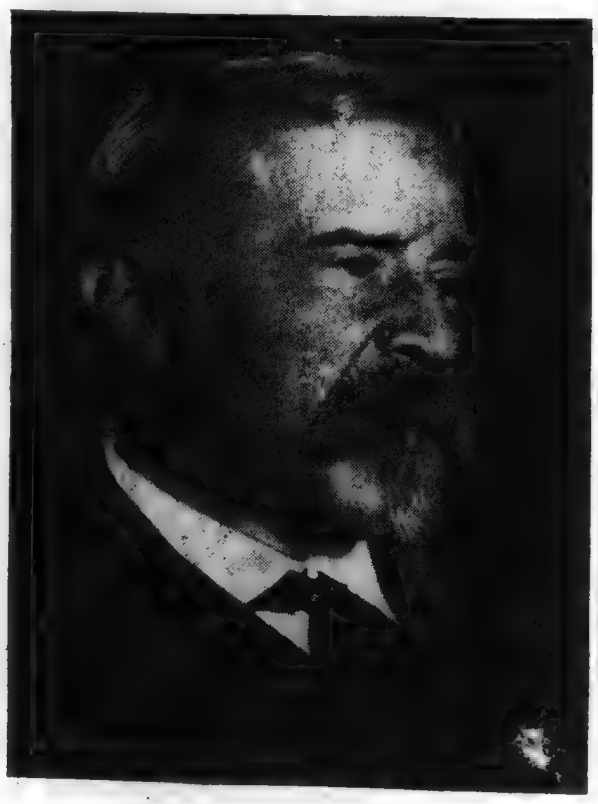
CONDUCTOR SERGEI KOUSSEVITZKY
"If you spik, I go home."
(Music)

MUSIC

Boston's Boyar

(See Cover)

In the first half of the 19th Century, when such men as Philosopher Ralph Waldo Emerson, Preacher Theodore Parker and Pundit Bronson Alcott were generating a whole kaleidoscope of intellectual sparks, Boston was in truth the cultural powerhouse of the U. S. Since then Boston's cultural graph has shown a decline. Her writers and painters, once the most pioneering, are now for the most part complacent. But to the Back Bay Brahmins Boston's past glories are still present, her old-fashioned way of life still sacredly up-to-date.



THE LATE HENRY LEE HIGGINSON
His million-dollar idea still stands.

One of Boston's hoary monuments to Brahmin gentility, that still stands like the Great Pyramid, is the Boston Symphony Orchestra. At its Friday afternoon concerts in venerable Symphony Hall, bald, spade-bearded oldsters and their classically corseted wives sit complacently, laved in the patrician strains of Beethoven and Brahms. So have they sat every week since the late Major Henry Lee Higginson, in 1881, materialized the expensive idea that Boston ought to have a good symphony orchestra. That idea cost Major Higginson a million dollars.

Higginson's Band. The fame of Henry Lee Higginson's orchestra has not been limited to Boston. Long before the Philadelphia Orchestra was heard of, connoisseurs rated the Boston Symphony the finest organization of its kind in the U. S., some said in the world. Although it has been rivaled in recent years by at least two other U. S. orchestras,* it has held its place fairly steadily for more than half a century. Only once in its history did it fall behind the front rank, and that was when its greatest conductor, razor-faced, German-born Karl Muck, was charged with espionage by New England patrioteers and interned during the World War.

There followed a six-year interlude of trouble. Aging Major Higginson, disgusted with the hue & cry over innocent, crotchety Dr. Muck, turned the orchestra's management over to a board of directors, died a year later. Many of the orchestra's best players had been deported as "enemy aliens." In turn, two more acceptable but less capable French conductors, Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux, strove vainly to regain the lost ground. A strike, supported by the American Federation of Musicians, though won by the management, further depleted the orchestra's ranks. But by 1924 the Boston Symphony, recovered from its wartime jitters, was being reorganized for a comeback. Soon it was back in its old place among the finest of U. S. symphonic organizations.

The man largely responsible for this comeback was a pince-nezed Russian who strongly resembles a diplomat of the Napoleonic era, Sergei Alexandrovich Koussevitzky. Imported by the Symphony's board of directors from Europe, where he had caused some loud critical quacks in the concert halls of London and Paris, Conductor Koussevitzky's first season was in the nature of a tryout. He was not at that time one of the towering figures of European music. Conservative Bostonians, in fact, found him at first somewhat exaggerated and theatrical. But soon Boston began to admit that Conductor Koussevitzky had two things: 1) an uncannily transparent tone that only he seemed able to elicit from the orchestra, 2) a repertory that was larger and more varied than that of any other conductor in the U. S. Insatiable in his search for good music by contemporary composers, he introduced the U. S. to such important modernist figures as William Walton, Paul Hindemith and Zoltán Kodály, provided Boston with a better balanced symphonic diet than any other U. S. city was enjoying. While other orchestras were splitting up their seasons under successive guest conductors, the Bostonians made out with Koussevitzky all winter long.

Last week the 106 members of the Boston Symphony, like thousands of symphonic musicians all over the U. S., polished their brasswork and rosined their bows for the start of a new season. For Boston's orchestra, second oldest in the U. S.,* this was to be their 58th winter, their 15th consecutive year under Koussevitzky's baton.

Tyrant's 15th. When Boston's concertgoers gather in Symphony Hall this week for the season's opening concert, they will see a haughty, grey-haired, tyrannical aristocrat stride to the podium in faultlessly tailored morning clothes, bow to the audience, then turn imperiously to the orchestra. As he raps for attention he will clap a pince-nez to his nose. Before he turns again to the audience to take his bow, the pince-nez will be removed. During the performance his rear view will present the most thoroughly studied and poised appearance to be seen on any symphonic podium in the U. S. Even in climaxes where the average maestro would be fighting the air with fury, Conductor Koussevitzky's well-preserved figure well preserves a Vere de Vere calm.

This remarkably poised exhibition gives no hint of the scenes that preceded it. Koussevitzky on parade and Koussevitzky in rehearsal are as different as night and day. While trombonists sweat, fiddlers fidget, and horn players dump saliva from their hard-worked instruments, Tyrant Koussevitzky, hunched in an old sweater, shouts, sings, gesticulates, lunges and paddles with his baton, grins froglike at pleasant sounds, scolds frantically in heavily battered English. "You must zing," he admonishes, "you must blay the nuts." "Vonderful, vonderful!" he exclaims, when the orchestra's tone suits him. "Don't spik!" he furiously warns some innocent player who is trying to make a suggestion. "If you spik, I go home!"

Associated Press

MRS. KOUSSEVITZKY
The serenade was groaning, mournful.

Since the Boston Symphony is the only important non-union orchestra in the U. S., musicians who cross Tyrant Koussevitzky risk their jobs. Stories of his tyranny (sometimes apocryphal) have become legend among musicians. Typical is that of the musician who persisted in playing sour notes. Exasperated, Koussevitzky finally shouted: "You are fired. Ged out. Ged out!" That ended the rehearsal. On his way out the discharged musician passed the dressing room, where the conductor was sitting gloomily hunched over a desk. The musician stopped. "Nuts to you, Koussevitzky!" he bellowed. Koussevitzky turned his haughty head. "It's too late to abologize," he snapped.

To Boston's John Q. Public, Koussevitzky is merely a funny name. But to Back Bay he is an idol, firmly pedestaled. If he showed signs of sociability, Boston's ladies would launch him in a flood of tea. But Conductor Koussevitzky has little time for fripperies, and his intimate friends are few. Few also are his hobbies. When he is not conducting, or studying the scores he keeps scattered about the living room of his home, he spends his time either walking or reading heavy tomes on metaphysics and philosophy. When walking he is accompanied by two joyfully yapping cocker spaniels named (in French) Bémol (flat) and Dièse (sharp).

Conservative in his tastes, 64-year-old Sergei Koussevitzky lives in a large rented house in the quiet, substantial, somewhat stuffy Boston suburb of Brookline. Its furnishings and decoration are completely American, its staff completely Russian. Chief factotum is a blond, grinning, gangling valet named Victor, who follows his master about with serf-like devotion. Strapping, slant-eyed Victor has many duties, among them that of drying off his master who is always drenched with perspiration at the end of each concert. Victor's wife is the cook, who prepares Koussevitzky's regular and carefully-chosen meals. Regularly and carefully apportioned are all his daily habits, with so much time allowed for rehearsing, so much for walking, so much for studying his scores, for the Boston Symphony's aging master takes systematic and excellent care of himself.

Though he is a tyrant on the podium, Koussevitzky in private life is an affable, courtly, talkative, rather posey Russian boyar* of the old school. While his tastes in music range from the 18th Century up to the streamlined present, his tastes in nearly everything else are old-worldly. Temperamentally a romantic, he loves to brood over the oniony ideas of such dank German philosophers as Schopenhauer and Nietzsche, considers them his teachers. But his manner, far from gloomy, is as enthusiastic as champagne. And his conversation, always accompanied by violent gesticulation, is loaded with rhetorical "Ah!'s," and wreathy superlatives. Though he has long been a champion of the works of young Soviet composers, he has little enthusiasm for Russia's present form of government. Always loud in his praise of the U. S. and its institutions, he took out his first U. S. citizenship papers three years ago.

Bull Fiddler. Koussevitzky has taken few of life's bumps. One good reason has been Natalya Konstantinovna Koussevitzkaya, his pleasant, portly, beak-nosed Russian wife. Koussevitzky is her career. Once a sculptress, she has not only spent the best part of her life smoothing out her husband's path; she also played an important part in putting him on the path in the first place.

The facts of Sergei Alexandrovich Koussevitzky's life belie his haughty mien but not his profession. He was born in 1874 in the tiny bedraggled central Russian village of Vyshny Volochek. His mother, who died shortly after he was born, was a pianist; his father gave lessons on the violin. A poor boy, destined by a traditionally musical family for a musical career, he was soon on his way to Moscow in search of a scholarship at Moscow's Philharmonic Conservatory. Because he was late in applying, and because there were only a few places left in the conservatory orchestra, the only scholarships open to him were for instruction on 1) the trombone, 2) the bassoon, 3) the string bass. As the least of three evils, young Koussevitzky chose the bull fiddle (string bass). So expert did he become that eventually he toured Europe as a soloist on this clumsiest of instruments, was widely hailed as the world's No. 1 bull fiddler.*

It was during his days as a mustachioed virtuoso on the string bass that he met Natalya Konstantinovna. While sawing the thick strings of his groaning instrument at a Moscow concert, he noticed a girl in the front row, gazing at him in maidenly admiration. Koussevitzky's heart jumped, he sawed away more sweetly than ever. After the concert he searched for his admirer, but she had gone. For weeks romantic Koussevitzky was in a lovesick daze. Months later, at another concert, he spied her again in the audience, made his pachydermatous instrument serenade her with mournful and passionate moans. Again she eluded him. It was not until two years afterward that they met and married.

SERGEI KOUSSEVITZKY (AET. 22)
He and Bob Haggert are the tops.

Like many a successful conductor's wife, Natalya Konstantinovna was a woman of means. Together they financed an orchestra for Koussevitzky to practice on, and gave a series of concerts in Moscow and St. Petersburg. The Koussevitzky Concerts began to catch on with the Russian public. The Koussevitzkys chartered a ferryboat, made a tour of the Volga. By

Cont. above

Cont. above

Cont. next page

---

* The Philadelphia Orchestra, the New York Philharmonic-Symphony.

* Oldest: the New York Philharmonic-Symphony (founded 1842).

* In Tsarist Russia, a gentleman not of noble rank.

1910 Koussevitzky was the most widely-known maestro in Tsarist Russia. Meanwhile he had started a publishing house for music by contemporary Slavic composers, published for the first time (thus, incidentally, sparing himself the performance royalties) works by such famed artists as the late Alexander Scriabin, Sergei Prokofieff and Igor Stravinsky.

The revolution of 1917 put a stop to all this. Zealous Bolsheviks liquidated Capitalist Koussevitzky's self-endowed orchestra and publishing house, offered him instead the post of Russia's musical head man. He declined, though he accepted for a time the conductorship of Petrograd's State Orchestra, where his dictatorial instincts were continually curbed by bureaucratic rules & regulations. Once officers of the GPU caught him attempting to escape to Estonia. When he did finally succeed in getting a passport to leave the country, he abandoned virtually all of his money and personal property to the Soviet Government.

Today, greying, fastidious Koussevitzky is at the peak of his career. The resignations of Arturo Toscanini from the conductorship of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony,* and of platinum-blond Leopold Stokowski from the chief conductorship of the Philadelphia Orchestra (see below) have left him without rivals among the regular directors of U. S. symphony orchestras. Ten years ago, outside of Boston, there may have been some doubt about his pre-eminence. But today even Manhattanites and Philadelphians would admit that the No. 1 symphony conductor of the U. S. is Boston's Sergei Alexandrovich Koussevitzky.

First Fiddle

As some football teams have co-captains, so some symphonies have co-conductors. Back to work from his summer home in Sanbornville, N. H. last week went one of the Philadelphia orchestra's co-conductors, blond-haired, Budapest-born Eugene Ormandy. Mr. Ormandy had spent a diligent summer, working over programs, boning up on the violin, his first love, with Virtuoso Jascha Heifetz.

Far from Philadelphia last week was the symphony's other co-conductor, sad-eyed Leopold Stokowski, resting in Beverly Hills, Calif. after a less industrious but equally eventful European summer in the company of Greta Garbo. Since Great Conductor Stokowski's blow-off with the symphony directors in 1934, when he relinquished his post as music director, he and co-Conductor Ormandy have been nominal equals.

After Mr. Ormandy's return, the directors announced: 1) that Conductor Stokowski had signed up for eleven concerts next spring, and 2) that "in recognition of musical achievement" the post of music director would be revived for Conductor Ormandy. For happy Violinist Ormandy this meant more pay, official confirmation that he is Philadelphia's first fiddle.

---

* Today, famed Maestro Toscanini's most important appearances in the U. S. are his dozen-odd annual broadcasts with the NBC Symphony Orchestra.

TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.

NOV 7 - 1938

Koussevitzky, Toscanini

Sirs:

I am astonished that TIME [Oct. 10] should have fallen for an old and, I believe, authentic Toscanini story and attributed it to Koussevitzky in connection with whom it simply doesn't make sense.

ALFRED A. KNOPF

New York City

Mr. Copland, Third Person Singular

B. Trans. Oct. 13/38

Aaron Copland, composer of "El Salon Mexico," the novel item on the Symphony concerts this week, who has been in Boston since Tuesday, found time to tell this department something of his present activities, confide a few opinions and tell a story or two.

His book, "What to Listen for in Music," will be published by Whittlesey House next month. He wrote recently a ballet, "Billy the Kid," commissoned by the Ballet Caravan. It is scheduled for first performance tomorrow at the Chicago Civic Theater. From there the Ballet Caravan will take it on a tour that will stretch as far as the West Coast and, later in the season, New York.

C. C. Birchard and Company, the Boston publishing house, is soon to bring out Copland's play-opera, "The Second Hurricane," written for performance by high school players, singers and actors. A little while ago, in a room high up in the Columbus avenue building where the Birchard Company makes its headquarters, the manuscript orchestral parts were spread out for the consideration of the editor. It was the day of the big wind; and before much could be done about it, many of the sheets had gone through the open windows!

At the same time Copland was sojourning at the MacDowell Colony in Peterboro, N. H. The place was hard hit. For a considerable period Copland was marooned in the main house, unable to get to his studio in the woods, where he had left the manuscript score of "The Second Hurricane." Fortunately nothing happened to it.

The conversation turned to composers and how they make their living, if any. ASCAP (American Society of Composers and Publishers) has been for some time protecting the interests of composers in the popular field, but has done practically nothing about composers of serious music, who are in an even worse plight. The prevalent idea, especially so far as American composers are concerned, has been that if a man is lucky enough to get his symphony played by a big orchestra he is more than repaid for his labors. As to how he is going to feed and shelter himself while writing, no especial thought is given to so prosaic a detail.

The Composers' Alliance came into the field recently to do something about this condition. Copland has been active in the movement even though, he insists, he has never given a composition to an orchestra without insisting that he be paid his fee. Before the Alliance achieves its goal, says Mr. Copland, there is a good deal to be done, including the ironing out of some jurisdictional overlapping with ASCAP. But Copland is hopeful about ultimate success.

Quartet To Play at Symphony Concert; Further Plans

B. Globe - Oct. 13/38

The Coolidge String Quartet will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the third regular pair of concerts to be given in Symphony Hall on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The occasion will be the first public performances of Nicolai Berezowsky's Toccata, Variations and Finale for String Quartet and Orchestra. Berezowsky is a member of the Quartet, which also includes: William Kroll, Nicolas Moldavan, and Victor Gottlieb. Mr. Berezowsky has been several times represented at these concerts, the most recent performance having been his Third Symphony, which was played in March, 1937.

The program will open with Glazounov's Symphonic Poem, "Stenka Razin." The music is based upon the popular Russian story of the Cossack marauder of the 17th century who, traversing the Volga river in his barge, encited the people to revolt against the government, promising them freedom from oppression. When, having defied the Czar himself, he was at last captured upon his barge, he cast his companion, a captive princess, into the waters, giving the mother Volga his most precious treasure in tribute and gratitude. "Stenka Razin" was last performed at the Symphony concerts when Glazounov conducted as guest, Jan. 17, 1930. The closing number upon next week's program will be the Fourth Symphony of Brahms in E minor.

The series of six concerts on Monday evenings and Tuesday afternoons by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, will open Oct. 24-25. A notable series is anticipated for the season to come. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct four of the pairs of concerts, the remaining two to be directed by George Enesco, the Roumanian composer and conductor, and Igor Stravinsky, the Russian composer who is to visit America next March. Soloists for this series will include Pierre and Genia Luboshutz, who will be heard in Mozart's Concerto for Two Pianos, and Myra Hess, the famous English pianist.

B. Trans. MUSIC Oct. 13/38

Novel Work from Copland For the Symphony Concerts

Composer Discusses 'El salon Mexico,' To Be Played Tomorrow and Saturday

By MOSES SMITH

Two works new to the repertory of the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra appear on the program for tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening, when the proceedings will end with Dvorak's "New World" Symphony, a sympathetic gesture from conductor and musicians to Czechoslovakia, land of Dvorak's birth. The first, a century and a half old, is the Mozart Divertimento in B-flat major for strings and a pair of horns, a work that has been discussed in these columns in connection with recent phonograph records of Columbia and Victor. The other is Aaron Copland's "El salon Mexico."

Copland got his idea from a huge dance-hall of the same name in Mexico City. The hall, he thinks, gives one the "feel" of the city better than anything else he knows. He began going to Mexico in 1932, and wrote the piano-score of "El salon Mexico" in 1934. Occupied with other things, he did not get around to orchestrating it until 1936. Chavez and his orchestra in Mexico City played the work for the first time in August, 1937. At that time, Copland says, the Mexicans expressed considerable surprise that a foreigner should have written music so characteristically Mexican. "El salon Mexico" was even compared to the music of Revueltas, whom they regard as the most Mexican of Mexican composers. There have been only two other performances, one by the NBC Symphony Orchestra under Sir Adrian Boult last year, the other by the BBC Symphony Orchestra under the same conductor at the I. S. C. M. Festival in London last spring.

"El salon Mexico" is scored for large modern orchestra, with winds in threes and a good-sized battery manned by four players. Among the percussion instruments are a gourd and temple-blocks, to lend local color. The substantive material itself is all—or nearly all—local color, taken directly from Mexican tunes, although not necessarily what is heard at the dance-hall in question. The piece, requiring ten minutes or a little more in performance, is in one continuous section, consisting of three sub-divisions after a fast introduction. The middle part is slow, and the last part does not repeat the material of the first. At one point Copland reduces the orchestra to the proportions of the mariaches ensemble, a group of half a dozen players such as is frequently to be heard in cafes, at weddings and so on.

The whole thing, Copland says, might be described as a medley of Mexican tunes. It is the sort of music, he says hopefully, as might occupy a place in a Pops program of, say, 1970. It was quite a success with an audience of connoisseurs at the London Festival. And this fact irritated the English reviewers, who even did a little public scolding because, in their opinion, the music was unworthy of such serious attention. Copland reports these things quite disarmingly. His only defense—and he scarcely puts it as a defense—is that he doesn't see why, because he has written, say, a symphony, he should have to write another symphony. If "El salon Mexico" is "different" from his other compositions (and the composer hopes it is), it is not, he believes, an abrupt change in the direction of his development as a composer.

Orchestras Afield

The Philadelphia Orchestra, Eugene Ormandy conductor, will play a Corelli Suite for orchestra, "Don Juan" by Strauss, "Iberia" by Debussy and the Second Symphony of Sibelius at its second pair of concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening.

The Cleveland Orchestra will begin its twenty-first season with concerts this evening and Saturday evening, when Artur Rodzinski will present Three Chorales by Respighi, Schoenberg's orchestral transcription of the Brahms G minor Quartet, Delius' "Paris, a Nightpiece" and the waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier."

The Chicago Symphony Orchestra will begin its forty-eighth season—the thirty-fourth under the direction of Frederick Stock—with the following program to be presented in concerts this evening and tomorrow afternoon: the conductor's transcription of "A Mighty Fortress Is Our God" by Bach, Rachmaninov's Second Symphony, "Iberia" by Debussy, Schoenherr's transcription of Kreutzer's Perpetuum mobile and "La valse" by Ravel.

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS

OCT 11 1938

MUSIC, MAESTRO, PLEASE!—Enterprising cameraman gives you his lens impression of a well-known symphony orchestra conductor at work. The conductor is Dr. Sergei Koussevitsky, who is starting his 15th consecutive year on the Boston podium.

ST. JOSEPH, MICH.
HERALD PRESS

OCT 10 1938

YOUNGSTOWN, O.
VINDICATOR

OCT 10 1938

COHOES, N. Y.
AMERICAN

OCT 11 1938

BATTLE CREEK, MICH.
MOON JOURNAL

OCT 11 1938

17

1910. Koussevitzky was the most widely-known maestro in Tsarist Russia. Meanwhile he had started a publishing house for music by contemporary Slavic composers, published for the first time (thus, incidentally, sparing himself the performance royalties) works by such famed artists as the late Alexander Scriabin, Sergei Prokofieff and Igor Stravinsky.

The revolution of 1917 put a stop to all this. Zealous Bolsheviks liquidated Capitalist Koussevitzky's self-endowed orchestra and publishing house, offered him instead the post of Russia's musical head man. He declined, though he accepted for a time the conductorship of Petrograd's State Orchestra, where his dictatorial instincts were continually curbed by bureaucratic rules & regulations. Once officers of the GPU caught him attempting to escape to Estonia. When he did finally succeed in getting a passport to leave the country, he abandoned virtually all of his money and personal property to the Soviet Government.

Today, greying, fastidious Koussevitzky is at the peak of his career. The resignations of Arturo Toscanini from the conductorship of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony,* and of platinum-blond Leopold Stokowski from the chief conductorship of the Philadelphia Orchestra (see below) have left him without rivals among the regular directors of U. S. symphony orchestras. Ten years ago, outside of Boston, there may have been some doubt about his pre-eminence. But today even Manhattanites and Philadelphians would admit that the No. 1 symphony conductor of the U. S. is Boston's Sergei Alexandrovich Koussevitzky.

First Fiddle

As some football teams have co-captains, so some symphonies have co-conductors. Back to work from his summer home in Sanbornville, N. H. last week went one of the Philadelphia orchestra's co-conductors, blond-haired, Budapest-born Eugene Ormandy. Mr. Ormandy had spent a diligent summer, working over programs, boning up on the violin, his first love, with Virtuoso Jascha Heifetz.

Far from Philadelphia last week was the symphony's other co-conductor, sad-eyed Leopold Stokowski, resting in Beverly Hills, Calif. after a less industrious but equally eventful European summer in the company of Greta Garbo. Since Great Conductor Stokowski's blow-off with the symphony directors in 1934, when he relinquished his post as music director, he and co-Conductor Ormandy have been nominal equals.

After Mr. Ormandy's return, the directors announced: 1) that Conductor Stokowski had signed up for eleven concerts next spring, and 2) that "in recognition of musical achievement" the post of music director would be revived for Conductor Ormandy. For happy Violinist Ormandy this meant more pay, official confirmation that he is Philadelphia's first fiddle.

---

* Today, famed Maestro Toscanini's most important appearances in the U. S. are his dozen-odd annual broadcasts with the NBC Symphony Orchestra.

TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.

NOV 7 - 1938

Koussevitzky, Toscanini

Sirs:

I am astonished that TIME [Oct. 10] should have fallen for an old and, I believe, authentic Toscanini story and attributed it to Koussevitzky in connection with whom it simply doesn't make sense.

ALFRED A. KNOPF

New York City

Mr. Copland, Third Person Singular

B. Trans. Oct. 13/38

Aaron Copland, composer of "El Salon Mexico," the novel item on the Symphony concerts this week, who has been in Boston since Tuesday, found time to tell this department something of his present activities, confide a few opinions and tell a story or two.

His book, "What to Listen for in Music," will be published by Whittlesey House next month. He wrote recently a ballet, "Billy the Kid," commissoned by the Ballet Caravan. It is scheduled for first performance tomorrow at the Chicago Civic Theater. From there the Ballet Caravan will take it on a tour that will stretch as far as the West Coast and, later in the season, New York.

C. C. Birchard and Company, the Boston publishing house, is soon to bring out Copland's play-opera, "The Second Hurricane," written for performance by high school players, singers and actors. A little while ago, in a room high up in the Columbus avenue building where the Birchard Company makes its headquarters, the manuscript orchestral parts were spread out for the consideration of the editor. It was the day of the big wind; and before much could be done about it, many of the sheets had gone through the open windows!

At the same time Copland was sojourning at the MacDowell Colony in Peterboro, N. H. The place was hard hit. For a considerable period Copland was marooned in the main house, unable to get to his studio in the woods, where he had left the manuscript score of "The Second Hurricane." Fortunately nothing happened to it.

The conversation turned to composers and how they make their living, if any. ASCAP (American Society of Composers and Publishers) has been for some time protecting the interests of composers in the popular field, but has done practically nothing about composers of serious music, who are in an even worse plight. The prevalent idea, especially so far as American composers are concerned, has been that if a man is lucky enough to get his symphony played by a big orchestra he is more than repaid for his labors. As to how he is going to feed and shelter himself while writing, no especial thought is given to so prosaic a detail.

The Composers' Alliance came into the field recently to do something about this condition. Copland has been active in the movement even though, he insists, he has never given a composition to an orchestra without insisting that he be paid his fee. Before the Alliance achieves its goal, says Mr. Copland, there is a good deal to be done, including the ironing out of some jurisdictional overlapping with ASCAP. But Copland is hopeful about ultimate success.

Quartet To Play at Symphony Concert; Further Plans

B. Trans. Oct. 13/38

The Coolidge String Quartet will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the third regular pair of concerts to be given in Symphony Hall on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The occasion will be the first public performances of Nicolai Berezowsky's Toccata, Variations and Finale for String Quartet and Orchestra. Berezowsky is a member of the Quartet, which also includes: William Kroll, Nicolas Moldavan, and Victor Gottlieb. Mr. Berezowsky has been several times represented at these concerts, the most recent performance having been his Third Symphony, which was played in March, 1937.

The program will open with Glazounov's Symphonic Poem, "Stenka Razin." The music is based upon the popular Russian story of the Cossack marauder of the 17th century who, traversing the Volga river in his barge, excited the people to revolt against the government, promising them freedom from oppression. When, having defied the Czar himself, he was at last captured upon his barge, he cast his companion, a captive princess, into the waters, giving the mother Volga his most precious treasure in tribute and gratitude. "Stenka Razin" was last performed at the Symphony concerts when Glazounov conducted as guest, Jan. 17, 1930. The closing number upon next week's program will be the Fourth Symphony of Brahms in E minor.

The series of six concerts on Monday evenings and Tuesday afternoons by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, will open Oct. 24-25. A notable series is anticipated for the season to come. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct four of the pairs of concerts, the remaining two to be directed by George Enesco, the Roumanian composer and conductor, and Igor Stravinsky, the Russian composer who is to visit America next March. Soloists for this series will include Pierre and Genia Luboshutz, who will be heard in Mozart's Concerto for Two Pianos, and Myra Hess, the famous English pianist.

B. Trans. MUSIC Oct. 13/38

Novel Work from Copland For the Symphony Concerts

Composer Discusses 'El salon Mexico,' To Be Played Tomorrow and Saturday

By MOSES SMITH

Two works new to the repertory of the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra appear on the program for tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening, when the proceedings will end with Dvorak's "New World" Symphony, a sympathetic gesture from conductor and musicians to Czechoslovakia, land of Dvorak's birth. The first, a century and a half old, is the Mozart Divertimento in B-flat major for strings and a pair of horns, a work that has been discussed in these columns in connection with recent phonograph records of Columbia and Victor. The other is Aaron Copland's "El salon Mexico."

Copland got his idea from a huge dance-hall of the same name in Mexico City. The hall, he thinks, gives one the "feel" of the city better than anything else he knows. He began going to Mexico in 1932, and wrote the piano-score of "El salon Mexico" in 1934. Occupied with other things, he did not get around to orchestrating it until 1936. Chavez and his orchestra in Mexico City played the work for the first time in August, 1937. At that time, Copland says, the Mexicans expressed considerable surprise that a foreigner should have written music so characteristically Mexican. "El salon Mexico" was even compared to the music of Revueltas, whom they regard as the most Mexican of Mexican composers. There have been only two other performances, one by the NBC Symphony Orchestra under Sir Adrian Boult last year, the other by the BBC Symphony Orchestra under the same conductor at the I. S. C. M. Festival in London last spring.

"El salon Mexico" is scored for large modern orchestra, with winds in threes and a good-sized battery manned by four players. Among the percussion instruments are a gourd and temple-blocks, to lend local color. The substantive material itself is all—or nearly all—local color, taken directly from Mexican tunes, although not necessarily what is heard at the dance-hall in question. The piece, requiring ten minutes or a little more in performance, is in one continuous section, consisting of three sub-divisions after a fast introduction. The middle part is slow, and the last part does not repeat the material of the first. At one point Copland reduces the orchestra to the proportions of the mariaches ensemble, a group of half a dozen players such as is frequently to be heard in cafes, at weddings and so on.

The whole thing, Copland says, might be described as a medley of Mexican tunes. It is the sort of music, he says hopefully, as might occupy a place in a Pops program of, say, 1970. It was quite a success with an audience of connoisseurs at the London Festival. And this fact irritated the English reviewers, who even did a little public scolding because, in their opinion, the music was unworthy of such serious attention. Copland reports these things quite disarmingly. His only defense—and he scarcely puts it as a defense—is that he doesn't see why, because he has written, say, a symphony, he should have to write another symphony. If "El salon Mexico" is "different" from his other compositions (and the composer hopes it is), it is not, he believes, an abrupt change in the direction of his development as a composer.

Orchestras Afield

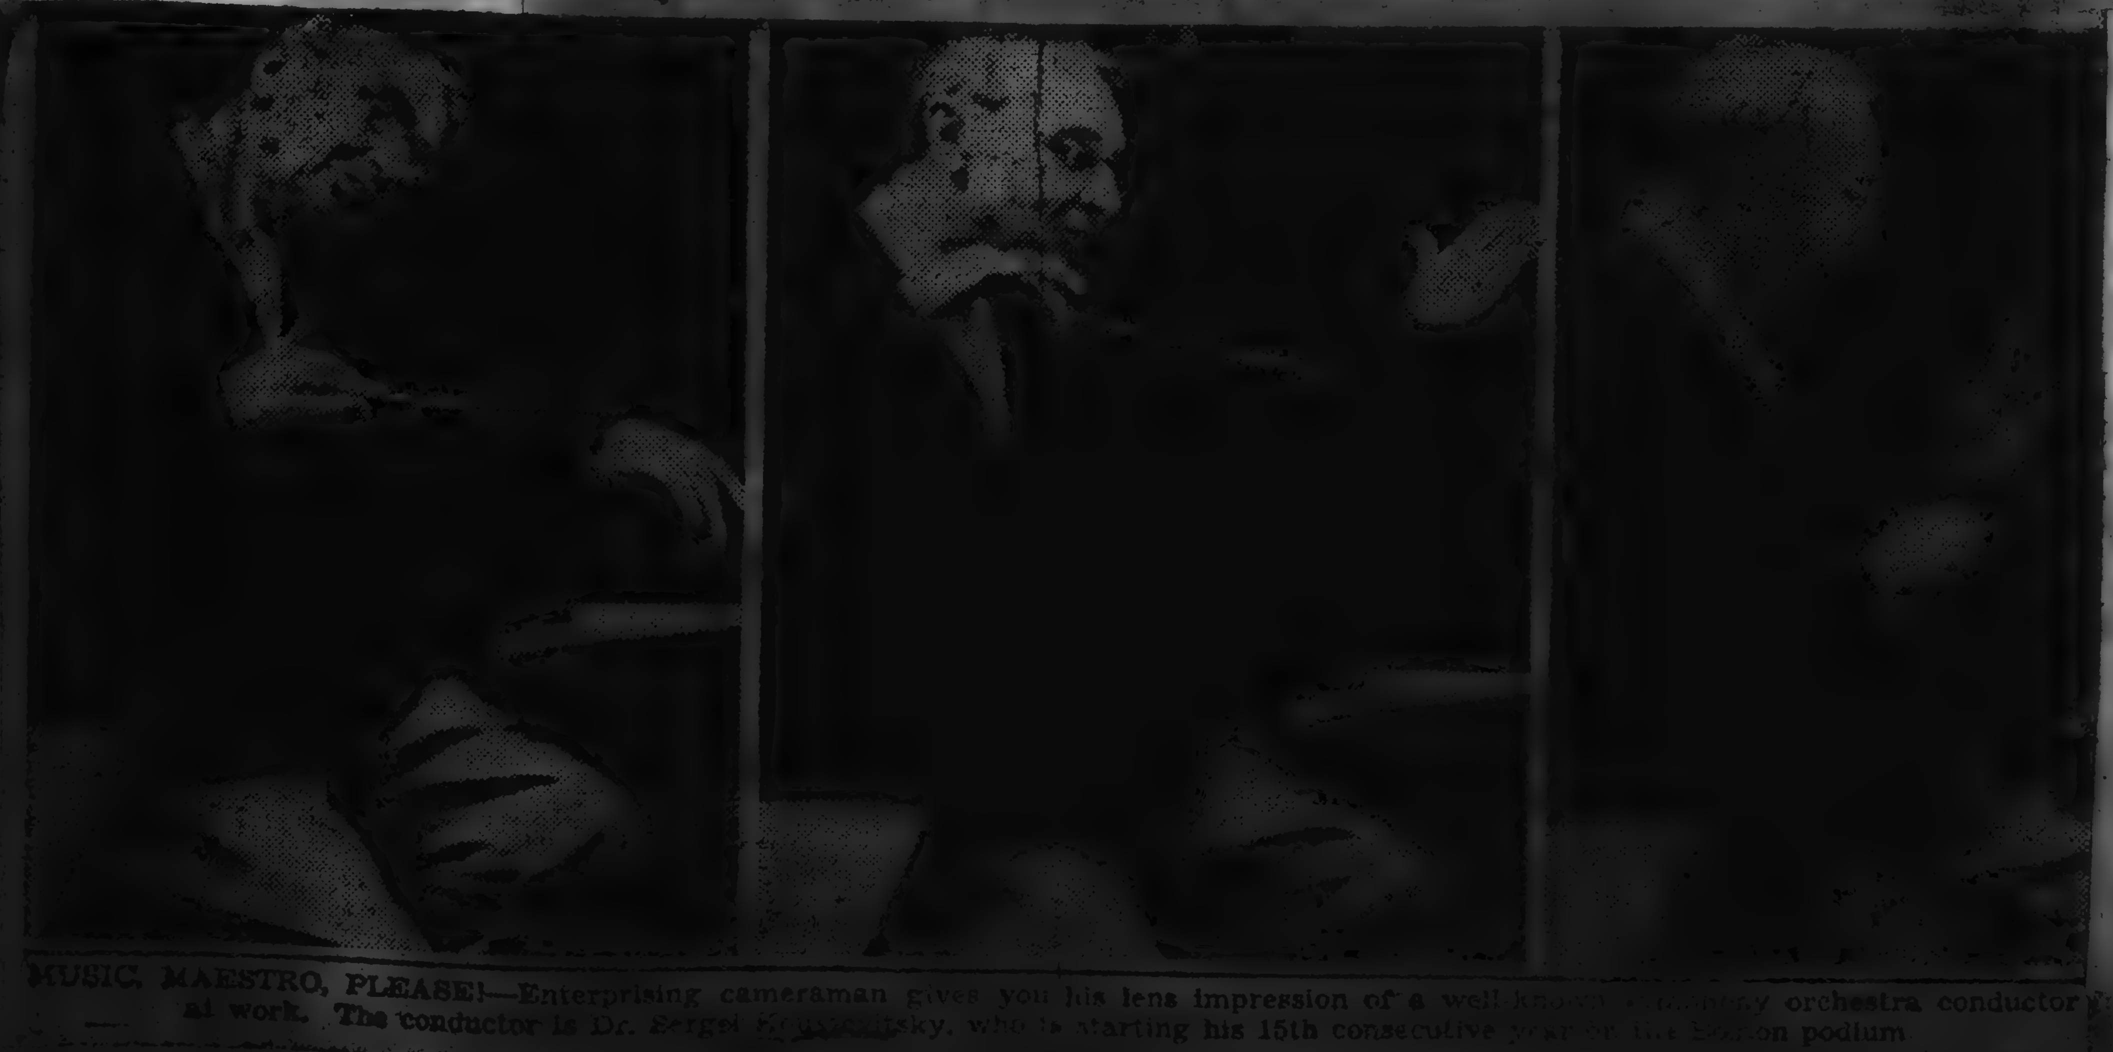
The Philadelphia Orchestra, Eugene Ormandy conductor, will play a Corelli Suite for orchestra, "Don Juan" by Strauss, "Iberia" by Debussy and the Second Symphony of Sibelius at its second pair of concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening.

The Cleveland Orchestra will begin its twenty-first season with concerts this evening and Saturday evening, when Artur Rodzinski will present Three Chorales by Respighi, Schoenberg's orchestral transcription of the Brahms G minor Quartet, Delius' "Paris, a Nightpiece" and the waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier."

The Chicago Symphony Orchestra will begin its forty-eighth season—the thirty-fourth under the direction of Frederick Stock—with the following program to be presented in concerts this evening and tomorrow afternoon: the conductor's transcription of "A Mighty Fortress Is Our God" by Bach, Rachmaninov's Second Symphony, "Iberia" by Debussy, Schoenherr's transcription of Kreutzer's Perpetuum mobile and "La valse" by Ravel.

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS

OCT 11 1938



MUSIC, MAESTRO, PLEASE!—Enterprising cameraman gives you his lens impression of a well-known symphony orchestra conductor at work. The conductor is Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky, who is starting his 15th consecutive year on the Boston podium

ST. JOSEPH, MICH.
HERALD PRESS

OCT 10 1938

YOUNGSTOWN, O.
VINDICATOR

OCT 10 1938

COHOES, N. Y.
AMERICAN

OCT 11 1938

BATTLE CREEK, MICH.
MOON JOURNAL

OCT 11 1938

18

COPLAND'S NEWEST BY SYMPHONY

"El Salon Mexico" a Brilliant Rhapsody of Popular Airs

B. Post - Oct. 15/38

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Fired by sympathy for the oppressed Czechs (and indignation against their oppressors) Dr. Koussevitzky yesterday afternoon commanded a performance of Dvorak's "New World" Symphony that might stand as a supreme example of what may be done for a piece too far gone to do much for itself. The rest of a concert, which proved far more enlivening than its predecessor, fell to a Divertimento of Mozart, new to Symphony Hall, and an actual novelty, Aaron Copland's "El Salon Mexico."

TEST OF VIRTUOSITY

For a Salzburg Countess the 21-year-old Mozart composed this Divertimento in B-flat major, and a companion piece, both scored for string quartet and a pair of horns. In this form it has been played in New York by a sextet of symphony men, but never in Boston. Yesterday's performance enlisted the services of a large body of strings, including some double basses. In view of the fact that the first violin part, which Mozart himself performed at the Munich premiere, is exceedingly tricky, yesterday's performance placed a heavy burden on the first violin section. As was to be expected, this test of its virtuosity was triumphantly met.

Early Mozart and an occasional piece to boot, the Divertimento is never-the-less first-rate Mozart for the period. It was a happy thought of Dr. Koussevitzky to add it to the repertory. Better far in these unproductive days a novelty come by in this fashion than the resort to transcriptions so common elsewhere. We owe much to him for keeping the Symphony concerts on the plane where they belong.

Copland in Audience

There could be no mistaking the delight of yesterday's audience in this engaging work and in its deft performance; while Mr. Copland, who was present to hear the first American performance of his piece outside a broadcasting studio, was rewarded by an outburst of enthusiasm that even reached the cheering point.

Visiting Mexico in 1932, Mr. Copland, as he stated in a note written for the programme book, was minded to bring back musical souvenirs, although it was not until a year later that he began to assemble these tonal impressions. With the knowledge that El Salon Mexico is a popular dance hall in Mexico City the listener becomes immediately aware of the composer's purpose.

A Brilliant Rhapsody

As Mr. Copland further states, he made no attempt to portray the graver, more serious features of Mexico past or present. What he has written is a brilliant rhapsody on Mexican popular airs. Fearful, however, that he might turn out a mere potpourri or conventional fantasia, he has partly resisted the temptation to let himself go. Imposed on the langour and seduction, the intoxication and abandon that a more liberal transcription might have yielded, we have a certain strain and tension: the gaiety is a little forced—as are the syncopations.

Perhaps in spite of himself, or in disregard of his expressed intentions, Mr. Copland has put into his music some of the atmosphere of tenseness and unrest that is to be found in Mexico as in so many other places on this unhappy planet.

The work of recreation which Dr. Koussevitzky and his players wrought with Dvorak's hackneyed symphony has already been noted. Even the Largo, made doubly trite by the use, or misuse, of its chief theme as a bogus spiritual, was not without its appeal yesterday, largely because of the surpassing euphony of the performance. And the livelier, more energetic movements were lent an astonishing vitality.

At the end, Dvorak seemed to speak as a sort of Bohemian Sibelius: as one inspired not by the land of his temporary sojourn but by the country of his birth. The purpose to which Dr. Koussevitzky would put the symphony was fully accomplished.

B. Globe MUSIC

Oct. 15/38

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

When Aaron Copland went to Mexico City in 1932, he enjoyed the atmosphere of a dance hall called "Salon Mexico." Back in the United States, he set about writing a light piece of music, based upon authentic tunes, which would reflect something of the spirit of the Mexican people as the casual traveler observes it. The result was "El Salon Mexico," an entertaining composition that was played for the first time in Boston yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The concert began with the Divertimento in B-flat (K. 287) by Mozart, and ended with Antonin Dvorak's famous Symphony, "From the New World." Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

Yesterday's lively performance of the equally lively "El Salon Mexico" raised in one listener's mind the question: "Why is it American composers, at least those now between 30 and 50, are evidently so much more successful with light rather than with serious subjects?" Perhaps it is the casual American temperament, perhaps the speedy pace of life today.

At any rate, Mr. Copland has turned out a gusty work, nicely written, in which are blended folk tunes, Mexican and jazz rhythms, and the spicy dissonance characteristic of the time. "El Salon Mexico" may not prove to be substantial, but it is very good fun, much more interesting than those serious compositions of Mr. Copland which this reviewer has heard. The instrumentation, too—for a large orchestra with added percussion—represents an advance in clarity and contrast of tone colors.

Mr. Copland well deserved the applause and cheers aroused both by his music and his appearance, after the performance, upon the stage.

Eighteenth Century composers wrote a good deal more than do composers of the present, mainly because people then fed upon new music. Today we live mostly upon established masterpieces, and everything new is regarded as an adventure if not with suspicion. Naturally, when quality is considered in relation to quanity, not even Mozart could hope to create a masterpiece every time he set pen to paper.

His B-flat Divertimento, far from suggesting Mozart's last symphonies, does not compare well with that lovely serenade, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik." The Divertimento is long, in some places frankly dull; as a background for an 18th Century party supplied copiously with refreshments, solid and liquid, it may have served. As a concert piece for the 20th Century, it fares badly. Originally scored for string quartet and two horns, the Divertimento was yesterday performed by two horns and the string sections of the Boston Symphony.

A virtuoso conductor and orchestra can bring aging music back to life and brilliance. Just that happened yesterday with the "New World" Symphony. While there are memorable pages, the Symphony as a whole has lost some of its strength it must have had back in the middle '90s, when it was new. A magical performance by Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony restored triumphant vigor to the first movement and the finale; the scherzo sounded fresh, and the slow movement, with that famous melody for English horn which has been heard in various forms literally thousands of times in 45 years, seemed once again an irresistible tone-painting of nature.

Despite this achievement, there were moments during the afternoon when the orchestra was not at its best. Some flaccid playing was evident in Mozart, and brass and double-brasses made faulty entrances in the slow movement of the Symphony.

The program will be repeated tonight. The program next week will feature the first performances of Nicholai Berezowsky's Toccata, Variations and Finale for String Quartet and Orchestra, with the Coolidge Quartet assisting. Glazunov's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razin," and the Fourth Symphony of Brahms will also be heard

C. W. D.

Symphony Presents 'El Salon Mexico'

B. Her. MUSIC

Oct. 15/38

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Divertimento in B flat major (for strings and two horns—K. 287)	Mozart
"El Salon Mexico"	Aaron Copland
Symphony No. 5 in E minor ("From the New World"—Op. 95)	Dvorak

Mr. Copland has so often come before a Boston audience with work of such shocking cacophony, which evoked only the most distantly polite applause, that it was a revelation to hear his "El Salon Mexico" so cordially received that bravos mingled with clapping. It was also a piece, for its showy vitality and its ingenious workmanship, that deserved a warm reception. The only curious thing is the discrepancy between this full-blooded example of orchestral display and the aggressive and probably deliberate avoidance of charm in his other music that has been heard here.

Did Mr. Copland for once let himself go and be damned to what the intellectuals might think? Or did he merely fall into the atmosphere and thereby hit upon the ideas that he has so brilliantly worked out? The painter Toulouse-Lautrec cared nothing for landscape and found his most congenial inspiration in the brothels and dance-halls of Montmartre. Perhaps Mr. Copland has been wasting his time all these years and should have been sunning himself and keeping his ears open in the cafes of Latin America. The public will care little that he ruin his health, so long as he produces exotic and exciting scores like this.

"El Salon Mexico" was the popular sensation this summer at the 16th festival of the International Society for Contemporary Music in London. The English critics were not a little shocked at this development and were in consequence inclined to be patronizing. This was unfortunate, for they missed a very clever piece of work.

There is nothing cheap in "El Salon Mexico." Note how economical it is in a great deal of the instrumentation. Note again how the slow section avoids the sentimental, while indicating the presence of that quality. In other words Mr. Copland has evolved an original work out of snatches of popular music. He has provided deft contrasts and varieties of rhythm. This piece is really clever, not merely smart. It was played for the first time in Boston, and the composer was present to acknowledge the applause.

What completely graceful and charming music is this Divertimento of Mozart! Give the suite today to a string quartet and the two horns and one might find it thin, as compared to the chamber music that is not intended for mere incidental entertainment. But a well disciplined string orchestra points up the gaiety and invigorates the music. The Boston Symphony strings did excellent work by it, and altogether it is a welcome addition to the repertoire where formerly "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" was considered enough to represent this side of Mozart's activity. The performance under Mr. Burgin two years ago of a serenade and this performance yesterday prove how wrong this notion was.

Dvorak's Symphony had a remarkably brilliant and intense interpretation under Dr. Koussevitzky yesterday. The slow movement seemed exceptionally broad and solemn, and no doubt Dr. Koussevitzky took it so very slowly in order to get round the fact that it is hackneyed. Whatever the result—and it at least argues a certain honesty not to hurry over the issue—few will deny the splendid effect of the first movement and the lightness of the scherzo. The finale is open to the charge of being tedious and long-winded. We have heard all the themes more than sufficiently discussed, and the new hammering theme is not a welcome addition. Still, familiar as the "New World" Symphony is, it was astonishingly revivified by yesterday's performance.

Some Symphonic Novelties

Monitor Oct. 15/38

The Arts in Boston

An air of novelty informs the Boston Symphony programs of this week. Mozart's Divertimento in B flat major, for strings and two horns (K. 287), had yesterday its first performance at these concerts. Aaron Copland's "El Salón México" was heard for the first time in Boston. The concert closed with Dvořák's "New World" Symphony, in E minor, which, although it is hardly novel, is seldom heard nowadays. Dr. Koussevitzky has played it only twice before, in 1929 and in 1934.

But if the "New World" Symphony is not novel, it is at least timely. It is the most notable symphony by a Bohemian composer. The musical controversy which once raged round this work has passed, but in view of the recent history of the composer's country Dr. Koussevitzky no doubt found it interesting to recall the work of a man who, as the program book reminded us, was a "successful exponent of the principle of racial character in music." And if his music seems a little naïve to our sophisticated ears, it is nevertheless the product of a gifted musician. At the hands of Dr. Koussevitzky this symphony always appears in its most ingratiating light. Possibly he feels a certain sympathy for it as music; it is rather Tchailisztian. Whether he does or not, he plays it as if it were close to his heart.

The Mozart is a real addition to the orchestra's repertory. Written in the difficult Munich period, when the composer was 21, it reflects his genius in almost every measure. There are six movements, of which the most interesting are the opening Allegro and the Adagio, but the Theme and Variations and the two Minuets are delightfully characteristic of Mozart's inexhaustible melodic inspiration and inventive resourcefulness. The final movement seemed at a first hearing of less interest than the others, and it was marred by some uncertainty in the violins in the introductory Andante. Elsewhere the orchestra played with an incredibly pure tone, exquisite phrasing and the subtlest nuance. It was a performance which could have been achieved only by an absolutely top-notch orchestra, led by a conductor of creative imagination. The audience was stirred to applaud until the men were called to their feet.

In notes supplied for the program book Mr. Copland confesses that all he could hope to do in this work was to show the Mexico of the tourists. The Salón México is a dance hall in Mexico City, and Mr. Copland's music attempts to reflect its atmosphere. It employs several Mexican folk songs, Spanish in character, which are treated with the composer's usual orchestral skill. But the interest is purely superficial, and the work is unimportant in respect of the whole body of Mr. Copland's work, to which it bears a relation similar to that of the "Spanish Caprice" to Rimsky-Korsakoff's operas. It might make a good acquisition for the Pop Concerts.

L. A. S.

'The Seeing Fingers'

"The Seeing Fingers," a Boston-made picture showing the work of the Braille Press, is being shown for the first time here in the current program at the South Station Theater. It will remain through Thursday.

For those who can see neithe newsreels nor newspapers, th Braille periodicals for the blir "The Weekly" and "Our Speci carry the news of the world to 3 readers in 32 different countr How the Braille system of print

---

Orchestra Holds First Rehearsal

S. Seiniger, Violinist With Boston Symphony, Leads Musicians

Under the able conduction of Mr. Samuel Seiniger, violinist in the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the past fifteen years, the M.I.T. student orchestra held its first rehearsal in the East Lounge of Walker Memorial yesterday evening when it played selections from Victor Herbert's "Babes In Toyland" and the Triumphal March from Grieg's "Sigurd Jarsafal."

At the present time the orchestra is composed of only forty members, and lacks any violas, cellos, double basses, oboes and saxophones, which are needed for a balanced effect. While encouraged by the eagerness and cooperation of those who did attend the first rehearsal, Mr. Seiniger expressed the hope that more students would appear for subsequent meetings, especially those who play instruments which are needed.

Mr. Seiniger, who was born in Lithuania, was brought to this country as a child, where he received his education and graduated from Harvard University. He was first associated with the Detroit Symphony Orchestra and later became a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with which organization he has played since 192[illegible] He has conducted the Boston Symphony Pops on several occasions, notably on June 21 of last year when he conducted Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue."

(Continued on page 2)

Orchestra

While Mr. Seiniger was confident that the orchestra would gradually take shape into a balanced unit, the first performance was marked by top-heavy brass and woodwind sections. Parts were distributed according to priority, and after a few more rehearsals Mr. Seiniger hopes to hear the members individually and properly allocate the parts.

At yesterday's meeting the definite time for future rehearsals was decided upon by popular vote, the time picked being from 7 to 9 p.m. Tuesday evenings. Any student who has not as yet attended the rehearsal or meeting held last week still stands an excellent opportunity to join the orchestra, and those interested are urged to come and demonstrate their ability next Tuesday, October 25.

18

COPLAND'S NEWEST BY SYMPHONY

"El Salon Mexico" a Brilliant Rhapsody of Popular Airs

B. Post - Oct 15/38

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Fired by sympathy for the oppressed Czechs (and indignation against their oppressors) Dr. Koussevitzky yesterday afternoon commanded a performance of Dvorak's "New World" Symphony that might stand as a supreme example of what may be done for a piece too far gone to do much for itself. The rest of a concert, which proved far more enlivening than its predecessor, fell to a Divertimento of Mozart, new to Symphony Hall, and an actual novelty, Aaron Copland's "El Salon Mexico."

TEST OF VIRTUOSITY

For a Salzburg Countess the 21-year-old Mozart composed this Divertimento in B-flat major, and a companion piece, both scored for string quartet and a pair of horns. In this form it has been played in New York by a sextet of symphony men, but never in Boston. Yesterday's performance enlisted the services of a large body of strings, including some double basses. In view of the fact that the first violin part, which Mozart himself performed at the Munich premiere, is exceedingly tricky, yesterday's performance placed a heavy burden on the first violin section. As was to be expected, this test of its virtuosity was triumphantly met.

Early Mozart and an occasional piece to boot, the Divertimento is never-the-less first-rate Mozart for the period. It was a happy thought of Dr. Koussevitzky to add it to the repertory. Better far in these unproductive days a novelty come by in this fashion than the resort to transcriptions so common elsewhere. We owe much to him for keeping the Symphony concerts on the plane where they belong.

Copland in Audience

There could be no mistaking the delight of yesterday's audience in this engaging work and in its deft performance; while Mr. Copland, who was present to hear the first American performance of his piece outside a broadcasting studio, was rewarded by an outburst of enthusiasm that even reached the cheering point.

Visiting Mexico in 1932, Mr. Copland, as he stated in a note written for the programme book, was minded to bring back musical souvenirs, although it was not until a year later that he began to assemble these tonal impressions. With the knowledge that El Salon Mexico is a popular dance hall in Mexico City the listener becomes immediately aware of the composer's purpose.

A Brilliant Rhapsody

As Mr. Copland further states, he made no attempt to portray the graver, more serious features of Mexico past or present. What he has written is a brilliant rhapsody on Mexican popular airs. Fearful, however, that he might turn out a mere potpourri or conventional fantasia, he has partly resisted the temptation to let himself go. Imposed on the langour and seduction, the intoxication and abandon that a more liberal transcription might have yielded, we have a certain strain and tension: the gaiety is a little forced—as are the syncopations.

Perhaps in spite of himself, or in disregard of his expressed intentions, Mr. Copland has put into his music some of the atmosphere of tenseness and unrest that is to be found in Mexico as in so many other places on this unhappy planet.

The work of recreation which Dr. Koussevitzky and his players wrought with Dvorak's hackneyed symphony has already been noted. Even the Largo, made doubly trite by the use, or misuse, of its chief theme as a bogus spiritual, was not without its appeal yesterday, largely because of the surpassing euphony of the performance. And the livelier, more energetic movements were lent an astonishing vitality.

At the end, Dvorak seemed to speak as a sort of Bohemian Sibelius: as one inspired not by the land of his temporary sojourn but by the country of his birth. The purpose to which Dr. Koussevitzky would put the symphony was fully accomplished.

B. Glo. Oct 15/38

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

When Aaron Copland went to Mexico City in 1932, he enjoyed the atmosphere of a dance hall called "Salon Mexico." Back in the United States, he set about writing a light piece of music, based upon authentic tunes, which would reflect something of the spirit of the Mexican people as the casual traveler observes it. The result was "El Salon Mexico," an entertaining composition that was played for the first time in Boston yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The concert began with the Divertimento in B-flat (K. 287) by Mozart, and ended with Antonin Dvorak's famous Symphony, "From the New World." Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

Yesterday's lively performance of the equally lively "El Salon Mexico" raised in one listener's mind the question: "Why is it American composers, at least those now between 30 and 50, are evidently so much more successful with light rather than with serious subjects?" Perhaps it is the casual American temperament, perhaps the speedy pace of life today.

At any rate, Mr. Copland has turned out a gusty work, nicely written, in which are blended folk tunes, Mexican and jazz rhythms, and the spicy dissonance characteristic of the time. "El Salon Mexico" may not prove to be substantial, but it is very good fun, much more interesting than those serious compositions of Mr. Copland which this reviewer has heard. The instrumentation, too—for a large orchestra with added percussion—represents an advance in clarity and contrast of tone colors.

Mr. Copland well deserved the applause and cheers aroused both by his music and his appearance, after the performance, upon the stage.

Eighteenth Century composers wrote a good deal more than do composers of the present, mainly because people then fed upon new music. Today we live mostly upon established masterpieces, and everything new is regarded as an adventure if not with suspicion. Naturally, when quality is considered in relation to quanity, not even Mozart could hope to create a masterpiece every time he set pen to paper.

His B-flat Divertimento, far from suggesting Mozart's last symphonies, does not compare well with that lovely serenade, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik." The Divertimento is long, in some places frankly dull; as a background for an 18th Century party supplied copiously with refreshments, solid and liquid, it may have served. As a concert piece for the 20th Century, it fares badly. Originally scored for string quartet and two horns, the Divertimento was yesterday performed by two horns and the string sections of the Boston Symphony.

A virtuoso conductor and orchestra can bring aging music back to life and brilliance. Just that happened yesterday with the "New World" Symphony. While there are memorable pages, the Symphony as a whole has lost some of its strength it must have had back in the middle '90s, when it was new. A magical performance by Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony restored triumphant vigor to the first movement and the finale; the scherzo sounded fresh, and the slow movement, with that famous melody for English horn which has been heard in various forms literally thousands of times in 45 years, seemed once again an irresistible tone-painting of nature.

Despite this achievement, there were moments during the afternoon when the orchestra was not at its best. Some flaccid playing was evident in Mozart, and brass and double-brasses made faulty entrances in the slow movement of the Symphony.

The program will be repeated tonight. The program next week will feature the first performances of Nicholai Berezowsky's Toccata, Variations and Finale for String Quartet and Orchestra, with the Coolidge Quartet assisting. Glazunov's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razin," and the Fourth Symphony of Brahms will also be heard

C. W. D.

Symphony Presents 'El Salon Mexico'

B. Her. Oct. 15/38

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Divertimento in B flat major.......Mozart
(for strings and two horns—K. 287)
"El Salon Mexico".......Aaron Copland
Symphony No. 5 in E minor.......Dvorak
("From the New World"—Op. 95)

Mr. Copland has so often come before a Boston audience with work of such shocking cacophony, which evoked only the most distantly polite applause, that it was a revelation to hear his "El Salon Mexico" so cordially received that bravos mingled with clapping. It was also a piece, for its showy vitality and its ingenious workmanship, that deserved a warm reception. The only curious thing is the discrepancy between this full-blooded example of orchestral display and the aggressive and probably deliberate avoidance of charm in his other music that has been heard here.

Did Mr. Copland for once let himself go and be damned to what the intellectuals might think? Or did he merely fall into the atmosphere and thereby hit upon the ideas that he has so brilliantly worked out? The painter Toulouse-Lautrec cared nothing for landscape and found his most congenial inspiration in the brothels and dance-halls of Montmartre. Perhaps Mr. Copland has been wasting his time all these years and should have been sunning himself and keeping his ears open in the cafes of Latin America. The public will care little that he ruin his health, so long as he produces exotic and exciting scores like this.

"El Salon Mexico" was the popular sensation this summer at the 16th festival of the International Society for Contemporary Music in London. The English critics were not a little shocked at this development and were in consequence inclined to be patronizing. This was unfortunate, for they missed a very clever piece of work.

There is nothing cheap in "El Salon Mexico." Note how economical it is in a great deal of the instrumentation. Note again how the slow section avoids the sentimental, while indicating the presence of that quality. In other words Mr. Copland has evolved an original work out of snatches of popular music. He has provided deft contrasts and varieties of rhythm. This piece is really clever, not merely smart. It was played for the first time in Boston, and the composer was present to acknowledge the applause.

What completely graceful and charming music is this Divertimento of Mozart! Give the suite today to a string quartet and the two horns and one might find it thin, as compared to the chamber music that is not intended for mere incidental entertainment. But a well disciplined string orchestra points up the gaiety and invigorates the music. The Boston Symphony strings did excellent work by it, and altogether it is a welcome addition to the repertoire where formerly "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" was considered enough to represent this side of Mozart's activity. The performance under Mr. Burgin two years ago of a serenade and this performance yesterday prove how wrong this notion was.

Dvorak's Symphony had a remarkably brilliant and intense interpretation under Dr. Koussevitzky yesterday. The slow movement seemed exceptionally broad and solemn, and no doubt Dr. Koussevitzky took it so very slowly in order to get round the fact that it is hackneyed. Whatever the result—and it at least argues a certain honesty not to hurry over the issue—few will deny the splendid effect of the first movement and the lightness of the scherzo. The finale is open to the charge of being tedious and long-winded. We have heard all the themes more than sufficiently discussed, and the new hammering theme is not a welcome addition. Still, familiar as the "New World" Symphony is, it was astonishingly revivified by yesterday's performance.

Some Symphonic Novelties

Monitor Oct. 15/38

The Arts in Boston

An air of novelty informs the Boston Symphony programs of this week. Mozart's Divertimento in B flat major, for strings and two horns (K. 287), had yesterday its first performance at these concerts. Aaron Copland's "El Salón México" was heard for the first time in Boston. The concert closed with Dvořák's "New World" Symphony, in E minor, which, although it is hardly novel, is seldom heard nowadays. Dr. Koussevitzky has played it only twice before, in 1929 and in 1934.

But if the "New World" Symphony is not novel, it is at least timely. It is the most notable symphony by a Bohemian composer. The musical controversy which once raged round this work has passed, but in view of the recent history of the composer's country Dr. Koussevitzky no doubt found it interesting to recall the work of a man who, as the program book reminded us, was a "successful exponent of the principle of racial character in music." And if his music seems a little naïve to our sophisticated ears, it is nevertheless the product of a gifted musician. At the hands of Dr. Koussevitzky this symphony always appears in its most ingratiating light. Possibly he feels a certain sympathy for it as music; it is rather Tchailisztian. Whether he does or not, he plays it as if it were close to his heart.

The Mozart is a real addition to the orchestra's repertory. Written in the difficult Munich period, when the composer was 21, it reflects his genius in almost every measure. There are six movements, of which the most interesting are the opening Allegro and the Adagio, but the Theme and Variations and the two Minuets are delightfully characteristic of Mozart's inexhaustible melodic inspiration and inventive resourcefulness. The final movement seemed at a first hearing of less interest than the others, and it was marred by some uncertainty in the violins in the introductory Andante. Elsewhere the orchestra played with an incredibly pure tone, exquisite phrasing and the subtlest nuance. It was a performance which could have been achieved only by an absolutely top-notch orchestra, led by a conductor of creative imagination. The audience was stirred to applaud until the men were called to their feet.

In notes supplied for the program book Mr. Copland confesses that all he could hope to do in this work was to show the Mexico of the tourists. The Salón México is a dance hall in Mexico City, and Mr. Copland's music attempts to reflect its atmosphere. It employs several Mexican folk songs, Spanish in character, which are treated with the composer's usual orchestral skill. But the interest is purely superficial, and the work is unimportant in respect of the whole body of Mr. Copland's work, to which it bears a relation similar to that of the "Spanish Caprice" to Rimsky-Korsakoff's operas. It might make a good acquisition for the Pop Concerts.

L. A. S.

"The Seeing Fingers"

"The Seeing Fingers," a Boston-made picture showing the work of the Braille Press, is being shown for the first time here in the current program at the South Station Theater. It will remain through Thursday.

For those who can see neither newsreels nor newspapers, th Braille periodicals for the blir "The Weekly" and "Our Speci carry the news of the world to readers in 32 different countr How the Braille system of prin

---

Orchestra Holds First Rehearsal

S. Seiniger, Violinist With Boston Symphony, Leads Musicians

Under the able conduction of Mr. Samuel Seiniger, violinist in the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the past fifteen years, the M.I.T. student orchestra held its first rehearsal in the East Lounge of Walker Memorial yesterday evening when it played selections from Victor Herbert's "Babes In Toyland" [illegible] the Triumphal March from Gr[illegible]'s "Sigurd Jarsafal."

At the present time the orchestra is composed of only forty members, and lacks any violas, c[illegible]s, double basses, oboes and saxop[illegible]es, which are needed for a balanced effect. While encouraged by the eagerness and cooperation of those who did attend the first rehearsal, Mr. Seiniger expressed the hope that more students would appear for subsequent meetings, especially those who play instruments which are needed.

Mr. Seiniger, who was born in Lithuania, was brought to this country as a child, where he received his education and graduated from Harvard University. He was first associated with the Detroit Symphony Orchestra and later became a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with which [illegible] he has played since 19[illegible]. He has conducted the Boston Symphony Pops on several occasions, notably on June 21 of last year when he conducted Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue."

(Continued on page 2)

Orchestra

While Mr. Seiniger was confident that the orchestra would gradually take shape into a balanced unit, the first performance was marked by top-heavy b[illegible] and woodwind sections. Parts were distributed according to priority and after a few more rehearsals Mr. Seiniger hopes to hear the members individually and properly allocate the parts.

At yesterday's meeting the definite time for future rehearsals was decided upon by popular vote, the time picked being from 7 to 9 p.m. Tuesday evenings. Any student who has not as yet attended the rehearsal or meeting held last week still stands an excellent opportunity to join the orchestra, and those interested are urged to come and demonstrate their ability next Tuesday, October 25.

Beautiful Conclusion Of a Kindly Gesture

Impassioned Reading of Dvorak Work by Koussevitzky and Men

B. Trans. By MOSES SMITH Oct. 15/38

Having determined to present the Dvorak "New World" Symphony at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon and this evening as an expression of sympathy with the harassed Czechoslovakian republic, Serge Koussevitzky completed the gesture beautifully. There seemed to be something remarkable in the performance at yesterday's matinee performance, when the Orchestra played a hackneyed work with exceptional brilliance. The instrumental colors were dazzling, and to at least one pair of ears the Orchestra seemed to have found a new sonority. On the slow movement, which has been even more overworked in every sort of performance than the rest of the symphony, the conductor lavished his warmest care, so that the music took on an elegiac note.

There were some cheers mingled with the hand-clapping at the end, but it is difficult to say whether they expressed anything more than appreciation of an extraordinary performance. A Bostonian audience in attendance at a matinee symphony concert probably is not one to let its emotions run away with it. Those who were thinking about this latest demonstration of the connection between art and politics, however, could congratulate the conductor upon the felicity of his choice, if not on musical grounds, certainly on sentimental. Czechoslovakia's establishment, as everyone knows, was intimately associated with this country during the years preceding the Versailles conference. The "New World Symphony was conceived and completed while the composer was living here. And the nostalgia of the composer for his native land is written all over the symphony. The aptness of Dr. Koussevitzky's selection could hardly have been more pointed.

* * *

The piece at the beginning of the program was Mozart's Divertimento in B-flat for strings and horns (K. 287). It is one of a large category of entertainment-music of the eighteenth century, and it was played in those days no doubt by six performers, one for each of the instruments represented in the score. That kind of performance, suitable enough for a princely garden or salon, would hardly do for a twentieth-century symphony concert. And so at yesterday's performance, the first in the history of the Boston Symphony concerts, the entire string section was heard with the two horns.

In the process the performance naturally lost some of the flexibility which six solo players could have given it. The first violin part suffered more than the others, since it is written almost like a solo part in a concerto, with commensurate difficulty. The eighteen first violins of the Boston Orchestra managed the passages and most of the expressive devices surprisingly well. But the more painstaking efforts of the conductor could not guarantee the plasticity, not to say expressiveness, of a single violinist, such as Szigeti or Burgin on phonograph records recently discussed in these columns. (For footnote to a footnote, and to keep the record clear, it should be set down that at the performance of the Divertimento by Boston Symphony players in Town Hall last year, Julius Theodorowicz was the solo violinist, not Mr. Burgin, as stated in the program-book for yesterday's concert.)

But aside from the slow sections of the last movement, which are too difficult for a whole violin section (there was almost a minor disaster near the beginning), these considerations were not, as it turned out, important. The symphonic texture of the music seemed good warrant for Dr. Koussevitzky's method. And the result, a delightful performance of delightful music, certainly justified it.

The other novelty was a more recent affair—Aaron Copland's "El salon Mexico." It would be superfluous to write about the form and substance of a work which was discussed in these columns in considerable detail after it was played at the I. S. C. M. festival in London last spring, and more recently on Thursday of this week. But I must express my disagreement with the reported opinions of the English reviewers, who, it will be recalled, were mildly disgusted with the audience for receiving the work so favorably, and who intimated that if you scratch a connoisseur you are likely to find a low-brow. The work had a success yesterday, too, though not too great to give the composer, who was present to acknowledge the applause, a swelled head. Because an immediate success of a new work is no guarantee of its lasting worth, it does not necessarily follow that such success is further guarantee of mediocrity.

If liking Copland's racy score is being low-brow, include me in, as the irreplaceable Mr. Goldwyn might put it. The thematic material, the rich, flavorsome instrumentation and the enormous gusto of the whole put the piece in line with such distinguished predecessors as Chabrier's "España," Debussy's "Iberia," and so forth. The Europeans were most likely to find their inspiration in old-world Spain. Mr. Copland gets his from part of new-world Spain. He does not merely repeat the formula for several reasons. Mexico is not Spain. The present, in which Mr. Copland writes, is not the past. And, most important of all, Mr. Copland, a completely equipped composer and a sentient artist, is himself, not Chabrier or Debussy or Rimsky-Korsakov or anyone else. He follows his own line of development, setting forth each new work on its merits, and leaving to others the task of spelling out their connection with (or departure from) previous works.

"El salon Mexico" invited the rarest talents of Dr. Koussevitzky in the presentation of music of our day and the consummate virtuosity of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The performance seemed to realize every possibility of the music. Even the performers seemed to like it. And in this respect, as well as in the promptly favorable response of the audience, Mr. Copland found himself in a new position here.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

OCT 14 1938

Fifteenth Year For Koussevitsky

Boston Symphony Winter Series Is Under Way

Opening its 58th season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented its first concert in the fall and winter series in Symphony Hall, Boston, last Saturday night.

Of more importance is the inauguration of the 15th year in which Sergei Alexandrovich Koussevitzy has been the leader of this orchestra.

For the first program and in recognition of the 15th anniversary, Dr. Koussevitzky selected Beethoven's Symphony No. 5, the first symphony which he conducted in Boston in his official capacity.

Springfield now virtually shares in the enjoyment of the Boston Symphony Orchestra throughout the year. The attendance from Springfield at the Berkshire Festival probably equals that of any concert in the Municipal Auditorium.

Now the winter series, except under adverse weather conditions are within easy distance. One finds the concert much shorter than those at Lenox. On the opening night the program mentioned that the entertainment would end at 9.55 o'clock, which it did precisely. You may come back at not too late an hour to Springfield on the same night, if sufficiently enthusiastic about the symphony. And who would not be?

The program by the orchestra last week included a concerto in D minor for orchestra with organ, by Vivaldi; Berlioz' overture to the opera "Benvenuto Cellini, entitled "The Roman Carnival;" and variations on a theme of Haydn, by Brahms.

Fifteen bass fiddlers, stretching half way across the rear of the stage at Symphony Hall are included in the Boston Symphony Orchestra personnel, giving sonorous depths to the orchestra's tonal effects. The number of players on this instrument may reflect Dr. Koussevitzky's own attachment to it. It was on the bass fiddle that he first studied music as a young man in Russia, his native country. His choice of the string bass occurred since a scholarship in that musical realm was the best opportunity available when the young Koussevitzky applied at the Philharmonic Conservatory of Moscow.

B. Trans. MUSIC Oct. 17/38

First and Second Thoughts In the Concert-Hall and Out

By Moses Smith

Second acquaintance with Aaron Copland's "El salon Mexico" at the concert of the Symphony Orchestra on Saturday night reinforced original impressions. The performance, which seemed even better than that of Friday afternoon, brought out even more strongly the resourcefulness and invention of the composer as orchestrator. In form as well as substance the piece is essentially popular in character. That fact partly explained why the reception on the part of both audiences was so favorable; but it was no indication, as pointed out here previously, of a necessarily ephemeral character.

Similarly the Mozart Divertimento in B-flat, more finely played than on Friday, stood revealed as an admirable item for inclusion in the more or less active repertory of the orchestra. Dr. Koussevitzky's faith in the brilliance and suppleness of his entire section of first violins was more than justified by the results. The symphonic character of the writing qualifies the piece for the symphonic repertory. None the less, I should like some time to hear the work from the Boston Orchestra in the form employed for Columbia phonograph records, for which Szigeti played the elaborate first-violin part alone and the other string parts were played by groups of players.

After the concert it was possible to hear only part of the first NBC Symphony Orchestra broadcast concerts, with Toscanini conducting. I heard the end of the Brahms Third Symphony and the second half of the program, consisting of two short pieces by Martucci, Notturno and Noveletta, and "Romeo and Juliet" by Tchaikovsky. The orchestra, with twenty-odd new players—principally in the wind sections—seemed to be a better ensemble even at this stage than that which finished last season, although my remarks must be qualified by the fact that I was listening at a poor radio set. The little pieces of Martucci, admirably performed, had elements of charm even if not of importance. But the most striking thing of all was Toscanini's way with the Tchaikovsky music.

From what I could tell he set it forth absolutely "straight," as if it were a classical work. This procedure would scarcely seem to be indicated with so romantic a composition, which we have on numerous occasions heard wonderfully presented in romantic vein by the Boston Orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky. Yet Toscanini's presentation was also a gripping thing. Perhaps it is time to revise the common notion that Tchaikovsky's music makes its way only by broad emphasis or sharp contrasts. Perhaps he was more of a musician than he is usually held to be; and said things that were capable of more than one interpretation.

MUSIC—IN TOWN

SYMPHONY HALL—Tonight 8.15
THIRD FRIDAY—SATURDAY CONCERTS, OCT. 21-22
Boston Symphony Orchestra
SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY—Conductor
Six Monday Evening Concerts at 8:15
Six Tuesday Afternoon Concerts at 3
OCT. 24-25, DEC. 26-27, JAN. 16-17, FEB. 20-21, MAR. 20-21, APR. 17-18
Guest Artists include:
MYRA HESS, IGOR STRAVINSKY, GEORGES ENESCO
SEASON TICKETS NOW—$6, $9, $12, $15. Season tickets still available for the 24 Fri. Aft. and 24 Sat. Eve. Concerts.

SUN. NOV. 6 at 3.30 HEIFETZ

MAIL ORDERS FILLED PROMPTLY—CHECKS TO SYMPHONY HALL

MUSIC

Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Return to Providence to Start Their 15th Season; Mozart and Dvorak Feature Program

Providence Journal By G. Y. Loveridge Oct. 19/38

The summer's siege of silence was happily raised by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his men were welcomed to Metropolitan Theatre with perhaps even more than the customary cordiality, it being the 15th season that Dr. Koussevitzky has conducted. No other conductor of the orchestra has had so long a tenure.

At a time when civilization has grown afraid to go to bed in the dark, it is reassuring to see so large a public gathering for so exalted and gentle a purpose. It does not signify that all's right with the world, but it signifies that all's not wrong. At least, not yet.

The only alarums and excursions of the evening were musical ones. A Mozart divertimento in B-flat major, for strings and two horns, and Dvorak's symphony "From the New World," in E minor, were the beginning and the end. Between them, Berlioz's overture inspired by the life of the fabulous Cellini was substituted for what had been previously announced, Glazounov's symphonic poem about the fabulous Stenka Razin.

The Mozart was magnificent. It was intended for only two violins, a viola and bass, besides the horns; so that the inclusion of the orchestra's entire string choir put the two delegates from the brass section at a handsome disadvantage. In fact, they might almost as well not have played at all.

The strings, however, were superb, in all the glory of their coloring, suppleness and precision. They spun out with faultless clarity the webs of sound that only Mozart could design. If there was any lapse at all, it was among the first violins in the adagio; and yet this movement was so beautifully uttered that many persons broke into applause, before the suite was finished. The violas were particularly fine in certain of the variations. Dr. Koussevitzky may be said to have started the season by putting the orchestra's best foot forward.

The "Roman Carnival Overture" made a startling contrast. Berlioz, as is well known, enjoys firing off everything in the arsenal, all at once, if convenient. The fragile fancies evoked by Mozart were soon scattered by the succeeding hurricane of tone. Dr. Koussevitzky commanded with great spirit, and the orchestra proceeded to give the overture an exciting and glittering performance. Brisk strings, arresting English horn, tempestuous brass—it ended like a cavalry charge.

The Dvorak symphony was the nearest the program approached to the music of this century. It was an agreeable choice, and was effectively presented. The adagio introduction was taken very slowly (Dvorak himself once expressed the desire that it be taken "as slowly as possible"); the following allegro sparkled with vitality. The transparency of orchestral tone and the balance of the choirs were admirable. Dr. Koussevitzky made the whole work seem remarkably fresh and new for a symphony that is perhaps as well known as most. The largo was absorbing with the English horn at its best, singing a tune exquisitely suited to its voice. In this movement the trombones, on occasion, might have spoken with greater unanimity. The brisk accent of the strings in the scherzo and the fiery weaving of themes in the concluding allegro brought the evening to an electric close.

Dr. Koussevitzky, applauded vigorously again and again as the program progressed, several times brought the orchestra to its feet in acknowledgement.

THE PROVIDENCE JOURNAL, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 19, 1938

AMONG SOCIETY'S FIRST NIGHTERS AS BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS ITS SEASON HERE

Shown Here Are Some of the Society Folk Who Turned Out for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's First Concert of the Season Last Night at the Metropolitan Theatre. Left to Right Are: Miss Elizabeth C. Hinckley, Mrs. Leonard B. Colt, Mrs. Albert H. Poland and Her Daughter, Miss Mary Louise Poland, and Miss Martha S. Snow.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ATTRACTS SOCIETY

First Concert of Season Is Reunion for Audience Back from Summer Vacations.

Society turned out in vast numbers last evening for the initial concert of the season presented by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, at the Metropolitan Theatre.

Last night's audience gave the appearance of a fall reunion for many of the groups had recently returned from country homes or extended European trips.

The lobby was occupied with music loving enthusiasts during intermission. Dinner frocks and formal evening gowns were noted in the fashionable array. Velvets, furred or self-trimmed, crepes, figured and plain, sheer chiffons and laces were some of the materials noticed in the assemblage. Teal blue, Dubonnet, coral pink, autumn gold, aquamarine, Royal blue and the ever fashionable back were outstanding in the shades of the gowns.

Mrs. Hovey T. Freeman's gown of Royal blue velvet was topped with a black velvet evening wrap. Mrs. Hugh F. MacColl was attired in a black dinner dress of crepe over which she wore a short fur jacket.

Mrs. J. Campbell Keighler and Mr. Keighler's sister, Mrs. M. W. K. Poore of Nutley, N. J., were noted in the throng. Mrs. Keighler wore a gown of blue lace and a black velvet evening wrap with a white fox collar. Mrs. Poore wore a black lace gown and an evening wrap of black velvet with a high standing collar of the same material.

Mrs. Ashbel T. Wall, Jr., was attractive in a gown of Chinese red printed crepe. Her only jewel was an antique diamond pendant and her gown was topped with a black velvet wrap. Mrs. Robert P. Brown, Jr., also wore a flowered crepe gown of Chinese red. Her evening coat was of deep purple tweed.

Mrs. Louis M. Ream was noted in a gown of black crepe with which she wore a shoulder cape of gray fur. Mrs. Lowell Emerson wore a black skunk cape with her white background flower chiffon gown. Mrs. Peter Pineo Chase's gown was of Chinese blue crepe threaded with gold and her jacket was a short model of black fur.

Mrs. Raymond G. Williams and her debutante daughter, Miss Janet Chace Williams, arrived together. Mrs. Williams wearing a black crepe gown with a sequins jacket and a velvet wrap of fuchsia color, and Miss Williams attired in peach color satin. Her gown was fashioned with a jacket and she wore a short white cape with a collar of soft white fur. Miss Martha S. Snow wore a black velvet gown with an evening coat of brilliant red velvet.

Mrs. Gerald Wallace Harrington wore a black velvet gown trimmed with ermine and a bright red old-fashioned quilted jacket. Mrs. Leonard B. Colt was noted in a flower print gown, the background of which was coral. With it she wore a cream brocade wrap.

Others noted in the audience were former United States Senator Jesse H. Metcalf and Mrs. Metcalf, Mrs. Murray S. Danforth, Mrs. Samuel M. Nicholson, Mr. William S. Innis and daughter, Miss Elizabeth W. Innis, Mrs. Robert H. I. Goddard, Mrs. E. Nicholson White and her twin daughters, Miss Elizabeth G. White

---

MERIDEN, CONN.
RECORD

OCT 15 1938

—The Boston Symphony Orchestra is playing The New World "to show sympathy." Unfortunately Czechoslovakia won't feel any reaction unless the proceeds of the concert accompany the sympathy.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

OCT 19 1938

Providence Hears Concert

Boston Orchestra Gives First of the Season's Programs

Special to the Herald Tribune

PROVIDENCE, Oct. 18.—The first of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. [illegible]ky conducting, was heard here tonight by more than 2,000 music-lovers, including members of society.

The Providence Junior League held its annual fall luncheon meeting at the Agawam Hunt today. Mrs. Curtis Bush Brooks, the president, presided. Mr. Gerald W. Harrington, of Providence, described the Rhode Island charter and proposed changes in it.

Mrs. Arthur B. Lisle was guest speaker before the Handicraft Club this afternoon and showed colored motion pictures made of her recent trip with Mr. Lisle to Peru and Chile. Mrs. Henry S. Newcombe, the president, presided. Mrs. Elizabeth Nicholson White and Mrs. Henry S. Lanpher served tea.

Mrs. Frederick Stanhope Peck and granddaughter, Miss Marcia Williams, and Mr. Richard C. Viet 2d, fiance of Miss Williams, are in New York, whence Mr. Viet goes to Miami, Fla., to join his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Kenneth Alden Viet.

LOWELL, MASS.
LEADER

OCT 17 1938

Reception for Dr. Koussevitzky

An exhibition was opened yesterday afternoon by the Addison Gallery of American Art at Phillips academy, Andover. A reception was held for Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and there was a preview of portrait drawings of the members of the orchestra by Gerome Brush. The exhibition of these drawings, together with the retrospective exhibtion of paintings by Maurice and Charles Prendergast, will continue for the remainder of the month.

Dr. Koussevitzky was accompanied by a number of members of the orchestra.

There will be daily free admission, including Sunday, for the remainder of the month.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 16 1938

A new piano concerto by Vladimir Dukelsky will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, in Boston this season, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

OCT 15 1938

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO OPEN SEASON

Koussevitzky Will Conduct at Tuesday Concert.—Crooks Recital Wednesday.

The concert season opens with both barrels next week in the Metropolitan Theatre, to wit, the Boston Symphony on Tuesday night and Richard Crooks, tenor, singing for the Community Concert Association on Wednesday night.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the symphony. It is his 15th year as leader of the orchestra.

Mr. Crooks, Metropolitan Opera singer. will be accompanied by Frederick Schauwecker, who will also play solos.

The orchestra program:

Mozart ....
  Divertimento in B-flat major, for strings and two horns (Koechel No. 287)
Glazounov ....
  "Stenza Razin," Symphonic Poem Op. 13
Dvorak ....
  Symphony No. 5, in E-minor, "From the New World," Op. 95.
  I. Adagio: Allegro molto
  II. Larghetto
  III. Schergo: Volto vivace.
  IV. Allegro confuoco

Mr. Crooks's and Mr. Schauwecker's program:

I.
Aria "Where'er You Walk"	Handel
Aria "Sound an Alarm'	Handel
II.
Du bist die Ruh'	Schubert
Mein	Schubert
Freundliche Vision	Strauss
Zueignung	Strauss
Mr. Crooks
III.
Nocturne	Glazounow
Intermezzo	Brahms
Piece Rococo	Taylor
Mr. Schauwecker
IV.
Aria "Lamento di Federico"	Cilea
V.
Through My Open Window	Warren
Sea Fever	Ireland
Do Not Go, My Love	Hageman
War Song of Donald the Black	Gilbert
Mr. Crooks

N

Roto Section

Boston Evening Transcript

Roto Section

VOL. CIX NO. 239 Established 1830 WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 12, 1938 Entered as Second-Class Matter, Postoffice, Boston, Mass. PRICE THREE CENTS

"Baton: 15th Year"

N

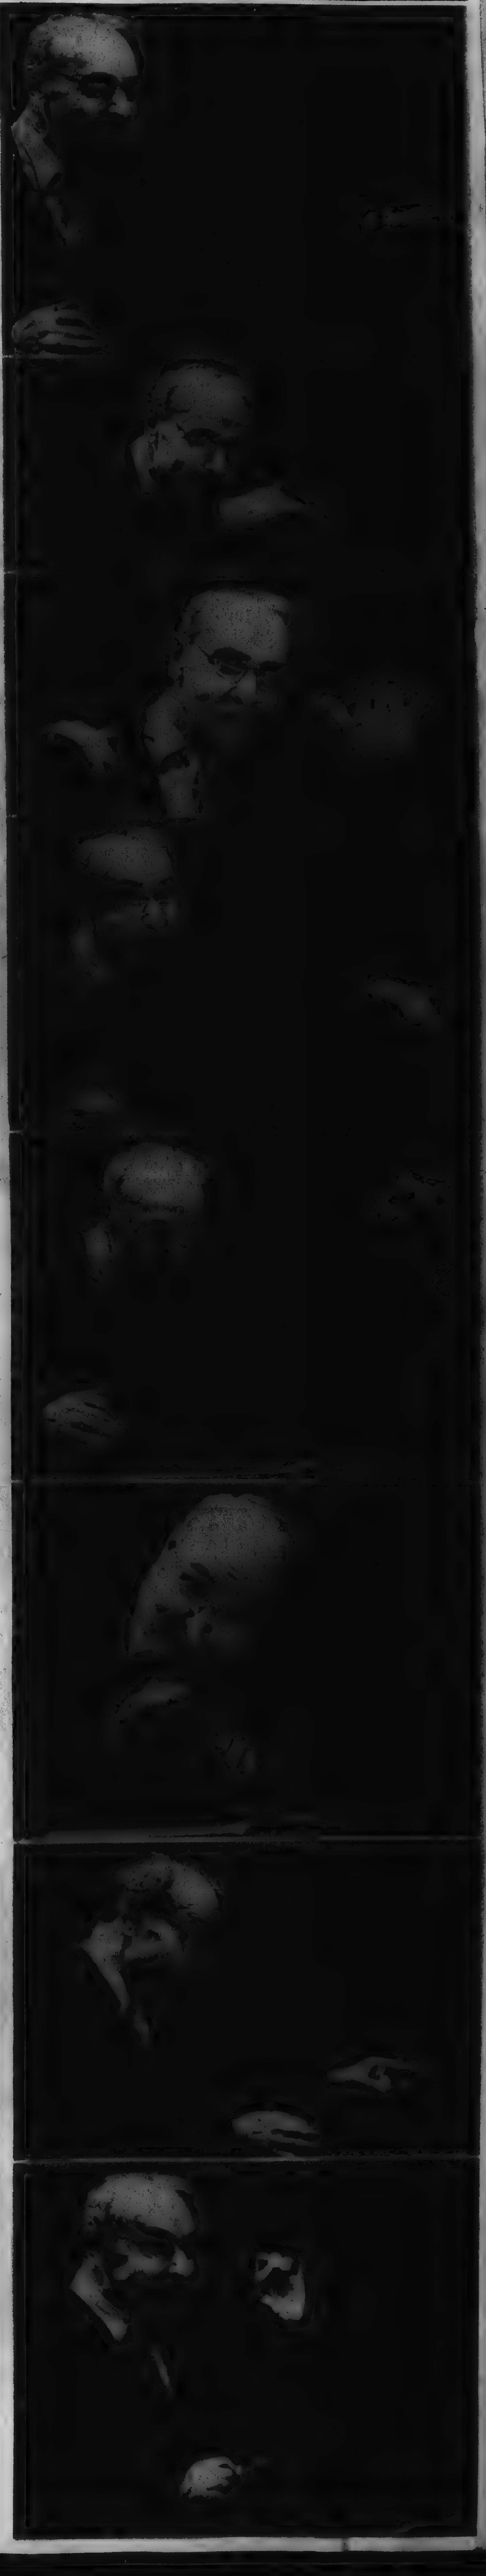
Roto Section

Boston Evening Transcript

Roto Section

VOL. CIX NO. 239 Established 1830 WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 12, 1938 Entered as Second-Class Matter, Postoffice, Boston, Mass. PRICE THREE CENTS

Baton: 15th Year



REHEARSAL

For the first time, cameras were allowed in Symphony Hall during a rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Transcript's Roto Photographer, Richard Tucker, got these pictures by moving all around the hall, and for the sequence on the right, by sitting among the violins. The pictures show Dr. Koussevitzky as he is seen by the players in the orchestra, and by those of the public who are fortunate enough to have seats near the front on either side.

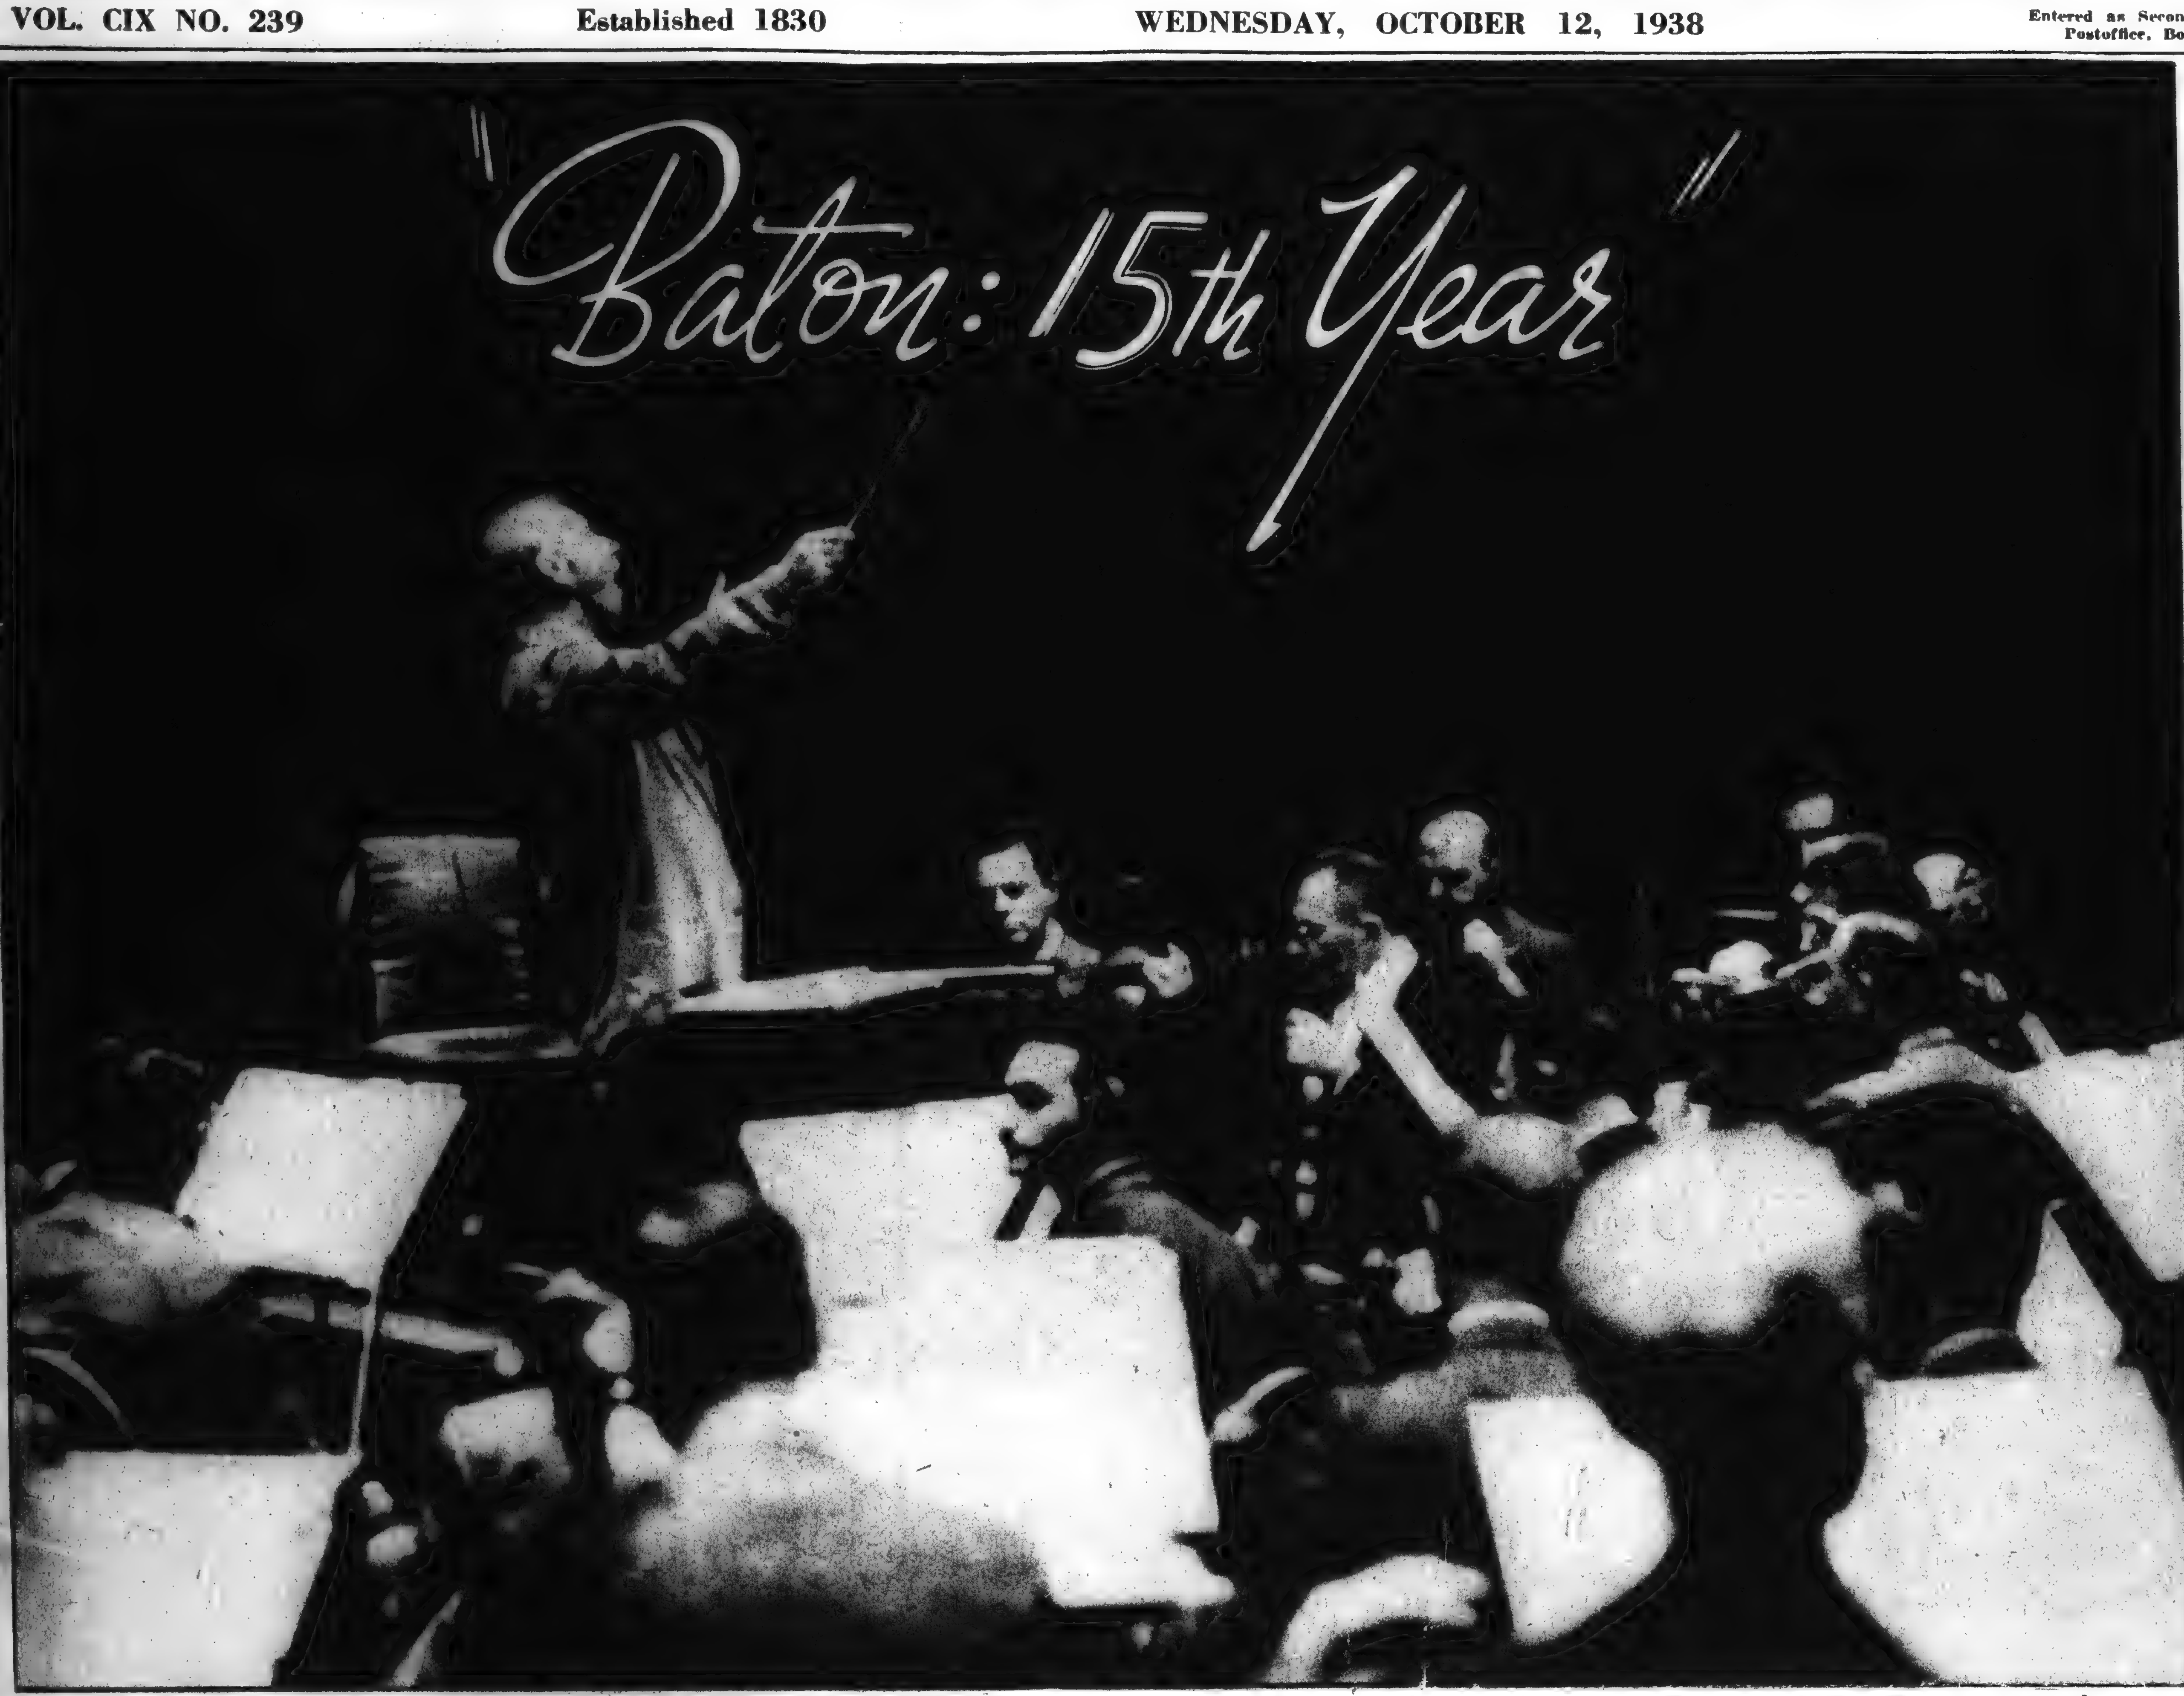
Roto Section

Boston Evening Transcript

Roto Section

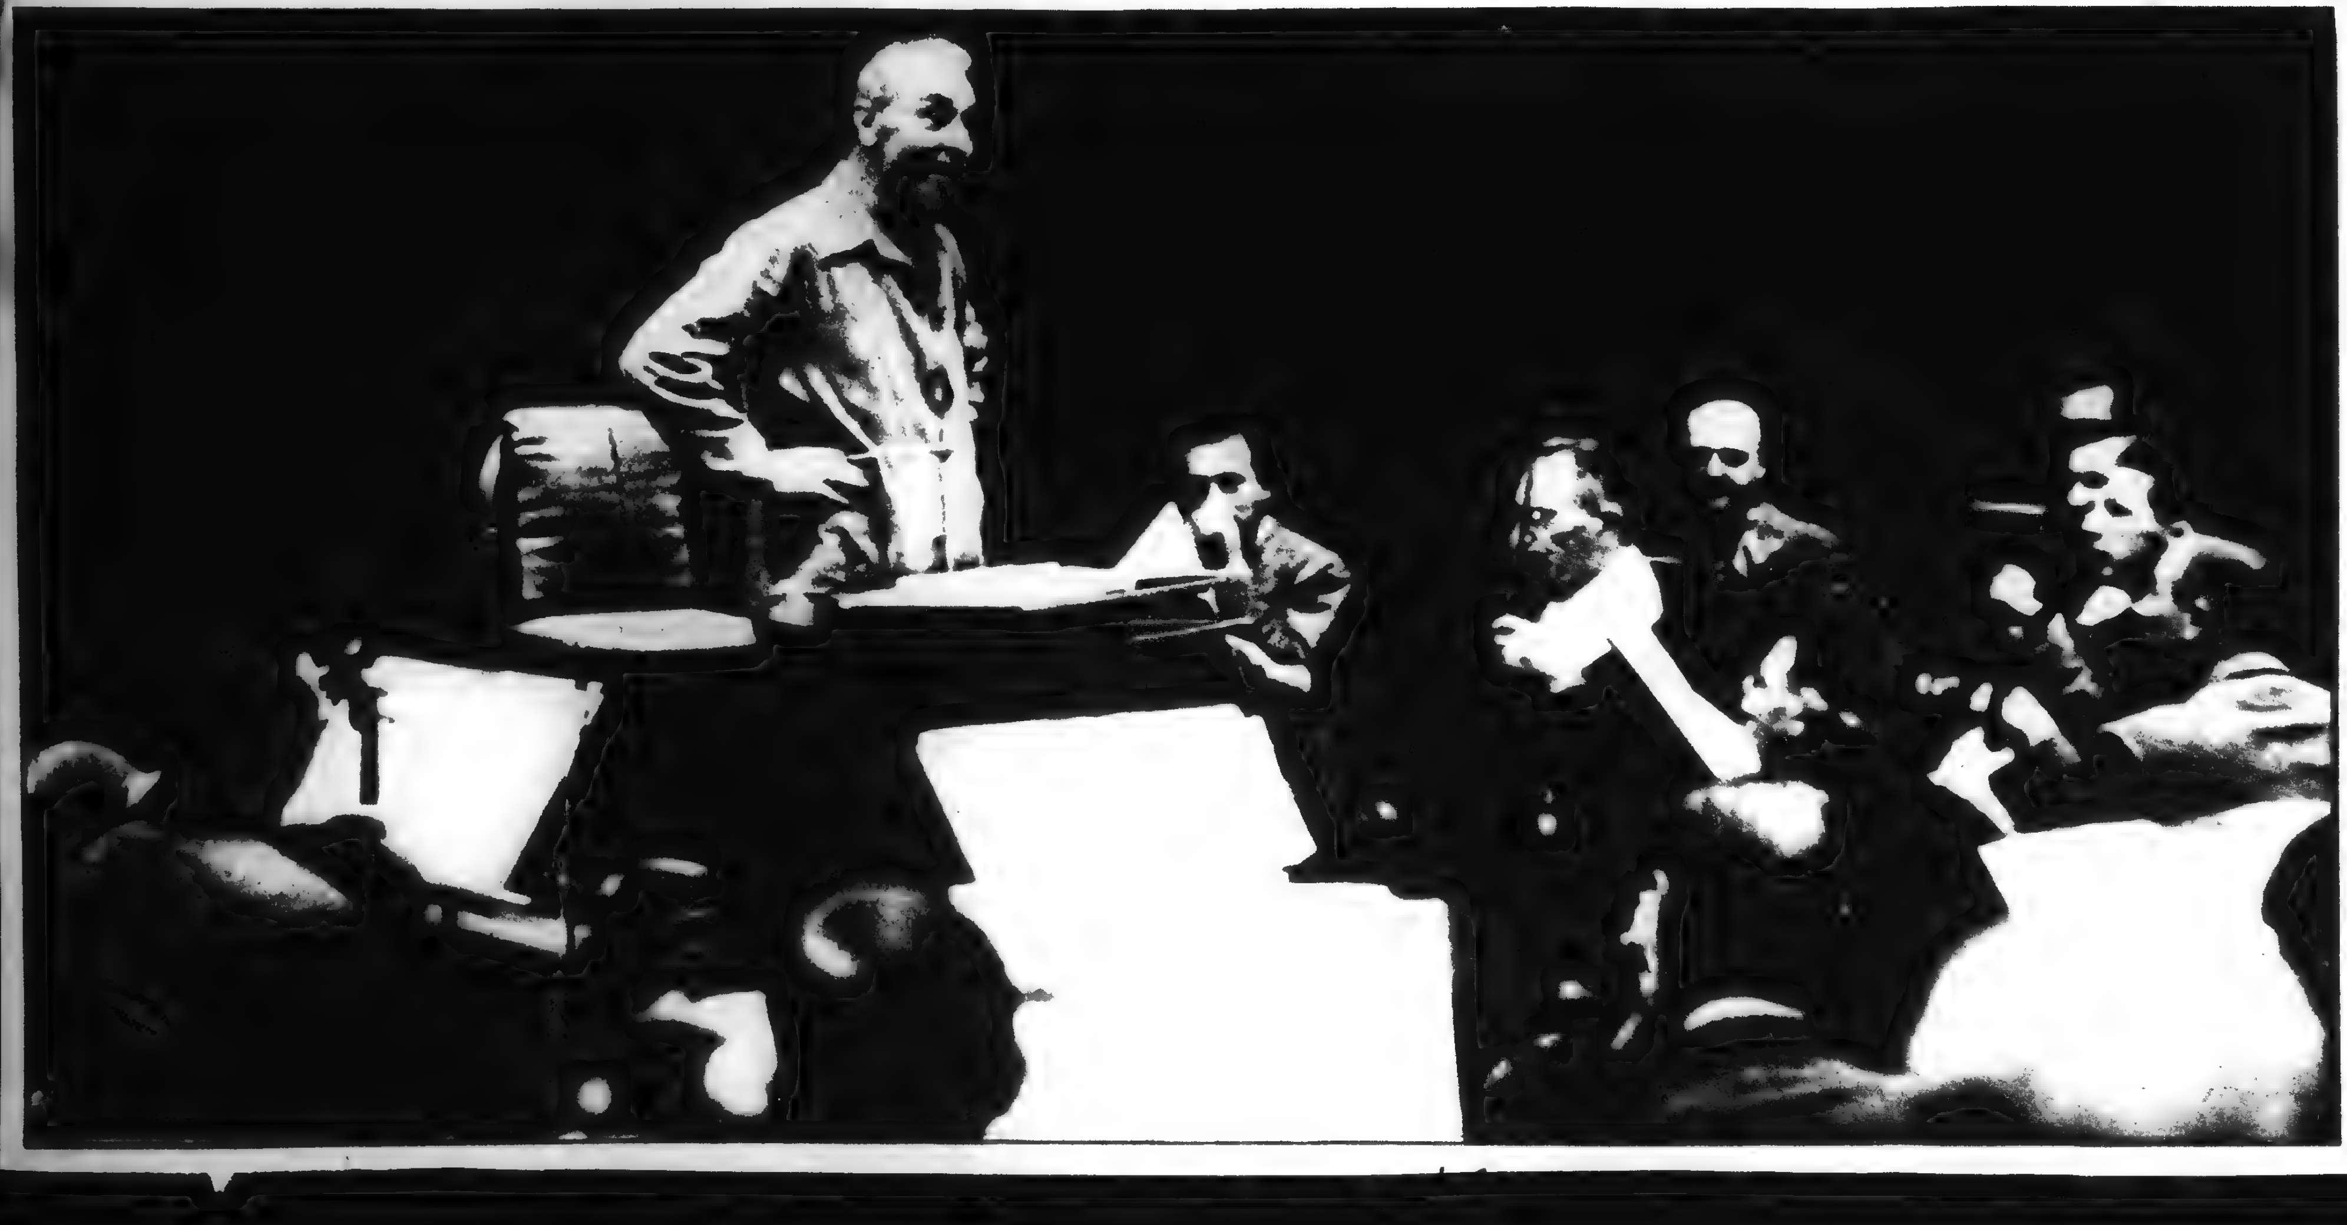
VOL. CIX NO. 239 Established 1830 WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 12, 1938 Entered as Second-Class Matter, Postoffice, Boston, Mass. PRICE THREE CENTS

"Baton: 15th Year"



REHEARSAL

For the first time, cameras were allowed in Symphony Hall during a rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Transcript's Roto Photographer, Richard Tucker, got these pictures by moving all around the hall, and for the sequence on the right, by sitting among the violins. The pictures show Dr. Koussevitzky as he is seen by the players in the orchestra, and by those of the public who are fortunate enough to have seats near the front on either side.



Boston Sunday Globe

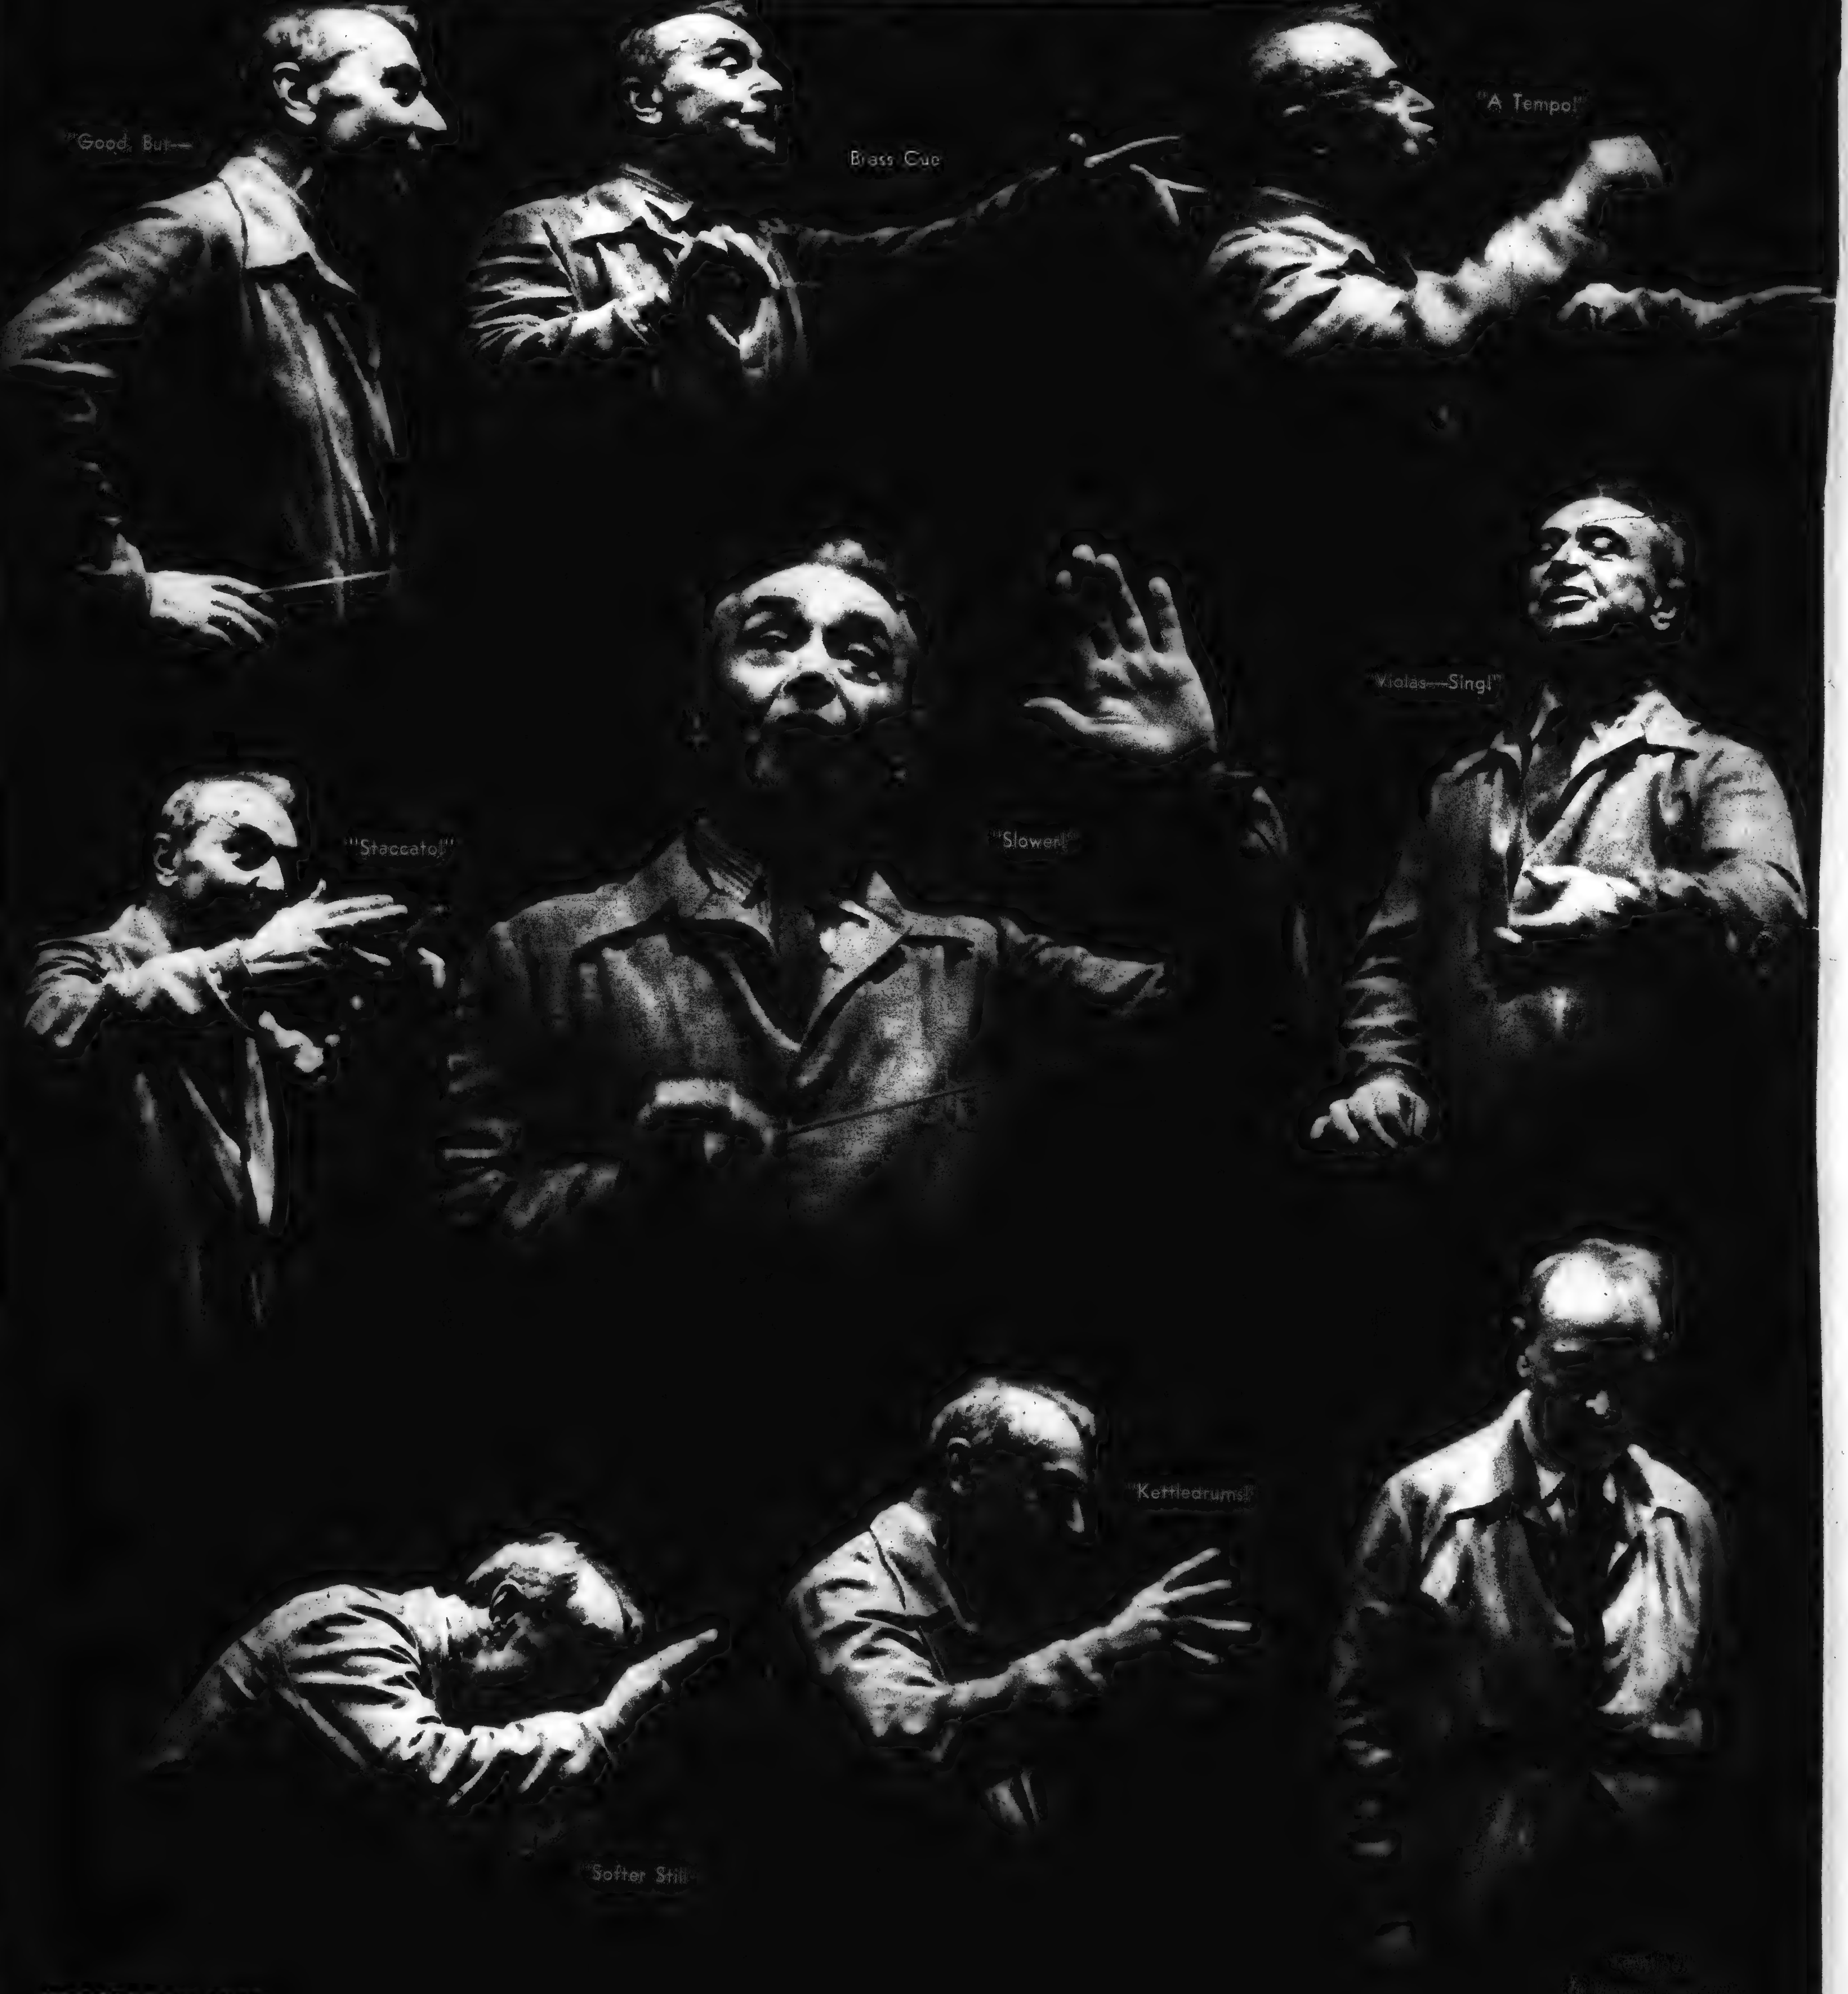
PICTORIAL

ROTOGRAVURE MAGAZINE

OCTOBER 16, 1938

MUSIC MASTER

Boston Sunday Globe
PICTORIAL
ROTOGRAVURE MAGAZINE



"Good, But—"
Brass Cue
"A Tempo!"
"Violas—Sing!"
"Staccato!"
"Slower!"
"Kettledrums!"
Softer Still

OCTOBER 16, 1938

MUSIC MASTER

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY [illegible] Boston [illegible] Symphony Orchestra [illegible]

23

KANSAS CITY, MO.
STAR
OCT 12 1938

GLORY RETURNS TO BOSTON CONCERT UNDER RUSSIAN GENIUS WITH BATON

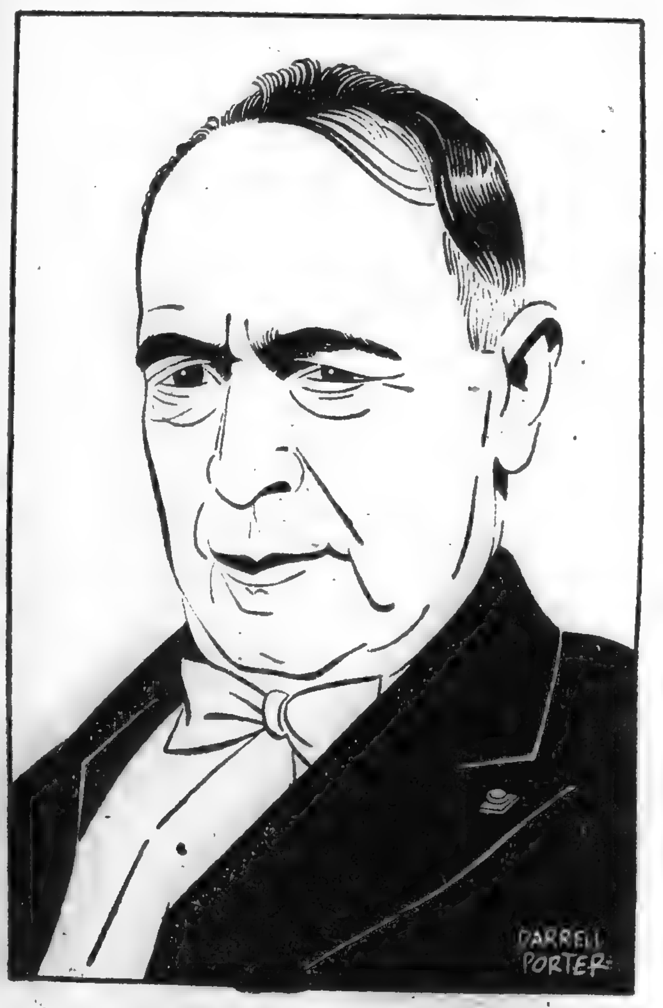
Classed as the Nation's No. 1 Symphony Conductor by Time Magazine, Sergei Koussevitzky Is a Versatile Showman, a Tyrant in His Work and a Highly Engaging Personality in Private Life.

The high standing of Boston's symphony orchestra largely is attributable to the energy, industry and ability of its Russian conductor, Sergei Koussevitzky. This week, as Koussevitzky begins his fifteenth consecutive year with the orchestra, Time magazine surveys the history of orchestra and conductor and ranks Koussevitzky as the "No." 1 symphony conductor of the United States." The article is reprinted by permission of the editors of Time and Fortune.

IN the first half of the nineteenth century, when such men as Ralph Waldo Emerson, Theodore Parker and Bronson Alcott were generating a whole kaleidoscope of intellectual sparks, Boston was in truth the cultural powerhouse of the United States. Since then Boston's cultural graph has shown a decline. Her writers and painters, once the most pioneering, are now for the most part complacent. But to the Back Bay Brahmins Boston's past glories still are present, her old-fashioned way of life still sacredly up to date.

One of Boston's hoary monuments to Brahmin gentility, that still stands like the great pyramid, is the Boston symphony orchestra. At its Friday afternoon concerts in venerable Symphony hall, bald, spade-bearded oldsters and their classically corseted wives sit complacently, laved in the patrician strains of Beethoven and Brahms. So have they sat every week since the late Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, in 1881, materialized the expensive idea that Boston ought to have a good symphony orchestra. That idea cost Major Higginson 1 million dollars.

The fame of Henry Lee Higginson's orchestra has not been limited to Boston. Long before the Philadelphia orchestra was heard of, connoisseurs rated the Boston symphony the finest organization of its kind in the United States, some said in the world. Only once in its history did it fall behind the front rank, and that was when its greatest conductor, German-born Karl Muck, was charged with espionage by New England patrioteers and interned during the World war.



BOSTON'S SERGEI KOUSSEVITZKY.

There followed a 6-year interlude of trouble. Aging Major Higginson, disgusted with the hue and cry over innocent crotchety Dr. Muck, turned the orchestra's management over to a board of directors, and died a year later.

THE ROAD BACK.

By 1924 the Boston symphony, recovered from its wartime jitters, was being reorganized for a comeback. Soon it was back in its old place among the finest of United States symphonic organizations. The man largely responsible for this comeback was a Russian who strongly resembles a diplomat of the Napoleonic era, Sergei Alexandrovich Koussevitzky.

Imported by the symphony's board of directors from Europe, Koussevitzky's first season was in the nature of tryout. Conservative Bostonians found him at first somewhat exaggerated and theatrical. But soon Boston began to admit that Koussevitzky had two things: (1) an uncannily transparent tone that only he seemed able to elicit from the orchestra, (2) a repertory that was larger and more varied than that of any other conductor in the United States.

Last week the 106 members of the Boston symphony, like thousands of symphonic musicians all over the United States, polished their brasswork and rosined their bows for the start of a new season. For Boston's orchestra, this was to be their fifty-eighth winter, their fifteenth consecutive year under Koussevitzky's baton.

"When Boston's concert-goers gather in Symphony hall this week for the season's opening concert, they will see a haughty, gray-haired, tyrannical aristocrat stride to the podium in faultlessly tailored morning clothes, bow to the audience, then turn imperiously to the orchestra. As he raps for attention he will clap a pince-nez to his nose. Before he turns again to the audience to take his bow, the pince-nez will be removed.

BEHIND THE SCENES.

This remarkably poised exhibition gives no hint of the scenes that preceded it. Koussevitzky on parade and Koussevitzky in rehearsal are as different as night and day. While trombonists sweat, fiddlers fidget, and horn players dump saliva from their hard-worked instruments, Koussevitzky, hunched in an old sweater, shouts, sings, gesticulates, lunges and paddles with his baton, grins froglike at pleasant sounds, scolds frantically in heavily battered English.

"You must zing," he admonishes, "you must blay the nuts." "Vonderful, vonderful!" he exclaims, when the orchestra's tone suits him. "Don't spik!" he furiously warns some innocent player who is trying to make a suggestion. "If you spik, I go home!"

Since the Boston symphony is the only important non-union orchestra in the United States, musicians who cross Koussevitzky risk their jobs. Stories of his tyranny (sometimes apocryphal) have become legend among musicians. Typical is that of the musician who persisted in playing sour notes. Exasperated, Koussevitzky finally shouted: "You are fired. Ged out. Ged out!" That ended the rehearsal.

On his way out the discharged musician passed the dressing room, where the conductor was sitting gloomily hunched over a desk. The musician stopped. "Nuts to you, Koussevitzky!" he bellowed. Koussevitzky turned his haughty head. "It's too late to abologize," he snapped.

If he showed signs of sociability, Boston's ladies would launch him in a flood of tea. But Koussevitzky has little time for fripperies, and his intimate friends are few. Few also are his hobbies. When he is not conducting, or studying the scores he keeps scattered about the living room of his home, he spends his time either walking or reading heavy tomes on metaphysics and philosophy. When walking he is accompanied by two joyfully yapping cocker spaniels named (in French) Bemol (flat) and Diese (sharp).

Conservative in his tastes, 64-year-old Sergei Koussevitzky lives in a large rented house in the quiet, substantial, somewhat stuffy Boston suburb of Brookline. Its furnishings and decoration are completely American, its staff completely Russian. Chief factotum is a blond, grinning, gangling valet named Victor, who follows his master about with serf-like devotion. Strapping, slant-eyed Victor has many duties, among them that of drying off his master, who is always drenched with perspiration at the end of each concert.

Victor's wife is the cook, who prepares Koussevitzky's regular and carefully-chosen meals. Regularly and carefully apportioned are all his daily habits, with so much time allowed for rehearsing, so much for walking, so much for studying his scores, for the Boston symphony's master takes systematic and excellent care of himself.

A CUSHIONED LIFE.

Koussevitzky has taken few of life's bumps. One good reason has been Natalya Konstantinovna Koussevitzky, his pleasant, portly, Russian wife. Koussevitzky is her career. Once a sculptress, she has not only spent the best part of her life smoothing out her husband's path; she also played an important part in putting him on the path in the first place.

The facts of Sergei Alexandrovich Koussevitzky's life belie his haughty mien but not his profession. He was born in 1874 in the tiny bedraggled Central Russian village of Vyshny Volochek. His mother, who died shortly after he was born, was a pianist; his father gave lessons on the violin. A poor boy, destined by a traditionally musical family for a musical career, he was soon on his way to Moscow in search of a scholarship at Moscow's Philharmonic conservatory.

Because he was late in applying, and because there were only a few places left in the conservatory orchestra, the only scholarships open to him were for instruction on (1) the trombone, (2) the bassoon, (3) the string bass. As the least of three evils, young Koussevitzky chose the bull fiddle (string bass). So expert did he become that eventually he toured Europe as a soloist on this clumsiest of instruments, was widely hailed as the world's No. 1 bull fiddler.

It was during his days as a mustachioed virtuoso on the string bass that he met Natalya Konstantinovna. While sawing the thick strings of his groaning instrument at a Moscow concert, he noticed a girl in the front row, gazing at him in maidenly admiration. Koussevitzky's heart jumped, he sawed away more sweetly than ever.

Cont. above

After the concert he searched for his admirer, but she had gone. For weeks romantic Koussevitzky was in a lovesick daze. Months later, at another concert, he spied her again in the audience, made his pachydermatous instrument serenade her with mournful and passionate moans. Again she eluded him. It was not until two years afterward that they met and married.

ORCHESTRA TO PRACTICE ON.

Like many a successful conductor's wife, Natalya Konstantinovna was a woman of means. Together they financed an orchestra for Koussevitzky to practice on, and gave a series of concerts in Moscow and St. Petersburg. The Koussevitzky concerts began to catch on with the Russian public. The Koussevitzkys chartered a ferryboat, made a tour of the Volga. By 1910 Koussevitzky was the most widely known maestro in czarist Russia. Meanwhile he had started a publishing house for music by contemporary Slavic composers, published for the first time (thus, incidentally, sparing himself the performance royalties) works by such famed artists as the late Alexander Scriabin, Sergei Prokofieff and Igor Stravinsky.

The revolution of 1917 put a stop to all this. Zealous Bolsheviks liquidated Koussevitzky's self-endowed orchestra and publishing house, offered him instead the post of Russia's musical head man. He declined, though he accepted for a time the conductorship of Petrograd's state orchestra, where his dictatorial instincts were continually curbed by bureaucratic rules and regulations.

Once officers of the GPU caught him attempting to escape to Estonia. When he finally did succeed in getting a passport to leave the country, he abandoned virtually all of his money and personal property to the Soviet government.

Today, graying, fastidious Koussevitzky is at the peak of his career. The resignations of Arturo Toscanini from the conductorship of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, and of Leopold Stokowski from the chief conductorship of the Philadelphia orchestra, have left him without rivals among the regular directors of United States symphony orchestras. Ten years ago, outside of Boston, there may have been some doubt about his pre-eminence. But today even Manhattanites and Philadelphians would admit that the No. 1 symphony conductor of the United States is Boston's Sergei Alexandrovich Koussevitzky.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER - CITIZEN
OCT 10 1938

Koussevitsky Scores in Concert at Boston

Symphony Hall in Boston was thronged on Saturday for the first of the series of evening concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The occasion marked the opening of Dr. Koussevitzky's 15th season as conductor. To him, undoubtedly, the perfection of the orchestra as a collective musical instrument is due. Frankly, on Saturday he showed his pride in it.

On Friday afternoon, by report, he made a little speech of acknowledgment of his welcome back to Boston. Saturday evening he allowed the orchestra to speak for him. It did so eloquently. For performance he had selected familiar works, chiefly from the first program which he conducted in Boston, the Vivaldi Concerto in D minor for orchestra with organ; the Roman Carnival Overture of Berlioz; the Brahms Variations on a theme of Haydn.

After the intermission came the Beethoven Fifth Symphony, which he had first conducted at his second program in Boston. By report he made a fine impression then. But now, with the superb orchestra which has been developed under his leadership, he had a far better medium of expression. The result was a really thrilling performance of this great masterpiece. None hearing it, as Dr. Koussevitzky set it forth on Saturday night, could resist its appeal. The Andante was beautifully moulded. And the final movement a triumph of blended virtuosity. There was no mistaking that, familiar as was the work, we were hearing music that more than holds its own and will endure.

Mr. Snow, at the organ, added rich sonority to the Vivaldi number. The Berlioz overture went brilliantly and the Brahms variations were melodic delight. Dr. Koussevitzky and his men were in the vein. The audience caught the spirit and reacted accordingly.

S. R. F.

LEWISTON, ME.
JOURNAL
OCT 12 1938

DANE PRESIDENT HUB SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

BOSTON-Æ-Ernest B. Dane, one of the original trustees of the famous Boston Symphony orchestra, Tuesday was elected its president, succeeding Bentley W. Warren, president since 1932, will continue as a member of the board.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY
OCT 8 - 1938

KOUSSEVITZKY LAUDS BOSTON'S RESPONSE

BOSTON, Oct. 7 (AP)—Serge Koussevitsky began his fifteenth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra today by departing from custom and making a brief pre-concert speech from the podium of Symphony Hall.

Asserting the musical world recognized the Boston group as "one of the greatest orchestras in the world—if not the greatest," the Russian-born conductor attributed it to his listeners' "deep feeling of the importance and necessity of art."

WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN
OCT 8 - 1938

SYMPHONY SEASON OPENS WITH SPEECH BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston, Oct. 7 — (AP) — Serge Koussevitzky began his 15th season as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra today by departing from custom and making a brief pre-concert speech from the podium at Symphony hall.

Asserting the musical world recognized the Boston group as "one of the greatest orchestras in the world—if not the greatest," the Russian-born conductor attributed it to his listeners' "deep feeling of the importance and necessity of art."

For the anniversary, Koussevitzky chose four numbers that appeared on his first two programs in 1924—when he made his debut here. They were Vivaldi's Orchestral Concerto, Berlioz' Roman Carnival overture, Brahms' Variations on a theme by Haydn, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony—the latter the first symphony that he performed in this country.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TELEGRAM
OCT 8 - 1938

KOUSSEVITZKY BEGINS HIS FIFTEENTH SEASON

BOSTON, Oct. 7. — (AP) Serge Koussevitzky began his fifteenth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra today by departing from custom and making a brief pre-concert speech from the podium at Symphony Hall.

Asserting the musical world recognized the Boston group as "one of the greatest orchestras in the world—if not the greatest," the Russian-born conductor attributed it to his listeners' "deep feeling of the importance and necessity of art."

For the anniversary, Koussevitzky chose four numbers that appeared on his first two programs in 1924—when he made his debut here. They were Vivaldi's orchestral concerto, Berlioz Roman carnival overture, Brahms' variations on a theme by Haydn, and Beethoven's fifth symphony—the latter the first symphony that he performed in this country.

ESQUIRE
CHICAGO, ILL.
NOV - - 1938

Roulades and Cadenzas

Once a European artist makes good in this country, he gains greater glory at home, and a raise in pay

by CARLETON SMITH

MUSIC

THE experience of being commentator on a series of symphonic broadcasts recently confirmed one of my old suspicions that, musically, this country has grown out of diapers. Thousands of people in cities, flag-stops and isolated farm communities are deeply concerned with the thoughts of Beethoven and Brahms, Morton Gould and Aaron Copland. Not only is the quantity of the response staggering but its character—whether it comes on penny postcards or engraved parchment—acts on a cynical spirit like a shot of adrenalin to a weak heart.

Listeners amaze you with the intelligence and directness of their reactions. The few excerpts quoted here are from letters of young people after a broadcast concert on American music. One Arkansas lad, not long out of high school, wrote: "On my birthday my dad gave me a radio phonograph with a Mozart recording and the Apassionata played by Harold Bauer . . . it was like a gift from heaven. I don't believe anything ever made me happier in my whole life. Though I like Bach and Chopin, now I'll have a chance to hear more American works."

And this, from a girl in the East: "I like the old masters best, but I have learned not to disdain the moderns like Copland and Harris. At first I hated them and turned my radio off, but I have come to see we must not judge a man and his music before hearing what he has to say; because this new man has a soul, just as the old classicist. He can talk, sing, cry, believe—without doing it in the same manner." Not bad, that, from a youngster.

A man in a small Ohio town: "I have found listening to our native composers a pleasure, but a lot of frills—which I presume are to make the work popular—are unnecessary. Second, the intervals between the hearings of a certain work are too great. And third, there is too much attempt at reproduction of commonplace noises in the modern idiom. That, I believe, is the reason many of us prefer the artists of an earlier and more stable era. On the other hand, I don't believe in telling the composer what or how to write, for that would probably change the influence that history naturally produces on music . . ."

In Rockford, Illinois, a young man was pleasantly surprised to find that he could learn to like the discordant sounds in so much present-day music: "I hardly ever like it the first time; it sounds so noisy. But this is not really so if one hears the number repeated many times so he can study the structure and attune his ears to the seeming discords."

Some Europeans suspect—incorrectly, I think—that we don't understand the music we hear, that we are like the butter-and-egg man who has made a pile and who buys a Rembrandt merely to brag about it. Perhaps we were at one time. We have been the victims of press agents and, being eager to learn, have taken whatever was sent us from abroad with a shiny label. We have and we still do devour celebrities.

But Europe is not altogether free from that curse, either. If a renowned artist appears at the Opéra in Paris or the Staatsoper in Berlin or Vienna, his or her name appears on the placards in front of the theatre in letters ten times as big as those announcing the name of the opera.

Also, during the intermission of a concert by a famous string quartet in the beautiful new Lausanne theatre, that is, between the playing of the Beethoven and the Schubert quarters . . . a screen was lowered and slides were projected, advertising local merchants' mattresses, canned goods, and watches.

We are, of course, highly susceptible to advertising. But commercial announcements are no more disturbing than the weather forecasts, market reports, and shipping news which I heard broadcast during the intermission of a renowned European orchestra concert conducted, as it happened, by Arturo Toscanini.

There are, of course, snobs among us: people who go to concerts to show off their jewels and to be seen parading in the foyer during the intermission. But they are in the minority. Even at the opera—that most exotic and un-American of entertainments, as we know it—what sells out the house? Tristan und Isolde, a three-hour work without ballets, spectacles, arias, or high C's. It must be because the people who go like the music.

And it would take a lot of double talk to convince me that the millions who listen to the radio, the hundreds of thousands who this summer have poured into Hollywood Bowl, Grant Park and Ravinia in Chicago, into the Dell in Philadelphia and New York's Lewisohn Stadium have done so for any reason except that they were anxious, hungry even, to hear the music that was played.

In recent years, thanks to the radio, Americans have acquired a love and an understanding of music that would surprise most Europeans. We hear everything the world has to offer. And dissatisfied and cynical though I am about a lot of other things on our musical scene, I believe that our taste and our public today are the most cosmopolitan and the most exacting in the world.

It has long been a matter of common agreement among artists that our musical life is the richest and fullest on the globe. Practically everybody—even the English—admits that today New York is the musical capital of the world. Vacationists returning from Europe, who have listened to the music there, realize it. They know that we have half a dozen symphony orchestras the like of which cannot be found elsewhere.

Before sailing from Southampton last year I had an unusual chance to compare three great European orchestras with two of our own. One evening I heard Furtwaengler conduct the Berlin Philharmonic in a Beethoven concert. The next morning I was in Amsterdam where Mengelberg conducted the Mahler Fourth, and that same night I heard Toscanini with the B.B.C. symphony in London. A week later I sat in Carnegie Hall and, on successive afternoons, heard the Philharmonic-Symphony under Barbirolli and the Boston Symphony with Koussevitsky. No fooling, the European orchestras hadn't anywhere near the beauty or roundness of tune, the accuracy of playing of our own orchestras. And the quality of our symphonic broadcasts, so help me, is not equaled elsewhere in the world.

Moreover, we have many more orchestras per capita than any country in Europe. Our landscape is dotted with permanent orchestras, and new ones are being established every year. Over here, there is scarcely a single city of half a million people without its orchestra, and the whole of Europe hasn't more than seven or eight permanent symphonies. And when you think that Vienna, the birthplace of symphonic music, hasn't a full-time orchestra (the Vienna Philharmonic is an opera-house orchestra that gives only occasional concerts), you begin to have an idea what has happened in our own country.

The number and quality of concerts here each season are not matched abroad. Literally in swarms, the musical great come to our shores to do their stuff, and then travel the length and breadth of the land, giving recitals.

We hear music that European capitals do not know. Last winter a friend of mine from an old and cultured Viennese musical family came here to spend the winter. One Sunday he asked me to choose a concert for him, and

Continued on page 173

across page

25

Roulades and Cadenzas

Continued from page 90

I suggested The English Singers. He came back flabbergasted. In twenty years of concert-going in Vienna he had not heard a single Elizabethan madrigal, did not know the music of Byrd, Locke and Morley.

Undoubtedly, we get the best from everywhere. With few exceptions, the ranking musicians of Austria, Spain, England, Italy, Norway, of every country, come to us. There is not a single musician in Europe, from Land's End to Erivan, who does not want to come to America, not only because of the money he expects to flow into his pockets but because of the prestige of an American appearance.

That's a brand new idea to many of us. So long have we read about the "world famous prima donna from La Scala" and the "celebrated conductor of the Vienna Philharmonic"—that it takes a while for the notion to soak in that actually, European artists earn more money at home after they have appeared in New York. The reason is that we have selected, commanded even, the best artists (not to mention some of the worst) from over the world. And when anyone comes here and succeeds, where competition is keenest, he is thought to be doubly good.

There isn't a conductor in the whole of Europe who wouldn't give his eye teeth to conduct one of our major orchestras. That is something we have a right to be cocky about but, to keep the record straight, let's not get any inflated idea that it's the result of any innate superiority on our part. In the final analysis, it is because of our wealth. Because, geographically and economically, we are a most favored people. We enjoy a standard of living which permits such artistic riches as we incontestably do have.

It may be that we do not approach music with the same spirit of reverence and mysticism as do the Teutonic peoples, that song is not in our blood as it is in the Italians', but it is true we have acquired a genuine appreciation for the old classics and a growing sensitivity and alertness to modern music. The fact is that so many talented musicians have come here to spread the gospel and we have been such willing, eager disciples, that our conversion has been rapid and complete.

We have not been content, either, merely to borrow European culture. We have artists and a music of our own. Today, no more beautiful voices exist than those developed here in the United States. There is not a warmer, more luscious dramatic soprano in the world than Connecticut-born Rosa Ponselle's. There is not a baritone anywhere, the quality of whose voice surpasses that of Lawrence Tibbett, John Charles Thomas, Richard Bonelli, Nelson Eddy . . . all born in this country.

The fame of these singers is not local. It has spread everywhere. The largest hook-up in the history of Australian broadcasting, for example, was for Lawrence Tibbett's recent farewell concert there. And the most widely acclaimed singer in Europe today: the woman who sells out a dozen concerts in Moscow or Tiflis, who draws the most listeners, not only in New York but in Vienna, Geneva, Helsinki and Paris—who, Sibelius says, has a "heart in her throat"—is Philadelphia's Marian Anderson.

America has instrumentalists, too. The highest-paid and most popular violinist in any city of the world where he appears is California-born Yehudi Menuhin. These are the headliners, of course. And there are many other American talents about which we can be snooty. But we are so accustomed to hollering for the best, to enjoying the cream of the world's talent, that we don't take time to prepare and encourage the youngsters who are only on their way. If it were as easy and inexpensive to practice conducting as it is to sing, I am sure we would have half a dozen great American conductors. But it takes seventy or eighty men to practice conducting, whereas any of us can sing in our own bathtubs. And so it is that too many of our young conductors, when they get a chance to squeeze in and conduct, have to go on unprepared.

But the time will come when we will have conductors worthy to rank among the best, just as we may have composers worthy to rank along with some of the old boys. They will grow naturally out of our soil and our culture, and produce a music that will say something worthy of being said.

Already we have produced a music that is distinctively our own—jazz. Perhaps its values are transient, but they are real to millions of people. This summer, thousands packed concert halls and stadiums over the country to hear the music of George Gershwin. Other millions heard it broadcast. And it is not only Americans who like it. European music lovers have a higher regard for it than we have any idea. I was in London last year when Gershwin died and his death caused a much bigger stir than Ravel's some months later. Newspapers carried full-page stories of his life and work. Thousands felt a personal loss at the American composer's passing.

The tunes of Irving Berlin are loved and sung everywhere from Lapland to the Arabian Desert, and our swing music has a following abroad that is not unlike baseball's, even, in this country. All this music is our exclusive creation which no European can copy. There is no reason why we should not take an honest pride in our progress, and flaunt a few feathers in our caps over the fact that we have a musical life that for richness and variety and quality can be compared with nowhere else on the face of the globe. ##

EAGLE

OCT 12 1938

Warren Resigns as Head Of Boston Orchestra

Succeeded by Ernest B. Dane Who Also Remains Treasurer—Warren Still Member of Board

Bentley Wirt Warren, president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1932, resigned at the annual meeting of the trustees yesterday and Ernest B. Dane, one of the original trustees of the orchestra and treasurer since the season of 1919-20 was elected his successor.

Mr. Warren remains a member of the board of which he also was an original member and of which he was vice-president from 1927 to 1932. He succeeded Judge Frederick P. Cabot as president. Mr. Warren, one of the outstanding lawyers in Massachusetts is well-known in the Berkshires. He maintains a summer home in Williamstown and is senior trustee of Williams College, his alma mater. Since the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first affiliation with the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Mr. Warren has shown a keen interest in the Festival's success.

Mr. Dane, one of the outstanding business men of Boston, has long been known for his generous support and great interest in the orchestra. He too has been interested in the Festival from the start and the past summer attended most of the concerts.

Henry B. Sawyer was elected vice-president, and Edward A. Taft, clerk. Mr. Dane remains the treasurer of the corporation. The board of trustees consists of 12 members: Allison Burr, Henry B. Cabot, Ernest B. Dane, Alvan T. Fuller, Jerome D. Greene, N. Penrose Hallowell, M. A. DeWolfe Howe, Roger I. Lee, Richard C. Paine, Henry B. Sawyer, Edward A. Taft, Bentley W. Warren.

SUN

OCT 11 1938

Music and

NEWS FROM THE

The supplementary series of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will again be given in pairs this season, the programs of Monday evenings being repeated on Tuesday afternoons. Dr. Koussevitsky will conduct four programs, and Georges Enesco and Igor Stravinsky one each. The soloists will be Pierre and Genia Luboshutz, who will play the Mozart Concerto for two pianos; Myra Hess and Stravinsky, who will play the piano part of one of his compositions in addition to conducting. The concerts will fall on Oct. 24-25, Dec. 26-27, Jan. 16-17, Feb. 20-21, March 20-21 and April 17-18.

LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

OCT 8 - 1938

Music and The Drama

KOUSSEVITSKY BEGINS 15TH SEASON AS CONDUCTOR OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

BOSTON, Oct. 7-AP-Serge Koussevitzky began his 15th season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra today by departing from custom and making a brief pre-concert speech from the podium of Symphony Hall.

Asserting the musical world recognized the Boston group as "one of the greatest orchestras in the world—if not the greatest," the Russian-born conductor attributed it to his listeners' "deep feeling of the importance and necessity of art."

For the anniversary, Dr. Koussevitzky chose four numbers that appeared on his first two programs in 1924—when he made his debut here. They were Vivaldi's Orchestral Concerto, Berlioz' Roman Carnival Overture, Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydn, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony—the latter the first symphony that he performed in this country.

AUGUSTA, ME.
KENNEBEC JOURNAL

OCT 8 - 1938

Maestro Begins 15th Season in Boston

Boston, Oct. 7—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky began his fifteenth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra today by departing from custom and making a brief pre-concert speech from the podium of Symphony Hall.

Asserting the musical world recognized the Boston group as "one of the greatest orchestra in the world—if not the greatest," the Russian-born conductor attributed it to his listeners' "deep feeling of the importance and necessity of art."

For the anniversary, Dr. Koussevitzky chose four numbers that appeared on his first two programs in 1924—when he made his debut here. They were Vivaldi's Orchestral Concerto, Berlioz' Roman Carnival Overture, Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydn, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony—the latter the first symphony that he performed in this country.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

OCT 13 1938

ORCHESTRA PRESIDENT

Ernest Dane Named to Boston Symphony Position

Boston, Oct. 12—(AP)—Ernest B. Dane, one of the original trustees of the famous Boston Symphony orchestra, yesterday was elected its president, succeeding Bentley W. Warren, president since 1922, who will continue as a member of the board.

Henry B. Sawyer was reelected vice-president and Edward A. Taft was renamed clerk. Dane, who has been treasurer of the corporation since the 1919-1920 season, will continue in that office, also.

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

OCT 12 1938

Ernest B. Dane Heads Famed Boston Symphony

Boston, Oct. 12 (AP)—Ernest B. Dane, one of the original trustees of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday was elected its president, succeeding Bentley W. Warren president since 1932 who will continue as a member of the board.

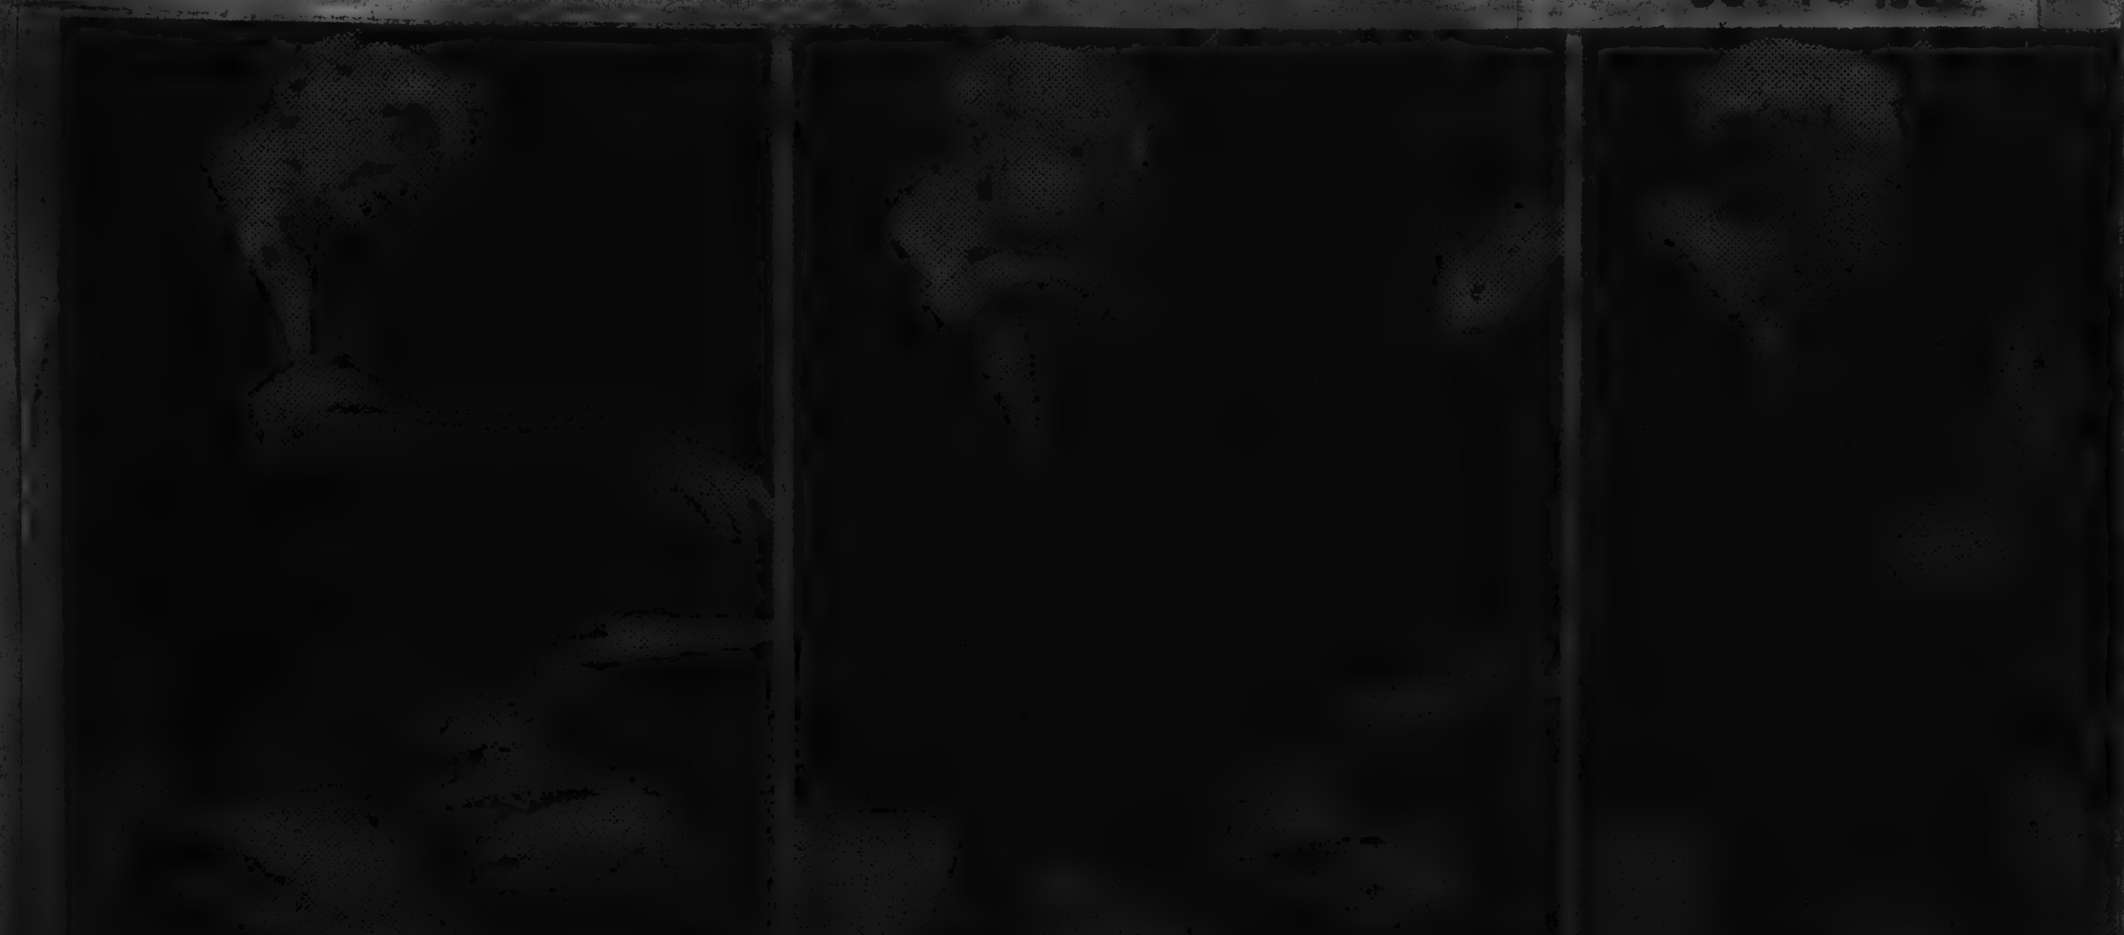
NEWPORT, R. I.
NEWS

OCT 13 1938

BOSTON, Oct. 13 (AP)—Ernest B. Dane, one of the original trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has succeeded Bentley W. Warren as its president. Warren, head of the organization since 1932, will remain a member of the board.

LAWRENCE, MASS.
EAGLE

OCT 12 1938



MAESTRO, PLEASE!—[illegible] cameraman gives you his lens impression of a well-known [illegible] orchestra conductor at work. The conductor is Dr. [illegible], who is starting his 15th consecutive year on the [illegible].

DAYTON, O.
HERALD

OCT 10 1938

NYACK, N. Y.
JOURNAL - NEWS

OCT 10 1938

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

OCT 10 1938

GADSDEN, ALA.
TIMES

OCT 13 1938

GLOVERSVILLE, N. Y.
LEADER - REPUBLICAN

OCT 11 1938

These carried the same picture as one on left.

Roulades and Cadenzas

Continued from page 90

I suggested The English Singers. He came back flabbergasted. In twenty years of concert-going in Vienna he had not heard a single Elizabethan madrigal, did not know the music of Byrd, Locke and Morley.

Undoubtedly, we get the best from everywhere. With few exceptions, the ranking musicians of Austria, Spain, England, Italy, Norway, of every country, come to us. There is not a single musician in Europe, from Land's End to Erivan, who does not want to come to America, not only because of the money he expects to flow into his pockets but because of the prestige of an American appearance.

That's a brand new idea to many of us. So long have we read about the "world famous prima donna from La Scala" and the "celebrated conductor of the Vienna Philharmonic"—that it takes a while for the notion to soak in that actually, European artists earn more money at home after they have appeared in New York. The reason is that we have selected, commanded even, the best artists (not to mention some of the worst) from over the world. And when anyone comes here and succeeds, where competition is keenest, he is thought to be doubly good.

There isn't a conductor in the whole of Europe who wouldn't give his eye teeth to conduct one of our major orchestras. That is something we have a right to be cocky about but, to keep the record straight, let's not get any inflated idea that it's the result of any innate superiority on our part. In the final analysis, it is because of our wealth. Because, geographically and economically, we are a most favored people. We enjoy a standard of living which permits such artistic riches as we incontestably do have.

It may be that we do not approach music with the same spirit of reverence and mysticism as do the Teutonic peoples, that song is not in our blood as it is in the Italians', but it is true we have acquired a genuine appreciation for the old classics and a growing sensitivity and alertness to modern music. The fact is that so many talented musicians have come here to spread the gospel and we have been such willing, eager disciples, that our conversion has been rapid and complete.

We have not been content, either, merely to borrow European culture. We have artists and a music of our own. Today, no more beautiful voices exist than those developed here in the United States. There is not a warmer, more luscious dramatic soprano in the world than Connecticut-born Rosa Ponselle's. There is not a baritone anywhere, the quality of whose voice surpasses that of Lawrence Tibbett, John Charles Thomas, Richard Bonelli, Nelson Eddy . . . all born in this country.

The fame of these singers is not local. It has spread everywhere. The largest hook-up in the history of Australian broadcasting, for example, was for Lawrence Tibbett's recent farewell concert there. And the most widely acclaimed singer in Europe today: the woman who sells out a dozen concerts in Moscow or Tiflis, who draws the most listeners, not only in New York but in Vienna, Geneva, Helsinki and Paris—who, Sibelius says, has a "heart in her throat"—is Philadelphia's Marian Anderson.

America has instrumentalists, too. The highest-paid and most popular violinist in any city of the world where he appears is California-born Yehudi Menuhin. These are the headliners, of course. And there are many other American talents about which we can be snooty. But we are so accustomed to hollering for the best, to enjoying the cream of the world's talent, that we don't take time to prepare and encourage the youngsters who are only on their way. If it were as easy and inexpensive to practice conducting as it is to sing, I am sure we would have half a dozen great American conductors. But it takes seventy or eighty men to practice conducting, whereas any of us can sing in our own bathtubs. And so it is that too many of our young conductors, when they get a chance to squeeze in and conduct, have to go on unprepared.

But the time will come when we will have conductors worthy to rank among the best, just as we may have composers worthy to rank along with some of the old boys. They will grow naturally out of our soil and our culture, and produce a music that will say something worthy of being said.

Already we have produced a music that is distinctively our own—jazz. Perhaps its values are transient, but they are real to millions of people. This summer, thousands packed concert halls and stadiums over the country to hear the music of George Gershwin. Other millions heard it broadcast. And it is not only Americans who like it. European music lovers have a higher regard for it than we have any idea. I was in London last year when Gershwin died and his death caused a much bigger stir than Ravel's some months later. Newspapers carried full-page stories of his life and work. Thousands felt a personal loss at the American composer's passing.

The tunes of Irving Berlin are loved and sung everywhere from Lapland to the Arabian Desert, and our swing music has a following abroad that is not unlike baseball's, even, in this country. All this music is our exclusive creation which no European can copy. There is no reason why we should not take an honest pride in our progress, and flaunt a few feathers in our caps over the fact that we have a musical life that for richness and variety and quality can be compared with nowhere else on the face of the globe. ###

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

OCT 12 1938

Warren Resigns as Head Of Boston Orchestra

Succeeded by Ernest B. Dane Who Also Remains Treasurer— Warren Still Member of Board

Bentley Wirt Warren, president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1932, resigned at the annual meeting of the trustees yesterday and Ernest B. Dane, one of the original trustees of the orchestra and treasurer since the season of 1919-20 was elected his successor.

Mr. Warren remains a member of the board of which he also was an original member and of which he was vice-president from 1927 to 1932. He succeeded Judge Frederick P. Cabot as president. Mr. Warren, one of the outstanding lawyers in Massachusetts is well-known in the Berkshires. He maintains a summer home in Williamstown and is senior trustee of Williams College, his alma mater. Since the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first affiliation with the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Mr. Warren has shown a keen interest in the Festival's success.

Mr. Dane, one of the outstanding business men of Boston, has long been known for his generous support and great interest in the orchestra. He too has been interested in the Festival from the start and the past summer attended most of the concerts.

Henry B. Sawyer was elected vice-president, and Edward A. Taft, clerk. Mr. Dane remains the treasurer of the corporation. The board of trustees consists of 12 members: Allison Burr, Henry B. Cabot, Ernest B. Dane, Alvan T. Fuller, Jerome D. Greene, N. Penrose Hallowell, M. A. DeWolfe Howe, Roger I. Lee, Richard C. Paine, Henry B. Sawyer, Edward A. Taft, Bentley W. Warren.

LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

OCT 8 - 1938

Music and The Drama

KOUSSEVITSKY BEGINS 15TH SEASON AS CONDUCTOR OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

BOSTON, Oct. 7-AP-Serge Koussevitzky began his 15th season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra today by departing from custom and making a brief pre-concert speech from the podium of Symphony Hall.

Asserting the musical world recognized the Boston group as "one of the greatest orchestras in the world—if not the greatest," the Russian-born conductor attributed it to his listeners' "deep feeling of the importance and necessity of art."

For the anniversary, Dr. Koussevitzky chose four numbers that appeared on his first two programs in 1924—when he made his debut here. They were Vivaldi's Orchestral Concerto, Berlioz' Roman Carnival Overture, Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydn, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony—the latter the first symphony that he performed in this country.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

OCT 13 1938

ORCHESTRA PRESIDENT

Ernest Dane Named to Boston Symphony Position

Boston, Oct. 12—(AP)—Ernest B. Dane, one of the original trustees of the famous Boston Symphony orchestra, yesterday was elected its president, succeeding Bentley W. Warren, president since 1922, who will continue as a member of the board.

Henry B. Sawyer was reelected vice-president and Edward A. Taft was renamed clerk. Dane, who has been treasurer of the corporation since the 1919-1920 season, will continue in that office, also.

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

OCT 12 1938

Ernest B. Dane Heads Famed Boston Symphony

Boston, Oct. 12 (AP)—Ernest B. Dane, one of the original trustees of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday was elected its president, succeeding Bentley W. Warren president since 1932 who will continue as a member of the board.

LAWRENCE, MASS.
EAGLE

OCT 12 1938

LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

OCT 11 1938

2

Music and

NEWS FROM THE

The supplementary series of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will again be given in pairs this season, the programs of Monday evenings being repeated on Tuesday afternoons. Dr. Koussevitsky will conduct four programs, and Georges Enesco and Igor Stravinsky one each. The soloists will be Pierre and Genia Luboshutz, who will play the Mozart Concerto for two pianos; Myra Hess and Stravinsky, who will play the piano part of one of his compositions in addition to conducting. The concerts will fall on Oct. 24-25, Dec. 26-27, Jan. 16-17, Feb. 20-21, March 20-21 and April 17-18.

AUGUSTA, ME.
KENNEBEC JOURNAL

OCT 8 - 1938

Maestro Begins 15th Season in Boston

Boston, Oct. 7—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky began his fifteenth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra today by departing from custom and making a brief pre-concert speech from the podium of Symphony Hall.

Asserting the musical world recognized the Boston group as "one of the greatest orchestra in the world—if not the greatest," the Russian-born conductor attributed it to his listeners' "deep feeling of the importance and necessity of art."

For the anniversary, Dr. Koussevitzky chose four numbers that appeared on his first two programs in 1924—when he made his debut here. They were Vivaldi's Orchestral Concerto, Berlioz' Roman Carnival Overture, Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydn, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony—the latter the first symphony that he performed in this country.

NEWPORT, R. I.
NEWS

OCT 13 1938

BOSTON, Oct. 13 (AP) —Ernest B. Dane, one of the original trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has ~~succeeded~~ Bentley W. Warren as its president. Warren, head of the organization since 1932, will remain a member of the board.

DAYTON, O.
HERALD

OCT 10 1938

NYACK, N. Y.
JOURNAL - NEWS
OCT 10 1938

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

OCT 10 1938

GADSDEN, ALA.
TIMES
OCT 13 1938

GLOVERSVILLE, N. Y.
LEADER - REPUBLICAN

OCT 11 1938

MUSIC, MAESTRO, PLEASE!—Enterprising cameraman gives you his lens impression of a well-known symphony orchestra conductor at work. The conductor is Dr. Sergei Koussevitsky, who is starting his 15th consecutive year on the Boston podium.

These carried the same picture as one on left.

LOS ANGELES, CAL.
MORNING NEWS

OCT 12 1938 76

MUSIC

By Dr. BRUNO DAVID USSHER

FEW tasks are more interesting in the study of musical recordings than to compare these tonal engravings of the same composition. A particularly fascinating opportunity has arisen with the month's issue of Mousssorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," played in the instrumentation of Lucien Caillet by the Philadelphia Symphony under Eugene Ormandy. Several years ago, the Boston Symphony under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky took the instrumentation made by Maurice Ravel before the phonograph microphone.

Both recordings bear the RCA-Victor label. And I will say at once that both are good. The preference for either will be largely just a matter of . . . preference. The general difference between the two sets is that Ravel's orchestration at times sounds richer, a little more Slavic in color, and Koussevitzky, a Russian himself no doubt has emphasized that element in his management of brasses, woodwinds and bells.

Lucien Caillet's transcription of the Moussorgsky piano pieces for the orchestra of which he is a first stand clarinetist, is nothing short of brilliant and suitably resourceful. It serves the atmosphere and pictorialism of the original pieces.

Hence the chief difference lies in the approach of the conductor and in the general qualities of two of the best orchestras in the world.

* * *

WHEREIN, then, differ the two Moussorgsky sets, apart from the fact that Ormandy fills eight sides of four discs, while Koussevitzky has his say in seven? The difference in length is unessential. Ormandy uses the first half of record five, to play a fine setting of the socalled "Promenade" theme, with which Moussorgsky has described an imaginary visitor to a picture exhibit, walking to and from paintings to view them from different angles or to compare various works by the same painter. (That painter was his distinguished friend, Arthur Hartman, in whose memory this set of pieces was composed.)

Koussevitzky's recording on the fifth side of his set starts immediately with the chattering of the Belgian greengrocer women, the last two-thirds of that side, then being devoted to the musical chapter, called "Catacombs." Ormany makes a fuller statement of "Catacombs" which in his case occupies all of the sixth face. Incidentally, there occurs in this piece a tender theme remarkably like the "Walsung Love" theme from Wagner's "Valkyrie." Moussorgsky wrote the "Pictures at an Exhibition" in 1874, and the opera had not been given. In any case, the Russian master never heard "Valkyrie," nor do I mean to imply that he is indebted to Wagner. If it comes to the question of who did the borrowing, the great Richard had no scruples in borrowing money or musical ideas from any one . . . without due acknowledgment.

* * *

I MUST confess to some prejudice when I first learned of the Ormandy-Moussorgsky set. I must confess, too, that I am quite pleasantly surprised. I presume that constantly improved recording technic is in his favor. That applies also to Lucien Caillet whose instrumentations are masterly, and at times, more in keeping with the subject than those of Ravel. I suspect the latter a little of being too much interested in being the great orchestrator which, of course, he is. Ormandy and Caillet plus the Philadelphia are attimes brilliant, where the Bostons with Koussevitzk and Ravel are magnificent. Ormandy achieves a more vivid, joyful climax in the closing "Gate of Kieff." Here Koussevitzy sounds more Russian. His bells are more Slavic. His pace swings more deliberately like the huge doors of that gate. In Koussevitzky's presentation I am reminded of the solemn gravity and power expressed in Moussorgsky's "Boris Godounow." The Ormandy ending has something of the exultation of the finale climaxing of Stravinsky's "Fire Bird," which composer in turn, is not uninfluenced here by Moussorgsky.

* * *

KOUSSEVITZKY'S interpretation often has an "earthiness" which one likes to think is a specific Moussorgsky quality. Ormandy and his collaborator are more bent on sharply drawn grimaces in "The Gnome." The Philadelphia pantomime is crisper of delineation. On the other hand, I prefer Caillet's setting of the Troubadour's song in "The Old Castle" to that of Ravel who chooses a saxophone to voice the minstrel. Caillet, unless I am mistaken, employs an English horn. (Or is it a clarinet. One cannot always be sure, with recordings, of instrumental timber.)

Again I prefer Koussevitzky's reading of "Bydle": The scene shows a lumbering, two wheeled oxcart. One can fairly see the animals plod through the loose earth of the country road, pulling heavily as the lumbering vehicle sways. The driver, a Polish peasant, sings, and Koussevitzky's horn sounds less abrupt at the end of melodic phrases than Ormandy's. The Philadelphia version lacks a bit of the feeling of simple strength and rustic confidence. In turn, he and Caillet have caught the deeply reflective sentiment of Moussorgsky in "The Catacombs." But these are rather fine differences. They are differences of personal preference rather than of perfection.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER - CITIZEN

OCT 12 1938

Friends of the Orchestra.

While the Boston Symphony will always be identified first with the city which is its musical home, increasingly year by year it has come to be regarded as a New England institution. In the course of the season it visits several New England cities and from others it draws many subscribers to the series of concerts in Boston. It provides the instrumentalists for the Pop Concerts in the early summer and has lately become the sponsor of the free concerts on the Esplanade by the Charles and also of the more ambitious development in the Berkshire Festival.

With the endowment fund at its disposal and the revenue from subscription and ticket sales it comes nearer to paying its way than most artistic organizations of the kind. According to the last report all but about 15 per cent of its outlay was taken care of by the resources cited.

For the margin above these sources of revenue needed to carry on the activities of its season it must depend on voluntary gifts from lovers of music who recognize in it a great cultural asset, the benefits of which it is desirable to distribute even more widely. That is where the members of the friends of the orchestra come into the picture. In the past season they numbered over 2000, the largest number by far of any year since the organization of the group.

The trustees hope to increase the number this season. And while, naturally, they rely mainly upon Greater Boston for contributors, one believes that, for the reasons mentioned above, they may plausibly and justifiably make a wider appeal. As they say, the most practical way by which friends and patrons of the orchestra may register their pride in the orchestra and its aims is by enrolling as Friends of the Orchestra and by their contributions great or modest, helping to maintain it.

Boston Programs.

On the program for the Boston Symphony concerts Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this week an American composition, "El Salon Mexico," by Aaron Copland will be the novelty. This is a rhapsody on Mexican popular songs named after a dance hall in Mexico City. It was played in London last year. Other items on the program will be Mozart's Divertimento in B-flat major for strings and two horns and Dvorak's Symphony No. 5, "From the New World."

MACON, GA.
TELEGRAPH

OCT 14 1938

MRS. ROY CROCKETT ADDRESSES SATURDAY MORNING MUSIC CLUB

Mrs. Roy Crockett talked on Current Events at the opening meeting of the Saturday Morning Music club held Thursday morning in the studio of Joseph Maerz at Wesleyan Conservatory.

Mrs. Crockett spoke of the events of the past summer in the musical world and told of the festivals at Bayreuth and Salzburg, Zurich and Munich in Europe and those in America.

"Salzburg had a wonderful festival with good singers and leaders, she said, "but Bayreuth was not so good. The opening address at Zurich festival was made by the grandson of Wagner, Dr. Franz Beidler who spoke on revolutionary aspects of his grandfather's operas. He advocated more new works to be given.

"At Lucerne, Switzerland another festival was held, Mrs. Crockett said fostering the idea of becoming an international festival. At this time a collection of manuscripts and other musical relics was started. Here a memorial concert was held on Aug. 25, commemorating the marriage of Richard Wagner to Cosima Bulow, arranged by Toscanini and given in the park. On the program was featured Siegfried Idyl of Wagner which was composed in celebration of the birth of his child.

Mrs. Crockett said that all over America there have been festivals and summer concerts series with the most outstanding one at Tanglewood in the Berkshires. This is the fifth summer it has been held and is the summer home of the Boston symphony. She told of the new permanent roof which has been constructed covering 5.500 seats with extended space beyond for unprotected seats.

"No negative criticism of the playing of this orchestra has been heard, she said, it was superb with Koussevitsky conducting.

The musical program in charge of Mrs. Hamilton Holt, program chairman, included the following numbers; Love and Faith and Far Away by Tirendelli, Mrs. Hamilton Holt accompanied by Mrs. Albert Jelks; piano group, Terraces in the Moonlight, Debussy, Allegretto, Jarnach, and Clog Dance, Hanson, Mrs. Jelks; O Cessate di Piagarmi, Scarletti, Se tu M'ami, Pergolesi, Miss Lucile Nelson accompanied by Mrs. Jelks.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

OCT 15 1938

..Music and Other Notes..

The 1938-1939 concert season opens auspiciously on Tuesday evening at :15 when the Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted by Sergei Koussevitsky, plays the first of its five concerts at Metropolitan Theatre. This season will be the 15th under the baton of Dr. Koussevitsky and during his leadership the orchestra has risen to great heights. The eminent conductor was given an ovation at the opening concert of the Boston series on Oct. 7. In response, he made a short speech in which he expressed the appreciation of the orchestra members to the audience for the stimulation afforded by its "deep feeling of the importance and necessity of musical art."

Tuesday's program opens with Mozart's Divertimento in B-flat major for strings and two horns. This includes Allegro, theme with six variations, Menuetto, Adagio, Menuetto II, Andante and Allegro molto.

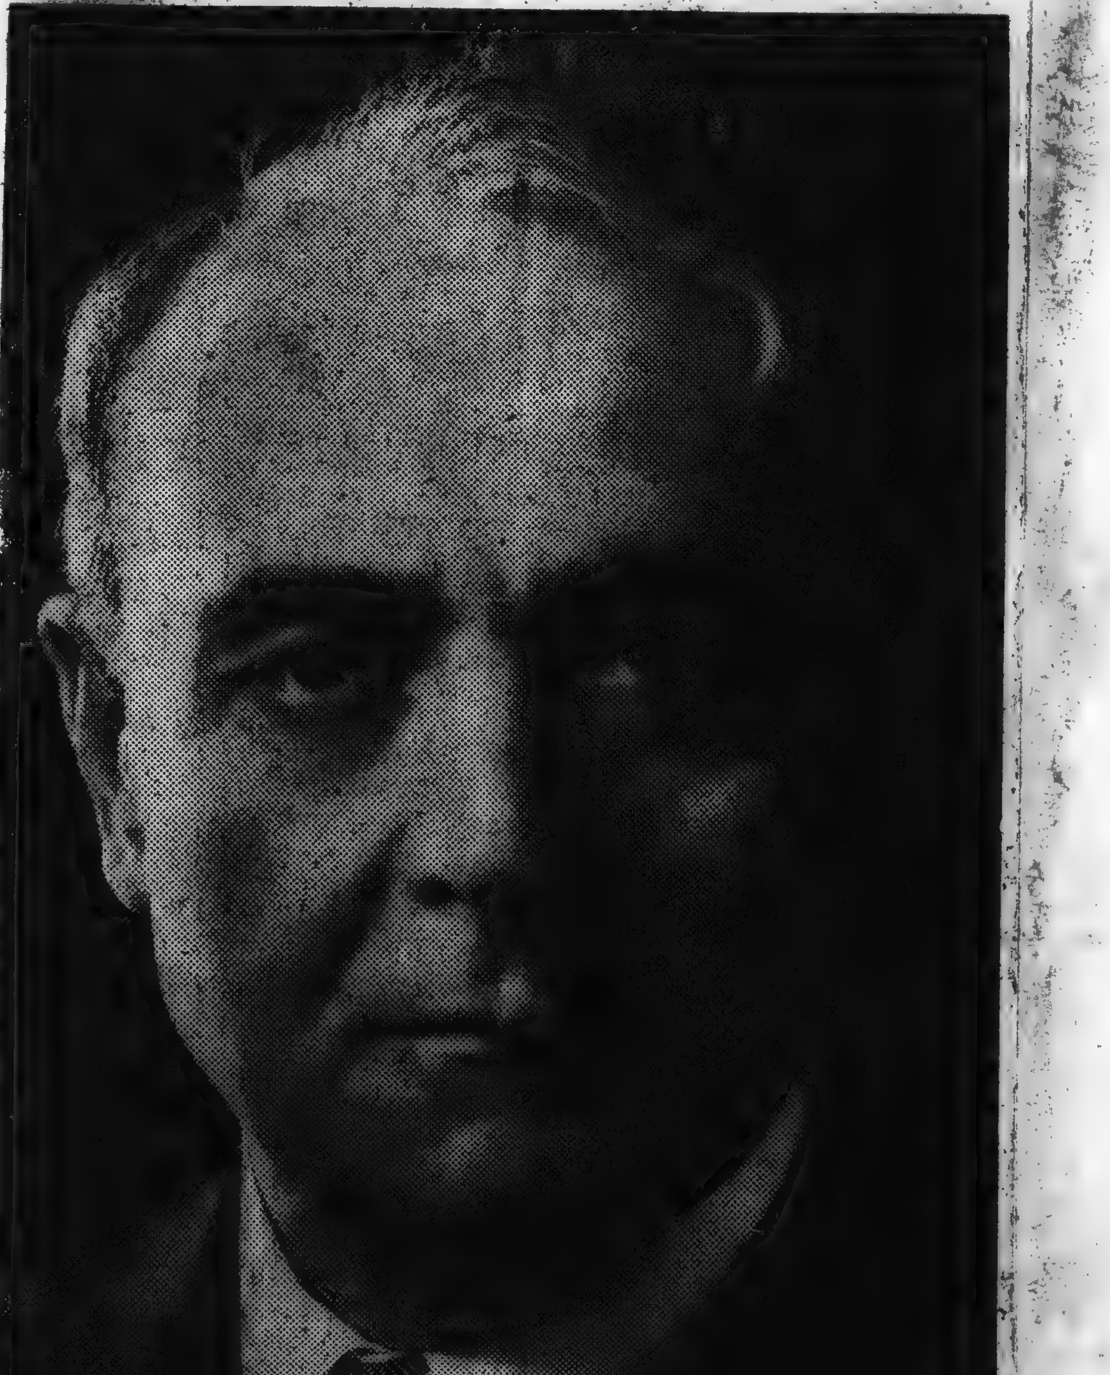
Glazounow's Symphonic Poem, op. 13, "Stenka Razin," follows. Stenka Razin was a Cossack rebel and outlaw who held forth in the 17th century. He is the hero of many Russian ballads and in the legend selected by Glazounow, the story of an incident of the devastation caused by the terrible Cossack along the banks of the Volga is depicted. He is interrupted in his cruel raids when the soldiers of the Tsar begin to defeat him. He sees that his capture is inevitable and so he makes the River Volga a present of the thing dearest in life to him, a captive Persian Princess, and hurls her into the waves. Three themes are used in the composition, the first, the well-known Volga Boat Song, the second a savage theme to portray Stenka Razin, and third, a beautiful melody for the princess.

Dvorak's Symphony No. 5, in E minor, "From the New World" Op. 95 will finish the program. This symphony written by the most famous Bohemian composer who lived from 1841 to 1904, is perhaps the most familiar in its thematic material of any of the more recent orchestral works. It was written in 1893 while Dvorak was living in United States. He was director of the National Conservatory in New York from 1892 to 1895 and spent his summer vacations in Spillville, Ia., with a group of his countrymen who had settled there. Dvorak had unusual skill in melodic invention and rhythmic designs. He was interested in folk tunes and some of his "New World" themes are said to have been inspired by Negro spirituals. He was one of the founders of the Czech national school of musical composition and his influence as a teacher has been far-reaching. His son-in-law and pupil, Josef Suk, has carried on the Czech tradition. This Symphony No. 5 has four movements: Adagio, Allegro molto, Larghetto, Scherzo, Molto Vivace and Allegro.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

OCT 15 1938

Begins 15th Season



Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its concert in Metropolitan Theatre on Tuesday night. It is his 15th season as leader.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

OCT 14 1938

Special Concerts For Commuters In Boston

Concerts a half hour late have been arranged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Boston, so that listeners may arrive early from distant points. These commuters' matinees begin Tuesday, Oct. 25, at 3 instead of 2.30 which is the regular weekly Friday concert start.

There will be six commuters' matinees, played once a month, omitting November. A season ticket for this series may be had at one-fourth the cost of the 24 Friday performances, although the Tuesday subscribers will hear the same high standard of program, played by the full strength personnel of 110 Boston Symphony musicians.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct four of the Tuesday concerts. Two distinguished guest conductors will present the remaining programs. They will be the great Russian composer and pianist, Igor Stravinsky and the famous Rumanian composer and violin virtuoso, Georges Enesco. The same programs heard on Tuesday afternoons will be played on Monday evenings, on the same reduced subscription plan .

LAWRENCE, MASS.
EAGLE

OCT 14 1938

CONCERTS WILL BE HELD FOR COMMUTERS

Concerts a half hour late have considerately been arranged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra so that listeners may arrive early from distant points. These "Commuters' Matinees" begin Tuesday, Oct. 25, at 3 o'clock, instead of 2:30, when the regular weekly Friday concerts start. There will be six Commuters' Matinees, played once a month, omitting November. Hence a season ticket for this series may be had at one-fourth the cost of the 24 Friday performances, although the Tuesday subscribers will hear the same high standard of programs, played by the full strength personnel of 110 Boston Symphony musicians.

The celebrated Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct four of the Tuesday concerts. Two very distinguished guest conductors will present the remaining programs. They will be the great Russian composer and pianist, Igor Stravinsky, and the famous Rumanian composer and violin cihtuoso, Georges Enesco. The same programs heard on Tuesday afternoons will be played on Monday evenings, on the same reduced subscription plan.

The present season is the 58th of the Boston Symphony orchestra. It is also the 15th consecutive season of Dr. Koussevitzky's conductorship—the longest, and critics declare the most brilliant and varied, record achieved by any conductor in the orchestra's history.

It is reported from Symphony Hall that the past three years have shown a decided increase in interest in symphony concerts. This is particularly true, officials say, in respect to the number of young men and women attending. They are found as subscribers to all four of the symphony series—24 programs each on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, and six each on Monday evenings and Tuesday afternoons.

MANCHESTER, N. H.
LEADER

OCT 13 1938

Boston Symphony Plans Commuters' Matinees

BOSTON, Oct. 13. — Concerts a half hour late have considerately been arranged by the Boston Symphony orchestra so that listeners may arrive early from distant points. These Commuters' Matinees begin Tuesday, October 25, at 3 o'clock, instead of 2:30, when the regular weekly Friday concerts start. There will be six Commuters' Matinees, played once a month, omitting November. Hence a season ticket for this series may be had at one fourth the cost of the 24 Friday performances, although the Tuesday subscribers will hear the same high standard of programs, played by the full strength personnel of 110 Boston Symphony musicians.

The celebrated Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct four of the Tuesday concerts. Two distinguished guest conductors will present the remaining programs. They will be the great Russian composer and pianist, Igor Stravinsky, and the famous Rumanian composer and violin virtuoso, Georges Enesco. The same programs heard on Tuesday afternoons will be played on Monday evenings, on the same reduced subscription plan.

The present season is the 58th of the Boston Symphony orchestra. It is also the 15th consecutive season of Dr. Koussevitzky's conductorship—the longest, and critics declare the most brilliant and varied, record achieved by any conductor in the orchestra's history.

It is reported from Symphony Hall that the past three years have shown a decided increase in interest in symphony concerts. This is particularly true, officials say, in respect to the number of young men and women attending. They are found as subscribers to all four of the symphony series—24 programs each on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, and six each on Monday evenings and Tuesday afternoons.

COMMUTERS' SERIES AT SYMPHONY HALL

Lawrence Eve. Tribune, Sat. Oct 22 1938

An extraordinary afternoon awaits the audience which will attend the opening of the six Commuters' Matinees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday at three o'clock.

The orchestra's world-famous leader, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, noting that Tuesday is the exact centenary of the birth of the brilliant and tragically short-lived Bizet, composer of that operatic favorite, "Carmen," will open the program with his "L'Arlesienne Suite, No. 1." In its way, this suite is as dazzlingly orchestrated and dramatically felt as "Carmen."

A noted two piano "team" will be soloists in Mozart's Concerto in E. These beautifully matched players are Pierre Luboshutz and his wife, known professionally as Genia Nemenoff. He is a graduate of the Moscow Conservatory, and she a pupil of the famous Isidor Philipp of the Paris Conservatory. They discovered their perfect adaptability to playing compositions for two pianos while engaging in private performances for the entertainment of friends.

For climax to the concert will come Beethoven's Symphony No. 5, persistently, if debatably, supposed to be built on the phrase "Thus Does Fate Knock." By many critics Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of this work is rated without superior.

Audiences at the Commuters Matinees travel a total of 60,000 miles in an afternoon, on their round trip to and from Symphony Hall. They come from every New England State.

LOWELL, MASS.
LEADER

OCT 13 1938

Concerts Late, to Get Audience Early

Concerts a half hour late have considerately been arranged by the Boston Symphony orchestra so that listeners may arrive early from distant points. These "Commuters' Matinees" begin Tuesday, Oct. 25, at 3 o'clock, instead of 2.30, when the regular weekly Friday concerts start. There will be six commuters matinees, played once a month, omitting November. Hence a season ticket for this series may be had at one-fourth the cost of the 24 Friday performances, although the Tuesday subscribers will hear the same high standard of programs, played by the full strength personnel of 110 Boston Symphony musicians.

The celebrated Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct four of the Tuesday concerts. Two very distinguished guest conductors will present the remaining programs. They will be the great Russian composer and pianist, Igor Stravinsky, and the famous Rumanian composer and violin virtuoso, Georges Enesco. The same programs heard on Tuesday afternoons will be played on Monday evenings on the same reduced subscription plan.

The present season is the 58th of the Boston Symphony orchestra. It is also the 15th consecutive season of Dr. Koussevitzky's conductorship—the longest, and critics declare the most brilliant and varied, record achieved by any conductor in the orchestra's history.

It is reported from Symphony hal lthat the past three years have shown a decided increase in interest in symphony concerts. This is particularly true, officials say, in respect to the number of young men and women attending. They are found as subscribers to all four of the symphony series—24 programs each on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, [illegible] each on Monday evenings and Tuesday afternoons.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER - CITIZEN

OCT 14 1938

Symphony to Defer Hour of Concerts

Time Set Back Half-Hour by Boston Orchestra in Endeavor to Have Audience Arrive on Time.

Concerts a half hour late have considerately been arranged by the Boston Symphony orchestra so that listeners may arrive early from distant points. These "Commuters' Matinees" begin Tuesday, Oct. 25, at 3 o'clock, instead of 2.30, when the regular weekly Friday concerts start. There will be six commuters matinees, played once a month, omitting November. Hence a season ticket for this series may be had at one-fourth the cost of the 24 Friday performances, although the Tuesday subscribers will hear the same high standard of programs, played by the full strength personnel of 110 Boston Symphony musicians.

The celebrated Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct four of the Tuesday concerts. Two very distinguished guest conductors will present the remaining programs. They will be the great Russian composer and pianist, Igor Stravinsky, and the famous Rumanian composer and violin virtuoso, Georges Enesco. The same programs heard on Tuesday afternoons will be played on Monday evenings on the same reduced subscription plan.

The present season is the 58th of the Boston Symphony orchestra. It is also the 15th consecutive season of Dr. Koussevitzky's conductorship—the longest, and critics declare the most brilliant and varied, record achieved by any conductor in the orchestra's history.

It is reported from Symphony hal lthat the past three years have shown a decided increase in interest in symphony concerts. This is particularly true, officials say, in respect to the number of young men and women attending. They are found as subscribers to all four of the symphony series—24 programs each on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, and six each on Monday evenings and Tuesday afternoons.

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

OCT 15 1938

27

CAMERA VIEWS OF THE NEWS

—International News.

Koussevitsky Conducting

Pictured for the first time conducting Boston's famed symphony orchestra is Dr. Sergei Koussevitsky, the tyrannical genius who is starting his fifteenth consecutive year on the Boston podium. In rehearsals he is known as a slave-driver if things are not just so, but he will break out into an eruption if enconium for his musicians when they give him the effect he strives for.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 16 1938

Symphony Concert and Recita Open Providence Music Seaso

Dr. Koussevitzky Begins 15th Year as Director of Boston Group

BY P. B. H.

PROVIDENCE'S new music season opens this week with programs by two of its finest and most important concert-givers—the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Providence Community Concert Association. Both take place in the Metropolitan Theatre.

The Boston Symphony, now starting its 58th season and its 15th under the leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will present at its initial Providence concert Tuesday evening at 8:30 o'clock, works by Mozart, Glazounov and Dvorak, the latter by his "New World" symphony which the orchestra is reviving after a lapse of several years.

Richard Crooks, popular tenor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, recitalist and radio artist, will be the community association's first attraction Wednesday night at 8:30. Mr. Crooks will sing arias from opera, oratorio and groups of shorter songs. Frederick Schauwecker will be his accompanist and contribute a group of solos for the piano.

Symphony Program

The program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play Tuesday evening at 8:30 o'clock at the Metropolitan Theatre, under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, follows:

Divertimento in B-flat major, for Strings and Two Horns (Koechel No. 287).... .... Mozart
"Stenka Razin," Symphonic Poem, opus 13 .... Glazounov
Symphony No. 5, in E-minor, "From the New World," opus 95......Dvorak
1. Adagio: Allegro molto
11. Larghetto
111. Scherzo; Molto vivace
IV. Allegro con fuoco

The Mozart work was written in 1777 and the first violin part was played by the composer at a concert in Munich in that year. The piece was scored for string quartet and two horns. In the coming performance the string parts will be taken by the full string orchestra. There are six movements, Allegro, Theme with Variations, Minuet, Adagio, Minuet, Andante.

Glazounov's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razin," is a descriptive piece based upon the Cossack marauder of the 17th century who pillaged the Ukraine and aroused the people to revolt against the oppressive government in such numbers that he reached the point of defying the Czar himself. When at last the rebel was captured in his barge on the Volga, he hurled his captive princess into the waters saying, "Today I shall give the mother Volga what is in my eyes the most precious of earthly treasures." The Volga Bargeman's Song is a principal motive of the score.

The employment and decoration of primitive American themes in Anton Dvorak's symphony have made it one of the best known and most liked of symphonies in this country. One of its themes has been made into a song, "Going Home" and its "tunes" in general are part of the country's hum-ology.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 16 1938

Variety of Functions Entered in Society's Engagement Book

Debutante Parties, Symphony Concerts, Weddings, Meetings, Luncheons an Dinners Listed. — Judd-Newberry Nuptials to be Held at Narragansett Friday.—Reception for Miss Mary Sayles Booker Oct. 28

By Alice E. Dyer

SOCIETY'S engagement book is gradually being filled with a variety of entertainments including debutante and pre-nuptial parties, symphony concerts, weddings, fall meetings and several luncheons, afternoon teas and dinners.

This week's social calendar presents a busy program with two evening concerts and a large society wedding. On Tuesday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will give its initial concert of the season here at the Metropolitan Theatre.

The following evening Richard Crooks, tenor, will give a concert at the Metropolitan Theatre, under the auspices of the Providence Community Concert Association.

On Friday the Judd-Newbury wedding will take place at the historic old church of St. Peter's-by-the-Sea at Narragansett, followed by a reception at the Hotel Carlton.

24

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS
OCT 16 1938

MUSIC AFIELD:

Orchestras To Spend $4,750,000

BY JOHN SELBY.

NEW YORK, Oct. 15.—The sixteen leading symphony orchestras of the country are getting ready to spend more than $4,750,000 to give their communities the music they want.

This figure does not include the budgets of the many excellent secondary orchestras. Thanks to music project efforts, there now is no city of the United States of 50,000 or better without some sort of orchestra. Many smaller cities also have them.

It does not touch the money spent on hundreds of college orchestras, nor the cost of the high school orchestras which now number in the thousands.

The total spent for symphonic music in America has been estimated as high as $40,000,000. Whatever it is, the record shows the communities like it.

Only one American city, Seattle, is reducing its symphony budget—and that is because of a peculiar local situation which may be changed with the advent of the new Seattle conductor, Dr. Nikolai Sokoloff.

Most budgets remain the same, although four cities will spend a little more this winter—Washington, Pittsburgh, Indianapolis and Rochester—which will spend more money on soloists.

Eleven of the sixteen key cities report better ticket sales than last season, when most found attendance had improved over the preceding winter. Cleveland, where a new women's organization has got into the field, reports the largest advance sale in the orchestra's history, and even Boston, where big audiences have been the rule more than fifty years, is 5 per cent ahead.

Only Philadelphia reports a decrease, and that is "slight, and not alarming," according to Alfred Reginald Allen, manager. Philadelphia is one of three cities reporting changes in the status of its conductor. Eugene Ormandy is now musical director, which means that he controls absolutely the personnel and the programs; Stokowski will appear as guest only, next spring.

In Pittsburgh Fritz Reiner becomes permanent conductor, his first similar berth since his days with the Cincinnati symphony. In Seattle Dr. Sokoloff replaces Dr. Basil Cameron, and, although Eugene Goosens remains permanent conductor in Cincinnati, he will be late arriving, and Jose Iturbi, conductor of the Rochester philharmonic, will take the first three pairs of the twenty comprising the season. Longest tenure among practicing conductors goes to Frederick Stock, now beginning his thirty-fourth season in Chicago.

Twenty men have been added to four orchestras—fewest additions being at Boston, where one more double bass will be found; most in Washington, where Hans Kindler will have ten new men. Only one orchestra has reduced personnel. This is St. Louis, where three men have resigned, and have not been replaced as yet.

Philadelphia will play the most concerts, 118. Seattle plans fewest, only thirteen. But Boston, where the symphony has not only its regular season, but a spring popular season and several weeks of free concerts out of doors, as well as a festival in the Berkshires, will do all told more than 200 concerts, a unique record in American music. More than half will be directed by the permanent conductor, Dr. George Koussevitzky.

The sixteen orchestras plan 1,315 concerts in their regular seasons. The budget total is $4,782,605. This is exactly $3,636.96 a concert. Approximately, a quarter of this is returned through ticket sales; some orchestras are lucky, and have fairly extensive endowments, or (as in Detroit) fat radio contracts.

For most orchestras, however, October is the beginning of a battle. On one side is symphonic music, which the nation demands in larger and and larger quantities. On the other is the big bad wolf—the deficit.

MUSIC

Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Return to Providence to Start Their 15th Season; Mozart and Dvorak Feature Program

Providence Journal

By G. Y. Loveridge

Oct. 19/38

The summer's siege of silence was happily raised by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his men were welcomed to Metropolitan Theatre with perhaps even more than the customary cordiality, it being the 15th season that Dr. Koussevitzky has conducted. No other conductor of the orchestra has had so long a tenure.

At a time when civilization has grown afraid to go to bed in the dark, it is reassuring to see so large a public gathering for so exalted and gentle a purpose. It does not signify that all's right with the world, but it signifies that all's not wrong. At least, not yet.

The only alarums and excursions of the evening were musical ones. A Mozart divertimento in B-flat major, for strings and two horns, and Dvorak's symphony "From the New World," in E minor, were the beginning and the end. Between them, Berlioz's overture inspired by the life of the fabulous Cellini was substituted for what had been previously announced, Glazounov's symphonic poem about the fabulous Stenka Razin.

The Mozart was magnificent. It was intended for only two violins, a viola and bass, besides the horns; so that the inclusion of the orchestra's entire string choir put the two delegates from the brass section at a handsome disadvantage. In fact, they might almost as well not have played at all.

The strings, however, were superb, in all the glory of their coloring, suppleness and precision. They spun out with faultless clarity the webs of sound that only Mozart could design. If there was any lapse at all, it was among the first violins in the adagio; and yet this movement was so beautifully uttered that many persons broke into applause, before the suite was finished. The violas were particularly fine in certain of the variations. Dr. Koussevitzky may be said to have started the season by putting the orchestra's best foot forward.

The "Roman Carnival Overture" made a startling contrast. Berlioz, as is well known, enjoys firing off everything in the arsenal, all at once, if convenient. The fragile fancies evoked by Mozart were soon scattered by the succeeding hurricane of tone. Dr. Koussevitzky commanded with great spirit, and the orchestra proceeded to give the overture an exciting and glittering performance. Brisk strings, arresting English horn, tempestuous brass—it ended like a cavalry charge.

The Dvorak symphony was the nearest the program approached to the music of this century. It was an agreeable choice, and was effectively presented. The adagio introduction was taken very slowly (Dvorak himself once expressed the desire that it be taken "as slowly as possible"); the following allegro sparkled with vitality. The transparency of orchestral tone and the balance of the choirs were admirable. Dr. Koussevitzky made the whole work seem remarkably fresh and new for a symphony that is perhaps as well known as most. The largo was absorbing with the English horn at its best, singing a tune exquisitely suited to its voice. In this movement the trombones, on occasion, might have spoken with greater unanimity. The brisk accent of the strings in the scherzo and the fiery weaving of themes in the concluding allegro brought the evening to an electric close.

Dr. Koussevitzky, applauded vigorously again and again as the program progressed, several times brought the orchestra to its feet in acknowledgement.

Quincy Ledger

Boston Symphony Series Will Open

Oct. [illegible]

Concerts a half hour late have considerately been arranged by the Boston Symphony orchestra so that listeners may arrive early from distant points. These "Commuters' Matinees" begin Tuesday, Oct. 25, at 3 o'clock, instead of 2:30 o'clock, when the regular weekly Friday concerts start. There will be six Commuters' Matinees, played once a month, omitting November.

The celebrated Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct four of the Tuesday concerts. Two distinguished guest conductors will present the remaining programs. They will be the great Russian composer and pianist, Igor Stravinsky, and the famous Rumanian composer and violin virtuoso, Georges Enesco. The same programs heard on Tuesday afternoons will be played on Monday evenings.

The present season is the 58th of the Boston Symphony orchestra. It is also the 15th consecutive season of Dr. Koussevitzky's conductorship—the longest, and critics declare the most brilliant and varied. record achieved by any conductor in the orchestra's history.

It is reported from Symphony hall that the past three years have shown a decided increase in interest in symphony concerts. This is particularly true, officials say, in respect to the number of young men and women attending. They are found as subscribers to all four of the symphony series—24 programs each on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, and six each on Monday evenings and Tuesday afternoons.

A season ticket for the Monday and Tuesday series may be had at one-fourth the cost of the 24 Friday and Saturday performances, although the subscribers will hear the same high standard of programs, played by the full strength personnel of 110 Boston Symphony musicians.

B. Her.

MUSIC

Oct. 20/38

SYMPHONY YOUTH CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The first of a series of three symphony concerts for youth was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall by an orchestra of 70 members of the Boston Symphony, conducted by Wheeler Beckett. There was a capacity audience to hear the following program:

Overture, "The Abduction from the Seraglio" .... Mozart
Symphony No. 6, "Pastoral," (first movement) .... Beethoven
Overture-Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet" .... Tchaikovsky
Cupid and Psyche from "Psyche" .. Franck
Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde" .... Wagner
Finlandia .... Sibelius

It has long been obvious to any one who thought about the matter at all that the Boston Symphony orchestra should do something in the line of musical education. The energetic group in Cambridge that sponsors a similar series on three Saturday mornings, evidently serves a special group and a somewhat younger audience, so that Mr. Beckett's project ought not to interfere with that other perfectly legitimate cause. The audience yesterday was serious and attentive, and, regardless of any special objective, this is a timely step in the right direction.

Two criticisms can be made of Mr. Beckett's approach. He appears to be a master of saying one thing and doing another. Having issued a program book in advance with the express purpose of doing with a minimum talk at the concert, he then proceeds to speak before each piece and, as in the case of Wagner, not very sensibly. Secondly, the program was too long and too diffuse, though Mr. Beckett made a not altogether plausible attempt to avoid the latter fault by linking everything under a vague idea of "love." The program had been carefully planned as to time, but sometimes a program gives an impression of length that it is wise to avoid.

The concert went off well on the whole, and the co-operation of the schools appears to have assured an ideal audience from which may grow the symphonic public of tomorrow. It will be time to discuss this interesting venture after one of the later concerts, which will take place on Wednesday afternoons, Nov. 9 and Dec. 14.

American Parade Goes On: Berezowsky to the Fore

B. Trans. Oct. 20/38

His Latest Work on Program of This Week's Symphony Concerts; Activities Elsewhere

In the third of the season's programs by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening, Serge Koussevitzky again makes place for a novel work by an American composer. Last week it was the turn of Aaron Copland. This week it is Nicolai Berezowsky, whose Toccata, Variations and Finale for orchestra and string quartet will be given first performances. The Coolidge String Quartet, of which the composer is second violinist, will be the "soloist." The rest of the program will consist of Glazounov's "Stenka Razin" and the Fourth Symphony of Brahms.

By word of the composer, the Toccata, Variations and Finale were completed last spring. In the three movements indicated by the title, the work takes about twenty-six minutes to play. The orchestra employed is more or less normal: two flutes and piccolo, two oboes, two clarinets and bass clarinet, two bassoons, two trumpets, four horns, three trombones, moderate percussion and strings—not a formidable array where modern orchestras are in question. It was the instrumentation, indeed, that presented the composer with his most difficult problem, he says. In the first place, the string quartet is an independent medium like the orchestra. In the second, the composer wished to avoid the shock induced by hearing the relatively feeble quartet of strings after an orchestral blast. For this reason he cut down to a minimum the number of independent orchestral tuttis.

* * *

The new work was indirectly inspired by the composer's membership in the Coolidge Quartet. That same group will play it with the Cleveland Orchestra under Artur Rodzinski next month and with the Philadelphia Orchestra under Eugene Ormandy four times in Philadelphia and New York in the spring. Other performances, enlisting other quartets, are in the air, according to Mr. Berezowsky.

He was kind enough to furnish to this department a summary of the new composition's musical content and treatment. It follows herewith:

> The Toccata, Variations and Finale are in no sense a concerto, for there are no extended display passages for solo instruments, nor is the solo quartet treated in the eighteenth century ripieno fashion as an alternating choir. The four voices are usually woven in the general texture of the orchestra with a certain independence of motion.
>
> Toccata—In the opening measures a lively theme is announced by the solo quartet in unison. A more melodic motive directly follows, played by the 'celli and basses. A broad sustained second theme is stated by the violas, accompanied by light figuration from the solo instruments. There is a short tutti for orchestra which leads to a sort of cadenza with a solo quartet over an organpoint. A short coda concludes the movement.
>
> Variations — The woodwinds state the theme, and six free variations follow without pause. At the end the solo quartet repeats the theme in brief conclusion.
>
> Finale—The first and second violins announce the theme allegro con fuoco over an energetic accompaniment by the orchestra. The second theme is given to the solo quartet. Development follows, and the themes appear in interplay between the solo voices and tutti. A third theme is introduced by the solo viola in lyric mood, and the other instruments embroider upon it. In the coda, the whole orchestra quickens the tempo, and the main theme is played fortissimo by the brass.

Youth Concert Series Begins Under Bekett

B. Trans.

Engrossed Audience Of Students Fills Symphony Hall

Oct. 20/38

By Moses Smith

The case for individual enterprise in the concert-hall is not yet hopeless. For a year Wheeler Beckett, conductor out of San Francisco and Richmond, Va., labored to make possible a series of symphony concerts for young people in and about Boston. Such an institution, the importance of which is taken for granted practically everywhere else in America, has languished here in recent years, almost before it had achieved much of a stature. The beginning of the realization of Mr. Beckett's plan occurred yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, where about 2500 youngsters assembled for the first of three concerts by the larger part of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Beckett to lead the way for both audience and musicians.

The program consisted of the Overture to Mozart's "Abduction from the Seraglio," the first movement of Beethoven's "Pastorale" Symphony, Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet," Franck's "Cupid and Psyche," the Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan" and "Finlandia" by Sibelius. It was a list that might have been considered heavy for an audience of young people not long ago, even though they were mostly of high-school age and music students to boot, as was the case yesterday. But if the almost exemplary behavior of this audience meant anything, the youthful patrons found pleasure in the program.

Mr. Beckett conducted the music with authority and energy. He seemed, indeed, more at home while thus engaged than while addressing himself to the audience in words. For one thing, he will have to talk more loudly if he is to be clearly heard by a large audience. For another, unless he plans to abridge his remarks even more (in conformity with the principle of distributing printed program-notes to the audience in advance of the concert), he will have to shorten his program, if he is to maintain interest throughout the concert. The over-all period of yesterday's concert went considerably beyond one hour and a half; and that would seem to be too long.

SYMPHONY PRESENTS A QUARTET

Coolidge Players Give Work With Full Orchestra

B. Post – Oct 22/38

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

That something new could happen at the Symphony Concerts, after all these years, seems unreasonable; but happen it did, at the concert of yesterday afternoon. A string quartet, the Coolidge Quartet, appeared as a collective soloist, to take part in the premiere of Nicolai Berezowsky's Toccata, Variations and Finale for String Quartet and Orchestra. For further fillip to the audience's interest Mr. Berezowsky, as second violinist of the quartet, was represented in a double capacity and received the applause both alone and with his companions.

BEAUTY OF KROLL'S TONE

Of course, the actual combining of a quartet of strings and an orchestral ensemble is not intrinsically new. It occurred constantly in the old concerto grosso, with its "ripieno" and "concertino." A string quartet is used in the slow movement of Laparra's "A Basque Sunday" for orchestra and piano, played here with the composer as a pianist in 1919, and in a later work by Martinu, to mention but two modern instances. Nevertheless, Mr. Berezowsky's approach to the problem is somewhat unusual. His quartet is not pitted against the orchestra, as in the old concerto. Rather are its voices, as Mr. Burk's notes put the matter, woven into the general texture of the orchestra. Only rarely are the four instruments heard alone; and then it is always to excellent effect.

While it would have been entirely feasible for Messrs. Burgin, Theodorowicz, Fourell and Bedetti of the orchestra to have assumed the role so capably filled yesterday by Messrs. Kroll, Berezowsky, Moldavan and Gottlieb, the presence of the latter was more than welcome, if only for the rare beauty of Mr. Kroll's tone. Here indeed, is a violinist.

Seasoned With Dissonance

In two successive concerts Dr. Koussevitzky has scored a hit with novel music. Last week Mr. Copland's "El Salon Mexico" proved both brilliant and diverting; and Mr. Berezowsky's aside from its ingenious design, its successful combining of two seemingly irreconcilable tonal bodies, is a resourceful and ingratiating composition. Like Prokofieff in the Second Violin Concerto, which delighted all and sundry last season, Mr. Berezowsky seems to have returned to the older, more urbane style of music-making, yet without being at any time trite or old-fashioned.

There is the seasoning of dissonance that we nowadays require, but it is dissonance employed with fitting restraint and there is an almost uninterrupted flow of agreeable musical ideas. With this work Dr. Koussevitsky's continued faith in his young countryman and co-exile has been finally and fully justified.

Glazounov's "Stenka Razin"

Occupying the centre of the programme Mr. Berezowsky's piece was also the centre of interest. For his first number Dr. Koussevitsky chose Glazounov's tone poem of Cossack legend, "Stenka Razin," last heard when the composer conducted it in 1930, and the concert concluded with the Fourth Symphony of Brahms. For a composer of 20, "Stenka Razin" was a remarkable achievement, and despite certain empty pages, it has withstood the ravages of time better than most of Glazounov's subsequent music. But if we are to have "Stenka Razin," why may we not also have Balakairev's "Thamar," a riper work of the same school and of somewhat similar cast which has gone too long unheard here? One may not entirely agree with B. H. Haggin in placing the Finale of the Fourth above any other movement of the Symphonies of Brahms and yet be quite willing to concede its pre-eminent position in the work it so eloquently concludes. To it Dr. Koussevitsky and the orchestra yesterday gave of their best.

B. Her. Oct. 22/38

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The third regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The soloists were the Coolidge String Quartet, consisting of William Kroll and Nicolai Berezowsky, violins, Nicolas Moldavan, viola, and Victor Gottlieb, 'cello. The program was as follows:

"Stenka Razin," Symphonic Poem Op. 13 .... Glazounov
Toccata, Variations and Finale for string quartet and orchestra, Op. 23 .... Berezowsky
Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98 .... Brahms

The combination of string quartet and full orchestra is one of the most curious and, one might imagine, far-fetched of all musical unions. It is one thing to write a concerto grosso in the manner of Handel or Bach, a form which is virtually chamber music, and quite another to contrast the most intellectual of musical organisms with the most spectacular and dramatic. The Czech composer, Bohuslâv Martinu, had such a work played here some years ago, and now Mr. Berezowsky, one of the most talented of composers at present working in America, emerges with another.

Obviously the answer to the theoretical dilemma posed above is that a composer confronted with the problem of working a quartet and an orchestra in harness is not going to write for the former as he would if it were pure chamber music that he had in mind. The reason for employing the combination in the first place is very probably practical, as so often happens in music. Mr. Berezowsky is a member of an established quartet, yet he does not want to give up composition and appear no more as conductor of or soloist with orchestras. What more practical than to kill two birds with one stone? That is at least a plausible notion of how this composition may have come about.

Another reason is that the contrast of orchestral and quartet tone, if cleverly handled, can be singularly effective. There was a point when the quartet followed hard on an orchestral climax without our being conscious of any absurdity. This is not a concerto; and the string quartet is merely a dramatic device, a prominent instrument in the statement of musical ideas.

The Toccata and the Variations are more successful and interesting than the finale. We recall that Mr. Berezowsky had some difficulty with the finale of his 3rd Symphony, played here in 1937. The Toccata, at any rate, is a fine, instrumental display. Incidentally, the emotional quality of this movement, as with the 17th century toccatas, is quite different from the fireworks of "Stenka Razin." We can not help feeling that Dr. Koussevitzky, usually so adroit a program builder, would have been wiser either to have reversed the order of these two works or to have preceded the Berezowsky with a composition of another type. The Variations are of a subtlety that needs more than one hearing to do them justice. They have an elegiac quality that is a good foil for the Toccata and the vigorous Finale. The Coolidge Quartet and the orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky did well by this, the first performance anywhere.

It is curious to observe the difference between Glazounov's still exciting tone poem and the Brahms 4th, each work having been written in 1885. On the one hand you have stunning, if not original, display of orchestral tone; on the other you find profound musical thought and an architectural beauty that is a long way from sheer tone for tone's sake. Naturally a brilliant tone poem, like "Stenka Razin," dates a little with the years. Looking back upon it we are enabled to "place it" historically, ever a rather depressing process. But to a contemporary and as the work of a man of 20 it must have appeared overpowering. Glazounov's subsequent career, however, was creatively an anti-climax.

Both "Stenka Razin" and, to us, the greatest symphony of Brahms received splendid performances, if one count out a slip in the first movement of the latter. It may be added at this point that the program, as printed, for the Monday-Tuesday concerts next week will contain this Symphony of Brahms instead of the Beethoven 5th.

B. Globe Oct 22/38

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Toccata, Variations and Finale for String Quartet and Orchestra by the young Russian-American, Nicolai Berezowsky, were played for the first time at the Boston Symphony concert yesterday afternoon. The portion for quartet was taken by the Coolidge Quartet, of which the composer is second violin, and the other three members, William Kroll, Nicolas Moldavan and Victor Gottlieb. Dr. Koussevitzky began the afternoon by conducting "Stenka Razin," the symphonic poem by Glazunov, and ended it with the Fourth Symphony of Brahms.

Bostonians have been afforded unusual opportunity to observe the development of Mr. Berezowsky, five of whose previous works have been heard here since 1931. The newest is the best of them all, in the belief of this listener. Mr. Berezowsky's ideas have become more salient, more directly and happily expressed. Gone are the unyielding dissonance, the rhythmic monotony characteristic of most post-war music written up to about five years ago. In their place is a warmer, pliant style, largely contrapuntal, in which small groups of instruments take freely flowing melodies.

The title is to be understood literally, for the work is not an orchestral concerto or concerto grosso, but a free work in what can generally be called a chamber music style. Completed last March, it is dedicated to Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, patron saint of chamber music in the United States. The Toccata, brimming with four-square melodic weaving (known technically as "figuration") typical of the form, is a little dry though interesting. Conversely, the six closely linked variations might be almost a lyrical, miniature tone poem. Most robust of all is the finale, though it makes effect with rather spare writing for large orchestra. Throughout the instrumentation is delicately colorful.

There is still not a great deal of passion in Mr. Berezowsky's music; strong accents, rhythmic variety and impetus are for the most part absent. Yet he has indubitably gained stature, both as craftsman and artist. Perhaps he does not now "speak out" as vigorously as he yet may. For that, there is precedent; Brahms was one such.

Mr. Berezowsky and his colleagues of the Coolidge Quartet played their share with notable finesse and beauty of tone. The loving care bestowed by Dr. Koussevitzky in what appeared to be a highly sensitive performance, and the collective virtuosity of the Boston Orchestra, also were influential in what was an undoubted success.

Not for eight years had "Stenka Razin" been heard at a Symphony concert, since the composer himself conducted it as guest. Its return to the active list is welcome, for in these pages the barbarous, warring Cossack relives his ancient deeds of piracy on the Volga River. Glazunov was of the "old school," and he was not a supreme creative spirit, but he had imagination and great technical skill in putting that imaginaton into music. If "Stenka Razin" is on the lush side orchestrally, it also is a rousing example of tone painting and atmospheric music. By all means, let us hear it again.

Brahms' Fourth Symphony may be too familiar to some concertgoers. But to many, this reviewer included, it is a fresh and imperishable masterpiece. Imposingly Gothic, it is also nobly Hellenic in the light it reflects, paradoxical as that may seem, and it is untouched by the sooty hand of time and the insidious germs of decay. Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of it has come to be an interpretive jewel. So, despite shortcomings on the part of a horn in the first movement and the outset of the second, it was again revealed yesterday.

C. W. D.

THE JEWISH ADVOCATE, FRIDAY, OCTOBER 21, 1938

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By JULES WOLFFERS

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Two "firsts" were heard at last week's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but if you are one of those who does not care for "modern" music, raise not your eyebrow—only one of these first performances was by a composer with the audacity to be alive; the other was by the imperishable Mozart. It so happens that Mozart's Diverimento in B-flat major, for strings and two horns, had not yet been performed by the Orchestra, probably due to the fact that the piece is, strictly speaking, scored for six performers. Again if you are one of the purists who frowns on transplanting music from the chamber to the hall you will cock an eyebrow or two. (Can one cock an eyebrow while frowning?)

Ah, these precious purists, these ivory-towered exquisites, these musical reactionaries, these anti-modernists, these point-for-point sticklers, these rigid etiquettestrians,—ah, how we love them! But please pardon this aside: it really has no place here and we were speaking of Mozart, weren't we?

This Divertimento is utterly charming. Full of invention, studded with the neatest turn of phrases imaginable, at once gay and profound, sparkling with wit yet noble withal, the piece needs the prefix "master." The interpretation and performance also were masterly. Particularly does one remember the tremendous intensity of the recitatives in the last of the six sections, recitatives conceived and performed with depth and passion.

If depth and passion was lacking in Aaron Copland's new "tourist's impression," which he calls "El Salon Mexico" after a Mexico City "hot spot," the piece, in which these qualities of course would be misplaced, is nevertheless lots of fun. Based on Mexican tunes, "El Salon" abounds with subleties of rhythm. Here and there an eerie catch floats out then is drawn back to the folk tune from which it had its genesis. The orchestration is deft and clever. The composition had at least the effect, upon this first Boston hearing, of causing me to be sure to visit "El Salon Mexico" if ever I find myself in the vicinity to sort of see for myself.

The final number on the program, Dvorak's "New World" Symphony, was magnificently done by conductor and orchestra. Dr. Koussevitzky received an ovation at the conclusion of the concert which perhaps had more than musical significance. Dvorak, it will be remembered, was born in Bohemia, dying in Prague in 1904.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 21, 1938 C

B. Trans MUSIC

Programs and Prospects For Halls of Music Here

Music by French composers will occupy Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week. The list runs: "Tombeau de Couperin" by Ravel, "Afternoon of a Faun" by Debussy, "Flemish" Rhapsody by Roussel and "Fantastic" Symphony by Berlioz.

At the first pair of supplementary symphony concerts next Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon Pierre Luboshutz and Genia Nemenoff will join hands with the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky in the performance of the Mozart Concerto for two pianos. To mark the one hundredth anniversary of Bizet's death (Oct. 25) Dr. Koussevitzky has included the First "L'Arlesienne" Suite on the program, which will end with the Beethoven Fifty Symphony.

SYMPHONY FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

First of Youth Concerts Under Beckett

B Post Oct 20/38

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Yesterday afternoon for the first time in several seasons an audience almost exclusively youthful heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra (or the greater part of it) at Symphony Hall. But whereas the young people's concerts of an earlier day were conducted by Dr. Koussevitsky, with the occasional assistance of Richard Burgin, this of yesterday, and the two that will follow it in November and December, are somewhat differently organized. Not the orchestra, but the Youth Concerts Association of Boston are sponsoring this series, and the conductor is Wheeler Beckett.

The expression "children's concerts" is attractively alliterative, but it will not apply in the present instance. Mr. Beckett, who has conducted concerts for young people in other cities, desired that his auditors here should, for the most part, come from the high schools and junior high schools. And so they did.

It was no place for tiny tots. One little sprite who sat immediately in front of this reviewer, about as reposeful and receptive as a drop of quicksilver, constituted, apparently, an unsuppressed minority of one. Again, two of the few elders present, who were so unlucky as to sit directly under the balcony, complained of a brief barrage of spitballs.

But taken as a whole this was an audience quite as attentive (seemingly more interested) and, it is probably safe to say, as musically intelligent as that which hears the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday afternoons. Many of these young people are studying music, some of them are playing in school orchestras, and the music they heard was evidently not over their heads. Only when they ran amok in the corridors during intermission did they betray their age—or lack of it.

"Love," in the broadest possible sense, was the motive that ran through Mr. Beckett's first programme. Romantic love was variously represented by Mozart's Overture to "The Elopement from the Seragalio," Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" Overture, Franck's "Cupid and Psyche" and the Prelude and Love-Death from Wagner's "Tristan." The first movement of Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony stood for love of nature and Sibelius' "Finlandia" for love of country.

There were programme notes, which were distributed to the prospective listeners ahead of time, and these were supplemented by brief comments from the podium. If Mr. Beckett did not play down to his audience in the matter of programme, neither did he condescend in his written or spoken words.

It remains only to add that Mr. Beckett, as we have already discovered, is a competent conductor, and his 75 players of yesterday served him and the music well.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
OCT 16 1938

30

CONDUCTOR OF MUSIC—AND MEN

Back in the spotlight as the new orchestral season hits its tempo—Reading clockwise: Toscanini, Koussevitzky, Barbirolli, Stokowski and Ormandy.

European and C. B. S.

The Maestro Plays on A Human Instrument

By H. HOWARD TAUBMAN

WHEN Arturo Toscanini returned to America last season to take over a new orchestra there was fear and trembling on the part of the officials of the ensemble that the maestro might disapprove arrangements that had been made for him. His temperamental explosions were a byword in the orchestral world and there was the peril that the venture would get off to a bad start.

But Signor Toscanini was a model of sweetness and light for days. Rehearsals went smoothly; the maestro was pleased with the orchestra; he liked the studio which was to be his concert hall; all seemed to be right with the world.

Then, one day, came a change. The rehearsal did not go well. The men did not respond as he wished; the composition failed to take shape as he had planned. In an outburst of anger he flung to the floor—and most effectively smashed—an expensive watch which had only recently been presented to him.

A little later the kinks in the rehearsal were smoothed out and the tempest was over. The maestro picked up the pieces of the ruined watch, looked at them ruefully and then smiled, as if to say that he knew he had been, perhaps, a bit abrupt.

That little bit of Toscaniniana indicates that conductors are—at least many of them—temperamental fellows. A new orchestral season is now getting under way; these possessors of mighty temperaments once again are gesturing airily before respectful audiences. All of which raises questions: Who is the conductor that he can get away with what, in other persons, would often be looked upon as outrageous conduct? What does he do, anyway? If the players have the music before them why can't they play it without the benefit of a well-tailored gentleman who makes occult motions at them? What is the difference between a Toscanini and any other stick waver?

The conductor's contribution can be tremendous; it can be ordinary; it can be downright detrimental. It depends on the man and on his talent and training for the task. For the conductor plays on the orchestra as on an instrument. Only this instrument is composed of human beings, and that is where the fun begins.

LET us start with the first meeting between an orchestra and a new conductor. The initial problem is for the leader to gain the respect and perhaps the friendship of the players. They may be well-disposed, curious, suspicious or playful. The conductor must win them over, whether it be through kindness, amiability or stern discipline. Many conductors have failed because they lost the first battle. There is on record, however, the story of the French composer who was guest conductor for a period and who disarmed the men by saying at the outset, "My friends, conduct me well."

Signor Toscanini established himself as the master in his first rehearsal in America when he came here to be the principal conductor at the Metropolitan Opera thirty years ago. The work in hand was "Goetterdaemmerung," and the maestro conducted from memory at the instigation of his friend, Giulio Gatti-Casazza, general manager of the Metropolitan. At an early point in the rehearsal Signor Toscanini stopped one of the men and said that he was playing an A natural where the score required a B flat. The instrumentalist pointed to his score, which showed an A natural, and said it had always been played in this way. Toscanini requested that the master score be brought out. The disputed note proved to be B flat. Toscanini had scored an important victory.

On the other hand, a certain well-known visiting conductor appeared once as guest leader of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra. The visitor sought to command discipline with an iron hand. Some of the men did not respond as he wished them to. At least two players were banned from the orchestra during his visit. Ill feeling mounted, and the result was that the Philharmonic-Symphony was below par that fortnight.

OCCASIONALLY some instrumentalists test a conductor after their own fashion. A young leader who knew his business appeared before a major ensemble some years ago and found that several woodwind players were coming in late at a certain place in the score. Then one or two of the violinists were discovered moving their bows close to their violins without making actual contact. The conductor would not go on until the woodwinds came in at the right instant and until he was satisfied that the violinists were really playing. When the playful gentlemen realized that the conductor was equal to such difficulties they attended strictly to business.

Another young conductor, making a debut with another major orchestra, was not so quick to catch the culprits before him. He did not realize that some of the men were deliberately faking. The result was that the men played lackadaisically through his appearance with the orchestra. His career as a conductor suffered a severe blow.

THE conductor, then, must have a phenomenally keen ear. The stories are legendary of Toscanini's sharpness of hearing. He has been known to stop an orchestra of more than a hundred men, when every instrument was going full blast, and single out one unfortunate who was a tiny fraction of a tone off pitch.

The conductor must know exactly what each instrument in the orchestra is capable of doing. There are constant differences of opinion between orchestra and conductor as to whether certain tone qualities or phrasings are feasible. In the resulting disputes the knowing conductor does not ask what is impossible, but he insists on what he is sure can be done. John Barbirolli, who was a 'cellist before he became a conductor, wanted a tone quality of special restraint and subtlety from the violins on one occasion, and he obtained it by ordering the violins to shorten their bows for the entire passage.

Most conductors are adept at several instruments and have learned about the others by playing in the orchestra among all instruments. There was a newcomer to the conducting ranks who had made his career originally as a pianist. When he turned to conducting he was not above learning from his men. He went so far as to take private lessons on one of the brasses from a first-desk man in the orchestra.

The great virtuoso orchestras of the present time, such as the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, the Boston Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestras, are notable especially for the brilliance and transparent quality of the ensemble tone. This has been achieved, not only because the individual players are first-rank instrumentalists, but because conductors like Toscanini, Serge Koussevitzky and Leopold Stokowski labored for years to develop unanimity, homogeneity and beauty in the total effect.

(Continued on Page 18)

CONDUCTORS OF MUSIC AND OF MEN

(Continued from Page 8)

A CONDUCTOR who brings an orchestra up to the highest level must be a tireless drillmaster. Mr. Koussevitzky was preparing his ensemble recently for a performance of Beethoven's Ninth symphony. For the statement of the main theme in the last movement, which is given early in the movement to the 'cellos, he desired a pianissimo of the finest possible fiber, and he wanted this pianissimo sustained through a long passage. He caused the 'cellos to play the passage over and over, and he did not stop until the men gave him precisely what he wanted, although some bystanders thought that the effect was impossible to obtain.

Toscanini does not relent until he feels each instrument is singing with its utmost potentialities. He was once rehearsing an orchestra in a rustic setting in the Summertime, and outside the open windows could be heard the voices of the birds. Toscanini stopped the rehearsal and told the men to listen to the birds. Then he said, "Sing! As they do!"

In the last analysis, the modern conductor stands or falls on his gifts as an interpreter. The first part of his work in bringing to life what the composer has committed to paper consists of studying the score in the privacy of his study. Signor Toscanini conducts from memory, and it is said that he knows more than 100 operas and several hundred symphonic works by heart. But he rarely fails to re-examine a score carefully before he begins preparations with the orchestra. Not only does he seek to check and double check on his memory, but he tries to discover fresh secrets in those black and white markings on the note paper.

THE greatness of a conductor lies in the accuracy with which he grasps the composer's intentions. His next task is to communicate what he feels and understands to the players and through them to the audience. A conductor like Toscanini is endlessly exacting in the quest for a true rendition of what the composer has written. He almost never makes changes in the score to suit his own whims. He believes that a Beethoven, a Mozart and a Bach knew exactly what they wanted, and the task of the conductor and his men is to realize the composer's vision in tone.

The titanic struggles that have occurred wherever Signor Toscanini has presided over an orchestra have stemmed most often from a failure of the men to give him the right nuance of tone, the correct curve of a phrase, the sustained singing quality of an instrument, the pace of a passage, the firmness of the rhythm. The years have not diminished Toscanini's intensity nor his fury when he is crossed.

Conductors vary in their methods at rehearsals. Some, like Toscanini, take nothing for granted. They rehearse every detail, whether a work is new or old to the men. Other conductors do not spend time with minor details, on the theory that the players are men of experience and can be trusted with these things. Toscanini never leaves the podium during a rehearsal, devoting every moment to the orchestra himself. Stokowski used another method. When he conducted the Philadelphia Orchestra throughout the season, he used to go and sit in the rear of the empty auditorium and request his assistant conductor to lead the men. Stokowski would make notes, suggest changes to the assistant and then occasionally take over himself. He felt that he could get the audience's perspective by standing away from the orchestra at times. Otto Klemperer resorts to this device on occasions.

Associated Press

Toscanini conducts.

THE question arises: What can the conductor do at the public performance if he has already prepared the orchestra perfectly at the rehearsal? If the conductor is a man of genius, like Toscanini, he can bring his men up to a fiery pitch. He can key them as an inspiring captain does a football team. He is there, in the first instance, to make sure that the men play as he asked them to during the rehearsal. But he can impart something of his own concentration and fervor, as Toscanini invariably does. A conductor like Stokowski or Koussevitzky manages to transmit something of his own dynamic personality to his players, and the performance goes with an electricity and passion that it did not have in rehearsal.

There are a few naive concert-goers—their number is decreasing—who judge a conductor by the grace and suavity of his gestures and his platform demeanor. Of course, no conductor's reputation was ever harmed by an attractive bearing on the podium. The truth is, however, that the beauty of design etched by a conductor's waving hands has little to do with the case. The motions a conductor makes during a performance are significant only to the players; these motions constitute the conductor's language to his men.

IT does not matter whether the conductor uses a baton or not, whether he swings his arms in wide sweeping movements as Toscanini does or crisply and in restricted arcs as Stokowski does, whether he signals with his eyes like Willem Mengelberg or with his lips like Wilhelm Furtwaengler. The essential thing is that the men understand him. Where conductor and orchestra have worked together for years, the men will understand their leader, even if his technique of gesture looks muddy to the average spectator.

Generally the right hand is used to keep time and to cue the players in, and the left controls shading and nuance. Some conductors do very little shading and nuancing during a performance. But if you happen to get a chance to watch Toscanini conduct, observe his left hand. Note its eloquence. Note how it induces the strings to bring up the tone from pianissimo to forte, and then with an imperious movement brings it down to pianissimo again. Observe how with a scooping movement of the hand he causes a horn player to mellow the tone quality, or how with an upward gesture he commands the trombones to sing out triumphantly.

The art of the conductor is subtle and profound. Men who are born with a talent for leading an orchestra must mature their gifts in the crucible of experience. Toscanini, for example, began to conduct at the age of 19. He directed small and large ensembles, in small and large cities. Now at the age of 71, he declares simply that he is still mastering his job. His conception of the conductor's task is a noble and truthful representation of the composer's ideas—the aim of all great musicians.

WORCESTER SUNDAY TELEGRAM

OCTOBER 23, 1938.

PAGE 2—SECTION THREE

Nancy Burncoat's LETTER

Commuter's Matinees

COMMUTER'S MATINEES for listeners who may arrive from distant points have been arranged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for Tuesdays, six of them through the Winter at 3 o'clock instead of 2.30 when the regular Friday concerts start. Once a month, they begin this week, but omitt the November date which conflicts with the Thanksgiving holiday. A season ticket for this series may be had at one-fourth the cost of the twenty-four Friday performances, although the Tuesday subscribers will hear the same high standard of programs, played by the full strength personnel of 110 Boston Symphony musicians.

The celebrated Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct four of the Tuesday concerts. Two very distinguished guest conductors will present the remaining programs. They will be the great Russian composer and violin virtuoso, Georges Enesco. The same programs heard on Tuesday afternoons will be played on Monday evenings, on the same reduced subscription

Sincerely yours,

Nancy Burncoat

MUSIC AND MU

Symphony Concert

Glazounov and Brahms as Foil For New Music by Berezowsky

B. Trans

By MOSES SMITH

Oct. 22/38

Such is the present standard of orchestral playing in the auditorium at the junction of Massachusetts and Huntington avenues that when a solo instrument makes a wrong entrance in a familiar work, as happened yesterday in the performance of the Brahms E minor Symphony, it is almost scandalous. The mishap was not intrinsically serious, and almost anywhere else in the world might be regarded as one of the expected incidents of the day. Because of the superlative orchestra built by Serge Koussevitzky we have come to take for granted seeming perfection at each concert. Almost nothing less will do.

An admirable performance of the opening number of yesterday's program, Glazounov's "Stenka Razin," would certainly seem to be no basis for a quarrel. But the orchestral playing at the concerts of the first two weeks of the season had been so polished that the very trace of imperfection here was disturbing, so that one almost forgot to admire the lines maintained by Dr. Koussevitzky for the work as a whole and the prevailing intensity of the musical expression.

* * *

This symphonic poem of Glazounov, which had not been played at these concerts since the late composer himself conducted it almost nine years ago, is something to wonder at, whether you like it or not. It seems incredible that it should have been completed when the composer was only twenty years old. It has its sentimental stretches, its persistent reliance on the Song of the Volga Boatmen like "Ole Man River" haunting an American musical play, and many sections where the composer works with something less than ideal economy of means. But things like these, remember, were almost the earmarks of the best musical expression of the day (1885). Brahms was not free from them. On the other side, there is in "Stenka Razin" striking musical characterization, a rich, unhackneyed harmonic vocabulary and already the manifestation of a talent for counterpoint. Over all is an intensely and genuinely Russin type of utterance—or so it seems, at least, to a concert-hall habitue in this capital of the arts.

The audience as a whole was perhaps thinking of other things. At any rate, it did not generate much enthusiasm in the form of applause after the performance. Nor did it exactly throw its collective hat in the air after the first performance of Berezowsky's Toccata, Variations and Finale or, at the end of the concert, with the reverberrations of a characteristically exciting presentation of the Brahms Symphony.

* * *

It is a little presumptuous for me to write about the quality of the presentation of the new composition by Nicolai Berezowsky, since, as second violinist of the Coolidge String Quartet, he had considerable opportunity, in rehearsal and in the actual concert, to determine how the work should be played. We may presumably take it for granted that the playing was both good on the part of a virtuouso orchestra and of a quartet making its first appearance in a Boston concert-hall. (The other members are William Kroll, Nicolas Moldavan and Victor Gottlieb.)

The composer certainly did not spare his own group in the writing. The passage-work for the solo quartet sounded difficult as well as involved. For all the composer's care in balancing quartet and orchestra, the members of the lesser group had frequent need of stout bowing-arms. That problem of balance, as Mr. Berezowsky intimated in these columns the other day, had given him considerable pause. With the customary saving qualification in the case of a first hearing, I do not see that he has solved the problem quite satisfactorily. He wished to avoid the "shock" which, in the concerto grosso of the eighteenth century, accompanied the contrast of solo strings after the passages for full orchestra. Mr. Berezowsky's solution, it is true, permitted the quartet to take part in the music-making more freely, while almost always continuing to be heard. But the orchestra, meanwhile, sounded cramped.

Throughout most of the performance and especially in the Toccata that served for first movement the composing seemed similarly inhibited. During the second movement, containing variations on a theme, the expression was freer, more natural, as if because the composer was now writing in a fashion more nearly resembling the echo style of the older concertos. Here, too, more than in the other movements, the composer remembered the music of Brahms that serves as the very butter of every player of chamber-music. (It was a pity that he did not so readily recall the music of Beethoven that serves as bread.) The last movement seemed at first hearing to accomplish best the composer's purpose. Here neither partner seemed repressed, yet the quartet continued to "sound."

The new work, departing considerably from the manner and content of other pieces by the same hand previously heard here, nevertheless emphasized Mr. Berezowsky's outstanding quality, a certain easy lyricism, especially in the writing for the strings. The three movements also emphasized, if in varying degrees, the composer's Russian origin. That fact, it seemed to me, was the healthiest manifestation of a composition which left many doubts on first acquaintance.

Offsetting the general abuse heaped upon the lowly but willing saxophone, comes warm defense in the current Victor Record Review:

> Venuti plays on the violin? Why pick on the saxophone when the clarinet figures so prominently in jazz? Did anyone ever "swing" better on the saxophone than Benny Goodman and Peewee Russell do on the clarinet? And why hold the saxophone up to ridicule and say nothing of the trombone? Did ever a saxophonist get "hotter" on his instrument than Jack Teagarden and Tommy Dorsey do on the trombone? And what about Louis Armstrong and Bunny Berigan on cornet?
>
> On the other hand, who is prepared to say that Lucien Cailliet, first saxophone of the Philadelphia Orchestra, or Rolland Tapley, first saxophone of the Boston Symphony, is less of an artist than flutists, violinists or cellists are on their instruments? Whoever has heard these great artists play the troubadour song at the castle, in Pictures from an Exhibition, by Moussorgsky-Ravel, is willing to class the saxophone among the most beautiful of musical instruments. Other convincing proof is the saxophone solos in Ravel's Bolero and Debussy's Rapsodie for saxophone, as played by one of these fine artists. It is not the instrument at all, but the way it is played, which makes it legitimate or jazz.

Musical Courier
Oct. 1/38

CONDUCTORS OF MUSIC AND OF MEN

(Continued from Page 8)

notable especially for the brilliance and transparent quality of the ensemble tone. This has been achieved, not only because the individual players are first-rank instrumentalists, but because conductors like Toscanini, Serge Koussevitzky and Leopold Stokowski labored for years to develop unanimity, homogeneity and beauty in the total effect.

A CONDUCTOR who brings an orchestra up to the highest level must be a tireless drillmaster. Mr. Koussevitzky was preparing his ensemble recently for a performance of Beethoven's Ninth symphony. For the statement of the main theme in the last movement, which is given early in the movement to the 'cellos, he desired a pianissimo of the finest possible fiber, and he wanted this pianissimo sustained through a long passage. He caused the 'cellos to play the passage over and over, and he did not stop until the men gave him precisely what he wanted, although some bystanders thought that the effect was impossible to obtain.

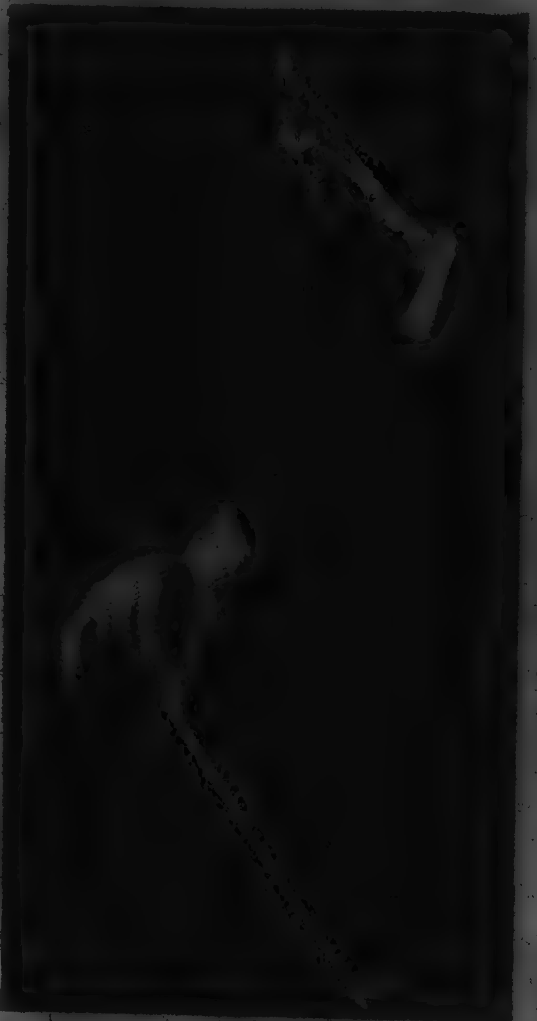
Toscanini does not relent until he feels each instrument is singing with its utmost potentialities. He was once rehearsing an orchestra in a rustic setting in the Summertime, and outside the open windows could be heard the voices of the birds. Toscanini stopped the rehearsal and told the men to listen to the birds. Then he said, "Sing! As they do!"

In the last analysis, the modern conductor stands or falls on his gifts as an interpreter. The first part of his work in bringing to life what the composer has committed to paper consists of studying the score in the privacy of his study. Signor Toscanini conducts from memory, and it is said that he knows more than 100 operas and several hundred symphonic works by heart. But he rarely fails to re-examine a score carefully before he begins preparations with the orchestra. Not only does he seek to check and double check on his memory, but he tries to discover fresh secrets in those black and white markings on the note paper.

THE greatness of a conductor lies in the accuracy with which he grasps the composer's intentions. His next task is to communicate what he feels and understands to the players and through them to the audience. A conductor like Toscanini is endlessly exacting in the quest for a true rendition of what the composer has written. He almost never makes changes in the score to suit his own whims. He believes that a Beethoven, a Mozart and a Bach knew exactly what they wanted, and the task of the conductor and his men is to realize the composer's vision in tone.

The titanic struggles that have occurred wherever Signor Toscanini has presided over an orchestra have stemmed most often from a failure of the men to give him the right nuance of tone, the correct curve of a phrase, the sustained singing quality of an instrument, the pace of a passage, the firmness of the rhythm. The years have not diminished Toscanini's intensity nor his fury when he is crossed.

Conductors vary in their methods at rehearsals. Some, like Toscanini, take nothing for granted. They rehearse every detail, whether a work is new or old to the men. Other conductors do not spend time with minor details, on the theory that the players are men of experience and can be trusted with these things. Toscanini never leaves the podium during a rehearsal, devoting every moment to the orchestra himself. Stokowski used another method. When he conducted the Philadelphia Orchestra throughout the season, he used to go and sit in the rear of the empty auditorium and request his assistant conductor to lead the men. Stokowski would make notes, suggest changes to the assistant and then occasionally take over himself. He felt that he could get the audience's perspective by standing away from the orchestra at times. Otto Klemperer resorts to this device on occasions.



Associated Press

Toscanini conducts.

THE question arises: What can the conductor do at the public performance if he has already prepared the orchestra perfectly at the rehearsal? If the conductor is a man of genius like Toscanini, he can bring his men up to a fiery pitch. He can key them as an inspiring captain does a football team. He is there, in the first instance, to make sure that the men play as he asked them to during the rehearsal. But he can impart something of his own concentration and fervor, as Toscanini invariably does. A conductor like Stokowski or Koussevitzky manages to transmit something of his own dynamic personality to his players, and the performance goes with an electricity and passion that it did not have in rehearsal.

There are a few naive concert-goers—their number is decreasing—who judge a conductor by the grace and suavity of his gestures and his platform demeanor. Of course, no conductor's reputation was ever harmed by an attractive bearing on the podium. The truth is, however, that the beauty of design etched by a conductor's waving hands has little to do with the case. The motions a conductor makes during a performance are significant only to the players; these motions constitute the conductor's language to his men.

IT does not matter whether the conductor uses a baton or not, whether he swings his arms in wide sweeping movements as Toscanini does or crisply and in restricted arcs as Stokowski does, whether he signals with his eyes like Willem Mengelberg or with his lips like Wilhelm Furtwaengler. The essential thing is that the men understand him. Where conductor and orchestra have worked together for years, the men will understand their leader, even if his technique of gesture looks muddy to the average spectator.

Generally the right hand is used to keep time and to cue the players in, and the left controls shading and nuance. Some conductors do very little shading and nuancing during a performance. But if you happen to get a chance to watch Toscanini conduct, observe his left hand. Note its eloquence. Note how it induces the strings to bring up the tone from pianissimo to forte, and then with an imperious movement brings it down to pianissimo again. Observe how with a scooping movement of the hand he causes a horn player to mellow the tone quality, or how with an upward gesture he commands the trombones to sing out triumphantly.

The art of the conductor is subtle and profound. Men who are born with a talent for leading an orchestra must mature their gifts in the crucible of experience. Toscanini, for example, began to conduct at the age of 19. He directed small and large ensembles, in small and large cities. Now at the age of 71, he declares simply that he is still mastering his job. His conception of the conductor's task is a noble and truthful representation of the composer's ideas—the aim of all great musicians.

WORCESTER SUNDAY TELEGRAM

OCTOBER 23, 1938.

PAGE 2—SECTION THREE

Nancy Burncoat's LETTER

Commuter's Matinees

COMMUTER'S MATINEES for listeners who may arrive from distant points have been arranged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for Tuesdays, six of them through the Winter at 3 o'clock instead of 2.30 when the regular Friday concerts start. Once a month, they begin this week, but omitt the November date which conflicts with the Thanksgiving holiday. A season ticket for this series may be had at one-fourth the cost of the twenty-four Friday performances, although the Tuesday subscribers will hear the same high standard of programs, played by the full strength personnel of 110 Boston Symphony musicians.

The celebrated Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct four of the Tuesday concerts. Two very distinguished guest conductors will present the remaining programs. They will be the great Russian composer and violin virtuoso, Georges Enesco. The same programs heard on Tuesday afternoons will be played on Monday evenings, on the same reduced subscription.

Sincerely yours,

Nancy Burncoat

MUSIC AND MU

Symphony Concert

Glazounov and Brahms as Foil For New Music by Berezowsky

B. Trans By MOSES SMITH Oct. 22/38

Such is the present standard of orchestral playing in the auditorium at the junction of Massachusetts and Huntington avenues that when a solo instrument makes a wrong entrance in a familiar work, as happened yesterday in the performance of the Brahms E minor Symphony, it is almost scandalous. The mishap was not intrinsically serious, and almost anywhere else in the world might be regarded as one of the expected incidents of the day. Because of the superlative orchestra built by Serge Koussevitzky we have come to take for granted seeming perfection at each concert. Almost nothing less will do.

An admirable performance of the opening number of yesterday's program, Glazounov's "Stenka Razin," would certainly seem to be no basis for a quarrel. But the orchestral playing at the concerts of the first two weeks of the season had been so polished that the very trace of imperfection here was disturbing, so that one almost forgot to admire the lines maintained by Dr. Koussevitzky for the work as a whole and the prevailing intensity of the musical expression.

* * *

This symphonic poem of Glazounov, which had not been played at these concerts since the late composer himself conducted it almost nine years ago, is something to wonder at, whether you like it or not. It seems incredible that it should have been completed when the composer was only twenty years old. It has its sentimental stretches, its persistent reliance on the Song of the Volga Boatmen like "Ole Man River" haunting an American musical play, and many sections where the composer works with something less than ideal economy of means. But things like these, remember, were almost the earmarks of the best musical expression of the day (1885). Brahms was not free from them. On the other side, there is in "Stenka Razin" striking musical characterization, a rich, unhackneyed harmonic vocabulary and already the manifestation of a talent for counterpoint. Over all is an intensely and genuinely Russin type of utterance—or so it seems, at least, to a concert-hall habitue in this capital of the arts.

The audience as a whole was perhaps thinking of other things. At any rate, it did not generate much enthusiasm in the form of applause after the performance. Nor did it exactly throw its collective hat in the air after the first performance of Berezowsky's Toccata, Variations and Finale or, at the end of the concert, with the reverberrations of a characteristically exciting presentation of the Brahms Symphony.

* * *

It is a little presumptuous for me to write about the quality of the presentation of the new composition by Nicolai Berezowsky, since, as second violinist of the Coolidge String Quartet, he had considerable opportunity, in rehearsal and in the actual concert, to determine how the work should be played. We may presumably take it for granted that the playing was both good on the part of a virtuouso orchestra and of a quartet making its first appearance in a Boston concert-hall. (The other members are William Kroll, Nicolas Moldavan and Victor Gottlieb.)

The composer certainly did not spare his own group in the writing. The passage-work for the solo quartet sounded difficult as well as involved. For all the composer's care in balancing quartet and orchestra, the members of the lesser group had frequent need of stout bowing-arms. That problem of balance, as Mr. Berezowsky intimated in these columns the other day, had given him considerable pause. With the customary saving qualification in the case of a first hearing, I do not see that he has solved the problem quite satisfactorily. He wished to avoid the "shock" which, in the concerto grosso of the eighteenth century, accompanied the contrast of solo strings after the passages for full orchestra. Mr. Berezowsky's solution, it is true, permitted the quartet to take part in the music-making more freely, while almost always continuing to be heard. But the orchestra, meanwhile, sounded cramped.

Throughout most of the performance and especially in the Toccata that served for first movement the composing seemed similarly inhibited. During the second movement, containing variations on a theme, the expression was freer, more natural, as if because the composer was now writing in a fashion more nearly resembling the echo style of the older concertos. Here, too, more than in the other movements, the composer remembered the music of Brahms that serves as the very butter of every player of chamber-music. (It was a pity that he did not so readily recall the music of Beethoven that serves as bread.) The last movement seemed at first hearing to accomplish best the composer's purpose. Here neither partner seemed repressed, yet the quartet continued to "sound."

The new work, departing considerably from the manner and content of other pieces by the same hand previously heard here, nevertheless emphasized Mr. Berezowsky's outstanding quality, a certain easy lyricism, especially in the writing for the strings. The three movements also emphasized, if in varying degrees, the composer's Russian origin. That fact, it seemed to me, was the healthiest manifestation of a composition which left many doubts on first acquaintance.

Offsetting the general abuse heaped upon the lowly but willing saxophone, comes warm defense in the current Victor Record Review:

Venuti plays on the violin? Why pick on the saxophone when the clarinet figures so prominently in jazz? Did anyone ever "swing" better on the saxophone than Benny Goodman and Peewee Russell do on the clarinet? And why hold the saxophone up to ridicule and say nothing of the trombone? Did ever a saxophonist get "hotter" on his instrument than Jack Teagarden and Tommy Dorsey do on the trombone? And what about Louis Armstrong and Bunny Berigan on cornet?

Musical Courier
Oct. 1/38

On the other hand, who is prepared to say that Lucien Cailliet, first saxophone of the Philadelphia Orchestra, or Rolland Tapley, first saxophone of the Boston Symphony, is less of an artist than flutists, violinists or cellists are on their instruments? Whoever has heard these great artists play the troubadour song at the castle, in Pictures from an Exhibition, by Moussorgsky-Ravel, is willing to class the saxophone among the most beautiful of musical instruments. Other convincing proof is the saxophone solos in Ravel's Bolero and Debussy's Rapsodie for saxophone, as played by one of these fine artists. It is not the instrument at all, but the way it is played, which makes it legitimate or jazz.

3/

NOVELTIES FROM MANY LANDS AT VENICE FESTIVAL

By RAYMOND HALL

VENICE.

OF the fifteen novelties launched at Venice three were by composers who wrote them expressly for the festival: Bohuslav Martinu (Czechoslovakia), Jacques Ibert (France) and Josip Slavenski (Yugoslavia). Of these Martinu's "Three Ricercari" for chamber orchestra (fifteen instruments) stood many cubits above the others and proved one of the few revelations of the year.

Martinu himself explains that the ricercare form is evoked only as an historical memory. He has not aimed to follow the architecture of this ancient form. Rather, he says, he has written a sort of polyphonic fantasia without subjecting himself to the rigid laws of pure polyphony. The first and third parts of this triptych are rapid movements; the second slow.

From the opening bars of the first piece one is struck by its exuberant vitality. Without scholasticism but with rigorous logic and extreme concision it propels itself by its own expansive force in a fresh and sweeping jet. The second is engaging for contrast, color and personal style. The third resumes the tense dynamism of the first and sustains its brio to the end. These two especially have solidity, clarity, brilliance, inventive opulence. The work received an ovation at the close in spite of the composer's Czech nationality.

* * *

Jacques Ibert is a popular figure in Italian modern music circles for the charm of his personality and the affinities of his lucid Latin spirit. As director of the French Academy at Villa Medici he has organized valuable artistic and intellectual exchanges which have made him in effect France's only ambassador to Rome. His capriccio for ten instruments in contrapuntal style confirms the qualities of his personality and race—taste, balance, sobriety, elegance, wit. It was deservingly well applauded.

* * *

This is the first year that Yugoslavia has been invited to the Venice festival. In fact, there was little concern here with contemporary music in that country until of late, though a Croat scored high in a Florentine fest some years ago. Josip Slavenski (Tchakovetz, 1896) studied with modernists of Budapest, Prague, Paris and is rated an advance-guardsman. His voluminous production has often used Balkan lore and includes Theremin music. Koussevitzky, Kleiber and others have conducted symphonic works of his.

Slavenski's Venetian offering is abeled "Music for Chamber Orchesra." Of its three brief movements, he first carries simple folk phrases n a ritmo ostinato. In the second delicate nostalgic theme in the nuted strings is underscored by anther obstinate figure. In the third he instruments embroider on an riental melody for oboe. All told, eat but inconsequential stuff. Slaenski bowed to scant applauses nd several hisses.

* * *

An important semi-novelty was indemith's "Nobilissima Visione" the new suite version given here r the first time anywhere (under his own baton). The suite has been laid out in five movements: Meditation, Rondo, March, Pastorale, Passacaglia.

Apart from the surprise of the religious subject, what most impressed Venetian listeners was the undisguised lyric urge few had suspected in the German modernist. In the Franciscan vision we are, for the most part, far from the rhythmic, harmonic and timbric rawness of earlier works. We are equally far from folk lyricism in structural function, as also from self-sufficient neo-classicism. Contrapuntal and sonorous values still remain the basis of the Hindemithian esthetique, but they are here subjugated, and one may say sublimated, to a contemplative and expressive spiritual plane.

Stylistically, too, a further clarification is visible, beyond a mere return to the tonal principle. Not otherwise can one explain the emotion aroused by an impeccable transparency of form and texture. The technical tours de force we expect from the German magician are here distilled with finer economy and subtlety. But its chief miracle is the new, authentic poetry, even the mystic fervor, attained at climactic points, as in the exquisite pastorale or in the Bachian passacaglia. Fully autonomous in suite form, the "Most Noble Vision" is without doubt a salient modern work (perhaps a turning point for Hindemith), in the originality, the wealth, the balance of its fused human and musical content. Both it and the composer-conductor were duly acclaimed.

* * *

A few words as to the other foreign offerings. Still in the modern German field we had the Second string quartet of Wolfgang Fortner (Leipzig, 1907), prolific writer and conductor of the Heidelberg Kammerrorchester. He has planted his banner under the Bach oak and aims to renew traditional forms with modern means. This quartet was first heard at Frankfurt last March. There is no denying Fortner's mastery of form and medium, as in the close-knit opening Allegro, the classic Aria or the robust double fugue finale, but one fails to discern in it a creative personality capable of vital transformations. However, he is vastly superior to Edmund von Borck, last year's young German guest here.

Francis Poulenc's recent song cycle, "Tel Jour, Telle Nuit," on nine poems of Paul Eluard, for tenor and piano, is a string of pearls of fastidious facture, in which the French modernist has created contrasting lyric or dramatic pictures of originality. Most suggestive, to my mind, are the first and second, for their archaic, fabulous tone; the fourth and fifth, for their sweep and synthesis; the sixth ("Une Herbe Pauvre"), a veritable jewel in its chaste line and tender lyricism; the ninth, of penetrating charm. Pierre Bernac, tenor, and the composer at the piano, were warmly applauded.

The third French contribution, Honegger's orchestral Nocturne, here conducted by himself, aroused mixed reactions with the insistent ironic or jazz touches of its central episodes, but in its subtle opening and close evoking the perfumed hush of a magic, sylvan night, wove a spell of enchantment on its Venetion hearers. William Walton also conducted his now familiar viola concerto (Frederick Riddle, soloist), new to Italy and admired for its solidity, able solo treatment and contemplative content.

* * *

The remaining foreign items were on a distinctly lower level: A substantial but academic and derivative second string quartet by the Rumanian, Stan Golestan; a clear, fluid but superficial Sonatina for clarinet and piano by the Pole, Antoni Szalowski (Warsaw, 1907); an arid chamber cantata for soprano and instruments by the Swiss, Conrad Beck (Schaffhausen, 1901); a futile sonata for two pianos by the Dutchman, Willem Pijper; some appallingly banal piano pieces by two Japanese amateurs, Bunya Koh and Akira Ifukube.

Extra Symphony Series Begins

Remembering that Georges Bizet was born one hundred years ago today, Serge Koussevitzky set the First "L'Arlesienne" Suite at the beginning of the opening program of the extra series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The composer of "Carmen," who had a great future ahead of him when he was cut off shortly after the production of his masterpiece, also had something of a past, as this Suite clearly indicates. Not even its persistent reiteration has completely dulled its edges. And when the music is presented as it was at last night's concert (repeated this afternoon), re-animated by Dr. Koussevitzky and played with surpassing brilliance and beauty of tone by his orchestra, the music has power as well as charm.

For middle number of a program that ended with the Brahms Fourth Symphony there was the occasionally heard Concerto of Mozart for two pianos and orchestra. The soloists were a remarkably matched pair of pianists, Pierre Luboshutz and Genia Nemenoff. They played with bravura but also with sentiment; with polish but also with flexibility. The accompaniment under Dr. Koussevitzky was in the same vein. With no attempt to read into the music what was not there, the performers brought off a presentation that was almost perfect in its blending of sensibility, aristocracy and virtuosity. M. S.

B. Trans. Oct. 24/38

HONOR MEMORY OF COMPOSER

Symphony Orchestra in Tribute to Bizet

B. Post. Oct. 25/38

Georges Bizet, whose "Carmen" made him the most brilliant figure in the annals of French opera, was born 100 years ago today. Of this fact, Dr. Koussevitzky has taken cognizance by placing at the head of the programme of last night's and this afternoon's "supplementary" symphony concerts, Bizet's second best work, the incidental music to Daudet's play, "L'Arlesienne"—or rather the first of the two orchestral suites later drawn from that music.

Like the Peer Gynt Suite of Grieg, this "L'Arlesienne" No. 1 used to appear with some regularity on the programmes of the regular symphony concerts. But the Frenchman's suite and that of the Norwegian were relegated to the "Pops," some time ago, or at best to the concerts of the extra series. It is a far cry from the first performance of the "L'Arlesienne" music, with a none-too-expert theatre orchestra, to the tonal glorification, last evening, accorded the Prelude, Minuet, Adagietto and Carillon that make the First Suite.

Now that the Monday and Tuesday concerts have been combined, the subscribers to the latter are faring considerably better in the matter of soloists. There were two, last evening, as there will be today, though their talents were merged in a single performance, that of Mozart's Concerto for Two Pianofortes in E-flat major. These paired-pianists, making their first appearances, not only in Symphony Hall but in Boston, are Pierre Luboshuts and Genia Nemenoff, in private life, Mr. and Mrs. Luboshuts. The first demand made upon duo-pianists, whether heard with or without orchestra, is that they achieve unanimity of thought and utterance, and this requirement Mr. and Mrs. Luboshutz met, last evening. It might be complained, however, that while conveying the grace of Mozart's music, they missed a little of its sparkle, an element abundantly supplied by the orchestra.

By way of conclusion, Dr. Koussevitzky offered the Fourth Symphony of Brahms, so superbly set forth by him and his orchestra at the concerts of last Friday and Saturday. On the part of the audience, enthusiasm ran high, whether the object of the applause happened to be the soloists, the suite or the symphony.

Nemenoff and Luboshutz Piano Duo To Play at Two Symphony Concerts

B. Globe - Oct. 24/

GENIA NEMENOFF AND PIERRE LUBOSHUTZ

Genia Nemenoff and Pierre Luboshutz, piano duo, will make their first appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concerts in Symphony Hall tonight at 8:15 and tomorrow afternoon at 3. They will be soloists in Mozart's E-flat Concerto for two pianos. The program for these first concerts of the orchestra's supplementary series will include Bizet's first "L'Arlesienne" Suite and the Fourth Symphony of Brahms. The music of Bizet will be performed in observance of his 100th birthday, which falls tomorrow. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct.

In private life Mme. Nemenoff is Mrs. Pierre Luboshutz. Both artists are of Russian ancestry. Mr. Luboshutz studied at Moscow, Mme. Nemenoff with Isidor Phillipp at the Paris Conservatoire.

Berezowsky Applauded At Symphony

By Ruth Marsters

Music Editor

B. Her. Oct. 23/38

DURING the last few years Boston Symphony audiences have learned to anticipate "the latest Berezowsky" with increasing curiosity,—the sort of curiosity most usually directed on the "something new under the sun."

The Toccata, Variations and Finale for String Quartet and Orchestra, given its first performance under Serge Koussevitzky's direction at the concerts this week-end, served as further proof of yet another aspect of the case. Namely that of Berezowsky's ability to hold the interest attracted through his originality by the really fine quality of his creative gift.

The composer was present as violinist in the Coolidge String Quartet, which assisted in the performance of the work and was received well, though perhaps not as well as he deserved.

The program was an exceptionally fine one from beginning to end, Glazounov's Symphonic Poem, "Stenke Razin," generously filling the first position with color and drama; Brahms' Fourth Symphony being the sufficiently climactic close.

The subsidiary series of Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon concerts opens this week with Pierre Luboshutz and Genia Nemenoff appearing as soloists in the performance of Mozart's Concerto for Two Pianofortes in E flat

---

B. Trans. MUSIC Oct. 24/38

Second Guess on New Work Of Nicolai Berezowsky

By Moses Smith

There are many ways, mostly euphemisms, of naming a type of curious and usually inexplicable mental confusion with which we are all familiar. The raciest and perhaps the best is "brainstorm." It must have been that phenomenon which accounted for the account, in these columns on Saturday, of the new Toccata, Variations and Finale by Nicolai Berezowsky which received first performance from the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky on the preceding day.

A second hearing on Saturday evening produced on the present writer a considerably different set of impressions from those which he had previously reported. There had been mention, for example, of the Brahmsian cast of some of the music in the second movement. As a matter of fact, as Saturday's re-hearing disclosed, the recollection of Brahms was most obvious in the thematic material near the beginning of the third movement, as if the composer had suddenly had urgent need to "express," say, the Piano Quintet or the C minor Trio.

The slow movement, indeed, was more in the vein of post-Straussian atmospherism. In that vein Berezowsky did a good job, even though the frequent insistence on a single mood tended to become, as the Germans say, "langweilig." And there was more to the first movement than previously indicated here. Toward the end of the movement the composer had sufficiently freed himself from certain inhibitions to permit the orchestra to sound out boldly; and the result was among the most invigorating pages of the new work.

For the present writer, though, the last movement remained the most successful, even if it did not have the most stimulating material and even if the composer is himself said to have considered it the weakest. The performance of the entire work, and particularly of the difficult beginning, seemed even better on Saturday evening than it had been at the matinee concert. And such was assuredly true of the brilliant performance of Glazounov's "Stenka Razin" which opened the program.

Whether the Brahms E minor Symphony at the end went better cannot be vouchsafed by this writer, who hied himself to the nearest available radio set (and a bad one) to hear Strauss' "Don Quixote" as played by the NBC Symphony Orchestra under Arturo Toscanini. Not even static and related phenomena could conceal the beauty of the performance and the wonderful 'cello playing of Emanuel Feuermann. Here was further reminder of the neglect of a masterful performer in Boston, where these many years Feuermann's only public appearance has been at the sold-out Boston Morning Musicales.

News of the Day

At the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall this evening and tomorrow afternoon the Fourth Symphony of Brahms will be substituted for the previously announced Fifth Symphony of Beethoven.

The Africaine Singers, under the direction of Henry Gideon, will give a concert in Brown Hall on Thursday evening of this week. The program will consist of a condensed concert version of the Gilbert and Sullivan "Iolanthe"; choral works from several hands, and a group of arranged Negro spirituals. The concert will be the first public appearance of the group for a general audience, though it has appeared on numerous occasions before special groups hereabout in several years. Walter Rober and Ina Braithwaite will be the accompanists.

N. Y. Tribune - Oct 23/38

THE ORCHESTRAS

JOHN BARBIROLLI will conduct the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra in the first concert of its "odd" Sunday afternoon series at Carnegie Hall today at 3 o'clock. The program, already played last Thursday and Friday, includes Weber's overture to "Der Freischütz," Sibelius's tone-poems, "Swan of Tuonela" and "Return of Lemminkainen," Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird" Suite, a Mozart adagio and fugue for strings and Beethoven's fifth symphony. This concert will also mark the opening of the season for the Philharmonic's radio listeners.

In the opening concerts of the "even" Thursday evening and Friday afternoon concerts at Carnegie Hall this week, October 27 and 28, the Brazilian pianist Guiomar Novaes will be the soloist in Beethoven's fourth concerto, in G major. Handel's concerto grosso in D minor, Op. 6, No. 10, and Brahms's second symphony complete the program. Next Sunday afternoon, October 30, in the first concert of the "even" Sunday series, Mme. Novaes will play Chopin's second concerto, in F minor. Mr. Barbirolli will repeat the Brahms symphony, and also offer Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" and Charles Tomlinson Griffes's "The White Peacock."

The orchestra, under Mr. Barbirolli, will give its first out of town concert of the season next Saturday night at Princeton, N. J. The program will be the same as the one scheduled for this afternoon, except that excerpts from Wagner's "Die "Meistersinger" will be heard instead of the Stravinsky suite. Mr. Barbirolli will give the first talk in the Philharmonic-Symphony League's lecture series Tuesday night, November 1, in the Barbizon-Plaza, discussing the conductor's role and its history. In the Philharmonic-Symphony concerts of Thursday night and Friday afternoon, November 3 and 4, the soloist will be Robert Viroval, eighteen-year-old Hungarian violinist, making his first New York appearances.

In the second concert of the Federal Music Project's Beethoven series tonight at the Federal Music Theater, 254 West Fifty-fourth Street, Jacques Gordon will conduct the Federal Symphony Orchestra, with James Friskin as soloist in the piano concerto in C minor. Frank St. Leger will conduct the New York Civic Orchestra in this afternoon's concert at 1:30, with Schumann's symphony in C as the principal number of the program. Hilda Ohlin, soprano, will be the soloist. Herman Neuman, musical director of Station WNYC, will conduct the Greenwich Orchestra next Thursday evening, when Sigismond Stojowski will be the soloist in his own Symphonic Rhapsody for piano and orchestra.

Boston, Cleveland and Chicago

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will celebrate the hundredth anniversary of Georges Bizet's birth next Tuesday by including his first suite from "L'Arlésienne" in their afternoon program at Symphony Hall. In the regular Boston Friday afternoon and Saturday night concerts this week a French program will be played including Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," Albert Roussel's "Rapsodie Flamande" and Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony.

Artur Rodzinski's program for the Cleveland Orchestra's third pair of concerts, next Thursday and Saturday nights, includes two Czech works, Smetana's "Vltava" and Dvorak's now seldom heard fourth symphony; Frederick Converse's "American Sketches," composed in 1929, and "Perpetual Motion," by an Austrian composer, Max Schönherr.

The Cleveland Orchestra will give the first of five "twilight concerts" under its associate conductor, Rudolph Ringwall, on Sunday, November 6, from 5 to 6 o'clock. This series proved popular last winter and spring, when it was reinstated after several seasons' lapse. The Monte Carlo Ballet Russe will dance with the Cleveland Orchestra on December 3, 4 and 5. On December 15 and 17, Joseph Szigeti will be the soloist with this orchestra in the first public performances of Ernest Bloch's violin concerto. This also may be played by Mr. Szigeti in New York later in the season. Mr. Bloch began the work in 1935 and finished it last January.

Frederick A. Stock's program for the Chicago Symphony Orchestra's third regular pair of concerts next Thursday night and Friday afternoon includes three novelties, Reznicek's "Overture to a Comedy," an Allegro Symphonique by the Belgian composer Marcel Poot and Kurt Attenberg's Ballade and Passacaglia on a Theme from a Swedish Folksong. Tchaikovsky's second symphony will follow.

Season's Openings

The National Symphony Orchestra of Washington will open its eighth season under Hans Kindler's direction next Sunday afternoon in Constitution Hall. American works to be heard for the first time include a symphony by Roy Harris, a piano concerto by Paul Nordhoff, "Miniatures" by Isadore Freed and "Seven Visions" by La Salle Spier, of Washington. Ernest Schelling's "Suite Variee" is to have its American premiere next January under the composer's direction; "Scenes of Povery and Toil" by Robert Sanders, of Chicago; a work for quartet and orchestra by Marcel Poot, to be played in March with the Pro Arte Quartet as assisting artists, Dr. Kindler's arrangement of part of Handel's fifth concerto grosso and Bizet's early symphony in C complete the list of Washington novelties.

The fifty-ninth season of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra, and its eighth under Vladimir Golschmann's leadership, begins next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening with Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," Ravel's "La Valse," Weber's overture to "Oberon" and the Brahms first symphony. Soloists for the season include Sergei Rachmaninoff, Myra Hess, Artur Rubinstein, pianists; Fritz Kreisler and Jascha Heifetz, violinists; Lotte Lehmann and Maria Reining, sopranos; Lawrence Tibbett, barytone; Maurice Marechal and Boris Golschmann, cellists, and Igor Stravinsky.

The Detroit Symphony Orchestra's season under Franco Ghione's direction begins Thursday night, November 3. Works announced as new to America in the season's programs include a concerto grosso by Germiniani, "Kolo Sinfonico," by Gotovac, a Yugoslav composer, and a toccata by Barbara Giuranna, of Rome. Works of Bloch, Kodaly and Shostakovitch and of several American composers are to be heard for the first time in Detroit.

The sixth season of the Kansas City Philharmonic Orchestra under Karl Krueger's leadership began last Thursday and Friday. In the second of the ten pairs of concerts in the regular series, November 3 and 4, John Charles Thomas, barytone, will be the soloist, Strauss's "Elektra" will be performed in concert form December 1 and 2 with Rose Pauly, Enid Szantho, Chase Baromeo and Paul Althouse as the principals. Other soloists will be Gaspar Cassado, cellist; Walter Gieseking, pianist, and Jules Seder, who will be heard in the first American performance of Fogg's bassoon concerto.

There will be a special series of Beethoven and Brahms symphonies on four Friday afternoons,

---

B. Trans. MUSIC Oct. 25/38

Recent Phonograph Records

Violin Concertos Aplenty, from Tartini To Prokofiev, and a Rarity by Beethoven

By MOSES SMITH

It is an old European custom whereby a virtuoso, seeking to attract an audience to observe his proficiency and—more important—listen to some music in the bargain, hires himself an orchestra and a conductor, and gives a concert. The typical recital of a violinist, at which one may hear not only music that was written for something other than piano accompaniment but even music not written originally for the violin—that sort of "concert" may not be an American invention but it has become an American barbarism. A few years ago Mischa Elman gave a typical European concert in Symphony Hall, playing, if memory serves, the usual quota of three concertos with orchestra. For our day and scene it was a rarity. Unfortunately the response was not sufficiently great to encourage a repetition. Economics reign in the concert hall as elsewhere.

One of the advantages of the phonograph medium is its partial annihilation of such economic laws as govern the concert hall. Once you have built up the library you can hear any kind of concert you want at the moment. The problem of building a library scarcely existing for a reviewer, I arranged for myself the other evening a concert of the type I have described. From records of recent months it was possible to select five violin concertos with the proper orchestral accompaniment and, for good measure, the Beethoven Triple Concerto for piano, violin and 'cello.

Whether that sort of evening's program would give general satisfaction I don't know, but it certainly exerts considerable attraction for the musician. It explodes the popular myth of music as exclusively a matter of inspiration. On the contrary, there is as much continuity in the history of the art of music as there is in culture generally—perhaps more, because music is more logical than most of the arts. Hearing a violin concerto by Bruch you realize it could not have been what it is but for the Mendelssohn Violin Concerto; and, on the other side, that Brahms was indebted to Bruch.

* * *

Chronologically the first of the half-dozen is Tartini's Concerto in D minor, arranged by Pente and subsequently rearranged by Joseph Szigeti, who is also the violinist. Szigeti is to be thanked for preserving the period flavor in his arrangement. The music is good, but I am afraid that for me its principal interest was its period. On the odd side Szigeti plays the familiar Arioso from the Bach Concerto in F minor; and here the playing is a little too heartfelt for my taste. (Columbia set M-X103; four twelve-inch sides.)

Next in line is the first movement of the Paganini Concerto in D major. On it Fritz Kreisler, the solo violinist, has so labored in re-orchestration and in the style of his playing that the result is perhaps as much Kreisler as Paganini. The violinist is here very much in the vein, and there is a superb orchestral accompaniment from the Philadelphia Orchestra under Eugene Ormandy, the whole being brilliantly recorded. (Victor set M-361; four twelve-inch sides.)

The Bruch G minor Concerto is very much out of fashion now. The less kindly of our modernists might even call it dead. But despite its gooey sentiment it remains, for me at any rate, a work not only of some importance in the history of the violin concerto but also intrinsically worth hearing on occasion. Fortunately the soloist of the present version, Alfredo Campoli (a name with which I was previously unfamiliar), is an excellent violinist, who does not attempt to add to the already liberal spread of sugar. The accompaniment by an orchestra under the direction of Walter Goehr is better than the usual run of such affairs; and the recording is satisfactory. (Columbia set M-332; six 12-inch sides.)

Some years before Bruch had finished this Concerto Schumann had completed his Violin Concerto in D minor. But whereas Joachim, friend of both composers, played Bruch's in concert soon after it was done, he could not bring himself to do the same for the Schumann. The ups and downs of this "lost" Concerto occupied the public prints at too great length last year to permit the story to be told again. Besides, the time has already come to judge the work—like it or leave it—as music. As it is beautifully set forth by Yehudi Menuhin, playing at his very best, and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society under John Barbirolli, I like the Concerto as much as when it was introduced last season. It is not a masterpiece. But it contains much that is typically Schumann. It scarcely deserved Joachim's condescension or that of more recent critics. The recording here is very fine. (Victor set M-451; seven 12-inch sides.)

Having recently used up practically all available superlatives in describing the performance and recording of Prokofiev's "Kije" Suite by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky, I am at a loss to find suitable praise for the playing of the Prokofiev Second Concerto by Jascha Heifetz and the Bostonians. Unable to hear the much-discussed performances by the same performers in Symphony Hall last year, I was especially grateful to the phonograph for an opportunity to become acquainted with an exceptional work. The performance on the records is everything that was said of those in the concert hall, and even more. Heifetz plays better than ever. And the recording is dazzlingly sharp and clear. (Victor Set M-450; six twelve-inch sides.)

It is easy to dismiss the Beethoven Triple Concerto as a mere piece d'occasion. But that explanation does not tell the whole story. While the Concerto is far from a masterwork, even of the young Beethoven, there is already the Beethoven melodic line. His characteristic type of development is further in evidence. And with a little imagination one can already detect in nucleo the composer of the "Emperor" Concerto. The present set, the first in the phonograph literature, is all the more wel-

---

MUSIC Oct. 25/38

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Genia Nemenoff and Pierre Luboshutz, duo pianists, last night appeared for the first time as soloists with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the season's first Monday concert. Since—following the departure of last season—the Monday and Tuesday concerts will this year be played on consecutive days with the same program serving for both, these two Russian artists will again be heard at Symphony Hall this afternoon.

They played Mozart's E-flat Concerto for two pianos, a work infrequently offered today despite its real popularity. The reason, naturally, is that despite the emergence of a number of piano "teams" in the past several years, orchestral soloists as a rule still come singly and not in pairs. Technically, Mr. and Mrs. Luboshutz (as they are in private life) are phenomenally well matched. Listening to them with eyes closed, one would be hard put to say when the first stopped playing and the other began. Their tone is beautiful, their style highly polished. They performed Mozart elegantly and with grace, so fluently that it may be carping to observe that more "bite" and sparkle would have been desirable, particularly in the witty last movement.

Both artists were warmly received by the Monday audience. So were Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra for their share in an admirable performance.

The name of Bizet is associated with opera and not with symphony programs because that illustrious Frenchman was in his short lifetime a composer for the theatre. He left behind as suitable material for modern concert use only the two suites arranged from his incidental music to Daudet's play, "L'Arlesienne." Since today is the 100th anniversary of Bizet's birth, Dr. Koussevitzky appropriately chose to observe it by playing the first of those two suites.

Here again, in a reading that ran to vivid contrasts, conductor and orchestra showed how hackneyed music may be restored to life at the hands of virtuosi. The minuet was taken a little too rapidly for one listener's taste, and some may have thought the beginning of the prelude too dramatically emphasized. Yet as a whole the performance was truly brilliant.

The evening ended with Brahms' Fourth Symphony, re-created with that exceptional depth and passion which have for some years been identifying traits of Dr. Koussevitzky's treatment of this mighty score. There are occasions, where music is concerned, when words are a pallid medium to convey an idea of just what happened. Last night was one of them.

C. W. D.

33

Townsman
Andover, Mass

OCT 13 1938

To Give Reception To Dr. Koussevitzky

Doctor Sergei Koussevitzky, now the pre-eminent leader of Symphony orchestras in the United States, will be tendered a reception on Sunday at the Addison Gallery at a preview of original drawings by Gerome Brush of members of the Boston Symphony. The exhibition will continue until November 1.

B. Herald - Oct. 26/38

European Tour for Koussevitzky And Symphony Probable in May

Trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra were understood last night to have voted to send the organization of 110 men, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, abroad in May for its long-contemplated European concert tour.

Prospects for such a trip, seriously considered in 1929 and later dropped because of the depression, were revived last June when Dr. Koussevitzky returned from his annual trip abroad with assurances that only the lack of a $100,000 guarantee prevented the trip. He added that Europe was not only ready but "clamoring" for concerts by the Boston Symphony.

Ernest B. Dane, president of the board of trustees, last night declined to deny or confirm the report, while several other members of the board, when questioned, retorted they "couldn't say a word."

Questioning of some members, however, drew admissions that the board had met yesterday and that a tour abroad for the orchestra was taken up.

B. Her Oct. 12/38

E. B. DANE PRESIDENT OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

Ernest B. Dane, charter trustee and treasurer since 1919 of the Boston Symphony orchestra, yesterday was elected president at the annual meeting to succeed Bentley W. Warren. The latter has been president since [illegible].

Others elected include: Henry B. Sawyer, re-elected vice-president; Edward A. Taft, clerk, and Ernest B. Dane, treasurer. Twelve members of the board of trustees are: Allston Burr, Henry B. Cabot, Alvan T. Fuller, Jerome D. Greene, N. Penrose Hallowell, M. A. DeWolfe Howe, Roger I. Lee, Richard C. Paine, and the officers, including former President Warren.

B. [illegible] Oct 12/38

SYMPHONY BOARD ELECTS ERNEST DANE PRESIDENT

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday elected Ernest B. Dane to succeed Bentley W. Warren as president. Mr. Dane was one of the original trustees of the orchestra and has been its treasurer since the season of 1919-1920.

Mr. Warren remains as a member of the board, of which he was also an original member, and of which he was vice president from 1927-1932. Henry B. Sawyer was re-elected vice president, and Edward A. Taft, clerk. Mr. Dane remains the treasurer of the corporation. The board of trustees comprises:

Allston Burr, Henry B. Cabot, Ernest B. Dane, Alvan T. Fuller, Jerome D. Greene, N. Penrose Hallowell, M. A. DeWolfe Howe, Roger I. Lee, Richard C. Paine, Henry B. Sawyer, Edward A. Taft; Bentley W. Warren.

N. Y. Tribune – Oct 23/38

THE ORCHESTRAS

JOHN BARBIROLLI will conduct the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra in the first concert of its "odd" Sunday afternoon series at Carnegie Hall today at 3 o'clock. The program, already played last Thursday and Friday, includes Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz," Sibelius's tone-poems, "Swan of Tuonela" and "Return of Lemminkainen," Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird" Suite, a Mozart adagio and fugue for strings and Beethoven's fifth symphony. This concert will also mark the opening of the season for the Philharmonic's radio listeners.

In the opening concerts of the "even" Thursday evening and Friday afternoon concerts at Carnegie Hall this week, October 27 and 28, the Brazilian pianist Guiomar Novaes will be the soloist in Beethoven's fourth concerto, in G major. Handel's concerto grosso in D minor, Op. 6, No. 10, and Brahms's second symphony complete the program. Next Sunday afternoon, October 30, in the first concert of the "even" Sunday series, Mme. Novaes will play Chopin's second concerto, in F minor. Mr. Barbirolli will repeat the Brahms symphony, and also offer Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" and Charles Tomlinson Griffes's "The White Peacock."

The orchestra, under Mr. Barbirolli, will give its first out of town concert of the season next Saturday night at Princeton, N. J. The program will be the same as the one scheduled for this afternoon, except that excerpts from Wagner's "Die "Meistersinger" will be heard instead of the Stravinsky suite. Mr. Barbirolli will give the first talk in the Philharmonic-Symphony League's lecture series Tuesday night, November 1, in the Barbizon-Plaza, discussing the conductor's role and its history. In the Philharmonic-Symphony concerts of Thursday night and Friday afternoon, November 3 and 4, the soloist will be Robert Viroval, eighteen-year-old Hungarian violinist, making his first New York appearances.

In the second concert of the Federal Music Project's Beethoven series tonight at the Federal Music Theater, 254 West Fifty-fourth Street, Jacques Gordon will conduct the Federal Symphony Orchestra, with James Friskin as soloist in the piano concerto in C minor. Frank St. Leger will conduct the New York Civic Orchestra in this afternoon's concert at 1:30, with Schumann's symphony in C as the principal number of the program. Hilda Ohlin, soprano, will be the soloist. Herman Neuman, musical director of Station WNYC, will conduct the Greenwich Orchestra next Thursday evening, when Sigismond Stojowski will be the soloist in his own Symphonic Rhapsody for piano and orchestra.

Boston, Cleveland and Chicago

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will celebrate the hundredth anniversary of Georges Bizet's birth next Tuesday by including his first suite from "L'Arlésienne" in their afternoon program at Symphony Hall. In the regular Boston Friday afternoon and Saturday night concerts this week a French program will be played including Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," Albert Roussel's "Rapsodie Flamande" and Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony.

Artur Rodzinski's program for the Cleveland Orchestra's third pair of concerts, next Thursday and Saturday nights, includes two Czech works, Smetana's "Vltava" and Dvorak's now seldom heard fourth symphony; Frederick Converse's "American Sketches," composed in 1929, and "Perpetual Motion," by an Austrian composer, Max Schönherr.

The Cleveland Orchestra will give the first of five "twilight concerts" under its associate conductor, Rudolph Ringwall, on Sunday, November 6, from 5 to 6 o'clock. This series proved popular last winter and spring, when it was reinstated after several seasons' lapse. The Monte Carlo Ballet Russe will dance with the Cleveland Orchestra on December 3, 4 and 5. On December 15 and 17, Joseph Szigeti will be the soloist with this orchestra in the first public performances of Ernest Bloch's violin concerto. This also may be played by Mr. Szigeti in New York later in the season. Mr. Bloch began the work in 1935 and finished it last January.

Frederick A. Stock's program for the Chicago Symphony Orchestra's third regular pair of concerts next Thursday night and Friday afternoon includes three novelties, Reznicek's "Overture to a Comedy," an Allegro Symphonique by the Belgian composer Marcel Poot and Kurt Attenberg's Ballade and Passacaglia on a Theme from a Swedish Folksong. Tchaikovsky's second symphony will follow.

Season's Openings

The National Symphony Orchestra of Washington will open its eighth season under Hans Kindler's direction next Sunday afternoon in Constitution Hall. American works to be heard for the first time include a symphony by Roy Harris, a piano concerto by Paul Nordhoff, "Miniatures" by Isadore Freed and "Seven Visions" by La Salle Spier, of Washington. Ernest Schelling's "Suite Variee" is to have its American premiere next January under the composer's direction; "Scenes of Povery and Toil" by Robert Sanders, of Chicago; a work for quartet and orchestra by Marcel Poot, to be played in March with the Pro Arte Quartet as assisting artists, Dr. Kindler's arrangement of part of Handel's fifth concerto grosso and Bizet's early symphony in C complete the list of Washington novelties.

The fifty-ninth season of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra, and its eighth under Vladimir Golschmann's leadership, begins next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening with Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," Ravel's "La Valse," Weber's overture to "Oberon" and the Brahms first symphony. Soloists for the season include Sergei Rachmaninoff, Myra Hess, Artur Rubinstein, pianists; Fritz Kreisler and Jascha Heifetz, violinists; Lotte Lehmann and Maria Reining, sopranos; Lawrence Tibbett, barytone; Maurice Marechal and Boris Golschmann, cellists, and Igor Stravinsky.

The Detroit Symphony Orchestra's season under Franco Ghione's direction begins Thursday night, November 3. Works announced as new to America in the season's programs include a concerto grosso by Geminiani, "Kolo Sinfonico," by Gotovac, a Yugoslav composer, and a toccata by Barbara Giuranna, of Rome. Works of Bloch, Kodaly and Shostakovitch and of several American composers are to be heard for the first time in Detroit.

The sixth season of the Kansas City Philharmonic Orchestra under Karl Krueger's leadership began last Thursday and Friday. In the second of the ten pairs of concerts in the regular series, November 3 and 4, John Charles Thomas, barytone, will be the soloist. Strauss's "Elektra" will be performed in concert form December 1 and 2 with Rose Pauly, Enid Szantho, Chase Baromeo and Paul Althouse as the principals. Other soloists will be Gaspar Cassado, cellist; Walter Gieseking, pianist, and Jules Seder, who will be heard in the first American performance of Fogg's bassoon concerto.

There will be a special series of Beethoven and Brahms symphonies on four Friday afternoons.

B. Trans. Oct. 25/38

MUSIC

Recent Phonograph Records

Violin Concertos Aplenty, from Tartini To Prokofiev, and a Rarity by Beethoven

By MOSES SMITH

It is an old European custom whereby a virtuoso, seeking to attract an audience to observe his proficiency and—more important—listen to some music in the bargain, hires himself an orchestra and a conductor, and gives a concert. The typical recital of a violinist, at which one may hear not only music that was written for something other than piano accompaniment but even music not written originally for the violin—that sort of "concert" may not be an American invention but it has become an American barbarism. A few years ago Mischa Elman gave a typical European concert in Symphony Hall, playing, if memory serves, the usual quota of three concertos with orchestra. For our day and scene it was a rarity. Unfortunately the response was not sufficiently great to encourage a repetition. Economics reign in the concert hall as elsewhere.

One of the advantages of the phonograph medium is its partial annihilation of such economic laws as govern the concert hall. Once you have built up the library you can hear any kind of concert you want at the moment. The problem of building a library scarcely existing for a reviewer, I arranged for myself the other evening a concert of the type I have described. From records of recent months it was possible to select five violin concertos with the proper orchestral accompaniment and, for good measure, the Beethoven Triple Concerto for piano, violin and 'cello.

Whether that sort of evening's program would give general satisfaction I don't know, but it certainly exerts considerable attraction for the musician. It explodes the popular myth of music as exclusively a matter of inspiration. On the contrary, there is as much continuity in the history of the art of music as there is in culture generally—perhaps more, because music is more logical than most of the arts. Hearing a violin concerto by Bruch you realize it could not have been what it is but for the Mendelssohn Violin Concerto; and, on the other side, that Brahms was indebted to Bruch.

* * *

Chronologically the first of the half-dozen is Tartini's Concerto in D minor, arranged by Pente and subsequently rearranged by Joseph Szigeti, who is also the violinist. Szigeti is to be thanked for preserving the period flavor in his arrangement. The music is good, but I am afraid that for me its principal interest was its period. On the odd side Szigeti plays the familiar Arioso from the Bach Concerto in F minor; and here the playing is a little too heartfelt for my taste. (Columbia set M-X103; four twelve-inch sides.)

Next in line is the first movement of the Paganini Concerto in D major. On it Fritz Kreisler, the solo violinist, has so labored in re-orchestration and in the style of his playing that the result is perhaps as much Kreisler as Paganini. The violinist is here very much in the vein, and there is a superb orchestral accompaniment from the Philadelphia Orchestra under Eugene Ormandy, the whole being brilliantly recorded. (Victor set M-361; four twelve-inch sides.)

The Bruch G minor Concerto is very much out of fashion now. The less kindly of our modernists might even call it dead. But despite its gooey sentiment it remains, for me at any rate, a work not only of some importance in the history of the violin concerto but also intrinsically worth hearing on occasion. Fortunately the soloist of the present version, Alfredo Campoli (a name with which I was previously unfamiliar), is an excellent violinist, who does not attempt to add to the already liberal spread of sugar. The accompaniment by an orchestra under the direction of Walter Goehr is better than the usual run of such affairs; and the recording is satisfactory. (Columbia set M-332; six 12-inch sides.)

Some years before Bruch had finished this Concerto Schumann had completed his Violin Concerto in D minor. But whereas Joachim, friend of both composers, played Bruch's in concert soon after it was done, he could not bring himself to do the same for the Schumann. The ups and downs of this "lost" Concerto occupied the public prints at too great length last year to permit the story to be told again. Besides, the time has already come to judge the work—like it or leave it—as music. As it is beautifully set forth by Yehudi Menuhin, playing at his very best, and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society under John Barbirolli, I like the Concerto as much as when it was introduced last season. It is not a masterpiece. But it contains much that is typically Schumann. It scarcely deserved Joachim's condescension or that of more recent critics. The recording here is very fine. (Victor set M-451; seven 12-inch sides.)

Having recently used up practically all available superlatives in describing the performance and recording of Prokofiev's "Kije" Suite by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky, I am at a loss to find suitable praise for the playing of the Prokofiev Second Concerto by Jascha Heifetz and the Bostonians. Unable to hear the much-discussed performances by the same performers in Symphony Hall last year, I was especially grateful to the phonograph for an opportunity to become acquainted with an exceptional work. The performance on the records is everything that was said of those in the concert hall, and even more. Heifetz plays better than ever. And the recording is dazzlingly sharp and clear. (Victor Set M-450; six twelve-inch sides.)

It is easy to dismiss the Beethoven Triple Concerto as a mere piece d'occasion. But that explanation does not tell the whole story. While the Concerto is far from a masterwork, even of the young Beethoven, there is already the Beethoven melodic line. His characteristic type of development is further in evidence. And with a little imagination one can already detect in nucleo the composer of the "Emperor" Concerto. The present set, the first in the phonograph literature, is all the more wel-

---

Oct. 25/38

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Genia Nemenoff and Pierre Luboshutz, duo pianists, last night appeared for the first time as soloists with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the season's first Monday concert. Since—following the departure of last season—the Monday and Tuesday concerts will this year be played on consecutive days with the same program serving for both, these two Russian artists will again be heard at Symphony Hall this afternoon.

They played Mozart's E-flat Concerto for two pianos, a work infrequently offered today despite its real popularity. The reason, naturally, is that despite the emergence of a number of piano "teams" in the past several years, orchestral soloists as a rule still come singly and not in pairs. Technically, Mr. and Mrs. Luboshutz (as they are in private life) are phenomenally well matched. Listening to them with eyes closed, one would be hard put to say when the first stopped playing and the other began. Their tone is beautiful, their style highly polished. They performed Mozart elegantly and with grace, so fluently that it may be carping to observe that more "bite" and sparkle would have been desirable, particularly in the witty last movement.

Both artists were warmly received by the Monday audience. So were Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra for their share in an admirable performance.

The name of Bizet is associated with opera and not with symphony programs because that illustrious Frenchman was in his short lifetime a composer for the theatre. He left behind as suitable material for modern concert use only the two suites arranged from his incidental music to Daudet's play, "L'Arlesienne." Since today is the 100th anniversary of Bizet's birth, Dr. Koussevitzky appropriately chose to observe it by playing the first of those two suites.

Here again, in a reading that ran to vivid contrasts, conductor and orchestra showed how hackneyed music may be restored to life at the hands of virtuosi. The minuet was taken a little too rapidly for one listener's taste, and some may have thought the beginning of the prelude too dramatically emphasized. Yet as a whole the performance was truly brilliant.

The evening ended with Brahms' Fourth Symphony, re-created with that exceptional depth and passion which have for some years been identifying traits of Dr. Koussevitzky's treatment of this mighty score. There are occasions, where music is concerned, when words are a pallid medium to convey an idea of just what happened. Last night was one of them. C. W. D.

Townsman
Andover, Mass

OCT 13 1938

To Give Reception To Dr. Koussevitzky

Doctor Sergei Koussevitzky, now the pre-eminent leader of Symphony orchestras in the United States, will be tendered a reception on Sunday at the Addison Gallery at a preview of original drawings by Gerome Brush of members of the Boston Symphony. The exhibition will continue until November 1.

B. Herald – Oct. 26/38

European Tour for Koussevitzky And Symphony Probable in May

Trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra were understood last night to have voted to send the organization of 110 men, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, abroad in May for its long-contemplated European concert tour.

Prospects for such a trip, seriously considered in 1929 and later dropped because of the depression, were revived last June when Dr. Koussevitzky returned from his annual trip abroad with assurances that only the lack of a $100,000 guarantee prevented the trip. He added that Europe was not only ready but "clamoring" for concerts by the Boston Symphony.

Ernest B. Dane, president of the board of trustees, last night declined to deny or confirm the report, while several other members of the board, when questioned, retorted they "couldn't say a word."

Questioning of some members, however, drew admissions that the board had met yesterday and that a tour abroad for the orchestra was taken up.

B. Her. Oct. 12/38

E. B. DANE PRESIDENT OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

Ernest B. Dane, charter trustee and treasurer since 1919 of the Boston Symphony orchestra, yesterday was elected president at the annual meeting to succeed Bentley W. Warren. The latter has been president since 1932.

Others elected include: Henry B. Sawyer, re-elected vice-president; Edward A. Taft, clerk, and Ernest B. Dane, treasurer. Twelve members of the board of trustees are: Allston Burr, Henry B. Cabot, Alvan T. Fuller, Jerome D. Greene, N. Penrose Hallowell, M. A. DeWolfe Howe, Roger I. Lee, Richard C. Paine, and the officers, including former President Warren.

B. Globe Oct. 12/38

SYMPHONY BOARD ELECTS ERNEST DANE PRESIDENT

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday elected Ernest B. Dane to succeed Bentley W. Warren as president. Mr. Dane was one of the original trustees of the orchestra and has been its treasurer since the season of 1919-1920.

Mr. Warren remains as a member of the board, of which he was also an original member, and of which he was vice president from 1927-1932. Henry B. Sawyer was re-elected vice president, and Edward A. Taft, clerk. Mr. Dane remains the treasurer of the corporation. The board of trustees comprises:

Allston Burr, Henry B. Cabot, Ernest B. Dane, Alvan T. Fuller, Jerome D. Greene, N. Penrose Hallowell, M. A. DeWolfe Howe, Roger I. Lee, Richard C. Paine, Henry B. Sawyer, Edward A. Taft, Bentley W. Warren.

B. Her. 34 Oct. 25/38

MUSIC

MONDAY SYMPHONY

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The first concert of the Monday-Tuesday series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday in Symphony Hall. Pierre Luboshutz and Genia Nemenoff (Mrs. Luboshutz), pianists, were the soloists. The program was as follows:

Suite No. 1 from "L'Arlesienne" ....Bizet
Concerto for Two Pianos and Orchestra in E flat (K. 365) ....Mozart
Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98 Brahms

Mr. Burk's program note was a singularly fair account for the 100th anniversary of the birth of a composer about whom a good deal of sentimental nonsense has been written. The fact that he died so soon after the first and mixed reception of his greatest work, "Carmen," started a legend of martyrdom that is not acording to fact. It is also true that the importance of Bizet as an originator has been greatly exaggerated, but there is no reason at the same time why his memory should not be revered for what he has given to the world, namely—one remarkable opera that shows no signs of being elbowed off the boards and the agreeable and still fresh incidental music to Daudet's play The first suite from the latter was played with rewarding effect last night.

We then switched to an infrequently heard example of Mozart's chief contribution to musical form, the classical concerto. He wrote, to be sure, more inspired concertos than this and some, like the D major Flute Concerto, that are likewise rarely heard in public. But the music of this Two Piano Concerto is none the less effective particularly in the rondo-finale. It is also a diverting novelty on a symphonic program. One may also wonder whv modern composers have not exploited the dramatic possibilities in the contrast between two modern grand pianos and a full orchestra.

The reason may well be that two piano music is a kind that many mature musicians tire of. A two piano recital can be stimulating, or nothing more; but the necessity for perfect team-play is apt to result in a mechanical performance. Admirable team-play there undoubtedly was last night from Mr. and Mrs. Luboshutz. They also played gracefully and with a very just understanding of Mozartian style, which Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra shared. The cadenzas were happily brief, and altogether it was a most satisfying performance that was cordially applauded by the audience.

We need not dwell on the fine interpretation of the Brahms 4th, a masterpiece that should be thoroughly familiar to Boston audiences. It is moreover a work that, by its profound intellectual content, can stand repeated hearings. It sounded, if anything, more superbly last night than on Friday. The concert will be repeated this afternoon.

Pulpit Digest
Great Neck N.Y.

OCT - - 1938

NOTES ON RECORDED MUSIC

VICTOR has indeed made some noteworthy recordings, lately, among which we are most impressed with a recording of the entire series of Nocturnes by Chopin. The are played, and very beautifully, too, by Arthur Rubinstein and presented in two volumes, or sets (M-461, $12 and M-462, $10). These Nocturnes embody the real romantic Chopin with which music lovers are most familiar and which is undoubtedly the most popular aspect of that great composer. The dreamy, melodic tunes bring out the sentimentalist in every listener and certainly in the performing artist, in this instance.

Prokofieff's music for the film Lietuenant Kije was so successful that Serge Koussevitzky directed it for the Berkshire Festival and has now immortalized it in an excellent recording for Victor (M-459, $6.50). The music has all the customary Prokofieff wit and charm and is a very funny and entertaining thing. It is played with gusto by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

People's Forum

THIS DEPARTMENT IS CONDUCTED BY OUR READERS, THE OPINIONS GIVEN ARE THEIRS

B. Traveler —— Oct. 17/38

Make your letters brief. Write on one side of paper only. Use typewriter or pen and ink. Give your street address. (It will not be published.) You may use a pen name if you desire, but your correct name and address must be given the People's Editor as an evidence of good faith. Print signature plainly. Do not telephone the People's Editor. Address your letters to

PEOPLE'S EDITOR, Boston Traveler, Boston, Mass.

WOULD MAKE SYMPHONY ALL-AMERICAN GROUP

People's Editor:

There are few things as un-American as the importing of musicians to fill minor positions in the Boston Symphony at a time when our own government is spending huge sums of money to provide work for destitute musicians.

This orchestra is supported by good American money which is annually sent to Europe by way of the pay checks of not a few aliens who come in each year as "visiting artists" to take work away from our own citizens. They may say that European musicians are better than those educated here, but this no longer holds true. The Philadelphia and NBC Symphony orchestras are all made up of American citizens, and so is every other orchestra in the country.

It's about time the Labor Department woke up. F. R.
Dorchester.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

OCT 23 1938

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IN FRENCH PROGRAMS

A programme of music by French composers will be presented by Serge Koussevitzky at the fourth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra to be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, October 28-29. It will consist of the suite "Le Tombeau de Couperin", by Maurice Ravel; Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun"; and the "Flemish Rhapsody" of Albert Roussel. The "Rhaposdie Flamande", one of Roussel's last works, had its first performance by this orchestra in 1937. The second part of the programme will consist of Berlioz' "Fantastic Symphony."

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

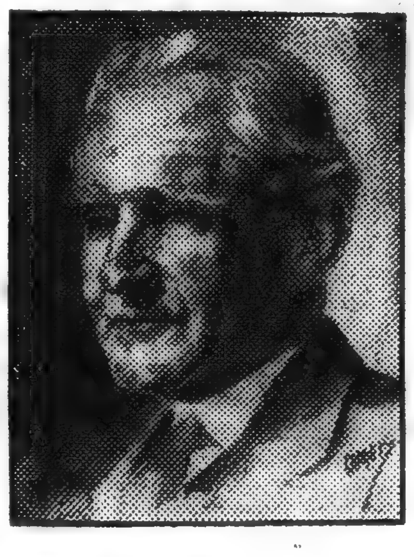
OCT 2 - 1938

Sensitivity Determines Musical Interpretation

Conductor of Boston Orchestra Pronounces Organic Interpretation Best Because Most Faithful to 'Elan Vital' of the Work

By Ray C. B. Brown.

Whenever we consider the interpretation of music, that process by which symbols written on paper are transformed into significant sounds, we are confronted by the inevitable fact that the interpreter stands between the composer and the auditor. All the arguments which have ever been waged over the different interpretations of any given composition have revolved around the pivotal question as to how faithfully the reading has conveyed the composer's meaning, and this question must always remain a moot one because the composer's precise meaning is known only to himself; having once committed his thoughts to paper, he must rely upon the insight and understanding of the performing musician. Because this sympathy between interpreter and composer is so essential to the eloquent projection of music, it is interesting to note what a distinguished interpreter of symphonic music has to say.



RAY C. B.

In a paper presented last April before the American Academt of Arts and Sciences by Sergei Kusevitzki, the conductor of the Boston Orchestra remarked: "We have a great deal of evidence that musical performers have a right to interpret compositions freely. They hold that right from the composer. Take Bach, for example. In his works we very often find no nuances. Does it mean that Bach intended to have his compositions played without nuances? Positively no. The great Bach leaves that freedom to the performer. Take the classical concertos by Mozart and Beethoven; we find that cadenzas are very rarely written by the composer, who leaves the freedom of improvisation to the performer. In Wagner's scores, after 'Tannhaeuser' and 'Lohengrin,' we find no exact indication of tempi. Wagner omitted it intentionally, and says in his book on the art of conducting that it is unnecessary to mark the exact tempo, because a talented conductor will find the right tempo anyway, and the untalented conductor will never grasp the tempo even if it is printed in the score.

"I recall a personal experience with the most outstanding contemporary composer, Jan Sibelius. When I studied his fourth symphony for a performance here, I found that the tempo of the last 98 bars of the scherzo was marked twice as slow as the preceding tempo, and that I could neither feel nor understand. I wrote to Sibelius asking for an explanation, thinking that it was a possible misprint and saying that I did not feel that tempo. And Sibelius answered: 'The right tempo is the one that the artist feels.' There is, after all, the truth of interpretation, and how can an artist justify that truth?

* * * *

"Personally, I believe that a composer, when creating a work, transfuses it not only with his musical power, but also with the entire meaning of his life—the essence of his being. That is why we can and we must find a 'central line' in the creation of every composer. What is the central line of a composer? It is the meaning of his life and ideals, which he brings to us through the medium of his music. With Bach the central line is religion. Bach came to glorify God. We find in his entire life his praise of God, exaltation of heaven and divinity.

"Haydn's line is joyfulness, humor, which he wants to share with others. We feel it in every symphony, in every menuetto and allegro. Mozart gives us pure tonal harmony; absolute purity of musical form. If we analyze his creative work, we will find how free Mozart was of any outward influence: he believed in music for the sake of music, sound for sound, beauty for beauty. Beethoven's central line is transcendentality: he reflects universal emotion in music. When Beethoven grieves, he grieves with the world; when he is joyful, it is universal joy; when he fells a tragedy, it is a world tragedy.

"Here emerges the truth of interpretative art. When the artist-interpreter is able to perceive the inner meaning, the central line, of a composition, he will find in himself the right and illuminating emotion to perform it. It may not be difficult to trace externally the central line, because there exists a vast literature of the life and activity of every composer, especially those belonging to history. It is not difficult for a musician to analyze a score externally, to determine its form, its melodic and harmonic plan and entire structure. But this takes us only half way. The most important part is that which can neither be read nor learned; it rests in the interpreter himself, in his own emotions, depth and feeling.

* * * *

"A perfect interpretation may have two different aspects, equally faithful to the score of the composer. One may be called mechanically perfect, the other organically perfect. The first gives the beauty of mathematical balance, symmetry and clarity; the second is the invisible, living, pulsating elan vital of the composition. One aims to present a beautiful surface or reflection of the composition. In the other, the composition—its central line—lives as a reality. One is always enjoyable, pleasant and delightful, but remains, like a beautiful scene, external to the listener. The other takes and carries him with the elan vital of the work, merges him with the reality of the central meaning, makes him co-live and co-experience the elan vital of the composition. Like a mystic experience, the organic interpretation puts the listener in direct touch with the absolute reality hidden in the great work."

It is noteworthy that Mr. Kusevitzki, when pointing out the nature of "true" interpretation, resorts to the central line of Henri Bergson's philosophical system, the "elan vital," that mysteriously moving spiritual energy which animates and shapes the universe. His choice of this phrase was a happy one, for the essence of all musical expression is spiritual, however attenuated it may at times become. The relative greatness of a composition is directly proportional to the amount of "elan vital" which it contains, and, conversely, the absence of "elan vital" from a composition makes us immediately aware of its cheapness and futility.

Among executants of music there are corresponding degrees of spiritual sensitivity. The greatest interpreters are highly intuitive, and from this summit one gradually descends to those artists who may be technically skillful but are nevertheless mere performers. All of us have heard performances which were so brilliant as to arouse our admiration, but which left us emotionally unmoved. We have also been profoundly stirred by performances which left us convinced of a close rapport between the interpreter and the "elan vital" of [illegible]

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER - CITIZEN

OCT 17 1938

Reception to Koussevitzky in Andover

Members of Boston Symphony Also Greeted at Addison Gallery as Gerome Brush Works Are Shown.

With a reception to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and a preview of portrait drawings by Gerome Brush of members of the Boston Symphony orchestra the Addison Gallery of American Art, Phillips academy, Andover, opened yesterday afternoon one of its notable exhibitions of this season. This coincides for the rest of the month with the retrospective exhibition of paintings by Maurice and Charles Prendergast, hung a few days ago.

A considerable group of the Symphony players came with Dr. Koussevitzky to this opening. They were received by Mr. and Mrs. Charles H. Sawyer jr., and other officers of the gallery and the academy. Tea was served in the main gallery, the pourers being Mrs. Frederick Johnson, Mrs. Dean Lynde, Mrs. William Eccles, Mrs. Scott Paradise.

Portraits Reproductions.

Some of the portraits in charcoal depicting members of the Symphony are the originals of the reproductions in a book of Mr. Brush's drawings which was published a short time ago and was reviewed in this newspaper. Since that publication the artist has added to his collection the likenesses of several of the newly added players. One of the merits of his method and viewpoint is that he seems to give equal artistic importance to the musical artists of the group. In a brisk, sketchy fashion they all have been portrayed, usually with a representation or suggestion of the instrument and sometimes with a bar of music worked into the picture.

Gerome Brush, it may be recalled, is a son of the distinguished American painter, George De-Forest Brush, of New York and Dublin, N. H. His drawings at the Addison gallery will be found in two print rooms on the ground floor.

The Prendergast exhibition in three galleries of the second floor had much attention from the guests yesterday. It is said to be attracting an unusual attendance to the gallery.

Although Maurice and Charles Prendergast were for a longe time residents of Winchester, this state, and then of Mt. Vernon street, Boston, where they worked until their removed to New York in 1914, this is stated to be the first retrospective display of their work in New England. The latter named artist, who still lives in New York, came on for the opening of the show and was here several days. His brother Maurice, born in Newfoundland in 1859, died in 1922.

Prendergast Paintings.

The main gallery is given over to Maurice Prendergast's paintings arranged chronologically from 1892 to 1922. A notable unity of method pervades them. From first to last Maurice Prendergast worked in spots of pure fresh color arranged in a mosaic-like pattern. He depicted places and people, usually beach scenes and other amusement resorts. His chief preoccupation, however was always to fill his picture with an interesting design in color.

Charles Prendergast will be remembered by many Middlesex county people as the Winchester artist who early in this century turned his attention to making artistic picture frames, these designed to go with individual paintings rather to follow stock patterns. He had large success, and perhaps still has, in this important craft. He has meantime experimented and achieved broadly in the field of decorative design, as proved by his panels, chests and screens which fill one of the main galleries at Andover.

The usual conditions of daily free admittance, including Sunday afternoons, prevails at the Addison gallery during the continuance of these stimulating art exhibitions by Gerome Brush and the brothers Prendergast. F. W. C.

B. Her. 34 Oct. [illegible]/38

MUSIC

MONDAY SYMPHONY

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The first concert of the Monday-Tuesday series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday in Symphony Hall. Pierre Luboshutz and Genia Nemenoff (Mrs. Luboshutz), pianists, were the soloists. The program was as follows:

Suite No. 1 from "L'Arlesienne" .... Bizet
Concerto for Two Pianos and Orchestra in E flat (K. 365) .... Mozart
Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98 .... Brahms

Mr. Burk's program note was a singularly fair account for the 100th anniversary of the birth of a composer about whom a good deal of sentimental nonsense has been written. The fact that he died so soon after the first and mixed reception of his greatest work, "Carmen," started a legend of martyrdom that is not acording to fact. It is also true that the importance of Bizet as an originator has been greatly exaggerated, but there is no reason at the same time why his memory should not be revered for what he has given to the world, namely—one remarkable opera that shows no signs of being elbowed off the boards and the agreeable and still fresh incidental music to Daudet's play. The first suite from the latter was played with rewarding effect last night.

We then switched to an infrequently heard example of Mozart's chief contribution to musical form, the classical concerto. He wrote, to be sure, more inspired concertos than this and some, like the D major Flute Concerto, that are likewise rarely heard in public. But the music of this Two Piano Concerto is none the less effective particularly in the rondo-finale. It is also a diverting novelty on a symphonic program. One may also wonder why modern composers have not exploited the dramatic possibilities in the contrast between two modern grand pianos and a full orchestra.

The reason may well be that two piano music is a kind that many mature musicians tire of. A two piano recital can be stimulating, or nothing more; but the necessity for perfect team-play is apt to result in a mechanical performance. Admirable team-play there undoubtedly was last night from Mr. and Mrs. Luboshutz. They also played gracefully and with a very just understanding of Mozartian style, which Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra shared. The cadenzas were happily brief, and altogether it was a most satisfying performance that was cordially applauded by the audience.

We need not dwell on the fine interpretation of the Brahms 4th, a masterpiece that should be thoroughly familiar to Boston audiences. It is moreover a work that, by its profound intellectual content, can stand repeated hearings. It sounded, if anything, more superbly last night than on Friday. The concert will be repeated this afternoon.

Pulpit Digest
Great Neck -
24

OCT - - 1938

NOTES ON RECORDED MUSIC

VICTOR has indeed made some noteworthy recordings, lately, among which we are most impressed with a recording of the entire series of Nocturnes by Chopin. The are played, and very beautifully, too, by Arthur Rubinstein and presented in two volumes, or sets (M-461, $12 and M-462, $10). These Nocturnes embody the real romantic Chopin with which music lovers are most familiar and which is undoubtedly the most popular aspect of that great composer. The dreamy, melodic tunes bring out the sentimentalist in every listener and certainly in the performing artist, in this instance.

Prokofieff's music for the film Lietuenant Kije was so successful that Serge Koussevitzky directed it for the Berkshire Festival and has now immortalized it in an excellent recording for Victor (M-459, $6.50). The music has all the customary Prokofieff wit and charm and is a very funny and entertaining thing. It is played with gusto by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

People's Forum

THIS DEPARTMENT IS CONDUCTED BY OUR READERS, THE OPINIONS GIVEN ARE THEIRS

B. Traveler Oct. 17/38

Make your letters brief. Write on one side of paper only. Use typewriter or pen and ink. Give your street address. (It will not be published.) You may use a pen name if you desire, but your correct name and address must be given the People's Editor as an evidence of good faith. Print signature plainly. Do not telephone the People's Editor. Address your letters to

PEOPLE'S EDITOR, Boston Traveler, Boston, Mass.

WOULD MAKE SYMPHONY ALL-AMERICAN GROUP

People's Editor:

There are few things as un-American as the importing of musicians to fill minor positions in the Boston Symphony at a time when our own government is spending huge sums of money to provide work for destitute musicians.

This orchestra is supported by good American money which is annually sent to Europe by way of the pay checks of not a few aliens who come in each year as "visiting artists" to take work away from our own citizens. They may say that European musicians are better than those educated here, but this no longer holds true. The Philadelphia and NBC Symphony orchestras are all made up of American citizens, and so is every other orchestra in the country.

It's about time the Labor Department woke up. F. R.

Dorchester.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

OCT 23 1938

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IN FRENCH PROGRAMS

A programme of music by French composers will be presented by Serge Koussevitzky at the fourth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra to be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, October 28-29. It will consist of the suite "Le Tombeau de Couperin", by Maurice Ravel; Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun"; and the "Flemish Rhapsody" of Albert Roussel. The "Rhapsodie Flamande", one of Roussel's last works, had its first performance by this orchestra in 1937. The second part of the programme will consist of Berlioz' "Fantastic Symphony."

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

OCT 2 - 1938

Sensitivity Determines Musical Interpretation

Conductor of Boston Orchestra Pronounces Organic Interpretation Best Because Most Faithful to 'Elan Vital' of the Work

By Ray C. B. Brown.

Whenever we consider the interpretation of music, that process by which symbols written on paper are transformed into significant sounds, we are confronted by the inevitable fact that the interpreter stands between the composer and the auditor. All the arguments which have ever been waged over the different interpretations of any given composition have revolved around the pivotal question as to how faithfully the reading has conveyed the composer's meaning, and this question must always remain a moot one because the composer's precise meaning is known only to himself; having once committed his thoughts to paper, he must rely upon the insight and understanding of the performing musician. Because this sympathy between interpreter and composer is so essential to the eloquent projection of music, it is interesting to note what a distinguished interpreter of symphonic music has to say.

RAY C. B.

In a paper presented last April before the American Academt of Arts and Sciences by Sergei Kusevitzki, the conductor of the Boston Orchestra remarked: "We have a great deal of evidence that musical performers have a right to interpret compositions freely. They hold that right from the composer. Take Bach, for example. In his works we very often find no nuances. Does it mean that Bach intended to have his compositions played without nuances? Positively no. The great Bach leaves that freedom to the performer. Take the classical concertos by Mozart and Beethoven; we find that cadenzas are very rarely written by the composer, who leaves the freedom of improvisation to the performer. In Wagner's scores, after 'Tannhaeuser' and 'Lohengrin,' we find no exact indication of tempi. Wagner omitted it intentionally, and says in his book on the art of conducting that it is unnecessary to mark the exact tempo, because a talented conductor will find the right tempo anyway, and the untalented conductor will never grasp the tempo even if it is printed in the score.

"I recall a personal experience with the most outstanding contemporary composer, Jan Sibelius. When I studied his fourth symphony for a performance here, I found that the tempo of the last 98 bars of the scherzo was marked twice as slow as the preceding tempo, and that I could neither feel nor understand. I wrote to Sibelius asking for an explanation, thinking that it was a possible misprint and saying that I did not feel that tempo. And Sibelius answered: 'The right tempo is the one that the artist feels.' There is, after all, the truth of interpretation, and how can an artist justify that truth?

* * * *

"Personally, I believe that a composer, when creating a work, transfuses it not only with his musical power, but also with the entire meaning of his life—the essence of his being. That is why we can and we must find a 'central line' in the creation of every composer. What is the central line of a composer? It is the meaning of his life and ideals, which he brings to us through the medium of his music. With Bach the central line is religion. Bach came to glorify God. We find in his entire life his praise of God, exaltation of heaven and divinity.

"Haydn's line is joyfulness, humor, which he wants to share with others. We feel it in every symphony, in every menuetto and allegro. Mozart gives us pure tonal harmony; absolute purity of musical form. If we analyze his creative work, we will find how free Mozart was of any outward influence: he believed in music for the sake of music, sound for sound, beauty for beauty. Beethoven's central line is transcendentality; he reflects universal emotion in music. When Beethoven grieves, he grieves with the world; when he is joyful, it is universal joy; when he fells a tragedy, it is a world tragedy.

"Here emerges the truth of interpretative art. When the artist-interpreter is able to perceive the inner meaning, the central line, of a composition, he will find in himself the right and illuminating emotion to perform it. It may not be difficult to trace externally the central line, because there exists a vast literature of the life and activity of every composer, especially those belonging to history. It is not difficult for a musician to analyze a score externally, to determine its form, its melodic and harmonic plan and entire structure. But this takes us only half way. The most important part is that which can neither be read nor learned; it rests in the interpreter himself, in his own emotions, depth and feeling.

* * * *

"A perfect interpretation may have two different aspects, equally faithful to the score of the composer. One may be called mechanically perfect, the other organically perfect. The first gives the beauty of mathematical balance, symmetry and clarity; the second is the invisible, living, pulsating elan vital of the composition. One aims to present a beautiful surface or reflection of the composition. In the other, the composition—its central line—lives as a reality. One is always enjoyable, pleasant and delightful, but remains, like a beautiful scene, external to the listener. The other takes and carries him with the elan vital of the work, merges him with the reality of the central meaning, makes him co-live and co-experience the elan vital of the composition. Like a mystic experience, the organic interpretation puts the listener in direct touch with the absolute reality hidden in the great work."

It is noteworthy that Mr. Kusevitzki, when pointing out the nature of "true" interpretation, resorts to the central line of Henri Bergson's philosophical system, the "elan vital," that mysteriously moving spiritual energy which animates and shapes the universe. His choice of this phrase was a happy one, for the essence of all musical expression is spiritual, however attenuated it may at times become. The relative greatness of a composition is directly proportional to the amount of "elan vital" which it contains, and, conversely, the absence of "elan vital" from a composition makes us immediately aware of its cheapness and futility.

Among executants of music there are corresponding degrees of spiritual sensitivity. The greatest interpreters are highly intuitive, and from this summit one gradually descends to those artists who may be technically skillful but are nevertheless mere performers. All of us have heard performances which were so brilliant as to arouse our admiration, but which left us emotionally unmoved. We have also been profoundly stirred by performances [illegible] us convinced of a close [illegible] between the interpreter [illegible]

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER - CITIZEN

OCT 17 1938

Reception to Koussevitzky in Andover

Members of Boston Symphony Also Greeted at Addison Gallery as Gerome Brush Works Are Shown.

With a reception to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and a preview of portrait drawings by Gerome Brush of members of the Boston Symphony orchestra the Addison Gallery of American Art, Phillips academy, Andover, opened yesterday afternoon one of its notable exhibitions of this season. This coincides for the rest of the month with the retrospective exhibition of paintings by Maurice and Charles Prendergast, hung a few days ago.

A considerable group of the Symphony players came with Dr. Koussevitzky to this opening. They were received by Mr. and Mrs. Charles H. Sawyer jr., and other officers of the gallery and the academy. Tea was served in the main gallery, the pourers being Mrs. Frederick Johnson, Mrs. Dean Lynde, Mrs. William Eccles, Mrs. Scott Paradise.

Portraits Reproductions.

Some of the portraits in charcoal depicting members of the Symphony are the originals of the reproductions in a book of Mr. Brush's drawings which was published a short time ago and was reviewed in this newspaper. Since that publication the artist has added to his collection the likenesses of several of the newly added players. One of the merits of his method and viewpoint is that he seems to give equal artistic importance to the musical artists of the group. In a brisk, sketchy fashion they all have been portrayed, usually with a representation or suggestion of the instrument and sometimes with a bar of music worked into the picture.

Gerome Brush, it may be recalled, is a son of the distinguished American painter, George De-Forest Brush, of New York and Dublin, N. H. His drawings at the Addison gallery will be found in two print rooms on the ground floor.

The Prendergast exhibition in three galleries of the second floor had much attention from the guests yesterday. It is said to be attracting an unusual attendance to the gallery.

Although Maurice and Charles Prendergast were for a longe time residents of Winchester, this state, and then of Mt. Vernon street, Boston, where they worked until their removed to New York in 1914, this is stated to be the first retrospective display of their work in New England. The latter named artist, who still lives in New York, came on for the opening of the show and was here several days. His brother Maurice, born in Newfoundland in 1859, died in 1922.

Prendergast Paintings.

The main gallery is given over to Maurice Prendergast's paintings arranged chronologically from 1892 to 1922. A notable unity of method pervades them. From first to last Maurice Prendergast worked in spots of pure fresh color arranged in a mosaic-like pattern. He depicted places and people, usually beach scenes and other amusement resorts. His chief preoccupation, however, was always to fill his picture with an interesting design in color.

Charles Prendergast will be remembered by many Middlesex county people as the Winchester artist who early in this century turned his attention to making artistic picture frames, these designed to go with individual paintings rather to follow stock patterns. He had large success, and perhaps still has, in this important craft. He has meantime experimented and achieved broadly in the field of decorative design, as proved by his panels, chests and screens which fill one of the main galleries at Andover.

The usual conditions of daily free admittance, including Sunday afternoons, prevails at the Addison gallery during the continuance of these stimulating art exhibitions by Gerome Brush and the brothers Prendergast. F. W. C.

35

WATERBURY, CONN.
DEMOCRAT

SEP 30 1938

Tall Tower Topics

BY THE MAN IN THE TOWER

Good Evening.

THE TRAVELER

I've cancelled my passage to Europe,
I'm not going to sail this fall,
I had not sent on my luggage,
It's reposing in the front hall.
I shall miss a season in Scotland
Dithering about shooting grouse,
But what to do is a puzzle
Since I'm redecorating my house.
I shall miss my winter in Italy
And winter sports at St. Moritz,
And my lovely spring in Normandy,
Too bad I have to call quits.
I've cancelled my passage to Europe,
I don't know what I'll miss most;
But as long as my luggage is waiting
I might as well fly to the coast.

—EM EM.

Checking up recently on young people's musical tastes a reporter was surprised to discover that the youth of the land are developing a taste for symphony concerts. Same reporter was surprised to discover that many young men and women were enrolling for Boston Symphony concerts under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. Boston, like New York, is a singularly fine place to live in, if you like something besides movies and the usual small town programs. For instance up in Boston there are twenty-four Friday afternoon and the same number of Saturday night concerts, stretching through the season from October to April. In Boston a group buy a couple of season symphony tickets, then they draw lots and turns for the concerts. Radio has developed youthful tastes considerably inasmuch as interest and even curiosity urges youth to try anything once; and whereas some decide that symphony music is out of their sphere they find themselves eventually listening to the music of the great composers, and to the analyzing of a composition by a clever commentator. And lo and behold, before you know it, the erstwhile jitterbug can call a symphony by name at the drop of the hat.

Warren Resigns as Head Of Boston Orchestra

B. Trans
Oct. 12/38

Succeeded by Ernest B. Dane Who Also Remains Treasurer—Warren Still Member of Board

Bentley Wirt Warren, president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1932, resigned at the annual meeting of the trustees yesterday and Ernest B. Dane, one of the original trustees of the orchestra and treasurer since the season of 1919-20 was elected his successor.

Mr. Warren remains a member of the board of which he also was an original member and of which he was vice-president from 1927 to 1932. He succeeded Judge Frederick P. Cabot as president. Mr. Warren, one of the outstanding lawyers in Massachusetts is well-known in the Berkshires. He maintains a summer home in Williamstown and is senior trustee of Williams College, his alma mater. Since the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first affiliation with the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Mr. Warren has shown a keen interest in the Festival's success.

Mr. Dane, one of the outstanding business men of Boston, has long been known for his generous support and great interest in the orchestra. He too has been interested in the Festival from the start and the past summer attended most of the concerts.

Henry B. Sawyer was elected vice-president, and Edward A. Taft, clerk. Mr. Dane remains the treasurer of the corporation. The board of trustees consists of 12 members: Allison Burr, Henry B. Cabot, Ernest B. Dane, Alvan T. Fuller, Jerome D. Greene, N. Penrose Hallowell, M. A. DeWolfe Howe, Roger I. Lee, Richard C. Paine, Henry B. Sawyer, Edward A. Taft, Bentley W. Warren.

BALTIMORE, MD.
MORNING SUN

OCT 16 1938

Symphonies To Spend Over Four Million

Every U. S. City Of 50,000 Or More Now Has Some Sort Of Orchestra

By JOHN SELBY

NEW YORK (AP).

THE sixteen leading symphony orchestras of the country are getting ready to spend more than $4,750,000 to give their communities the music they want.

This figure does not include the budgets of the many excellent secondary orchestras (including those with part-time musicians, like Baltimore's). Thanks to music project efforts, there now is no city in the United States of 50,000 or better without some sort of orchestra. Many smaller cities also have them.

It does not touch the money spent on hundreds of college orchestras, nor the cost of the high school orchestras which now number in the thousands.

The total spent for symphonic music in America has been estimated as high as forty millions. Whatever it is, the record shows the communities like it.

Seattle Only City Reducing Musical Budget

Only one American city, Seattle, is reducing its symphony budget—and that is because of a peculiar local situation which may be changed with the advent of the new Seattle conductor, Dr. Nikolai Sokoloff.

Most budgets remain the same, although four cities will spend a little more this winter: Washington, Pittsburgh, Indianapolis and Rochester, which will spend more money on soloists.

Eleven of the sixteen key cities report better ticket sales than last season, when most found attendance had improved over the preceding winter. Cleveland, where a new women's organization has got into the field, reports the largest advance sale in the orchestra's history, and even Boston, where big audiences have been the rule more than fifty years, is five per cent. ahead.

Eugene Ormandy Now "Musical Director"

Only Philadelphia reports a decrease, and that is "slight, and not alarming," according to Alfred Reginald Allen manager. Philadelphia is ~~one of~~ three cities reporting changes in the status of its conductor. Eugene Ormandy is now "musical director," which means that he controls absolutely the personnel and the programs; Stokowski will appear as guest only, next spring.

In Pittsburgh Fritz Reiner becomes permanent conductor, his first similar berth since his days with the Cincinnati Symphony. In Seattle, Dr. Sokoloff replaces Dr. Basil Cameron, and although Eugene Goosens remains permanent conductor in Cincinnati, he will be late arriving, and Jose Iturbi, conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic, will take the first three pairs of the twenty comprising the season. Longest tenure among practicing conductors goes to Frederick Stock, now beginning his thirty-fourth season in Chicago.

Philadelphia will have the longest season—thirty weeks, of which four will be spent on tour. Seattle has the shortest, twelve concerts. Kansas City where Karl Kruger has built an excellent orchestra since 1933, adds ten concerts to its season; Pittsburgh adds three weeks.

The only major departure from standard symphony practice is at Rochester, where the fifty men of the well-known "Civic" Orchestra are engaged for a twenty-eight-week season, and are augmented by thirty-five more players for a concentrated symphony season of twelve weeks.

Twenty men have been added to four orchestras — fewest additions being at Boston, where one more double bass will be found; most in Washington, where Hans Kindler will have ten new men. Only one orchestra has reduced personnel. This is St. Louis, where three men have resigned and have not been replaced as yet.

Philadelphia will play the most concerts, 118. Seattle plans fewest, only thirteen. But Boston, where the symphony has not only its regular season, but a spring popular season and several weeks of free concerts out-of-doors, as well as a festival in the Berkshires, will do all told more than 200 concerts, a unique record in American music. More than half will be directed by the permanent conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

1315 Concerts By 16 Orchestras

The sixteen orchestras plan 1,315 concerts in their regular seasons. The budget total is $4,782,605. This is exactly $3,636.96 a concert. Approximately a quarter of this is returned through ticket sales; some orchestras are lucky and have fairly extensive endowments, or (as in Detroit) fat radio contracts.

For most orchestras, however, October is the beginning of a battle. On one side is symphonic music, which the nation demands in larger and larger quantities. On the other is the big bad wolf—the deficit.

LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE

OCT 14 1938

CONCERTS WILL BE HELD FOR COMMUTERS

Concerts a half hour late have considerately been arranged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra so that listeners may arrive early from distant points. These "Commuters' Matinees" begin Tuesday, Oct. 25, at 3 o'clock, instead of 2:30, when the regular weekly Friday concerts start. There will be six Commuters' Matinees, played once a month, omitting November. Hence a season ticket for this series may be had at one-fourth the cost of the 24 Friday performances, although the Tuesday subscribers will hear the same high standard of programs, played by the full strength personnel of 110 Boston Symphony musicians.

The celebrated Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct four of the Tuesday concerts. Two very distinguished guest conductors will present the remaining programs. They will be the great Russian composer and pianist, Igor Stravinsky, and the famous Rumanian composer and violin cihtuoso, Georges Enesco. The same programs heard on Tuesday afternoons will be played on Monday evenings, on the same reduced subscription plan.

The present season is the 58th of the Boston Symphony orchestra. It is also the 15th consecutive season of Dr. Koussevitzky's conductorship—the longest, and critics declare the most brilliant and varied, record achieved by any conductor in the orchestra's history.

It is reported from Symphony Hall that the past three years have shown a decided increase in interest in symphony concerts. This is particularly true, officials say, in respect to the number of young men and women attending. They are found as subscribers to all four of the symphony series—24 programs each on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, and six each on Monday evenings and Tuesday afternoons.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS
STANDARD-TIMES

OCT 18 1938

Boston Symphony to Open 'Commuters' Matinees'

The Tuesday afternoon concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this season, presented in the form of "Commuters' Matinees," in that they begin at 3 p. m. for convenience of out-of-towners rather than at the conventional 2:30, will begin next Tuesday in Symphony Hall, Boston.

There will be six of these matinees, played once a month, omitting November. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct four of them, and guest conductors will be Igor Stravinsky, Russian composer and pianist, and Georges Enesco, Roumanian composer and violin virtuoso. The same programs heard on Tuesday afternoons will be presented Monday nights.

This is the 58th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the 15th consecutive season of Dr. Koussevitzky's conductorship.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 17 1938

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra Here Tomorrow Night

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in Metropolitan Theatre tomorrow night, giving the first of five concerts to be offered here this season. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, now commencing the 15th year of his reign, will conduct.

The program, calculated to display the quality of the orchestra admirably, comprises a Mozart divertimento for string quartet and two horns, to be played by all the strings in the orchestra; a symphonic poem, "Stenka Razin," by Glazounov, and Dvorak's fifth symphony, "From the New World."

The divertimento is one of many written by Mozart and is in the key of B-flat major. The movements are Allegro, Theme with Variations, Minuet, Adagio, Minuet and Andante. It is not at all "heavy music," but one of those entertaining and graceful achievements of which Mozart has so many to his credit. These compositions, written for many combinations of instruments, are not often to be heard.

The Glazounov symphonic poem was inspired by the life of a sort of Cossack Robin Hood, who raided towns in the Ukraine and instigated popular uprising against the government. He was taken prisoner on his barge on the Volga. Among the prizes of his forays was a princess, whom he now consigned to the river, saying: "Today I shall give the mother Volga what is to me the most desirable of earthly treasures." The song of the Volga boatman is one of the themes used in the score.

The Dvorak symphony has not been on the orchestra's programs for several seasons. It was written in 1892 and 1893, and most of the orchestration was done in Spillville, Ia. At the time it was first performed there was much controversy as to whether Dvorak had used Indian and Negro tunes in it. He himself called such "accusations" lies, and explained: "I tried to write only in the spirit of those national American melodies."

The symphony is considered the best of his works. It has the customary four movements, of which the second is widely familiar. It is the "Largo," containing the beautiful melody for English horn that almost everybody has heard somewhere or other.

G. Y. L.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

OCT 17 1938

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in Metropolitan Theatre tomorrow night, giving the first of five concerts to be offered here this season. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, now commencing the 15th year of his reign, will conduct.

The program, calculated to display the quality of the orchestra admirably, comprises a Mozart divertimento for string quartet and two horns, to be played by all the strings in the orchestra; a symphonic poem, "Stenka Razin," by Glazounov, and Dvorak's fifth symphony, "From the New World."

The divertimento is one of many written by Mozart and is in the key of B-flat major. The movements are Allegro, Theme with Variations, Minuet, Adagio, Minuet and Andante. It is not at all "heavy music," but one of those entertaining and graceful achievements of which Mozart has so many to his credit. These compositions, written for many combinations of instruments, are not often to be heard.

The Glazounov symphonic poem was inspired by the life of a sort of Cossack Robin Hood, who raided towns in the Ukraine and instigated popular uprising against the government. He was taken prisoner on his barge on the Volga. Among the prizes of his forays was a princess, whom he now consigned to the river, saying: "Today I shall give the mother Volga what is to me the most desirable of earthly treasures." The song of the Volga boatman is one of the themes used in the score.

The Dvorak symphony has not been on the orchestra's programs for several seasons. It was written in 1892 and 1893, and most of the orchestration was done in Spillville, Ia. At the time it was first performed there was much controversy as to whether Dvorak had used Indian and Negro tunes in it. He himself called such "accusations" lies, and explained: "I tried to write only in the spirit of those national American melodies."

The symphony is considered the best of his works. It has the customary four movements, of which the second is widely familiar. It is the "Largo," containing the beautiful melody for English horn that almost everybody has heard somewhere or other.

G. Y. L.

34

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

OCT 16 1938

Prokofieff's 'Kije' By Boston Symphony

Orchestral Suite by Russian Composer, Recorded in Victor Set, Originally Written for Soviet Sound Film—Its General Character and Use as Propaganda — Debussy's 'Iberia' Suite Conducted by Barbirolli—Brahms's Final Chamber Work

By BENJAMIN BUXTON

SERGEI PROKOFIEFF, one of the few contemporary Russian composers whose works are known to American audiences, is represented in a recent Victor company list by a set of records of unusual interest. "Lieut Kije," an orchestral suite written in 1933 as incidental music to a sound film of that name is neat, unemotional, and as a running commentary to the fanciful Soviet movie, must have served its purpose well.

It was first played in this vicinity during the Berkshire Symphonic festival by the Boston Symphony orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky, and the recording is by the same organization. Two hearings of it, first at Tanglewood, and then on the gramophone, create the impression that it is the work of one of the most gifted of modern writers, although, like much music of an occasional nature, it is probably more useful than beautiful. As a musical portrait of a nonexistant personality, it is remarkably efficient, but compared with the Second Violin concerto and the early "Classical Symphony," it has comparatively little importance.

In writing music for sound films there are many problems to solve in the way of timing and in the creation of moods that will serve the purpose rather than reflect the thoughts and emotions of the composer. It is music that is almost purely functional; it has to be carefully synchronized with the action on the screen; it must in no way intrude itself on the mood sought by the producer, and yet at the same time it must subtly suggest that mood and complement it. Taken bodily out of its original setting, however, and regarded as music for the concert hall, it has to be judged by different standards. If it produces a definite reaction to a group of listeners as well as a sense of form, then it has achieved a double purpose.

As arranged from the original film, "Lieut Kije" is in five parts: "The Birth of Kije," "Romance," "Kije's Wedding," "Troika,' and "Burial of Kije." If this is to be regarded as a picture of an individual, it is to be assumed that the imaginary Kije was a light and pleasant little person, largely preoccupied with things military, who took his romance with lightness and whose fictitious birth, existence and death were as casual and carefree as those of any other figment of the imagination.

A personality of this description could scarcely inspire music of great eloquence, yet he could trip along and leave behind him a sort of immortality as light as his own self. No personality has to be great to be agreeable, and Kije, although he may not have reached great emotional hights, would at least present no problems to his acquaintances.

Regarded as a cleverly conceived, pleasing series of orchestral sketches, "Lieut Kije" is highly successful. Its general effect is gay and slightly acid. On a concert program it would have a places as one of the lighter selections. The explanatory pamphlet that accompanies the Victor album, however, indicates that it was taken to have political implications at a concert in Paris in February, 1937. At this concert "an unidentified man attempted to tell the audience about Russian music in general and Prokofieff in particular." The Musical Times stated, "But he did not get very far. By the time he had reached his third or fourth platitude, folks became impatient." Le Menestral wrote, "At the beginning of the concert a speaker came forth to read remarks which were loudly cut short by a public of little patience. If he intended to elucidate the two composers, he taught us little. If to spread national propaganda, the attempt was clumsy and useless as well."

Perhaps the lieutenant, whose existence appears to have been innocent enough, could not have understood this fuss over his significance, for he creates no impression in the measures that describe him of any dark propagandistic meaning. Permitted to live his own life, he could be easily understood; taken as a puppet to stir up political feeling, he would become bewildered in a maze of isms pinned on him with all the ceremony of a lodge meeting. The lieutenant, could he think, would prefer his life to be gay, if short, and would probably not worry his head without being important to any one but himself. He is the genial creation of the pen of an extraordinarily gifted composer and can speak for himself without the assistance of haranguing missionaries.

Debussy's "Iberia"

Debussy's "Iberia" suite, written between 1907 and 1912, is played in another Victor album by the Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra of New York directed by John Barbirolli. It is a briliantly orchestrated set of three pieces with the Spanish atmosphere that a number of French composers have caught so successfully. The first of these, "Par les rues et par les chemins" (In the Streets and Roadsides), is lively and colorful and filled with insinuating rhythms and tunes. The second selection, "Les Parfums dans la nuit," (Fragrance of the Night), is somewhat reminiscent of one of Debussy's piano Preludes, "Les sons et les parfums," not only in the title but in the delicate, impressionistic line. "Le matin d'un jour de fete," (Morning of a Festival), is brief and vigorous. The suite, which is played with sure effect under Barbirolli, is an example of Debussy's most telling music.

Brahms's final chamber work, the Sonata for Clarinet and Piano in E-flat, Op 120, No 2, is played in its arrangement for viola by William Primrose, violist, and Gerald Moore, pianist, in a new Victor set. This is one of four works in which Brahms, who late in life became friendly with one of the clarinet virtuosos of that period and for him wrote a number of works for clarinet and various combinations of instruments.

Transcribed for viola, the E-flat sonata is a remarkably effective piece and reveals the composer in his latest and richest style. These final works have less of the so-called Brahmsian severity, are more intimate in feeling and more immediately ingratiating to the ear on first hearing than some of the earlier opuses. Like the late quartets of Beethoven, they speak less loudly and less directly. The sonata ends quietly, thus placing a period on the 24 chamber works of one of the 1[illegible]th century's greatest composers.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

OCT 19 1938

Music

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Headed By Dr. Koussevitzky for 15th Year, Returns to Providence And Wins Vigorous Applause.—Scores Offer Startling Contrasts

By G. Y. Loveridge

The summer's siege of silence was happily raised by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his men were welcomed to Metropolitan Theatre with perhaps even more than the customary cordiality, it being the 15th season that Dr. Koussevitzky has conducted. No other conductor of the orchestra has had so long a tenure.

At a time when civilization has grown afraid to go to bed in the dark, it is reassuring to see so large a public gathering for so exalted and gentle a purpose. It does not signify that all's right with the world, but it signifies that all's not wrong. At least, not yet.

The only alarums and excursions of the evening were musical ones. A Mozart divertimento in B-flat major, for strings and two horns, and Dvorak's symphony "From the New World," in E minor, were the beginning and the end. Between them, Berlioz's overture inspired by the life of the fabulous Cellini was substituted for what had been previously announced, Glazounov's symphonic poem about the fabulous Stenka Razin.

The Mozart was magnificent. It was intended for only two violins, a viola and bass, besides the horns; so that the inclusion of the orchestra's entire string choir put the two delegates from the brass section at a handsome disadvantage. In fact, they might almost as well not have played at all.

The strings, however, were superb, in all the glory of their coloring, suppleness and precision. They spun out with faultless clarity the webs of sound that only Mozart could design. If there was any lapse at all, it was among the first violins in the adagio; and yet this movement was so beautifully uttered that many persons broke into applause, before the suite was finished. The violas were particularly fine in certain of the variations. Dr. Koussevitzky may be said to have started the season by putting the orchestra's best foot forward.

The "Roman Carnival Overture" made a startling contrast. Berlioz, as is well known, enjoys firing off everything in the arsenal, all at once, if convenient. The fragile fancies evoked by Mozart were soon scattered by the succeeding hurricane of tone. Dr. Koussevitzky commanded with great spirit, and the orchestra proceeded to give the overture an exciting and glittering performance. Brisk strings, arresting English horn, tempestuous brass—it ended like a cavalry charge.

The Dvorak symphony was the nearest the program approached to the music of this century. It was an agreeable choice, and was effectively presented. The adagio introduction was taken very slowly (Dvorak himself once expressed the desire that it be taken "as slowly as possible"); the following allegro sparkled with vitality. The transparency of orchestral tone and the balance of the choirs were admirable. Dr. Koussevitzky made the whole work seem remarkably fresh and new for a symphony that is perhaps as well known as most. The largo was absorbing with the English horn at its best, singing a tune exquisitely suited to its voice. In this movement the trombones, on occasion, might have spoken with greater unanimity. The brisk accent of the strings in the scherzo and the fiery weaving of themes in the concluding allegro brought the evening to an electric close.

Dr. Koussevitzky, applauded vigorously again and again as the program progressed, several times brought the orchestra to its feet in acknowledgement.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

OCT 19 1938

Sparkling Gowns and Fur Boleros Seen at Concert

Velvets, Figured and Plain Crepes, Sheer Chiffons and Laces Also Are Noticed

Mozart, Berlioz and Dvorak, interpreted by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the b[illegible] Serge Koussevitzky, held the attention of local society last evening at the Metropolitan Theatre in the opening concert of the season.

But society, itself, came in for some spot-lighting as it paraded into the theatre in the stellar fashions of the new season. Fur boleros and sparkling gowns, essence of the season, were seen on many of the subscribers in the swank first rows of orchestra and mezzanine.

The lobby was occupied with music loving enthusiasts during intermission. Dinner frocks and formal evening gowns were noted in the fashionable array. Velvets, furred or self-trimmed, crepes, figured and plain, sheer chiffons and laces were some of the materials noticed in the assemblage. Teal blue, Dubonnet, coral pink, autumn gold, aquamarine, Royal blue and the ever fashionable back were outstanding in the shades of the gowns.

Mrs. Hovey T. Freeman's gown of Royal blue velvet was topped with a black velvet evening wrap. Mrs. Hugh F. MacColl was attired in a black dinner dress of crepe over which she wore a short fur jacket.

Mrs. J. Campbell Keighler and Mr. Keighler's sister, Mrs. M. W. K. Poore of Nutley, N. J., were noted in the throng. Mrs. Keighler wore a gown of blue lace and a black velvet evening wrap with a white fox collar. Mrs. Poore wore a black lace gown and an evening wrap of black velvet with a high standing collar of the same material.

Mrs. Ashbel T. Wall, Jr., was attractive in a gown of Chinese red printed crepe. Her only jewel was an antique diamond pendant and her gown was topped with a black velvet wrap. Mrs. Robert P. Brown, Jr., also wore a flowered crepe gown of Chinese red. Her evening coat was of deep purple tweed.

Mrs. Louis M. Ream was noted in a gown of black crepe with which she wore a shoulder cape of gray fur. Mrs. Lowell Emerson wore a black skunk cape with her white background flower chiffon gown. Mrs. Peter Pineo Chase's gown was of Chinese blue crepe threaded with gold and her jacket was a short model of black fur.

Mrs. Raymond G. Williams and her debutante daughter, Miss Janet Chace Williams, arrived together. Mrs. Williams wearing a black crepe gown with a sequins jacket and a velvet wrap of fuchsia color, and Miss Williams attired in peach color satin. Her gown was fashioned with a jacket and she wore a short white cape with a collar of soft white fur. Miss Martha S. Snow wore a black velvet gown with an evening coat of brilliant red velvet.

Mrs. Gerald Wallace Harrington wore a black velvet gown trimmed with ermine and a bright red old-fashioned quilted jacket. Mrs. Leonard B. Colt was noted in a flower print gown, the background of which was coral. With it she wore a cream brocade wrap.

Others noted in the audience were former United States Senator Jesse H. Metcalf and Mrs. Metcalf, Mrs. Murray S. Danforth, Mrs. Samuel M. Nicholson, Mr. William S. Innis and daughter, Miss Elizabeth W. Innis, Mrs. Robert H. I. Goddard, Mrs. E. Nicholson White and her twin daughters, Miss Elizabeth G. White and Miss Kate M. White, and their house guest, Miss Natalie Merrill of Newport, Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence Lanpher, Mrs. Byron S. Watson and Miss Betty Watson, Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Clifford, Mrs. Rathbone Gardner and her daughter, Miss Ellen Rathbone Gardner.

Mrs. Albert H. Poland and her daughter, Miss Mary Louise Poland, Miss Elizabeth C. Hinckley, Mrs. Claude R. Branch, Mr. and Mrs. Edward S. Jones, Miss Helen Ray Potter, Mr. and Mrs. William Kinsley Low, Mrs. William Osborn Todd, Mrs. George Hill MacLean and Miss Ruth Tripp.

GARY, IND.
POST-TRIBUNE

OCT 21 1938

In The Realm of Music

By— A.B. DICKSON

A recent biographical sketch of George Koussevitsky brings out some interesting facts. It speaks of Boston as "the cultural power house" of the United States and mentions the Boston symphony orchestra as being a monument to Boston's Brahmin gentility.

Whether the Boston symphony orchestra is "the finest of its kind in the United States (although rivaled in recent years by the Philadelphia and the New York Philharmonic Society) is a matter of opinion and in this neck of the woods there are many Chicago Symphony orchestra adherents who would challenge this statements.

We have always held that a comparison of great orchestras and artists was a futile pastime by which nothing was accomplished.

Koussevitsky is idolized by the citizens of Boston and other cities. Although a Russian by birth he has always been eager to bring out the music of American composers even to the extent of experimenting with ultra modern compositions.

MANCHESTER, N. H.
LEADER

OCT 22 1938

First of Matinees by Symphony on Tuesday

An extraordinary afternoon awaits the audiencs—including citizens of this community—which will attend the opening of the six "Commuters' matinees" of the Boston Symphony next Tuesday at 3 o'clock.

The orchestra's world-famous leader, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, noting that Tuesday is the exact centenary of the birth of the brilliant and tragically short-lived Bizet, composer of that operatic favorite, "Carmen," will open the program with his "L'Arlesienne Suite No. 1."

A noted two-piano "team" will be soloists in Mozart's Concerto in E. These matched players are Pierre Luboshutz and his wife, known professionally as Genia Nemenoff.

For climax to the concert will come Beethoven's Symphony No. 5, persistently, if debatably, supposed to be built on the phrase "Thus Does Fate Knock."

QUINCY, MASS.
PATRIOT LEDGER

OCT 19 1938

Boston Symphony Series Will Open

Concerts a half hour late have considerately been arranged by the Boston Symphony orchestra so that listeners may arrive early from distant points. These "Commuters' Matinees" begin Tuesday, Oct. 25, at 3 o'clock, instead of 2:30 o'clock, when the regular weekly Friday concerts start. There will be six Commuters' Matinees, played once a month, omitting November.

The celebrated Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct four of the Tuesday concerts. Two distinguished guest conductors will present the remaining programs. They will be the great Russian composer and pianist, Igor Stravinsky, and the famous Rumanian composer and violin virtuoso, Georges Enesco. The same programs heard on Tuesday afternoons will be played on Monday evenings.

The present season is the 58th of the Boston Symphony orchestra. It is also the 15th consecutive season of Dr. Koussevitzky's conductorship—the longest, and critics declare the most brilliant and varied, record achieved by any conductor in the orchestra's history.

It is reported from Symphony hall that the past three years have shown a decided increase in interest in symphony concerts. This is particularly true, officials say, in respect to the number of young men and women attending. They are found as subscribers to all four of the symphony series—24 programs each on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, and six each on Monday evenings and Tuesday afternoons.

A season ticket for the Monday and Tuesday series may be had at one-fourth the cost of the 24 Friday and Saturday performances, although the subscribers will hear the same high standard of programs, played by the full strength personnel of 110 Boston Symphony musicians.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL

OCT 1 9 1938

America's Symphony Leader No. 1

Russian Born Koussevitzky of Boston Is a Gray Haired Aristocrat Who Rules Musicians With Firm Hand, and Has Reputation of Being World's Best Bull Fiddler

IN AMERICA Toscanini confines himself to 15 radio concerts a year; Stokowski has relinquished much of his activity with the Philadelphia orchestra. So that leaves Sergei Koussevitzky of the Boston orchestra as the orchestra director who is regarded as the greatest now practicing in America. Many critics rate him as the finest conductor in the world.

The Russian took charge of the Boston orchestra in 1924, when it had sunk to low estate. Karl Muck, the great German who had led the Boston band to eminence, was accused of espionage in the World war and was deposed. For several years thereafter the organization declined. Then Koussevitzky was imported from Europe and today the Boston orchestra is at its old peak. Time magazine says:

Koussevitzky was not in 1924 one of the towering figures of European music. Conservative Bostonians, in fact, found him at first somewhat exaggerated and theatrical. But soon Boston began to admit that Koussevitzky had two things: An uncannily transparent tone that only he seemed able to elicit from the orchestra, and a repertory that was larger and more varied than that of any other conductor in the United States. He introduced the United States to such important modernist figures as William Walton, Paul Hindemith and Zoltan Kodaly.

When Boston's concert goers gather in Symphony hall they see a haughty, gray haired, tyrannical aristocrat stride to the podium in faultlessly tailored morning clothes, bow to the audience, then turn imperiously to the orchestra. As he raps for attention he claps a pince-nez to his nose. Before he turns again to the audience to take his bow, the pince-nez is removed. During the performance his rear view presents the most thoroughly studied and poised appearance to be seen on any symphonic podium in the United States. Even in climaxes where the average maestro would be fighting the air with fury, Koussevitzky's figure is calm.

Koussevitzky on parade and Koussevitzky in rehearsal are as different as night and day. While trombonists sweat, fiddlers fidget and horn players dump saliva from their instruments, Koussevitzky, hunched in an old sweater, shouts, sings, gesticulates, lunges and paddles with his baton, grins froglike at pleasant sounds, scolds frantically in heavily battered English. "You must zing," he admonishes, "you must blay the nuts." "Vonderful, vonderful!" he exclaims, when the orchestra's tone suits him. "Don't spik!" he furiously warns some innocent player who is trying to make a suggestion. "If you spik, I go home!"

Since the Boston symphony is the only important nonunion orchestra in the country, musicians who cross Koussevitzky risk their jobs. Stories of his tyranny (sometimes apocryphal) have become legend among musicians. Typical is that of the musician who persisted in playing sour notes. Exasperated, Koussevitzky finally shouted: "You are fired. Ged out. Ged out!" That ended the rehearsal. On his way out the discharged musician passed the dressing room, where the conductor was sitting gloomily hunched over a desk. The musician stopped. "Nuts to you, Koussevitzky!" he bellowed. Koussevitzky turned his haughty head. "It's too late to abologize," he snapped.

* * *

Conservative in his tastes, 64 year old Sergei Koussevitzky lives in a large rented house in the quiet Boston suburb of Brookline. Its furnishings and decoration are completely American, its staff completely Russian. The chief factotum is a blond, grinning, gangling valet named Victor, who follows his master about with serflike devotion. Victor has many duties, among them that of drying off his master who is always drenched with perspiration at the end of each concert. Victor's wife is the cook, who prepares Koussevitzky's regular and carefully chosen meals. Regularly and carefully apportioned are all his daily habits, with so much time allowed for rehearsing, so much for walking, so much for studying his scores, for the Boston symphony's aging master takes systematic and excellent care of himself.

Though he is a tyrant on the podium, Koussevitzky in private life is an affable, courtly, talkative, rather posey Russian gentleman of the old school. While his tastes in music range from the eighteenth century up to the streamlined present, his tastes in nearly everything else are old worldly. Temperamentally a romantic, he loves to brood over Schopenhauer and Nietzsche.

* * *

Though he has long been a champion of the works of young Soviet composers, he has little enthusiasm for Russia's present form of government. Always loud in his praise of the United States, he took out his first American citizenship papers three years ago.

Koussevitzky has taken few of life's bumps. One good reason has been Natalya Konstantinovna Koussevitzkaya, his Russian wife. Koussevitzky is her career. Once a sculptress, she has not only spent the best part of her life smoothing out her husband's path; she also played an important part in putting him on the path in the first place.

The facts of Koussevitzky's life belie his haughty mien but not his profession. He was born in 1874 in the central Russian village of Vyshny Volochek. His mother, who died shortly after he was born, was a pianist; his father gave lessons on the violin. A poor boy, destined by a traditionally musical family for a musical career, he was soon on his way to Moscow in search of a scholarship at Moscow's Philharmonic conservatory. Because he was late in applying, and because there were only a few places left in the conservatory orchestra, the only scholarships open to him were for instruction on the trombone, the bassoon or the string bass. As the least of three evils, young Koussevitzky chose the bull fiddle (string bass). So expert did he become that eventually he toured Europe as a soloist on this clumsiest of instruments. He is regarded as the best contrabass player in the world.

It was during his days as a mustachioed virtuoso on the bass that he met Natalya Konstantinovna. While sawing the thick strings of his instrument at a Moscow concert, he noticed a girl in the front row, gazing at him in maidenly admiration. Koussevitzky's heart jumped, he sawed away more sweetly than ever. After the concert he searched for his admirer, but she had gone. For weeks romantic Koussevitzky was in a lovesick daze. Months later, at another concert, he spied her again in the audience and made his instrument serenade her with mournful and passionate moans. Again she eluded him. It was not until two years afterward that they met and married.

Like many a successful conductor's wife, Natalya Konstantinovna was a woman of means. Together they financed an orchestra for Koussevitzky to practice on, and gave a series of concerts in Moscow and St. Petersburg. The Koussevitzky concerts began to catch on with the Russian public. The Koussevitzkys chartered a ferryboat and made a tour of the Volga. By 1910 Koussevitzky was the most widely known maestro in Czarist Russia. Meanwhile, he had started a publishing house for music by contemporary Slavic composers, published for the first time (thus, incidentally, sparing himself the performance royalties) works by such famed artists as the late Alexander Scriabin, Sergei Prokofieff and Igor Stravinsky.

The revolution of 1917 put a stop to this. Zealous Bolsheviks liquidated Koussevitzky's self-endowed orchestra and publishing house and offered him instead the post of Russia's musical head man. He declined, though he accepted for a time the conductorship of Petrograd's state orchestra, where his dictatorial instincts were continually curbed by bureaucratic regulations. Once officers of the GPU caught him attempting to escape to Estonia. When he did get a passport to leave the country, he abandoned virtually all of his money and personal property to the Soviet government.

Sergei Koussevitzky of Boston

LOWELL, MASS.
LEADER

OCT 22 1938

Music Lovers at Boston Symphony

Lowell will be represented by many music lovers at the first of a series of six commuters' matinees next Tuesday afternoon at Symphony Hall in Boston where Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will direct the Boston Symphony orchestra and a noted two-piano team will be heard.

The orchestra's world-famous leader, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, noting that Tuesday is the exact centenary of the birth of the brilliant and tragically short-lived Bizet, composer of that operatic favorite, "Carmen," will open the program with his "L'Arlesienne Suite, No. 1." In its ways, this suite is as dazzingly orchestrated and dramatically felt as "Carmen."

A noted two-piano "team" will be soloists in Mozart's Concerto in E. These beautifully-matched players are Pierre Luboshutz and his wife, known professionally as Genia Nemenoff. He is a graduate of the Moscow conservatory, and she a pupil of the famous Isidor Philipp of the Paris conservatory. They discovered their perfect adaptability to playing compositions, for two pianos, while engaging in private performances for the entertainment of friends.

For climax to the concert will come Beethoven's Symphony No. 5, persistently, if debatably, supposed to be built on the phrase, "Thus Does Fate Knock." By many critics, Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of this work is rated without superior.

Audiences at the commuters' matinees travel a total of 60,000 miles in an afternoon, on their round trip to and from Symphony Hall. They come from every New England state except Vermont.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 1 9 1938

MUSIC

Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Return to Providence to Start Their 15th Season; Mozart and Dvorak Feature Program

By G. Y. Loveridge

The summer's siege of silence was happily raised by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his men were welcomed to Metropolitan Theatre with perhaps even more than the customary cordiality, it being the 15th season that Dr. Koussevitzky has conducted. No other conductor of the orchestra has had so long a tenure.

At a time when civilization has grown afraid to go to bed in the dark, it is reassuring to see so large a public gathering for so exalted and gentle a purpose. It does not signify that all's right with the world, but it signifies that all's not wrong. At least, not yet.

The only alarums and excursions of the evening were musical ones. A Mozart divertimento in B-flat major, for strings and two horns, and Dvorak's symphony "From the New World," in E minor, were the beginning and the end. Between them, Berlioz's overture inspired by the life of the fabulous Cellini was substituted for what had been previously announced, Glazounov's symphonic poem about the fabulous Stenka Razin.

The Mozart was magnificent. It was intended for only two violins, a viola and bass, besides the horns; so that the inclusion of the orchestra's entire string choir put the two delegates from the brass section at a handsome disadvantage. In fact, they might almost as well not have played at all.

The strings, however, were superb, in all the glory of their coloring, suppleness and precision. They spun out with faultless clarity the webs of sound that only Mozart could design. If there was any lapse at all, it was among the first violins in the adagio; and yet this movement was so beautifully uttered that many persons broke into applause, before the suite was finished. The violas were particularly fine in certain of the variations. Dr. Koussevitzky may be said to have started the season by putting the orchestra's best foot forward.

The "Roman Carnival Overture" made a startling contrast. Berlioz, as is well known, enjoys firing off everything in the arsenal, all at once, if convenient. The fragile fancies evoked by Mozart were soon scattered by the succeeding hurricane of tone. Dr. Koussevitzky commanded with great spirit, and the orchestra proceeded to give the overture an exciting and glittering performance. Brisk strings, arresting English horn, tempestuous brass—it ended like a cavalry charge.

The Dvorak symphony was the nearest the program approached to the music of this century. It was an agreeable choice, and was effectively presented. The adagio introduction was taken very slowly (Dvorak himself once expressed the desire that it be taken "as slowly as possible"); the following allegro sparkled with vitality. The transparency of orchestral tone and the balance of the choirs were admirable. Dr. Koussevitzky made the whole work seem remarkably fresh and new for a symphony that is perhaps as well known as most. The largo was absorbing with the English horn at its best, singing a tune exquisitely suited to its voice. In this movement the trombones, on occasion, might have spoken with greater unanimity. The brisk accent of the strings in the scherzo and the fiery weaving of themes in the concluding allegro brought the evening to an electric close.

Dr. Koussevitzky, applauded vigorously again and again as the program progressed, several times brought the orchestra to its feet in acknowledgement.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
RECORD

OCT 23 1938

ON THE RECORD

The Khan Konchak, chief of the Polovtsy tribe of Central Asia, was a generous foe. When he conquered Prince Igor, his Boyar enemy, he treated him regally, chivalrously. At a banquet in honor of his captive, the Khan disported his subjects in wild, barbaric dances for the prince's benefit. There were dances of wild men, of young boys and girls, of slave girls and prisoners, culminating in a general dance of the whole tribe.

This bizarre music, in savag vigorous rhythms, wild and exci ing, comes to brilliant life again i the recording by Leopold Stokowsk and the Philadelphia Orchestra of Borodin's Dances of the Polovetzki Maidens, from "Prince Igor." (Victor. M-499. $4.50.) It makes a prize album.

Weird Dance Music.

Fit companion-piece is anothe style in weird dance music, the Bacchanale from Saint-Saens' "Samson and Delilah," given a colorful dashing performance by the Boston "Pops" Orchestra under [illegible] (Victor. 12318. $1.50.)

Delightful miniatures of a long lost day are the Haydn: Four Divertimenti for Flute and Strings, played by Rene Le Roy (flute) Jean Pasquier (violin) and Etienn

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

OCT 19 1938

First Concert of the New Season Brings Society Into Musical Reunion

Providence demonstrated its affection for Symphony Orchestra Leader Serge Koussevitzky and his musicians last night when the large auditorium of the Metropolitan Theatre [illegible]most to the last seat. Photographed on their way to hear the Boston Symphony's program were: across the page, Mr. and Mrs. Robert H. I. Goddard, Jr.; Miss Ellen R. Gardner and her mother, Mrs. Rathbone Gardner; Miss Betty Innis, followed by her father, William S. Innis.

39

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Evening Public Ledger

CT 22 1938

The Critic Talks to
MUSIC LOVERS

By SAMUEL L. LACIAR

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, recently contributed a paper to the Proceedings of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, entitled "Poetry and Music; Musical Interpretation, and Some Remarks About American Orchestras." Naturally, from Dr. Koussevitzky's high position among the great orchestral conductors of the world, anything that he says about the matter of musical interpretation and about orchestras, either American or foreign, must be received with the greatest respect. Music, he says, gave rise to the art of interpretation, thus creating in its own sphere a second and auxiliary art which poetry does not know at all. In poetry, interpretation is very artificial and changes into a dramatic pose—a pose because it appears an imitation of theatrical art from which poetical interpretation must borrow, for in poetry's own sphere as an organic art it cannot arise.

Interpretation as an auxiliary art is above all most closely connected with music. Dr. Koussevitzky asserts that interpretation, especially the art of conducting, is still very young, when we consider that Berlioz, Mendelssohn and Wagner, who appeared at about the same time as the leading conductors of their epoch, were, indeed, the first conductor-interpreters. In fact, they founded a new school, and he says that Wagner was the first conductor who turned his back to the audience when leading an orchestra. Before him, conductors stood "a trois quart," facing the public. "You can well imagine," says the Boston conductor, "what little influence a conductor could have on an orchestra, standing with his back to the musicians. But in those days the art of interpretation in conducting was not known."

* * *

CONDUCTORS were then mostly "time beaters," who did not even trouble to rehearse, assigning the concertmaster to this duty, from which arose that title and the public performance consisted simply of playing in time without consideration for detail or perfection. Any virtuoso player having a solo passage to play, performed it with the utmost individuality, disregarding the whole conception of the work, its general meaning or line. It was Wagner and Mendelssohn who created the revolution in the sphere of conducting. They no longer "beat time" alone; they built up the musical phrase. Yet this was still far from the modern art of conducting. The geniuses of Mendelssohn and Wagner were totally opposite; Wagner was essentially romantic, Mendelssohn essentially constructive.

Dr. Koussevitzky believes that Mendelssohn's art of conducting is nearer to our day than the art of Wagner, because Mendelssohn's approach to musical compositions was more abstract than Wagner's approach. However, he calls attention to the fact that, in their time, almost the entire younger generation followed Wagner, and not Mendelssohn, because Wagner reflected his epoch immeasurably more than did Mendelssohn. It is also interesting to mark the difference of their conceptions of musical compositions. At this point in his address the Allegretto Scherzando from Beethoven's Eighth Symphony and the "Freischeutz" overture of Weber were played on a piano to illustrate the difference of tempo.

* * *

MENDELSSOHN'S interpretation was shown to be faster, more rigid and more precise; Wagner's was freer and more emotionally expressive in its phrasing. At the close of this illustration Dr. Koussevitzky asked: "Which of the two was right?" and answered his own question with "We cannot say." Here, he said, we actually come to the problems of interpretation. Before the World War interpretative art was strongly influenced by the romantic school. That is, the interpreter regarded a musical composition as an artist-painter would regard a landscape; to him it was an "aspect of nature" which he took and reflected as he saw, felt and understood it. Therefore one and the same landscape in the hands of two artists will have a different reflection.

In all ages, continued Dr. Koussevitzky, artists have been the prophets of either the rise or the downfall of a culture, and thus, in the pre-war period, leading artists introduced decadence in art before it manifested itself in the social and political life of the post-war period. Decadence in musical interpretation in some countries grew to such proportions that not only were the lights and shadings distorted, but the form itself was lost. At the same time, artists in other countries, also instinctively foreseeing that decline, attempted to straighten the distorted line of classical art.

* * *

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY deals at length with the right of musical performers to interpret compositions freely, and they hold that right from the composer himself. As illustration, he mentioned Bach, in whose works "we frequently find no nuances," but that positively does not mean that Bach intended to have his works played without nuances; he simply left that freedom to the performers. Thus, also, in the classical concertos of Mozart and Beethoven there are few if any cadenzas written by the composer, who left that to the interpreter. Wagner also intentionally wrote no exact definition of tempo, because, as he said in his book on conducting, the talented conductor will find the right tempo and the untalented one will never find it, even if printed in the score.

In this connection Dr. Koussevitzky related a personal experience with Sibelius regarding the fourth symphony of that composer. Failing either to feel or to understand a tempo mark of the scherzo he wrote the composer about it, and Sibelius replied that "the right tempo is the one that the artist feels." So, inquires Dr. Koussevitzy, "where is, after all, the truth of interpretation, and how can an artist justify that truth?"

That part of Dr. Koussevitzy's paper relating to the "central line" of the greatest composers and to American orchestras will be discussed in this column next Saturday.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

OCT 23 1938

MONDAY AND TUESDAY SYMPHONY SERIES

Tomorrow evening at 8.15, and Tuesday afternoon at three o'clock, the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will give the first concerts of the shorter series of six pairs in Symphony hall. The opening programme will be of special interest in that the distinguished paired pianists, Pierre Luboshutz and Genia Nemenoff, will make their first appearance with the orchestra. They will perform Mozart's Concerto for two pianofortes, in E flat major. Both artists, who in private life are Mr. and Mrs. Pierre Luboshutz, are Russian by birth. Pierre Luboshutz had his early training in Moscow, while Genia Nemenoff studied at the Paris Conservatoire under Isidor Phillipp. Each acquired a considerable reputation as a solo artist before the two combined their talents in music for two pianists.

Next Tuesday, October 25, will mark the hundredth anniversary of the birth of Georges Bizet, and in recognition of the event, Dr. Koussevitzky wil include upon this programme the first suite from Bizet's music to Daudet's play "L'Arlesienne". It has been his "L'Arlesienne" music, together with his opera "Carmen," which has perpetuated the name of Bizet these many years. The Symphony upon this programme will be the Fifth of Beethoven, in C minor.

WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN

OCT 26 1938

100TH ANNIVERSARY OF BIZET MARKED

Boston, Oct. 25. —(AP)— The 100th birthday anniversary of Georges Bizet, composer of "Carmen" and other successful operas, was observed today by the Boston Symphony orchestra, which performed his "L'Arlesienne Suite" No. 1.

Added to the orchestra for this composition was a saxophone, Conductor Serge Koussevitzky pointing out that Bizet was the first outstanding composer to employ this new instrument, invented during that era by Adolph Saxe.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
JOURNAL

OCT 23 1938

IN ATHENS

Dmitri Mitropoulos, conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra, is shown leading the stringed orchestra in the ancient Roman theater under the Acropolis in Athens. Below is Dr. Sergei Koussevitsky at work with the Boston Symphony.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 23 1938

WITH SOME

THE St. Louis Symphony Orchestra, under Vladimir Golschmann, will open its fifty-ninth season this Friday afternoon and Saturday night in St. Louis with a program containing the Brahms First symphony, Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," Ravel's "La Valse" and Weber's overture to "Oberon."

Bizet's first "L'Arlésienne" suite will be played by the ~~Boston~~ Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, this Tuesday in Boston in honor of the centennial of the composer's birth, which falls on that day. The program for this Friday afternoon and Saturday night includes Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," Roussel's "Rapsodie Flamande" and Berlioz's "Fantastic" symphony.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 23 1938

New Symphony Record

With a total of 200 concerts scheduled during the current season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is establishing a record believed to be unique in American music. Its nearest rival in activity is the Philadelphia Symphony, which will appear in 118 formal concerts between now and next spring.

The Boston schedule includes not only the formal concerts but also the "pop" concerts, several weeks of free concerts outdoors and participation in the Berkshire Festival. More than half of its concerts will be directed by the permanent conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 23 1938

Capacity audiences attended two concerts at the Metropolitan Theatre last week. On Tuesday evening, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the [illegible] Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, presented its first program of the season here.

The following evening, Richard Crooks, noted tenor, gave an unusually interesting and varied program, under auspices of the Providence Community Concert Association.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

OCT 26 1938

"In all ages, artists were prophets of either the rise or the downfall of a culture."—Koussevitzky.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

OCT 23 1938

Commuter's Matinees

COMMUTER'S MATINEES for listeners who may arrive from distant points have been arranged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for Tuesdays, six of them through the Winter at 3 o'clock instead of 2.30 when the regular Friday concerts start. Once a month, they begin this week, but omitt the November date which conflicts with the Thanksgiving holiday. A season ticket for this series may be had at one-fourth the cost of the twenty-four Friday performances, although the Tuesday subscribers will hear the same high standard of programs, played by the full strength personnel of 110 Boston Symphony musicians.

The celebrated Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct four of the Tuesday concerts. Two very distinguished guest conductors will present the remaining programs. They will be the great Russian composer and violin virtuoso, Georges Enesco. The same programs heard on Tuesday afternoons will be played on Monday evenings, on the same reduced subscription

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Evening Public Ledger

CT 22 1938

The Critic Talks to
MUSIC LOVERS

By SAMUEL L. LACIAR

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, recently contributed a paper to the Proceedings of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, entitled "Poetry and Music; Musical Interpretation, and Some Remarks About American Orchestras." Naturally, from Dr. Koussevitzky's high position among the great orchestral conductors of the world, anything that he says about the matter of musical interpretation and about orchestras, either American or foreign, must be received with the greatest respect. Music, he says, gave rise to the art of interpretation, thus creating in its own sphere a second and auxiliary art which poetry does not know at all. In poetry, interpretation is very artificial and changes into a dramatic pose—a pose because it appears an imitation of theatrical art from which poetical interpretation must borrow, for in poetry's own sphere as an organic art it cannot arise.

Interpretation as an auxiliary art is above all most closely connected with music. Dr. Koussevitzky asserts that interpretation, especially the art of conducting, is still very young, when we consider that Berlioz, Mendelssohn and Wagner, who appeared at about the same time as the leading conductors of their epoch, were, indeed, the first conductor-interpreters. In fact, they founded a new school, and he says that Wagner was the first conductor who turned his back to the audience when leading an orchestra. Before him, conductors stood "a trois quart," facing the public. "You can well imagine," says the Boston conductor, "what little influence a conductor could have on an orchestra, standing with his back to the musicians. But in those days the art of interpretation in conducting was not known."

* * *

CONDUCTORS were then mostly "time beaters," who did not even trouble to rehearse, assigning the concertmaster to this duty, from which arose that title and the public performance consisted simply of playing in time without consideration for detail or perfection. Any virtuoso player having a solo passage to play, performed it with the utmost individuality, disregarding the whole conception of the work, its general meaning or line. It was Wagner and Mendelssohn who created the revolution in the sphere of conducting. They no longer "beat time" alone; they built up the musical phrase. Yet this was still far from the modern art of conducting. The geniuses of Mendelssohn and Wagner were totally opposite; Wagner was essentially romantic, Mendelssohn essentially constructive.

Dr. Koussevitzky believes that Mendelssohn's art of conducting is nearer to our day than the art of Wagner, because Mendelssohn's approach to musical compositions was more abstract than Wagner's approach. However, he calls attention to the fact that, in their time, almost the entire younger generation followed Wagner, and not Mendelssohn, because Wagner reflected his epoch immeasurably more than did Mendelssohn. It is also interesting to mark the difference of their conceptions of musical compositions. At this point in his address the Allegretto Scherzando from Beethoven's Eighth Symphony and the "Freischeutz" overture of Weber were played on a piano to illustrate the difference of tempo.

* * *

MENDELSSOHN'S interpretation was shown to be faster, more rigid and more precise; Wagner's was freer and more emotionally expressive in its phrasing. At the close of this illustration Dr. Koussevitzky asked: "Which of the two was right?" and answered his own question with "We cannot say." Here, he said, we actually come to the problems of interpretation. Before the World War interpretative art was strongly influenced by the romantic school. That is, the interpreter regarded a musical composition as an artist-painter would regard a landscape; to him it was an "aspect of nature" which he took and reflected as he saw, felt and understood it. Therefore one and the same landscape in the hands of two artists will have a different reflection.

In all ages, continued Dr. Koussevitzky, artists have been the prophets of either the rise or the downfall of a culture, and thus, in the pre-war period, leading artists introduced decadence in art before it manifested itself in the social and political life of the post-war period. Decadence in musical interpretation in some countries grew to such proportions that not only were the lights and shadings distorted, but the form itself was lost. At the same time, artists in other countries, also instinctively foreseeing that decline, attempted to straighten the distorted line of classical art.

* * *

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY deals at length with the right of musical performers to interpret compositions freely, and they hold that right from the composer himself. As illustration, he mentioned Bach, in whose works "we frequently find no nuances," but that positively does not mean that Bach intended to have his works played without nuances; he simply left that freedom to the performers. Thus, also, in the classical concertos of Mozart and Beethoven there are few if any cadenzas written by the composer, who left that to the interpreter. Wagner also intentionally wrote no exact definition of tempo, because, as he said in his book on conducting, the talented conductor will find the right tempo and the untalented one will never find it, even if printed in the score.

In this connection Dr. Koussevitzky related a personal experience with Sibelius regarding the fourth symphony of that composer. Failing either to feel or to understand a tempo mark of the scherzo he wrote the composer about it, and Sibelius replied that "the right tempo is the one that the artist feels." So, inquires Dr. Koussevitzy, "where is, after all, the truth of interpretation, and how can an artist justify that truth?"

That part of Dr. Koussevitzy's paper relating to the "central line" of the greatest composers and to American orchestras will be discussed in this column next Saturday.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

OCT 23 1938

MONDAY AND TUESDAY SYMPHONY SERIES

Tomorrow evening at 8.15, and Tuesday afternoon at three o'clock, the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will give the first concerts of the shorter series of six pairs in Symphony hall. The opening programme will be of special interest in that the distinguished paired pianists, Pierre Luboshutz and Genia Nemenoff, will make their first appearance with the orchestra. They will perform Mozart's Concerto for two pianofortes, in E flat major. Both artists, who in private life are Mr. and Mrs. Pierre Luboshutz, are Russian by birth. Pierre Luboshutz had his early training in Moscow, while Genia Nemenoff studied at the Paris Conservatoire under Isidor Phillipp. Each acquired a considerable reputation as a solo artist before the two combined their talents in music for two pianists.

Next Tuesday, October 25, will mark the hundredth anniversary of the birth of Georges Bizet, and in recognition of the event, Dr. Koussevitzky wil include upon this programme the first suite from Bizet's music to Daudet's play "L'Arlesienne". It has been his "L'Arlesienne" music, together with his opera "Carmen," which has perpetuated the name of Bizet these many years. The Symphony upon this programme will be the Fifth of Beethoven, in C minor.

WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN

OCT 26 1938

100TH ANNIVERSARY OF BIZET MARKED

Boston, Oct. 25. —(AP)— The 100th birthday anniversary of Georges Bizet, composer of "Carmen" and other successful operas, was observed today by the Boston Symphony orchestra, which performed his "L'Arlesienne Suite" No. 1.

Added to the orchestra for this composition was a saxophone, Conductor Serge Koussevitzky pointing out that Bizet was the first outstanding composer to employ this new instrument, invented during that era by Adolph Saxe.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
JOURNAL

OCT 23 1938

IN ATHENS
Dmitri Mitropoulos, conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra, is shown leading the stringed orchestra in the ancient Roman theater under the Acropolis in Athens. Below is Dr. Sergei Koussevitsky at work with the Boston Symphony.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 23 1938

WITH SOME

THE St. Louis Symphony Orchestra, under Vladimir Golschmann, will open its fifty-ninth season this Friday afternoon and Saturday night in St. Louis with a program containing the Brahms First symphony, Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," Ravel's "La Valse" and Weber's overture to "Oberon."

Bizet's first "L'Arlésienne" suite will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, this Tuesday in Boston in honor of the centennial of the composer's birth, which falls on that day. The program for this Friday afternoon and Saturday night includes Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," Roussel's "Rapsodie Flamande" and Berlioz's "Fantastic" symphony.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 23 1938

Capacity audiences attended two concerts at the Metropolitan Theatre last week. On Tuesday evening, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, presented its first program of the season here.

The following evening, Richard Crooks, noted tenor, gave an unusually interesting and varied program, under auspices of the Providence Community Concert Association.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 23 1938

New Symphony Record

With a total of 200 concerts scheduled during the current season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is establishing a record believed to be unique in American music. Its nearest rival in activity is the Philadelphia Symphony, which will appear in 118 formal concerts between now and next spring.

The Boston schedule includes not only the formal concerts but also the "pop" concerts, several weeks of free concerts outdoors and participation in the Berkshire Festival. More than half of its concerts will be directed by the permanent conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

OCT 26 1938

"In all ages, artists were prophets of either the rise or the downfall of a culture."—Koussevitzky.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

OCT 23 1938

Commuter's Matinees

COMMUTER'S MATINEES for listeners who may arrive from distant points have been arranged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for Tuesdays, six of them through the Winter at 3 o'clock instead of 2.30 when the regular Friday concerts start. Once a month, they begin this week, but omitt the November date which conflicts with the Thanksgiving holiday. A season ticket for this series may be had at one-fourth the cost of the twenty-four Friday performances, although the Tuesday subscribers will hear the same high standard of programs, played by the full strength personnel of 110 Boston Symphony musicians.

The celebrated Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct four of the Tuesday concerts. Two very distinguished guest conductors will present the remaining programs. They will be the great Russian composer and violin virtuoso, Georges Enesco. The same programs heard on Tuesday afternoons will be played on Monday evenings, on the same reduced subscription

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 23 1938

OPERA AND CONCERT

Bennett Completing New One-Act Work—Chicago Orchestra Finances

It is a significant thing that American composers are turning increasingly to native themes when they think of writing operas. In the past the subject was, more often than not, some grandiose story based on the Bible or some tale of blood and thunder that looked as if it belonged to the old-fashioned Italian opera-thriller school. But the trend seems to be away from the derivative and toward stories that are indigenous to America.

This morning's news is that Robert Russell Bennett, who is thoroughly American in his orientation and his composition, is at work on an opera drawn from one of this country's best loved spinners of tales. He is working on a dramatization of a story by O. Henry. It is not possible yet to reveal which story.

It seems strange, however, that O. Henry has not frequently been the source of inspiration of the lyric muse. His short stories are truly American in their flavor and compactness. Since they are well designed entities, they would seem to be naturals for operatic treatment, where the line of the story must be broad and direct.

Mr. Bennett's librettist is again Robert A. Simon, who fashioned an original book for a previous opera by the composer. This was "Maria Malibran," which was done at the Juilliard School. The new opera will probably be a one-acter. Mr. Bennett is finishing it between Hollywood and Broadway chores.

Another young American composer, one who has confined himself largely to what may be called pure in contradistinction to theatre music, has completed a brace of new works. He is Samuel Barber. One of these is not strictly new; it has a new dress. It is the adagio from the string quartet which was heard here recently. Mr. Barber has set it for string orchestra. The other work, all new, is called "Essay for Orchestra" and utilizes the full modern ensemble.

Although the Boston Symphony Orchestra attends to its adult audiences in its regular concerts at home and on the road, in the Spring "Pops," in the free Esplanade concerts, and in the annual Berkshire Festival, it has been somewhat remiss in recent years in its obligation to the youngsters of the city. Conscious of this obligation, Wheeler Beckett, conductor, assembled some seventy men of the B. S. O. and announced a series of three concerts especially for boys and girls of high school and junior high school ages. He gave clear warning that the "general public" was not invited, and that adults would be admitted only as escorts, not as music-lovers.

The series, which opened to a capacity house last week in Symphony Hall, is distinctive in certain important aspects. First, price of tickets. With the aid of a generous group of sponsors, Mr. Beckett was able to offer 400 subscriptions at 60 cents for the entire series, which were quickly taken by twenty-five Boston Settlements. Some 1,800 seats were taken by public school students at $1 for the series, and the rest went to private schools.

The other departure from the conventional concerns the presentation of the concerts. Convinced that the music is the thing, Mr. Beckett has decided to throw overboard demonstration of instruments, stereoscopic slides and interminable speechifying. Instead, he has prepared music notes which will be sent in advance to the young subscribers.

Musical Boston is watching the progress of this series as a test case in a hitherto uncertain field of endeavor.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

OCT 25 1938

Berkshire Festival Reports Increase In Membership

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival reports an increasing number of members for the 1939 concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the new Tanglewood shed between Stockbridge and Lenox.

Memberships, limited to 3,000, are available only until Nov. 1. All seats will be reserved next year, but prices will not be advanced. Trustees point to an advantage of membership in an appreciable saving in the cost of tickets. Members pay about 50 percent of what tickets would cost if bought singly. Under the membership plan it is possible to attend concerts for less than a dollar.

Cost of Shed $91,193

Trustees have issued a brochure calling attention to accomplishments at Tanglewood—erection of the music shed at a cost of $91,193.95. The building contract, according to the brochure, was completed under the contract price and one month ahead of schedule.

More than 82 percent of the donations came from people living within a radius of 50 miles of Tanglewood and the trustees themselves contributed more than 40 percent of the total. It is estimated that $75,000 more will be necessary to complete the shed and drain and level the parking area and install adequate lighting. An item of extreme urgency, according to the trustees, is the enclosing of the shed immediately with roll curtains for protection in winter and for the audience in case of storms during concerts.

Money Obtained Unaided

"The money contributed thus far has been obtained without the aid of professionals at a cost of less than 3 percent," says the brochure. "The board of trustees believes the remaining amount can be secured in the same way."

Two other pertinent paragraphs from the brochure follow: "The Berkshire Symphonic Festival is non-profit-making and no dividends are paid. All operating expenses are paid from the sale of tickets. If there is a surplus, it is placed in a reserve fund to meet evtraordinary emergencies as, for example, the repairing of parking fields this summer at a cost of over $1,500.

"The 1934 and 1935 Festivals showed small deficits. The last three Festivals made a small surplus."

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

OCT 24 1938

BERKSHIRE SYMPHONIC FESTIVAL MEMBERS ARE ON THE INCREASE

Stockbridge, Oct. 24—The Berkshire Symphonic festival reports an ever-increasing number of members for the 1939 concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra at the new Tanglewood shed on route 183 between Stockbridge and Lenox. Memberships, limited to 3000, are available only until November 1. All seats will be reserved next year but prices will not be advanced.

Trustees point to advantages of membership as follows: An appreciable saving in the cost of tickets. Members pay about 50 per cent of what tickets would cost if bought singly. Under the membership plan it is possible to attend concerts for less than a dollar. First choice of seat locations. Attendance at no cost of a rehearsal by the orchestra.

Trustees have issued a brochure to all who have contributed to the building calling attention to accomplishments at Tanglewood—erection of the music shed at a cost of $91,193.95, which includes fees to the architect and engineer and chairs for the front section. The building contract, according to the brochure, was completed under the contract price and one month ahead of schedule. Information may be obtained from the office in Stockbridge.

WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN
OCT 23 1938

MUSIC

16 Symphony Orchestras To Spend 5 Millions For Concerts

By JOHN SELBY

(Associated Press Arts Editor)

New York, Oct. 22—The 16 leading symphony orchestras of the country are getting ready to spend more than $4,750,000 to give their communities the music they want.

This figure does not include the budgets of the many excellent secondary orchestras. Thanks to music project efforts, there now is no city of the United States of 50,000 or better without some sort of orchestra. Many smaller cities also have them.

It does not touch the money spent on hundreds of college orchestras, nor the cost of the high school orchestras which now number in the thousands.

The total spent for symphonic music in America has been estimated as high as 40 millions. Whatever it is, the record shows the communities like it.

Sokoloff Goes West.

Only one American city, Seattle, is reducing its symphony budget—and that is because of a peculiar local situation which may be changed with the advent of the new Seattle conductor, Dr. Nikolai Sokoloff.

Most budgets remain the same, although four cities will spend a little more this winter: Washington, Pittsburg, Indianapolis and Rochester, will spend more money on soloists.

Eleven of the 16 key cities report better ticket sales than last season, when most found attendance had improved over the preceding winter. Cleveland, where a new women's organization has got into the field, reports the largest advance sale in the orchestra's history, and even Boston, where big audiences have been the rule more than 50 years, is 5 per cent ahead.

Changes in Philadelphia.

Only Philadelphia reports a decrease, and that is "slight, and not alarming," according to Alfred Reginald Allen, manager. Philadelphia is one of three cities reporting changes in the status of its conductor. Eugene Ormandy is now "musical director", which means that he controls absolutely the personnel and the programs; Stokowski will appear as guest only, next spring.

In Pittsburg, Fritz Reiner becomes permanent conductor, his first similar berth since his days with the Cincinnati symphony. In Seattle Dr. Sokoloff replaces Dr. Basil Cameron, and although Eugene Goosens remains permanent conductor in Cincinnati, he will be late arriving, and Jose Iturbi, conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic, will take the first three pairs of the 20 comprising the season. Longest tenure among practising conductors goes to Frederick Stock, now beginning his 34th season in Chicago.

Philadelphia will have the longest season—30 weeks, of which four will be spent on tour. Seattle has the shortest, 12 concerts. Kansas City, where Karl Krueger has built an excellent orchestra since 1933, adds 10 concerts to its season; Pittsburg adds three weeks.

Rochester's Combination.

The only major departure from standard symphony practise is at Rochester, where the 50 men of the well known "civic" orchestra are engaged for a 28-week season, and are augmented by 35 more players for a concentrated symphony season of 12 weeks.

Twenty men have been added to four orchestras—fewest additions being at Boston where one more double bass will be found; most in Washington, where Hans Kindler will have 10 new men. Only one orchestra has reduced personnel. This is St. Louis, where three men have resigned, and have not been replaced as yet.

Philadelphia will play the most concerts, 118. Seattle plans fewest, only 13. Boston, where the symphony has not only its regular season, but a spring popular season and several weeks of free concerts out of doors, as well as a festival in the Berkshires, will do all told more than 200 concerts, a unique record in American music. More than half will be directed by the permanent conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

The 16 orchestras plan 1,315 concerts in their regular seasons. The budget total is $4,782,605. This is exactly $3,636.96 a concert. Approximately a quarter of this is returned through ticket sales; some orchestras are lucky, and have fairly extensive endowments, or (as in Detroit) fat radio contracts.

For most orchestras, however, October is the beginning of a battle. On one side is symphonic music, which the nation demands in larger and larger quantities. On the other is the big bad wolf, the deficit.

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
OCT 24 1938

Festival Membership List Closes Nov. 1st

Increasing Number of Members is Reported for 1939 Concerts by Boston Symphony Orchestra—All Seats Will be Reserved Next Year But Prices Will Not be Advanced—Trustees Issue Brochure to All Who Have Contributed to Building Calling Attention to Accomplishments at Tanglewood.

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival reports an ever increasing number of members for the 1939 concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the new Tanglewood shed on Route 183 between Stockbridge and Lenox. Memberships, limited to 3,000, are available only until Nov. 1. All seats will be reserved next year, but prices will not be advanced.

Trustees point to advantages of membership as follows:

An appreciable saving in the cost of tickets. Members pay about 50 per cent of what tickets would cost if bought singly. Under the membership plan it is possible to attend concerts for less than a dollar.

First choice of seat locations.

Attendance at no cost of a rehearsal by the orchestra.

Trustees have issued a brochure to all who have contributed to the building calling attention to accomplishments at Tanglewood—erection of the music shed at a cost of $91,193.95 which includes fees to the architect and engineer and chairs for the front section. The building contract according to the brochure was completed under the contract price and one month ahead of schedule.

More than 82 per cent of the donations came from people living within a radius of 50 miles of Tanglewood and the trustees themselves contributed more than 40 per cent of the total. It is estimated that $75,000 more will be necessary to complete the shed and drain and level the parking area and install adequate lighting. An item of extreme urgency according to the trustees is the enclosing of the shed immediately with roll curtains for protection in winter and for the audience in case of storms during concerts.

"The money contributed thus far has been secured without the aid of professionals at a cost of less than 3%," says the brochure. "The board of trustees believes the remaining amount can be secured in the same way. This can be assured if you will send in a donation for whatever amount you may feel disposed to contribute. The board of trustees can then turn their attention to the larger problem of the educational aspects of the Festival, particularly as concerns the children of the community who will constitute the future audiences. It is hoped educational programs may be organized for them in the schools as well as for grown-ups in local Festival clubs where recorded music of the great masters may be played.

"We hope you will want to join with us in this great enterprise by becoming a Festival 'stockholder'."

Three other pertinent paragraphs from the brochure follow:

"The Berkshire Symphonic Festival is non-profit-making and no dividends are paid. All operating expenses are paid from the sale of tickets. The accounts are audited each year. If there is a surplus, it is placed in a reserve fund to meet extraordinary emergencies, as, for example, the repairing of parking fields this summer at a cost of over $1,500.

"The 1934 and 1935 Festivals showed small deficits. The last three Festivals made a small surplus. The estimated 1938 operating budget of $51,000 was not exceeded.

"It is estimated that 36,000 people attended the six concerts in 1938. Many came from long distances, even from the Pacific coast and Canada. From the musical standpoint the performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the brilliant direction of Dr. Koussevitzky, were of outstanding merit. The enthusiasm of the audience was extraordinary and revealed an intimate sense of friendliness toward the conductor and the magnificent orchestra. The public was evidently conscious that this annual event is now assuming national and even international significance in the musical world. Its educational and cultural value is difficult to estimate."

Membership blanks may be obtained from the office in Stockbridge and contributions to the building fund may be addressed there, too.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

OCT 24 1938

Words About

Music

And Musicians

The first of six commuters' matinees will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow afternoon at 3.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, noting that Tuesday is the exact centenary of the birth of Bizet, will open the program with his L'Arlesienne Suite, No. 1 Pierre Luboshutz and his wife, known professionally as Genia Nemenoff, will be soloists in Mozart's Concerto in E. The Symphony No. 5.

Audiences at the commuters' matinees are said to travel a total of 60,000 miles on their round trip to and from Symphony Hall. They come from every New England state.

LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

OCT 25 1938

Music and The Drama

KOUSSEVITZKY LEADS BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FIRST OF COMMUTERS' MATINEES TODAY

An exceptional afternoon awaits the audience—including citizens of this community—which will attend the opening of the six Commuters' Matinees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra today at 3 o'clock.

The orchestra's world-famous leader, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, noting that Tuesday is the exact centenary of the birth of the brilliant and tragically short-lived Bizet, composer of that operatic favorite, "Carmen," will open the program with his "L'Arlesienne Suite, No. 1". In its way, this suite is as dazzlingly orchestrated and dramatically felt as "Carmen."

A noted two piano "team" will be soloists in Mozart's Concerto in E. These beautifully matched players are Pierre Luboshutz and his wife, known professionally as Genia Nemenoff. He is a graduate of the Moscow Conservatory, and she a pupil of the famous Isidor Philipp of the Paris Conservatory. They discovered their perfect adaptability to playing compositions for two pianos while engaging in private performances for the entertainment of friends.

For climax to the concert will come Beethoven's Symphony No. 5, persistently, if debatably, supposed to be built on the phrase "Thus Does Fate Knock." By many critics, Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of this work is rated without superior.

Audiences at the Commuter's Matinees travel a total of 60,000 miles in an afternoon, on their round trip to and from Symphony Hall. They come from every New England State.

41

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
OCT 26 1938

Orchestra May Go to Europe

Ernest B. Dane, President, Declines To Confirm Reports

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and its famed conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, may tour Europe in May as well as make its annual appearance later at the Berkshire Symphonic Festival in August, according to reports from Boston today.

Prospects for such a trip, seriously considered in 1929 and later dropped because of the depression, were revived last June when Dr. Koussevitzky returned from his annual trip abroad with assurances that only the lack of a $100,000 guarantee prevented the trip. He added that Europe was not only ready but "clamoring" for concerts by the Boston Symphony.

Ernest B. Dane, president of the board of trustees, declined to deny or confirm the report, while several other members of the board, when questioned, retorted they "couldn't say a word."

Questioning of some members, however, drew admissions that the board had met yesterday and that a tour abroad for the orchestra was taken up.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
OCT 26 1938

Boston Symphony May Make European Tour

BOSTON, Oct. 25 (AP)—Reports were published tonight that trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra had voted to send Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the famous 110-piece orchestra abroad next May for a European concert tour.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
OCT 26 1938

Hub Symphony Makes Europe Tour in 1939

BOSTON, Oct. 26 (UP) — The Boston Symphony orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, may make its long-contemplated European concert tour next year.

Trustees of the 110-piece orchestra were reported today to have voted to send it abroad in May. Such a tour was considered in 1929 but the idea was abandoned because of the depression.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION
OCT 26 1938

Boston Symphony May Tour Europe

BOSTON, Oct. 26 (AP)—Dr. Ernest B. Dane, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, declined today to confirm or deny published reports the board had voted to send Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky and the 110 musicians to Europe for a concert tour next May. The Boston Herald said other trustees admitted the tour was "in the air."

Last summer when Dr. Koussevitzky returned from abroad he announced Europe was "clamoring" for the orchestra but lack of a $100,000 guarantee prevented the trip.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript Telegram
OCT 26 1938

δ δ δ

THE Boston Symphony orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, may make its long-contemplated European concert tour next year. Trustees of the 110-piece orchestra were reported today to have voted to send it broad in May. Such a tour was considered in 1929 but the idea was abandoned because of the depression.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
OCT 26 1938

Standards of Music in America Highest in World, Says Koussevitzky

Famous Conductor Finds Art Outlet For Deep Emotion

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky in rehearsal with his Boston Symphony Orchestra. This famous symphony group will be presented twice in the coming Bushnell Concert series.

"At no time has the standard of musical performance been set as high as it is in America today. This is not a mere verbal statement; facts speak for themselves."

Serge Koussevitzky, who will open the Bushnell Series with a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Nov. 15, made this statement in an address recently before the American Academy of Arts and Sciences. His topic was "Poetry and Music; Musical Interpretations; and Some Remarks About American Orchestras."

Better Possibilities Here

"In Europe," he said, "even in the best of the old days, the symphony orchestras had not nearly the same possibilities as we have here. Nor was there the same intensity of work and interest. I shall take, for example, the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, one of the oldest in Europe. How many concerts did that orchestra give in the course of one season under the leadership of a great conductor? In its most brilliant period, the Berlin Philharmonic gave 10 concerts with Nikisch conducting. The remaining concerts were led by different and indifferent conductors. Yet that was the foremost orchestra of the time. A strikingly interesting period of the musical life of Vienna, which may well be termed 'heroic,' is the period when Gustav Mahler was at the head of the Vienna Opera Orchestra. That same orchestra gave also symphony concerts and was then called 'The Philharmonic.' However, it was, in the first place, an opera orchestra, the concerts came in between; there were, perhaps, 8 or 10 symphony concerts in a season, also conducted by various conductors. The possibilities in America are infinitely better, and give a new idea of orchestral performances.

"It is a mistake to think that musical life in America developes only because of America's wealth. This is wrong. Musical life in this country grows because there is need for music. That need for music today has an explanation: men seek an outlet for their best and deeper emotions, and they find it in music. For, music is the recovered word of true feeling, liberated from the banality, hypocrisy, and cruelty of life. Music is to help the souls of men. It is the pure language, regenerating, like the mountain air."

About Interpretations

Dr. Koussevitzky's view of interpretations may be seen from the following: "We have a great deal of evidence that musical performers have a right to interpret compositions freely. They hold that right from the composer. Take Bach, for example. In his works we very often find no nuances. Does it mean that Bach intended to have his compositions played without nuances? Positively no. The great Bach leaves that freedom to the performer. Take the classical concertos by Mozart and Beethoven: we find that cadenzas are very rarely written by the composer, who leaves the freedom of improvisation to the performer. In Wagner's scores, after "Tannhaeuser" and "Lohengrin," we find no exact indication of tempi. Wagner omitted it intentionally, and says in his book on the art of conducting that it is unnecessary to mark the exact tempo, because a talented conductor will find the right tempo anyway; and the untalented conductor will never grasp the tempo even if it is printed in the score. For that reason, Wagner marks his tempi in a general way, such as: 'Bewegt,' 'Massig bewegt," slower, faster, and so on."

Poetry and Music

Regarding the relationship between poetry and music Dr. Koussevitzky had this to say: "Only bad verses aspire to be pronounced, playing with the sonority of words; good verses are fond of stillness and silence. In music, we observe the opposite phenomenon: only bad music is hostile to its tonal expression—that is, music which contents itself with its outlines 'Papiermusik.' Good music requires to be unchained in reproduction.

"Music which does not sound appears to be a dead world and loses its significance; its meaning dwells only in the tonal realization. Verses which are not even read (let alone not pronounced) do not lose their active power, but keep, in a mysterious manner, the ascendency of poetry. Goethe and Petrach do not lose their power and strength, but are independent of the fact whether they are remembered and read."

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
OCT 26 1938

Festival Declines Offer To Move Office to Lenox

Trustees Report Stockbridge Citizens Prepared To Give Land and Erect Building

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival trustees yesterday voted unanimously not to accept the "gracious invitation" of the Selectmen of Lenox to move the Festival office to Lenox Town Hall. The Lenox officials had offered the former post office quarters under a three-year least at $1 per year with heat and light.

After action had been taken on the Lenox proposal, it was revealed that leading citizens of Stockbridge are prepared to give land and erect a building as permanent office quarters for the Festival. To help raise funds for this project or for some other project that will assist the Festival, Stockbridge citizens will conduct "the first annual harvest festival ball" at Red Lion Inn, Nov. 5.

Reply Delivered

The meeting of the Festival trustees was called to act on the Lenox proposal, to hear a report on the membership campaign for the 1939 concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra which closes Nov. 1, and to transact routine business. It was held at the home of Mrs. Charles Robinson Smith in Glendale. The reply delivered to the Lenox Selectmen today and signed by Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, president, was as follows:

"At a meeting of the board of trustees of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc., held yesterday, your gracious invitation to use office space in the Lenox Town Hall was considered with deep appreciation of the proffered hospitality and of the kind expressions accompanying it.

"After earnest discussion it was resolved that this generous offer must be declined.

"The trustees are sure that you will understand and sympathize with compelling reasons for this decision. Among others are the unwillingness to seem indifferent to the years of unfailing hospitality from Stockbridge and—of outstanding importance—the great business advantage to the Festival continuing the office address used since its inception.

"With renewed thanks for your thoughful and neighborly action."

Petition Signed by 200

A petition signed by 200 residents of Stockbridge was presented, but not until after action had been taken on the Lenox offer. This petition read: "We the citizens of Stockbridge, appreciating the enduring significance of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, petition the trustees, that the Festival, which originated in Stockbridge, continue to maintain its headquarters in Stockbridge village."

Then a second petition signed by 11 residents of the town headed by Selectmen William G. MacClintic, Clinton Foster and Fred B. Williams, was presented. This petition, addressed to Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, Festival president, read:

"We understand finances are influencing consideration of a change of the Festival headquarters. If the trustees of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival so desire, citizens of Stockbridge will furnish the Festival with office quarters, rent free, rather than permit Stockbridge to be deprived of offering continued hospitality to the Festival."

Other signers of this petition were Henry W. Dwight, president of the Housatonic National Bank and Festival treasurer; Charles A Acly, Stanley Harrod, Henry V Rathbun, Miss Anna King, Bernhard Hoffmann, Heaton I. Treadway and Harold Williams.

Programs and Prospects For Boston Music Halls

B. Trans.

The first performances of Ernst Krenek's new Piano Concerto will take place at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week, with the composer as soloist. The program will open with Haydn's Symphony in D major (No. 86) and close with "A Pagan Poem" by Loeffler.

Krenek, who is temporarily resident in this city, will be recalled as the composer of the jazz opera, "Jonny spielt auf," which had considerable vogue a decade ago and even entered the sacred portals of the Metropolitan Opera House in New York City. Subsequently Krenek through in his lot with the Schoenberg School; and the Concerto, as well as the opera "Charles V," produced at Prague last summer, is composed in the twelve-tone system.

At the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, on Thursday evening of next week, the program will consist of the aforementioned symphony of Haydn and tonepoem of Loeffler and of the Beethoven Fifth Symphony.

THE JEWISH ADVOCATE, FRIDAY, OCTOBER 28, 193

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By JULES WOLFFERS

Boston Symphony Orchestra

For last weeks concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky chose the following program: "Stenka Razin," Symphonic Poem, Op. 13, by Glazounov; Toccata, Variations and Fugue, for String Quartet and Orchestra, Op. 23, by Berezowsky (first performance); Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98, by Brahms.

The Glazounov overture is based on some incidents in the life of the Russian Robin Hood, Stenka Razin, who for a time terrified the Russian court and nobility with a rebellion which gained vast proportions. This hero of the people eventually was defeated and executed with the barbarity usual to 17th century Russia. The composer recounts musically the fate of a Persian princess, mistress of the outlaw, who was cast in the Volga for her somewhat impetuous admirer.

Russian-born Nicolai Berezowsky was present in a dual capacity at first hearing of his new work as composer and as second violinist in the Coolidge String Quartet which was soloist, so to speak, of the evening. An opinion of the merits of the piece seems impossible after but one hearing. It is, of course, interesting, as are all the products of this composer's pen. Whether or not the piece pleases is a matter of individual taste. One may perhaps question the form itself; that is, the use made of quartet and orchestra in just the way that the composer chose to do it. The work is not concerto-like, nor is there much use made of alternation between quartet and orchestra. Strictly speaking, the quartet is part of the orchestra. This composition, it is quite possible, would create a splendid effect as chamber-music if performed by a group of about 20 performers.

The Brahms fared magnificently at the hands of an inspired conductor and orchestra.

A note in the program-book reminded us that the annual meeting of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra would be held on Nov. 2. A contribution to this society is well worth one's serious consideration. The Friends of the Orchestra are a most valuable aid in helping to maintain the orchestra as one of the finest institutions of its kind in the world today. To enroll as a member one need simply send a contribution in any amount, large or small, to the Friend of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Symphony Hall, Boston, together with one's name and address. Many Boston music-lovers will not wish to miss this opportunity of showing in concrete fashion their appreciation of the splendid work that Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra have done and are doing for Boston's musical life.

B. Her. Oct. 29/38

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 4th regular concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. An all-French program was given in honor of the visit of the French ambassador, Count Rene de Saint-Quentin, as follows:

Suite, "Le Tombeau de Couperin" ... Ravel
Prelude a "L'apres-midi d'un faune" ... Debussy
Rapsodie Flamande Op. 56 .... Roussel
Symphonie fantastique, Op. 14a ... Berlioz

Mr. Somerset Maugham once observed that he had a sneaking sympathy with George Crabbe, who read the poetry of Scott, Byron, Wordsworth and Shelley and found it all stuff and nonsense. Similarly Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony is a masterpiece of romanticism that denies its favors to us, always excepting the "March to the Scaffold." For us it is a considerable feat of historical sleight-of-hand to get into the mood that makes Berlioz come alive as the remarkable and original composer that he was to his contemporaries. Judging, though, from the applause yesterday, there are many who have no difficulty in assuming such a state of mind.

What is there in Berlioz that today causes his music to stick in some throats? We have no trouble in taking delight in Schumann's romantic nature or in Weber's charming spirit of fantasy. It may be that there is a lack of musical density, as it were that brilliance of orchestration and vitality of emotion sufficiently covers up for some and not for others. Philip Hale said of those who do not today like Berlioz: "They have ears and they do not hear." That is a disquieting thought; but what school can teach what one's honest feelings reject?

In April, 1937 (not 1936 as the program note to the Berlioz had it) Dr. Koussevitzky also chose Roussel's Flemish Rhapsody to precede the Fantastic Symphony. It is a work that made a better first impression than it does a second, even though the earthy quality of the work is still impressive. Roussel did such extraordinary work in his 3rd and 4th Symphonies and had previously written gay and amusing pieces as well as ones of unusual intellectual content, that it was not unreasonable to expect him to caper with more grace in this Rhapsody.

The interesting aspect of this work is the authentic feeling for the music of the people, of the folk, if you must, that it achieves. Perhaps the composer meant us to sense the cumbersome qualities of a peasant. The Rhapsody is not at all conventional or specious; but the disappointment in hearing it for a second time is that it is not as ingenious and vital as it first appeared to be.

Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin" Suite was the most characteristically French music on the program. The Berlioz Symphony belonged to a vast trend in all the arts, one that depended on literature for its inspiration and was common to several countries. Roussel was purposely exploting Flemish music. Debussy was the musical leader of the important artistic movement of impressionism. But Ravel in this work displayed many of the finest points of French culture. It has been played here so often that there is no need to recapitulate its exquisite shading and the composer's wonderful ear for recondite harmony and just the instrumentation to set that harmony to best advantage.

The performances yesterday by Dr Koussevitzky and the orchestra were marvels of clarity and precision and with deep insight into the mood and emotion of the music. Dr. Koussevitzky led the Prelude and the Rigaudon and to some extent the Forlane of the Ravel at a very fast clip. It is one that the virtuosity of the musicians in the Boston Symphony can sustain, but it is possible that the archaic flavor of the Suite might better emerge at a slower pace.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the orchestra will play Haydn's Symphony in D major No. 86 and Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem." Ernest Krenek will be soloist in his own 2nd Piano Concerto.

SYMPHONY IN TRIBUTE TO FRANCE

B. — Post

Music Honors Visit of Ambassador de Saint-Quentin

Oct. 29/38

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In honor of the visiting French ambassador, Count Rene Doynel de Saint-Quentin, Dr. Koussevitzky presented an all-French programme at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon. Following the concert His Excellency was tendered a reception at Symphony Hall by Dr. and Mme. Koussevitzky and the Orchestra's trustees.

FROM FOUR COMPOSERS

Ravel, Debussy, Roussel and Berlioz, a fairly representative choice, French symphonic music being the relatively recent thing it is, were the composers of the afternoon. From the first came the Suite which pays such eloquent and touching homage to an ancient master, "The Tomb of Couperin"; from the second, the Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun"; from the third, the "Flemish Rhapsody," introduced here in the spring of 1937. Against these three shorter works was set one which equaled them all in length, the "Symphonie Fantastique."

If Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin," with its tactful and ingenious modernizing of old forms and style, its felicitous instrumentation, just imitative enough and just brilliant enough to satisfy on every count, can be regarded as an esthetic tour de force, that expression might as fittingly apply to yesterday's performance of it. The same Dr. Koussevitzky who can, if need be, ride the tonal hurricane can, when occasion demands, achieve effects of the utmost delicacy and precision.

Tender and Exquisite

As perfect in its way was the performance of Debussy's Prelude. Here entered the note of voluptuousness—to be sure, a tender and exquisite voluptuousness, and conductor and orchestra were equal to the occasion. Since first flute and first oboe have here almost a solo prominence, Dr. Koussevitzky included Messrs. Laurent and Gillet in the applause. For a second time the listener had been treated to rare tonal sensation. With Ravel, a dry wine; with Debussy, a sweet. Some may have preferred one, some the other. In the language of the distinguished guest, "Chacun a son gout."

Roussel's "Rhapsodie Flamande," with its sentiment and bonhomie, that set it so sharply apart from both Ravel's Suite and Debussy's Prelude, was repeated none too soon. The wedding of popular, homely melody and the symphonic style and manner could scarcely be more adroitly accomplished than here. And since neither Ravel's music nor Debussy's altogether escape the reproach of preciosity, Roussel's frankness was the more welcome.

Berlioz's "Fantastic"

With the "Fantastic," that extraordinary blend of genius and gaucherie, Dr. Koussevitzky completed a four-week's course in the standard symphonies, which had already offered Beethoven's Fifth, Dvorak's "New World" and the Fourth of Brahms.

Next week, happily, the spell will be broken. Haydn's little Symphony in D major, No. 86, hardly falls in that depressing category.

BRATTLEBORO, VT.
REFORMER

OCT 26 1938

ent.

SYMPHONY MAY GO ABROAD.

Boston Orchestra Trustees Admit Tour Is in Prospect.

BOSTON, Oct. 26 (AP)—Dr. Ernest B. Dane, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, declined today to confirm or deny published reports the board had voted to send Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky and the 110 musicians to Europe for a concert tour next May. The Boston Herald said other trustees admitted the tour was "in the air."

Last summer when Dr. Koussevitzky returned from abroad he announced Europe was "clamoring" for the orchestra but lack of a $100,000 guarantee prevented the trip.

Globe B. Oct. 29/38

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The program of the Boston Symphony concerts this week is devoted to music by French composers, in honor of the visit to Boston of Count Rene de Saint-Quentin, French Ambassador to the United States. As guest of the trustees of the orchestra and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, the Ambassador was present yesterday afternoon, sitting in an improvised box in the first balcony. After the concert, there was a reception in his honor in the foyer of Symphony Hall. In addition, there was an exhibition of French paintings loaned by Ex-Gov. Alvan T. Fuller.

Dr. Koussevitzky's selection of French music was excellent in every respect, consisting as it did of Ravel's suite "The Tomb of Couperin"; "The Afternoon of a Faun," by Debussy; Albert Roussel's "Flemish Rhapsody," and that imperishable bloom of romanticism, the "Fatastic" symphony by Berlioz.

Superlatives were long since exhausted upon Dr. Koussevitzky's magnificent readings of Ravel and Debussy, but they must be applied again to do justice to performances that could not be surpassed. Like his "Daphnis and Chloe" suites and "La Valse," Ravel's tonal memorial to the genius of Couperin is a masterpiece of its kind.

The brilliant and exacting solos for oboe and flute were again beautifully played by Messrs. Gillet and Laurent, respectively, who were rewarded with the applause of a truly captivated audience.

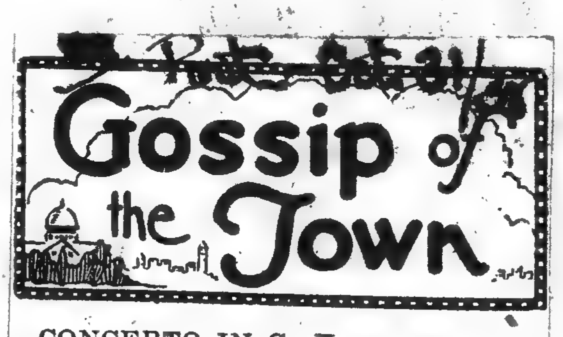
The "Flemish Rhapsody," based upon Flemish popular tunes, may not gain immortality for the gifted Roussel, but it is dashing music, cleverly devised and carried off with proverbial Gallic refinement. It seemed brilliant upon its first Boston performance a year ago last April. Yesterday it made an even deeper impression.

Some there are who still debate the worth of the "Fantastic" symphony. That is well, since to a certain extent art flourishes according to the amount of healthy discussion about it. Yet, granting its length and the inequality of Berlioz' musical ideas, the "Fantastic" symphony has survived remarkably well and it continues to enthrall many by its passion and fantasy. Especially is this so when it is played with such verve and perfection as the Boston orchestra and its conductor bring to it.

The program will be repeated tonight. Next week Ernst Krenek, the composer, now living in Boston, will be soloist in the first American performances of his Second Piano Concerto. Dr. Koussevitzky also will conduct one of Haydn's Paris symphonies, that in D major, No. 86, and Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem."

C. W. D.

Post Oct. 31/38



CONCERTO IN G: Years ago a brilliant young violinist came up out of high school in Chelsea and stood before the extraordinary Dr. Karl Muck, then the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He'd never have gotten there except that he had a letter from Charles Martin Loeffler, composer, who thought the boy was a great genius. Dr. Muck said: "Play!"

The stoutish youth brought the instrument under his chin, his long, dark hair all but tumbling over the strings. And he performed Max Bruch's Konzertstuck in G. Muck listened to all of it, agreed with Loeffler's letter, sent the youth to Manager Brennan, and he was hired. The boy had put his soul into that solo performance before an audience consisting of one man. It is doubtful that he ever played that way again.

For a year he played in the Boston Symphony. Then came an offer that turned his life around. Would he lead a dance orchestra at the Westminster Hotel? The pay was three times what Symphony paid him. Besides, he had heard a remark; "A Symphony Orchestra is a graveyard of individual talent."

The youth won a kind of fame and a very solid fortune as an orchestra leader in dance spots. He has a Hollywood home now with a swimming pool. But he says he's missed something. At a local night club he thinks sometimes that for a minute maybe even a jitterbug would be enamored by a theme from the Concerto in G. They say the tears well to his eyes for a quivering moment when he fancies himself in the Boston Symphony before the great Muck. But before he can altogether lose himself, there's a demanding feminine "Hey! Hey" voice from among the dancers on the floor, yelling: "Gee, Jack, we're dancing, get hot!"

And Jacques Renard takes the violin from under his chin and directs his men: "All right brasses—get hot!"

Symphony Salutes French Envoy; Tobin Is Host at Luncheon by City

Art, music and dining—three things dear to cultivated Frenchmen—yesterday occupied Count Rene Doynel de Saint-Quentin, French ambassador to the United States. Outstanding events of the third day of a four-day visit here were a city of Boston luncheon in the Statler Hotel, with Mayor Tobin as host, and a concert and reception in Symphony hall, with Serge Koussevitzky and his artists as melodious greeters.

A model of upper class French correctness with a smile for all, Count Doynel will visit Wellesley College this morning, before taking the seat of honor at a Copley-Plaza luncheon given by Gov. Hurley.

The envoy expects to end an unusually full visit tomorrow morning by taking a train for Washington. He has shaken thousands of hands, spoken countless words in poetic French and accented English, and has viewed, with the eyes of a scholar, many New England monuments. At yesterday's end, he seemed eager for more.

Perhaps the Symphony concert, at which Dr. Koussevitzky presented an all-French program of Ravel, Debussy, Roussel and Berlioz, evoked Count Doynel's highest enthusiasm.

"That is the best concert I have heard in all my life," he exclaimed, as he rose in his box and applauded the players with a vigor unmatched even in Paris' Salle Pleyel.

The city of Boston luncheon in the Statler followed the ambassador's visit to Boston University, where Dr. Daniel L. Marsh, the president, ushered him about. As a gesture of Boston conservatism, no wines were served with the fish luncheon. Forty male Bostonians enjoyed cocktails before taking their places at tables. The menu enhanced the reputation of Mayor Tobin as gourmet and host.

Those present included:

Chor-Bishop Stephen El-Douaihy of the Lebanese church, whose manner of saying silent grace by making the sign of the cross was familiar to Count Doynel, an expert on near-eastern affairs; Francois Briers, French consul here, and Antoine Morand, vice-consul; Maj. Vincent Coyne, representing Gov. Hurley; Judge Raoul Boudreau of the superior court; William A. Reilly, fire commissioner; Dr. George H. Edgell, director of the Museum of Fine Arts; E. G. Holmes, president of the museum trustees; Profs. Louis J. A. Mercier, P. J. F. Baldensperger and J. D. M. Ford of Harvard; Morris Carter, host to the ambassador at a dinner in Fenway Court last night; Berry Belmont of Newport, Allan Forbes, Francophile president of the State Street Trust Company; Robert Brice, Joseph Doguin.

H. Ainslee Highman of the French Line; E. A. Van Haelst and Ralph Thibodeau of the French consulate, Charles R. Codman, Gilbert E. Fuller of Raymond Whitcomb, Dr. Richard P. Strong, who will entertain the ambassador this afternoon; Joseph McCarthy, city treasurer; Dr. Roger T. Doyle, John J. Spencer, Earl Carriere, George A. Hyland, Cornelius A. Reardon, Dr. Charles F. Wilinsky, Harry A. Higgins, Wallace Goodrich and Louis J. Brems.

The Symphony Hall reception took place in the foyer, where tea was served and 200 men and women gathered to greet the ambassador. As a picturesque but necessary touch, Dr. Koussevitzky, fresh from the stage, wore a cloak in the receiving line. Members of the orchestra, 35 of whom are French, took part in the reception. Ex-Gov. Alvan T. Fuller lent six French paintings, one by Pissarro and five by Renoir, to adorn the foyer.

A French Symphony Program

The Arts in Boston

French composers supplied the music for the fourth pair of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts of the season, the first of which was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. His Excellency the French Ambassador, who was present, must have been immensely gratified by the sympathetic and virtuosic realization of the music creations of his countrymen; indeed he gave every evidence of pleasure in the performance. Where is there a conductor or an orchestra more capable of giving eloquent expression to French musical art?

The list which represented varied aspects of the French genius comprised Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin" Suite, Debussy's Prelude to "L'Après-midi d'un Faune," Roussel's "Rapsodie Flamande," and Berlioz's "Fantastic" Symphony. The last two numbers had been included also in a French program given by the orchestra 18 months ago, when Roussel's piece had its first performance in the United States. On both occasions it was the least interesting and least rewarding item. The Flemish folk tunes employed again seemed commonplace and the treatment by the composer uninspired. Roussel, a greatly gifted artist, would have been more worthily represented by almost any other of his orchestral works.

The performance of the Debussy was extraordinary, even for this orchestra, in its beauty of tone, its grace of phrasing, its subtlety of nuance, and its delicacy of color. Both Mr. Laurent and Mr. Gillet—good Frenchmen—were called upon to take a bow in response to the applause.

The symphony likewise came to brilliant utterance. And despite its pages of redundancy and its overblown emotionalism and theatricalism, it is still enjoyable for its melodic charm, its harmonic justness, its original orchestraton. The performance was received with enthusiasm.

L. A. S.

NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
HERALD

OCT 26 1938

SYMPHONY MAY TOUR

Boston, Oct. 26 (UP)—The Boston symphony orchestra, under Dr Serge Koussevitzky, may make its long-contemplated European concert tour next year.

Trustees of the 110-piece orchestra were reported today to have voted to send it abroad in May. Such a tour was considered in 1929 but the idea was abandoned because of the depression.

Symphony In Salute To France

Oct. 30/38

B. Advertiser

By Ruth Marsters
Music Editor

IN recognition of the Boston visit of His Excellency Monsieur le Comte Rene de Saint-Quentin, Ambassador of the French Republic to the United States, the Boston Symphony concerts this weekend were French in program.

Dr. Koussevitzky's penchant for Debussy's Prelude a "L'Apres-midi d'un Faune," and Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony has been manifest before in performances of inspired excellence.

The exquisite Ravel Suite "Le Tombeau de Couperin," which opened the program, likewise had the benefit of a most sensitive reading on the part of the conductor, and top form response on the part of the orchestra.

Next weekend Ernst Krenek, Austrian composer recently resident in this country, will appear as soloist in the first American performances of his Second Piano Concerto. Krenek first achieved prominence by the production of his jazz opera, "Johny spielt auf." A more recent opera, "Karl V," produced at Prague last July, finds its harmonic basis in the twelve-tone scale, as does the piano concerto to be heard this week.

The program will include, in addition, Hadyn's Symphony in D major, No. 86, and Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem."

The second concert of the Boston Symphony series in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, will be given next Thursday evening. The program is the same as that of the Friday and Saturday concerts in Symphony Hall, excepting the substitution of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony for the Krenek work.

43

Members of Society Throng Symphony for Friday Afternoon Concert

Program Arranged in Honor Of Count Rene de Saint-Quentin

French Ambassador to the United States Is Distinguished Guest—Reception Is Held Following Concert

By ALISON ARNOLD

Once again yesterday afternoon, Symphony Hall was thronged with members of society, who regularly set aside each Friday afternoon during the winter season for their beloved Symphony concerts. In the audience was a most distinguished guest, His Excellency Monsieur le Comte Rene Doynel de Saint-Quentin, French ambassador to the United States. In addition to the program of music by French composers, an exhibition of French paintings loaned through the courtesy of Mr. Alvan T. Fuller, was on view in the first balcony gallery, and following the concert a reception was held for the ambassador. The program opened with Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin" suite, followed by the prelude to Debussy's "L'Apres-midi d'un Faun," and Roussel's stirring "Rapsodie Flamande." The Berlioz Fantastic Symphony concluded the concert and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky had to return again and again for the continued applause.

An early arrival was Mrs. Edwin S. Webster, her black coat collared with mink. Down near the front was Mrs. Charles Goddard Weld, who wore with her sable-trimmed suit of plum color, a plumed hat of the same becoming shade. With her was her sister, Mrs. Horace H. Soule. In her usual first balcony seat, which happened to be right next to where the ambassador sat, was Mrs. Robert Treat Paine, in smart black and white, which is her favorite combination.

With her slim black suit, Mrs. Moses Williams, Jr., wore a shell pink sweater, and in black with pearls was Miss Jane Ragle. Mrs. Guy Warren Walker looked very regal in black with touches of royal purple, and also in black with a pale pink veil on her hat was Mrs. Robert Morris. Mrs. H. Nickerson Sears, in a turquoise tweed suit and turban, was accompanied by her young daughter, Ann.

The debutantes seem to be turning out en masse for the Symphony this season and there were ever so many present yesterday. Miss Nancy Burrage, in a smart little suit of wine red, attended with her mother, Mrs. Albert Cameron Burrage, Jr., Miss Louisa Barbour, in a checked tweed tailleur, who promises to be as popular as her elder sister, was surrounded by a group of friends. With her green tweed coat, Miss Faith Kidder wore a twist of brown velvet about her hair, and Miss Beatrice Talbot wore a cherry red hat with her checked tweeds. Still another debutante we glimpsed was Miss Esmee de Menocal, in beige, who was chatting with her aunt, Mrs. Allan Forbes, in black with twin silver foxes.

Strolling about the foyer together during the intermission were Miss Elizabeth C. Leland, in black with a cluster of tiny chrysanthemums in her lapel, and Mrs. George Megrew, also in black. Miss Lucile Swift's black frock and silky black caracul jacket were brightened by touches of cerise, a color she seems to adore, and Miss Mary Coolidge topped her black skirt with a black and white checked jacket. Miss Dorothy West, in brown, and Miss Phyllis Forbes in a lovely combination of teal blue and fuchsia, were busily engaged in conversation during the intermission.

Mrs. Amor Hollingsworth, Jr., wore teal blue trimmed with squirrel, and Mrs. William Read, Jr., was in black with a leopard cape. Looking very pretty in a print frock was Miss Frances Lowell, and Miss Geraldine Field chose tan tweeds. With Mrs. Richard King Thorndike was her daughter, Miss Priscilla Thorndike. Mrs. Francis MacVeagh wore an emerald green blouse with her brown tweed tailleur.

Enjoying a cigarette in the foyer was Mrs. John Lavalle, in smart black. With her mist gray frock Mrs. William B. Long wore pearls, and Mrs. Robert H. Stevenson was all in navy blue. Mrs. Roswell Parish wore a sumptuous silver fox cape with her teal blue gown and Mrs. Hobart Spalding's black frock was belted with gold.

Among the many others present were Mrs. Edward Wigglesworth Grew, Jr., Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller, Mrs. Morton Prince, Miss Sylvia Winslow, Miss Jane Megrew, Miss Josephine Emery, Mrs. Alfred R. McIntyre, Miss Marian Minot, Mrs. Robert S. Coit, Mrs. Walter Atherton, Mrs. Palfrey Perkins, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Prout, Mrs. Charles Gaston Smith, Mrs. William Dana Orcutt, Mrs. Paul F. Clark, Mrs. Wilbur Higgins, Mrs. Edward C. Moore, Mrs. Charles Stratton French, Mrs. Frank M. Sawtell, Mrs. Carl Dreyfus, Mrs. Eben Ellison, Mrs. Jaffray de Hauteville Bell, Miss Gertrude Sands, Mrs. Frank H. Stewart and her daughter, Mrs. C. Stewart Black, Mrs. Sidney Conrad, Mrs. Chester Humphrey and Miss Rosamond Pier

29/38

JASCHA HEIFETZ
Appearing in violin recital at Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 6.

LAWRENCE, MASS.
EAGLE

OCT 26 1938

BOSTON, Oct. 25—(AP)—Reports were published tonight that trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra had voted to send Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the famous 110-piece orchestra abroad next May for a European concert tour. Members of the board, the Boston Herald said, admitted the long-discussed tour was "in the air" although Dr. Ernest B. Dane, trustee president, refused to confirm or deny the report after a meeting tonight. Only lack of a 100,000 guarantee prevented the trip in 1929, he said.

Symphony Concert

French Ambassador Hears Program Of Compositions by His Countrymen

B.T By MOSES SMITH Oct. 29/38

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra played the host at yesterdays concert to His Excellency, Monsieur le Comte Rene de Saint-Quentin, French Ambassador to this country, as gracefully as they might turn a musical phrase. Through the conret they made the distinguished visitor feel as much at home as they could by providing a program exclusively of French music. After the concert, when His Excellency was presented to a distinguished Bostonian company at a reception in the middle-floor gallery, he could look upon examples of paintings from his country provided by Alvan T. Fuller, one of the trustees of the Orchestra, who were joint hosts.

If, aside from such obvious matters as Symphony Hall itself and the Bostonian audience, there was one important detail which made His Excellency feel not at home, it was in the quality of the orchestral playing. Nowhere in France could he hear a native orchestra capable of playing with superb finish and elan displayed by the Boston orchestra in the program of yesterday. It is not a matter of offending a visitor by a vulgar display of one's possessions. Nor does one need to offer here the reason for the present condition, which finds America, by and large, with the best orchestras in the world and Boston with one of the best, if not the very best. One merely details a truism with a reasonable pride. After the concert the visitor himself could not refrain from expressing his enthusiasm and astonishment in that most charming of all manners—the language of a cultivated Frenchman.

* * *

Seated in the balcony behind a railing, which was the nearest to a makeshift box that the severe Symphony Hall could encompass, His Excellency—and 2500 others—heard a program traversing "Le tombeau de Couperin" by Ravel, "The Afternoon of a Faun" by Debussy, Roussel's "Flemish" Rhapsody and the "Fantastic" Symphony of Berlioz. From beginning to end the playing was in the best vein of the Boston Orchestra. The conductor, for his part, apparently keyed up more than usual by the occasion, performed miracles in the recreation of French music with which he has been so intimately associated in the past.

The delicacy and expressiveness of his many-voiced instrument have perhaps never been more manifest than in the performances of the pieces by Ravel and Debussy yesterday. The playing of the woodwind section had a wonderful surface in both works, particularly in the former, where the demands were so great. The Rock-of-Gibraltar steadiness of M. Gillet, the oboist, is taken for granted after these many years. But yesterday there seemed something exceptional in the sensitiveness and warmth of his phrasing Quite deservedly Dr. Koussevitzky singled him out at the end, as he was to do a little later to both M. Gillet and M. Laurent, the incomparable flutist.

Two men do not make an orchestra, though, and it was the perfection of ensemble, more than in the brilliance of individual playing, that (in his own words) so impressed the visitor from France via Washington, D. C. It is something which subscribers to the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra have come to take for granted, even though yesterday's exhibition was a little out of the ordinary.

The performance of the "Fantastic" Symphony was such as to engross one who has never found the intrinsic music—masterpiece though it may be—engrossing, some pages here and there excepted. As to the Rhapsody of Roussel, its heartiness and vigor called into play other talents of the virtuoso orchestra. The work itself (introduced here, it will be recalled, the season before last) seems destined to be a popular success, like many arhapsody before it. There are good tunes in it, and the workmanship—as almost inevitable with Roussel—is good. The present writer, however, can work up no enthusiasm for it. The composer is here paying tribute to his origins. Somehow the laudable gesture seems no concern of ours.

* * *

Since an ambassador is but the human symbol of the relation between nations, yesterday's program and the exceptional appurtenances to a weekly concert may be regarded as a friendly gesture to a sister republic. These are days when there are more ambassadors than there are legations. Emissaries of good-will come and go, as likely as not, without formal credentials. Often alas, the good-will turns out to be nothing but propaganda, with the emphasis on the shady aspect of that term. But this fact need not discredit the instiuion. In the best sense, good-will among nations is expressed by exchange of ideas as well as of commodities.

The point in all this moralizing is suggested by the rumor, which is on everybody's tongue and has even been dignified by publication, to the effect that the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor are going to Europe, and specifically to France, shortly after the close of the present season. Whether there is anything more to the rumor now than there has been in the many years since the rumor has periodically bobbed up is not for the present observer to say. But concerning the timeliness of the present talk there can be little doubt. Both might well repay M. le Comte's visit as cultural ambassadors not merely from Boston but even from the United States of America.

Economic laws being, as we are constantly reminded, fairly inexorable, somebody is going to have to provide a lot of money before such a projected journey can become an actuality. It will be worth while.

Old Music, New Society

Beginning a Venture Rich in Promise

Under distinguished auspices the new Boston Society of Early Music has just issued its preliminary prospectus. The society has for aim the furtherance of "the understanding of the rich and seldom heard field of music before Bach and Handel as well as music of the eighteenth century." To this end the society will give concerts at which will be employed exclusively the instruments that the composers had in mind when they wrote their works. It will also have meetings at which early music will be discussed informally for the benefit of members, who will be invited to participate in the discussions. Professor G. Wallace Woodworth, for example, will speak at one of these meetings. The societ will even try to arrange special performance of works in which members are interested.

The society has been founded by Putnam Aldrich, resident harpsichordist, and Alfred Zighera, 'cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and familiar figure hereabouts in chamber music. Both of these musicians, it may be recalled, have taken part in concerts of ancient music here in recent seasons, Mr. Zighera's province being the viola da gamba. Together with Paul Federowsky, descant viol, Albert Bernard, treble viol and viole d'amour, and Gaston Dufresne, large bass viol—all members of the Boston Society of Ancient Instruments—they will constitute the performing nucleus for three concerts which the society will give in November, February and April at the Women's City Club. The program for the first of these, on Tuesday evening, Nov. 29, will consist of Telemann's Trio in F major for violin, viola da gamba and harpsichord; Diego Ortiz' Recercada for viola da gamba and harpsichord; Christopher Simpson's Variations on Two Grounds (from "The Division-ViVolist") for viola da gamba bons' Three-part Fantasy for desand harpsichord; Orlando Gibcant viol, treble viol and viol da gamba; Fresocbaldi's Partite "sopra l'aria della Romanesca" for harpsichord solo; Bach's Sonata in G major for harpsichord and viola da gamba and Gervaise's "Dancferies" for four viols and harpsichord.

Each of the other programs, too, will contain one of the Bach sonatas for harpsichord and viola da gamba. At one of the concerts Olga Averino will appear as assisting artist.

Membership, subscriptions at five dollars, entitling the member to admission to the three concerts and to the other meetings of the society, are now being solicited at the headquarters of the society, 277 Marlborough street.

ORCHESTRA TO EUROPE?

B. Her. Oct. 29/38

Bostonians would be as proud to have their great orchestra play in Europe next summer as they are confident that European audiences would be delighted to hear it. High as the reputation of Dr. Koussevitzky's organization now is, it would unquestionably acquire additional prestige by a successful tour of the major cities on the other side of the Atlantic. At the moment the enterprise appears to be at the "Barkis is willin'" stage. The conductor and his men are eager to go. The trustees have given their approval. The trip could be so arranged as to interfere only slightly with the orchestra's home engagements.

There remains, however, the inevitable question of financing. The trustees rightly believe that they should not assume any obligation which might increase the orchestra's annual deficit. They would also probably hesitate a long time before asking for any money here to pay for the trip. Thus the question pretty much resolves itself into what financial assurances may come from abroad. And, again, prospective guests cannot very well suggest to their prospective hosts what the terms of the visit should be.

Meanwhile the orchestra continues its almost year-round schedule of concerts in Boston, New York and other cities in the winter and on the Esplanade and at Stockbridge during the summer, and both its artistic reputation and the size of its public continue to grow. A European tour would be nice, but it is not precisely necessary.

CZECH COMPOSER TO PLAY HERE

B. Post, Oct. 30/38

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

ERNST KRENEK, Czech-blooded Vienna-born composer, who will play his Second Pianoforte Concerto with the Symphony Orchestra at the concerts of this week-end, did not dare even to fly to Prague last summer to hear the world premiere of his opera, "Charles the Fifth," lest the forced landing of his plane in Germany might bring about his internment in a concentration camp. Like Paul Hindemith, Krenek is persona non grata with the Nazis because of his radical tendencies as a composer, not because of what they might regard as a racial taint.

In that invaluable volume of reference where the moderns are concerned, Slonimsky's "Music Since 1900," Krenek's advent into the world on Aug. 23, 1900, is thus noted: "Ernst Krenek, composer of Czech extraction, who more than any contemporary reflects the three principal tendencies of modern music—absolute (Atonal Symphony), urban (the jazz opera, Jonny Spielt Auf), and satiric (Der Diktator)—is born in Vienna."

"Der Diktator" was not, though one might easily guess the contrary, aimed at Der Fuehrer. The text and music of this political opera (Krenek wrote both) were completed, according to the omniscient Slonimsky, on Aug. 29, 1926, before Hitler came into power. This circumstance, however, would not make its author any more popular in a dictator-run country. The glorification of the Negro in "Jonny Spielt Auf"—even the Metropolitan had to turn Jonny into a black-faced white when the opera was produced in New York in 1929—would hardly delight the upholders of Aryan supremacy. Further damaging activity: the third of Krenek's operatic trilogy of political satires, of which "Der Diktator" is the first, bears the title "Heavyweight, or Pride of the Nation" and was inspired by a diplomat's assertion that "a prizefighter or channel swimmer does more for the glory of the German nation than all the artists and scientists put together."

And had these operas never been written, Krenek would still be in wrong with the Reichsmusikkammer because he insists on writing in the Schoenbergian 12-tone scale. In brief, Krenek is that dreaded thing, an atonalist. In an article once appearing in "Modern Music" he attacked the tonal system as an outgrown, outmoded altogether reactionary musical medium. By report the Concerto to be heard Friday afternoon and Saturday evening embodies Krenek's atonal faiths. It may be mentioned in passing, and without any intention of underselling the new work ahead of time, that a Suite for Piano heard at Jordan Hall

Continued on Page 27

1 LARGE ROOM, nicely furnished. Gardner st., Allston. Stadium 0870.
FURNISHED and unfurnished rooms, 214 Commonwealth ave. Kenmore 5377.
Dorchester—2 large rms., kit., porch, heat, h. w., gas, elec., $9 wk.; nr. trans. Tal. 1944.
407 MARLBORO ST., Apt. 3: Warm, attrac. rms., plenty hot water. Homelike. Ken. 3807.

MUSIC

Continued From Page 25

a few seasons ago proved rigorously atonal and as unremittingly ugly. On the other hand, the rather jazzy Little Symphony, conducted here by Dr. Koussevitzky in 1930, though flippant and disrespectful, was distinctly amusing. And we must remember that "Jonny" has been one of the few sensational successes in modern opera.

The coming performances will be the first in America, the work having previously been heard only in Amsterdam, Stockholm and London. The other numbers on Dr. Koussevitzky's programme are a Symphony of Haydn in D major, No. 86, heard here but twice before, in 1902 and 1931, and Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem," in which the assisting pianist will be Jesus Maria Sanroma.

CAMDEN, N. J.
COURIER
OCT 28 1938

Music's The Thing, Not Glamor, Names, Records Show Again

Arrangement of 'Pictures at Exhibition' Should Find Appreciation

More and more we are coming to the conclusion that names in music are losing their force and that the music performed is what counts more, as far as today's listeners are concerned. Before the education that came with radio that state of affairs wasn't as evident, but now, we are sure, there is no doubt about it.

There have been those who, from the beginning, have said, "I don't know very much about music but I like it." And, ordinarily, one could and can trust their judgment over many, many more. Now, however, there are countless listeners who have left that behind. They know a lot more about music and they like it much more.

Thus, perhaps, we are coming to a time when that elusive quality, glamor, means less in music. Conductors who have it will perhaps take a back seat while those who lack it go to town through the medium of good music well played. What have gesticulations to do with good music? What have podium gyrations? What have the affectations so carefully arranged to impress?

Thus we come to mention of the new orchestration of Lucien Cailliet of the "Pictures At An Exhibition" of Moussorgsky. M. Cailliet is not an imposing, pushing musician. He sits in the clarinet section of the Philadelphia Orchestra. And yet his orchestrations and arrangements are as fine as anything of the sort being produced today and, for some reason, he gets full credit for them with Mr. Ormandy at the helm. Into his work M. Cailliet pours a genius that is partly a sense of humor, a tremendous energy and an enviable knowledge of instrumentation.

We liked this arrangement of the Moussorsky opus, which Victor has released for October. We liked the Ravel arrangement, played by the Boston Symphony, too. But somehow there is more color in the new transcription, more contrasts, less glamor of name. The orchestra under Mr, Ormandy plays it well. (M-422).

Something of a reverse faces us in our consideration of the recording of the Brahms First by Bruno Walter and the Vienna Philharmonic. For no matter whose interpretation you like best, this set will have meaning in that Mr. Walter is an exile and the Vienna Philharmonic a thing of the past, due to Nazi coups and the Continental apologists. Mr. Walter, beyond all that, is a splendid conductor, and it is to be hoped that he will be heard in this country soon. (M-470.)

In a two-pocket album are presented the Polovetzki Dances from Prince Igor, arranged by Leopold Stokowski and played by the Philadelphia Orchestra. (M-499.)

Kirsten Flagstad, who is coming to Philadelphia soon in recital, is heard this month in "Thou Monstrous Fiend" from Beethoven's "Fidelio," which equals the singer's achievements in "Ah Perfido," released some time ago. Once again the Philadelphia Orchestra and Mr. Ormandy, among the artist's most enthusiastic supporters in the concert world, play the accompaniment—it is more than that—with the acoustical advantages of the Philadelphia Academy.

Also meriting your attention are the following:

George Copeland, American pianist, playing two Bach compositions, "Jesus Christ the Son of God" and the English Suite No. 5, including the three movements, Sarabande, Passepied I and Passepied II. (15183.)

John Charles Thomas singing "Au Pays" and "Requiem du Coeur" with Carroll Hollister at the piano. (15184.)

"Evening," sung by the Augustana Choir, conducted by Henry Veld, unaccompanied. The music, by Zoltan Kodaly, is loveliness itself. (1937.)

The "Bacchanale" from Samson and Delilah played by the Boston Pops Orchestra. (12318.)

Bruna Castagna singing "Near the Walls of Seville" and "Let Me Know My Fate," both from Bizet's Carmen and well suited to the singer's voice.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY
OCT 26 1938

Boston Symphony In First Tuesday

Luboshutz and Nemenoff in Double Concerto; Bizet Centenary Observed

Yesterday afternoon a matinee concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened the annual "Commuters' " series of six programs to be given once a month, omitting November. The soloists were Genia Nemenoff and Pierre Luboshutz, a married pair famous for their two-piano appearances. Civic subscribers of this locality will recall the enthusiasm that greeted their concert in the Newport series two seasons ago and again in the Fall River series last Winter. They combine a sense for the exquisite with a technique that can compass brilliance. These qualities served them well for the Mozart double piano concerto in E flat, not too frequently heard. Also on the program was Bizet's first L'Arlesienne Suite performed in observance of his 100th birthday and—a change from the original announcement of the Beethoven Fifth Symphony—a repetition of the Brahms' Fourth in E minor, which was played at the concerts of last Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

In appearance, the paired pianists have changed within the year. Nemenoff has taken on almost fragility while Luboshutz has added a more admirably groomed polish to his pleasant personality. The delicately poised feminine contribution to the concerto was an absorbed poetic penetration of its lyric gentleness—the andante taken like a reflective improvization; the masculine, a watchful, exquisitely apt support as of a kindred thought. Mr. Luboshutz uses his hands in unobtrusive grace. For the serenities, the warm scoring of this particular phase of Mozart, Nemenoff and Luboshutz have attained a rare felicity. The Maier and Pattison performance of 1920 with the Boston Symphony may have shown a spirit and classic perfection, but this of yesterday was a personal realization. Dr. Koussevitsky held the men of the orchestra attuned in mood.

On November 10 in Pawtucket and on April 13 in Attleboro, Civic subscribers may hear this admired pair again.

A special feature of the program was the in memoriam performance of the L'Arlesienne suite—not heard from this orchestra since 1916. From small theater orchestras, we receive no such conceptions of its pastoral beauties and undercurrent tragedies as Dr. Koussevitzky expressed in his restraint of the darker voices while giving surface prominence to village simplicities. Except for the ominous significance of the Prelude, there is no kinship with Bizet's musical treatment of "Carmen." The Carillon paints in sound a locale. The instrumentation of the bell music is fascinating to follow from 'cello opening to percussion conclusion with a smoothly blended suggestion of bagpipe strains between. An excellent resume of Bizet's work as composer marks in the program book the centenary of his birth on October 25.

If there be any nobility in the Brahms Fourth Symphony in E minor, Dr. Koussevitzky has thought on these things and has brought them to revelation. His spurring of his forces to the sharply, swiftly joyous Allegro giocoso, borne along by sparkling measures suggesting all that creates gaity; the deep and exciting beauties of the final movement in form of a Chaconne stand out as most vital memories of this interpretation. Skillfully sharpened accents, softly rounded changes in mood lifted the variations into a marvel of inspired intuition and attained execution.

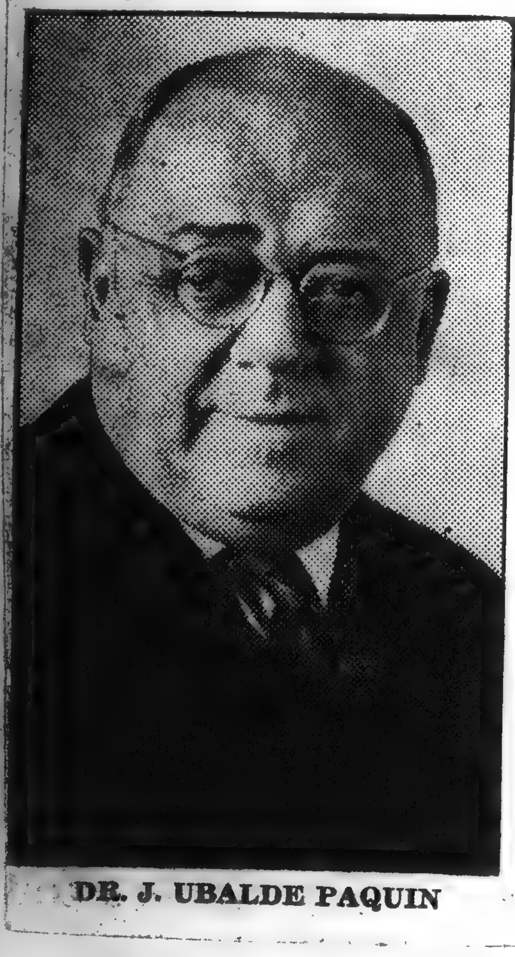
This supplementary series of six Monday evening and duplicated Tuesdays caters especially to out-of-town concert goers and the matinee time is set a half hour later than the Friday concerts to accommodate them. As the years go on, the series becomes more and more brilliant in its programs, and this year, besides four conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, there will be two with Igor Stravinsky and Georges Enesco as guest conductors—Stravinsky in his own works. The appearance of Myra Hess, eminent English pianist, also lends distinction to the concerts.

A number of New Bedford concert goers patronize the Tuesday series. Yesterday, there was a large representation of Tuckers and Pratts. Symphony Hall had few vacant seats.

A. C. R.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS
STANDARD-TIMES
OCT 25 1938

Dr. Paquin Will Preside at Dinner For French Ambassador to America



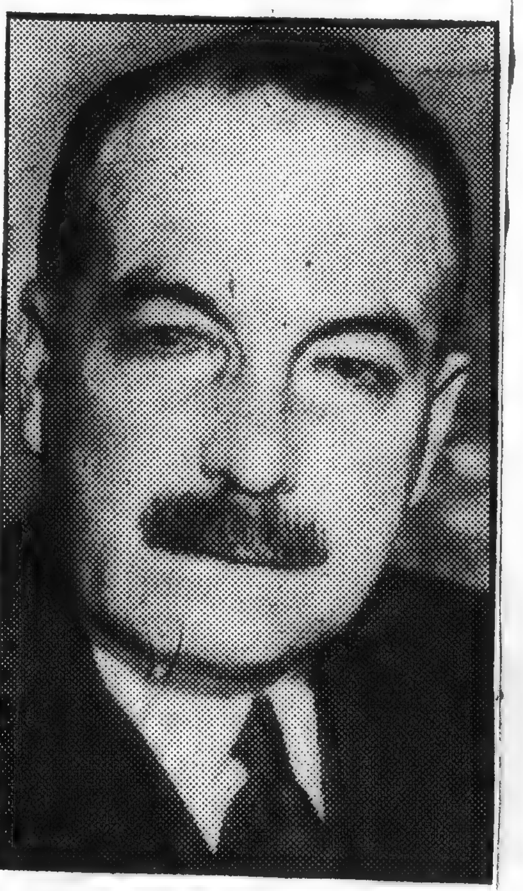
DR. J. UBALDE PAQUIN

DR. J. UBALDE PAQUIN of 1306 Acushnet Avenue, president of the Franco-American Historical Society, will officiate as master of ceremonies at a reception and banquet at 6:30 p. m. tomorrow at Hotel Statler, Boston, in honor of Count Rene Doynel de Saint Quentin, French Ambassador to the United States. A delegation of 39 New Bedford Franco-Americans also will attend the banquet.

Honor guests at the affair will include the Ambassador, French Consul and Mrs. Francois Briere of Boston, Msgr. Stephen El-Douaihy, curate of Notre Dame du Liban Church, Boston; Prof. Andre Morize of Harvard University and Mrs. Morize; Colonel Emile Vaillancourt of Montreal, honorary member of the Society and one of its former lecturers; Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. Koussevitzky; and Adolphe Robert of Manchester,

(Continued from Page 1)

N. H., president-general of the Canadian Society.



COUNT DE SAINT QUENTIN

600 Expected

Also Prof. James Geddes, formerly of Boston University; Vice-Consul Paul Morand of Boston; Judge Raoul H. Beaudreau of Belmont; Mrs. L. K. Rand of Cambridge, Harvard University; Prof. Fernand Baldensperger of Harvard University, and Joseph Bourgeois, representing the Franco-American Colony of New York. Dr. Omer E. Boivin of Fall River is president of the reception committee. More than 600 are expected to attend.

Dr. Paquin will give the address of welcome to the Ambassador and invited guests. Addresses are scheduled to be given by Msgr. El-Douaihy, Professor Morize, the Ambassador and Dr. Paquin. Following the banquet, the semi-annual business meeting and election of officers of the society will be held.

Delegations from several Franco-American, French and American Societies will be present. Harvard University, Wellesley College and the College of the Assumption, Worcester, will be represented by delegations. The Boston Symphony Orchestra also has been invited.

Will Visit Hurley

During his stay in Boston, the Ambassador is scheduled to visit Governor Hurley at the State House, dignitaries of the Roman Catholic Church in Boston and Harvard. Thursday he will visit Assumption College. Friday he is scheduled to lunch with Mayor Maurice J. Tobin of Boston and to attend a concert by the Symphony Orchestra. A luncheon with Governor Hurley an a reception by L'Alliance Francaise Saturday will complete his visit to Boston.

Dr. Paquin will be accompanied by Mrs. Paquin and a group of Franco-Americans from this city. Those who will attend include Mr. and Mrs. Rodolphe J. Carrier and daughter, Miss Laure-Anna Carrier, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Potvin and daughter, Miss Peatrice Potvin, Miss Doris Duchaine, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Bouvier, Mrs. Oliver Prescott, Mr. and Mrs. Antonio Lemieux, Alderman Theodore Loranger, Francois Rousseau, Misses Theresa, Lorenza and Zorine Senecal, Dr. and Mrs. Raymond Senecal, Charles Senecal, Dr. and Mrs. Wilfred Rousseau, the Rev. Lorenzo Morais.

Also Dr. Hormidas LeClair, Henri Magnant, the Rev. A. Berube, George and Roger Bernique, Miss Laura Bessette, Mrs. Tona Colman, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Loranger, Alfred H. Saulnier, Zephyr D. Paquin, Miss Jeanne Paquin, Leopold Corriveau and Mrs. Frank Fahey.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
DESERET NEWS
OCT 29 1938

Zlatko Balokovic Has Busy Schedule

ZLATKO BALOKOVIC, violinist, will be soloist with the Boston Symphony on March 3rd and 4th, the Detroit Symphony, March 18th and the Youngstown (Ohio) Symphony, April 20th, 1930.

His fall tour begins with a recital in Prague, Czechoslovakia, on October 7th. He will be soloist with the Philharmonic Orchestra of that city on October 9th, and will have a radio broadcast on October 10th. On October 11th he broadcasts from Warsaw, Poland, followed by three recitals there. In fact, his tour calls for seventeen recitals and seven orchestral concerts, taking him as far south as Athens, Greece.

45

LOWELL, MASS.
LEADER
OCT 26 1938

First Commuters Matinee Given by Boston Symphony

Pierre Luboshutz and Genia Nemenoff, Pianists, Play Mozart Concerto ---Brahms Fourth Symphony Feature

The Tuesday afternoon concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra, known popularly now as the Commuters' Matinees, opened auspiciously before an audience which practically filled Symphony hall. These programs, set for the convenient hour of 3 o'clock this season, attract music lovers from all over New England. And interest in them has steadily increased.

Orchestral polish and virtuosity and pianistic subtleties and refinements inaugurated the season, with the latter characteristics displayed by Pierre Luboshutz and Genia Nemonoff, pairing their talents in the Mozart Concerto in E-flat for two pianofortes and orchestra.

As Georges Bizet was born in Paris 100 years ago to the day, Dr. Koussevitzky marked the anniversary by the performance of the first suite from his music to Daudet's play "L'Arlessienne." It is familiar by reason of frequent hearings over the air, played by groups of varying degrees of ability. Played by the Boston Symphony musicians it is revitalized, music of rare beauty and charm. If Dr. Koussevitzky took the Minuet at a brisk pace, that served only to bring out more effectively the contrast with the adagietto which follows in which the soft string effects were a sheer delight. The final carillon with its simulation of bell, tones and clangor was given with verve and spirit.

The solo pianists, not entire strangers to Boston, matched their skill evenly in the Mozart Concerto. Refinement characterized their playing. The musical adornments of the themes were lightly and brightly limmed. Runs were fluid and limpid. There was evident desire for beautiful tonal effects. At times it seemed as if a little less restraint might have been effective. But the composition is lyrical rather than heroic. And Dr. Koussevitzky adjusted his orchestral support accordingly.

For the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven originally announced for performance the Brahms Fourth was substituted, possibly because the Beethoven masterpiece has figured so conspicuously on the programs of other symphony orchestras at the opening of the season. Dr. Koussevitzky's way with Brahms is now an old story. And the Fourth gives him the opportunities for effects which appeal to him and to the audience. Nobody would have suspected that there was day in the history of the orchestra when the music of Brahms was rated as not worth hearing or playing. S. R. F.

Townsman
Andover, Mass
OCT 20 1938

Photos by Donald Surett

Top left: Dr. Koussevitzky, world-famous director of the Boston Symphony, examining some of the Prendergast paintings at a tea given in his honor at the Addison Gallery Sunday. Already having received very enthusiastic notices in Boston and New York papers, the gallery received last Thursday unstinted praise in Time magazine for having arranged the exhibit.

Top right: Punchard's Muller, just after intercepting a pass in the Concord game last Saturday.

Bottom: The Andover Brass band tooting its own horns as the new membership contest got underway last Monday night. Academy assistant music director, Whittredge Clark, is seen directing the efforts of Messrs. Newman, Dennison, Slate, Page, Yancey, Dufton, Wainwright, Wilson and Sayles.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST
OCT 28 1938

THE Conning Tower

It seems to us that Mr. Alfred L. Dennis, president of the Bach Society of New Jersey, is needlessly concerned over the swinging of classics. He calls it a high musical crime, and wants the Federal Communications Commission to penalize offenders with suspension of the radio station's license for the first offense, and revocation for the second. The Conning Tower dislikes swing, but it has consulted its attorney, and is willing to pass the legal advice on to Mr. Dennis. It is neither a misdemeanor nor a crime to turn off the radio. Of course, Mr. Dennis can take it to the Supreme Court. But the chances of swinging Bach's music are slight; a classic, to be swung, has to be familiar enough so that the audience can distinguish—though it isn't always easy—the original. And there aren't many of us who can whistle Bach, and some of those who can feel that the Constitution provides for Benny Goodman and Tommy Dorsey as well as for Eugene Ormandy and Serge Koussevitsky.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Evening Public Ledger
OCT 28 1938

Just Gossip About PEOPLE

—BY NANCY WYNNE—

First Dinner Party Cosmopolitan Dash Culture for All

WERE you among the hundreds of Forum members who were thrilled last night at the brilliant performance of the Wagnerian Singers at the Academy of Music? We hope so. . . Belonging to the forum means that you simply cannot afford to miss any of the marvelous programs on this outstanding platform of culture.

Distinguished men and women in every field bring to the Forum audience a thorough education in the arts, sciences, travel . . there are lectures and divertissements which fit into no set category. . . The Boston Symphony Orchestra ~~under~~ Koussevitzky, Andre Maurois, Elisabeth Schumann, Lawrence Tibbett, Elissa Landi, Carl Sandburg, Kathryn Meisle and Gregor Piatigorsky in a joint program, Paul van Zeeland, Stefan Zweig, Joseph Hofmann and the Curtis Symphony Orchestra . . are but a few of the vital experiences that Forum members have to look forward to this Winter.

BARRE, VT.
TIMES
OCT 27 1938

KOUSSEVITZKY MAPS TOUR.

May Take Boston Sympony Orchestra of 110 Pieces to Europe.

Boston, Oct. 27 (AP)—Dr. Ernest B. Dane, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, declined Wednesday to confirm or deny published reports the board had voted to send Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky and the 110 musicians to Europe for a concert tour next May. The Boston Herald said other trustees admitted the tour was "in the air."

Last summer when Dr. Koussevitzky returned from abroad he announced Europe was "clamoring" for the orchestra but lack of a $100,000 guarantee prevented the trip.

SANTA MONICA, CAL.
OUTLOOK
OCT 26 1938

L. NAZAR KURKDJIE

L. Nazar Kurkdjie, concert violinist and teacher, formerly of Boston, Mass., and Cleveland, O., now is permanently located in Santa Monica, with studios at 841 23rd st.

In the past 20 years Kurdjie has been active in musical circles in the two cities. In Boston he was a featured member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In Cleveland, he was dean of the violin department of Baldwin-Wallace College for a period of 15 years, was supervisor of instrumental music for the 17 schools in the Lakewood, O., area, a member of the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra and directed the Hotel Cleveland Ensemble for a period of 16 years.

Recognized as a master musician, Kurkdjie has had a wealth of teaching experience and now is available for beginners or advanced students who desire to study violin.

CHRISSY STAGE

Preparations for the annual Fall concert by the students of the Chrissy Stage Accordion Studios are under way, with finishing touches being added to the solo and band numbers, according to announcement by Chrissy Stage, director of the studios.

FLINT, MICH.
JOURNAL
OCT 25 1938

Music, Maestro, Please!—Enterprising cameraman gives you his lens impression of a well-known symphony orchestra conductor at work. The conductor is Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky, who is starting his 15th consecutive year on the Boston podium.

45

LOWELL, MASS.
LEADER
OCT 26 1938

First Commuters Matinee Given by Boston Symphony

Pierre Luboshutz and Genia Nemenoff, Pianists, Play Mozart Concerto ---Brahms Fourth Symphony Feature

The Tuesday afternoon concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra, known popularly now as the Commuters' Matinees, opened auspiciously before an audience which practically filled Symphony hall. These programs, set for the convenient hour of 3 o'clock this season, attract music lovers from all over New England. And interest in them has steadily increased.

Orchestral polish and virtuosity and pianistic subtleties and refinements inaugurated the season, with the latter characteristics displayed by Pierre Luboshutz and Genia Nemonoff, pairing their talents in the Mozart Concerte in E-flat for two pianofortes and orchestra.

As Georges Bizet was born in Paris 100 years ago to the day, Dr. Koussevitzky marked the anniversary by the performance of the first suite from his music to Daudet's play "L'Arlessienne." It is familiar by reason of frequent hearings over the air, played by groups of varying degrees of ability. Played by the Boston Symphony musicians it is revitalized, music of rare beauty and charm. If Dr. Koussevitzky took the Minuet at a brisk pace, that served only to bring out more effectively the contrast with the adagietto which follows in which the soft string effects were a sheer delight. The final carillon with its simulation of bell, tones and clangor was given with verve and spirit.

The solo pianists, not entire strangers to Boston, matched their skill evenly in the Mozart Concerto. Refinement characterized their playing. The musical adornments of the themes were lightly and brightly limmed. Runs were fluid and limpid. There was evident desire for beautiful tonal effects. At times it seemed as if a little less restraint might have been effective. But the composition is lyrical rather than heroic. And Dr. Koussevitzky adjusted his orchestral support accordingly.

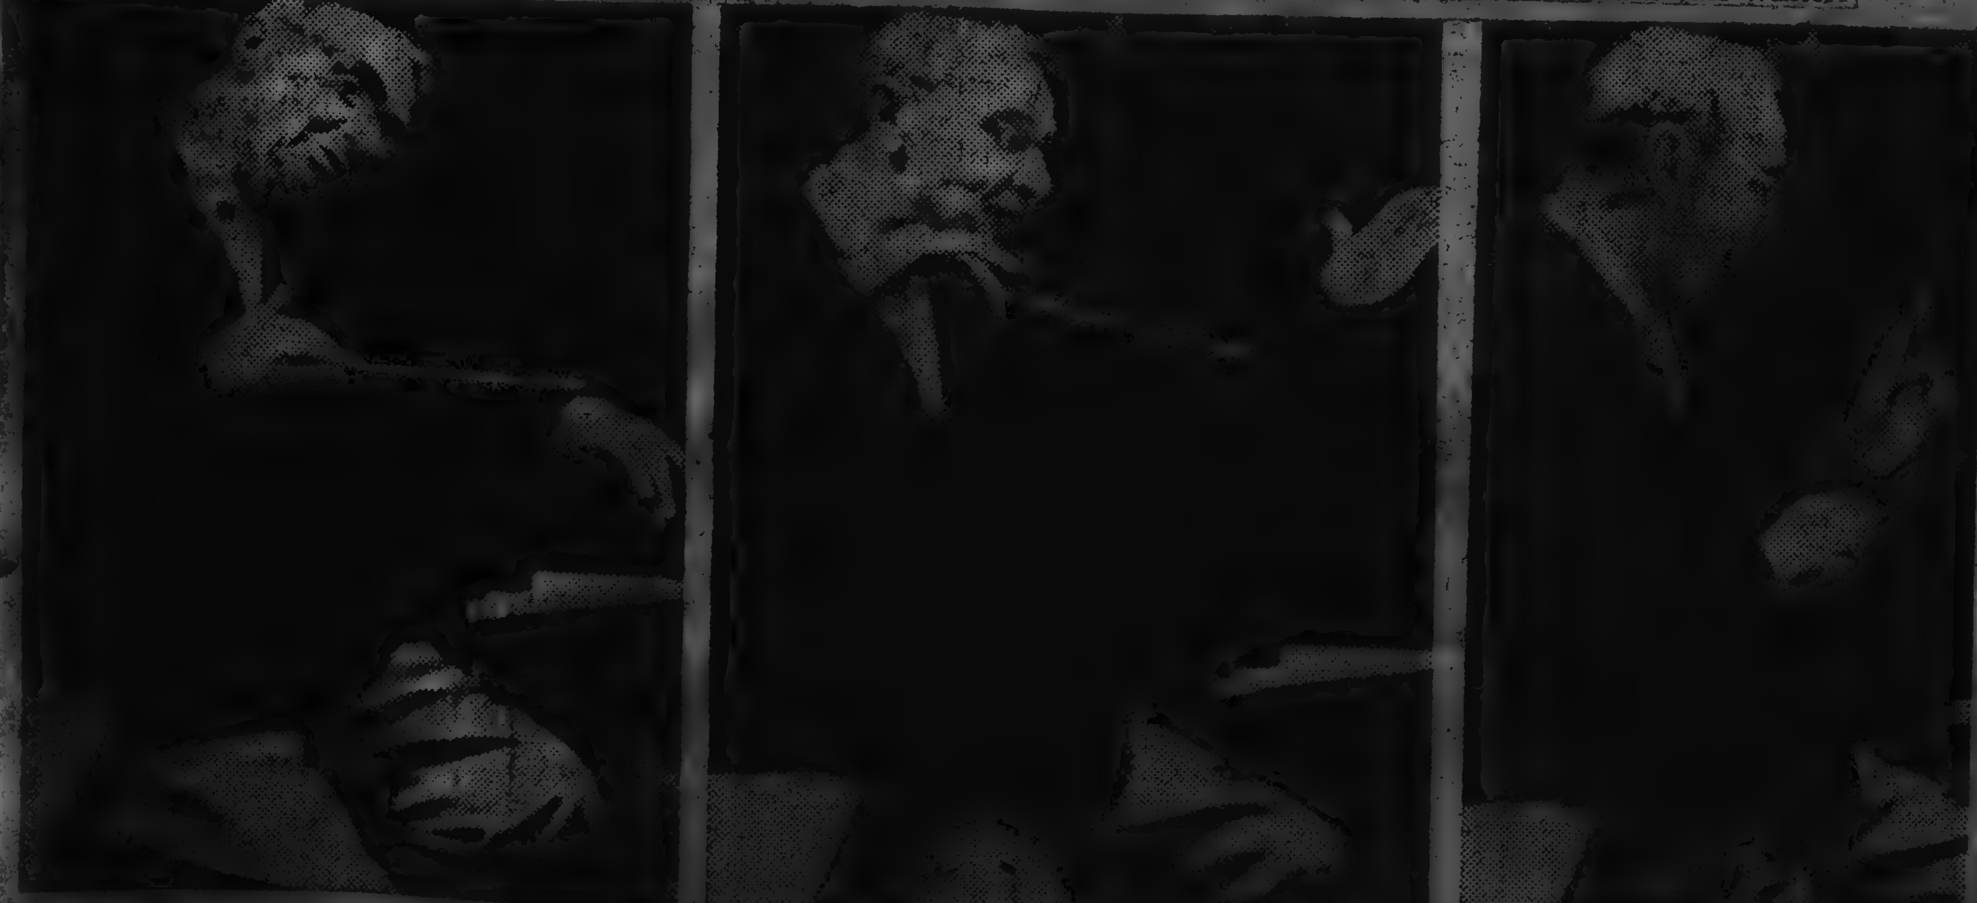
For the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven originally announced for performance the Brahms Fourth was substituted, possibly because the Beethoven masterpiece has figured so conspicuously on the programs of other symphony orchestras at the opening of the season. Dr. Koussevitzky's way with Brahms is now an old story. And the Fourth gives him the opportunities for effects which appeal to him and to the audience. Nobody would have suspected that there was day in the history of the orchestra when the music of Brahms was rated as not worth hearing or playing. S. R. F.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST
OCT 28 1938

THE Conning Tower

It seems to us that Mr. Alfred L. Dennis, president of the Bach Society of New Jersey, is needlessly concerned over the swinging of classics. He calls it a high musical crime, and wants the Federal Communications Commission to penalize offenders with suspension of the radio station's license for the first offense, and revocation for the second. The Conning Tower dislikes swing, but it has consulted its attorney, and is willing to pass the legal advice on to Mr. Dennis. It is neither a misdemeanor nor a crime to turn off the radio. Of course, Mr. Dennis can take it to the Supreme Court. But the chances of swinging Bach's music are slight; a classic, to be swung, has to be familiar enough so that the audience can distinguish—though it isn't always easy—the original. And there aren't many of us who can whistle Bach, and some of those who can feel that the Constitution provides for Benny Goodman and Tommy Dorsey as well as for Eugene Ormandy and Serge Koussevitsky.

FLINT, MICH.
JOURNAL
OCT 25 1938



Music, Maestro, Please!—Enterprising cameraman gives you his lens impression of a well-known symphony orchestra conductor at work. The conductor is Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky, who is starting his 15th consecutive year on the Boston podium.

Townsman
Andover, Mass
OCT 20 1938

Photos by Donald Surett

Top left: Dr. Koussevitzky, world-famous director of the Boston Symphony, examining some of the Prendergast paintings at a tea given in his honor at the Addison Gallery Sunday. Already having received very enthusiastic notices in Boston and New York papers, the gallery received last Thursday unstinted praise in Time magazine for having arranged the exhibit.

Top right: Punchard's Muller, just after intercepting a pass in the Concord game last Saturday.

Bottom: The Andover Brass band tooting its own horns as the new membership contest got underway last Monday night. Academy assistant music director, Whittredge Clark, is seen directing the efforts of Messrs. Newman, Dennison, Slate, Page, Yancey, Dufton, Wainwright, Wilson and Sayles.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Evening Public Ledger
OCT 28 1938

Just Gossip About PEOPLE
BY NANCY WYNNE

First Dinner Party
Cosmopolitan Dash
Culture for All

WERE you among the hundreds of Forum members who were thrilled last night at the brilliant performance of the Wagnerian Singers at the Academy of Music? We hope so. . . Belonging to the forum means that you simply cannot afford to miss any of the marvelous programs on this outstanding platform of culture.

Distinguished men and women in every field bring to the Forum audience a thorough education in the arts, sciences, travel . . there are lectures and divertissements which fit into no set category. . . The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Koussevitzky, Andre Maurois, Elisabeth Schumann, Lawrence Tibbett, Elissa Landi, Carl Sandburg, Kathryn Meisle and Gregor Piatigorsky in a joint program, Paul van Zeeland, Stefan Zweig, Joseph Hofmann and the Curtis Symphony Orchestra . . are but a few of the vital experiences that Forum members have to look forward to this Winter.

BARRE, VT.
TIMES
OCT 27 1938

KOUSSEVITZKY MAPS TOUR.

May Take Boston Sympony Orchestra of 110 Pieces to Europe.

Boston, Oct. [illegible] (AP)—Dr. Ernest B. Dane, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, declined Wednesday to confirm or deny published reports the board had voted to send Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky and the 110 musicians to Europe for a concert tour next May. The Boston Herald said other trustees admitted the tour was "in the air."

Last summer when Dr. Koussevitzky returned from abroad he announced Europe was "clamoring" for the orchestra but lack of a $100,000 guarantee prevented the trip.

SANTA MONICA, CAL.
OUTLOOK
OCT 26 1938

L. NAZAR KURKDJIE

L. Nazar Kurkdjie, concert violinist and teacher, formerly of Boston, Mass., and Cleveland, O., now is permanently located in Santa Monica, with studios at 941 23rd st.

In the past 29 years Kurdjie has been active in musical circles in the two cities. In Boston he was a featured member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In Cleveland, he was dean of the violin department of Baldwin-Wallace College for a period of 15 years, was supervisor of instrumental music for the 17 schools in the Lakewood, O., area, a member of the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra and directed the Hotel Cleveland Ensemble for a period of 16 years.

Recognized as a master musician, Kurkdjie has had a wealth of teaching experience and now is available for beginners or advanced students who desire to study violin.

CHRISSY STAGE

Preparations for the annual Fall concert by the students of the Chrissy Stage Accordion Studios are under way, with finishing touches being added to the solo and band numbers, according to announcement by Chrissy Stage, director of the studios.

ARDMORE, PA.
WEEKLY CHRONICLE

OCT 21 1938

46

Metropolitan Music

A Review of Outstanding Contributions by Florence Leonard

The curious and the eager for novelties and for revivals of old favorites have been scanning the news columns in search of plans for the season already begun, in some cities.

Among the orchestras the Boston Orchestra under Koussevitsky seems to promise some, at least, of the most modern productions. Stravinsky—who, however, will not arrive in this country till spring—will appear with this orchestra as guest conuctor in his own music, and will also play his new piano concerto in its American premiere. Ernst Krenek, remembered of many for his opera, "Johnny Spielt Auf," will also conduct compositions of his own and will play his piano concerto, also new. This orchestra will present, besides, novelties in a piano concerto by Duklsky and one for string quartet and orchestra by Berezowsky, second violin of the organization. John Alden Carpenter will be represented by his own violin concerto. As a balance to these novelties, perhaps ,the predominating compositions of the winter will be those composed by one Beethoven, for whose works the world has not yet grown weary.

Chicago stands first among the cities which have kept the same conductor for a long period of years. Frederick A. Stock began his thirty-fourth year with this group, last week. Stravinsky and Krenek will appear as conductors and soloists with this orchestra, and a major revival in the concert series will be Mahler's "Das Lied von der Erde."

The New York Philharmonic will have as its only guest conductor, George Enesco, the Roumanian artist, and he will bring out his latest orchestral work, "La Villageoise," just completed during Enesco's summer vacation. In December, a new piano concerto by Anis Fuleihan, New York composer, will be played.

For the opening concerts, some of which may be heard over the radio, two interesting revivals are promised, 'Return of Lemminkaien' by Sibelius, which has not been heard in New York since 1902, and a composition by Mozart. "Adagio and Fugue for Strings." This work was played in New York in its original version in the season of 1913-14, and also in the orchestral arrangement in 1929, when Toscanini introduced it into the repertory of the Philharmonic. The fugue was written first of all for two pianos, in 1783. Five years later Mozart arranged it for strings, and completed it by adding an Adagio. It was published in this form with a sub-title, "27th Quartet." But the manuscript of the Fugue, according to Mr. Barbirolli's investigations, was plainly intended for string orchestra and not for quartet, for the parts were so marked as to indicate this plan. The manuscript of the Fugue is in the British Museum but the whereabouts of the manuscript of the Adagio is not known. The evidence of the composition itself is plainly that it was intended for string orchestra, since as Barbirolli tells us, "the whole piece sounds as unsatisfactory for string quartet as it is magnificent for orchestra."

If we think of the Fugue as chiefly a possession of Johann Sebastian Bach, and merely by accident belonging also to the styles of other composers, it is with a surprised sense of the beauty of fugues that we listen to what Mozart has to say in this frame of musical thoughts. Barbirolli says that this particular fugue is "a marvel of contrapuntal felicity," but we can look even further than to mere felicity for Mozart's message. Especially if it is to be delivered to us by the full string choir of the Philharmonic. And the Adagio after the manner of Mozart's Adagios, is sure to speak of nobility, of those qualities of spirit which withstand the assaults of material strength and of ravaging time.

HERALD TRIBUNE N.Y.

OCT 30 1938

Mrs. Henry Joralemon Davenport will give a tea at her Monroe Place home on Tuesday for members of the Brooklyn committee for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The [illegible] five symphonic concerts will open at the Brooklyn Academy of Music on November 18.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
~~ENQUIRER~~
Inquirer

OCT 30 1938

Music 25 Years Ago

The Philadelphia - Chicago Grand Opera Company opened the opera season at the Metropolitan Opera House Nov. 3 with "Tosca," featuring Mary Garden, Giovanni Martinelli in his American debut, and Vanni Marcoux. "The Barber of Seville" was given Nov. 3, with Titta Ruffo as the Barber for the first time in America; Jenny Dufau, Aristodamo Giorgini and Henri Scott.

Geraldine Farrar was soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor, on Nov. 3.

LEADER
Oakmont-Pa

OCT 21 1938

The Spectator

Dan Baker

The Philadelphia Orchestra, with Eugene Ormandy, conductor, will have the distinction of opening the symphony season in Pittsburgh with two concerts at Syria Mosque on Saturday evening, November 5th, and Sunday afternoon, November 6th.

This concert is sponsored by the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association which holds a record of achievement that is unique in American symphonic music. The association is entering its 23rd season of presenting visiting orchestras to the Pittsburgh public. During its years of service in Pittsburgh the association has brought to this city all the major orchestras of the country, including a visit of the Paris Symphony under the greatest orchestra conductor of the century, Arturo Toscanini.

This year the association will sponsor five concerts, two by the Boston Symphony, directed by Serge Koussevitsky, and three by the Philadelphia under the baton of Eugene Ormandy.

For the opening concerts, Mr. Ormandy has chosen for the Saturday evening program, "Weber's "Euryanthe Overture". Other important works include "Don Juan Poem" by Strauss, Debussy's "Iberia" and the Brahms Symphony No. 1 in G Minor. The Sunday afternoon concert will be an all Wagnerian program.

B. Trans. Oct. 26/38

MUSIC

Programs and Prospects For Boston Music Halls

The first performances of Ernst Krenek's new Piano Concerto will take place at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week, with the composer as soloist. The program will open with Haydn's Symphony in D major (No. 86) and close with "A Pagan Poem" by Loeffler.

Krenek, who is temporarily resident in this city, will be recalled as the composer of the jazz opera, "Jonny spielt auf," which had considerable vogue a decade ago and even entered the sacred portals of the Metropolitan Opera House in New York City. Subsequently Krenek through in his lot with the Schoenberg School; and the Concerto, as well as the opera "Charles V," produced at Prague last summer, is composed in the twelve-tone system.

At the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, on Thursday evening of next week, the program will consist of the aforementioned symphony of Haydn and tonepoem of Loeffler and of the Beethoven Fifth Symphony.

NEW LONDON, CONN.
DAY

OCT 28 1938

Announces New Concert Series

A new series of concerts to be held in the auditorium of the Chapman Technical High school during the winter months was announced today by Byron Hatfield, well known artist and voice teacher. The announcement indicates that the series will be sponsored by the Friends of Music, a society now being formed to promote fine music in this community.

One of the outstanding features of the new movement is the presentation in the afternoon of a complete concert exclusively for students of the elementary and secondary schools. Cooperating in the project, the officers of both the public and the private schools have made it possible for the students to hear the same artists at a nominal fee.

The first concert which is to be given on the evening of Nov. 8 will be a joint recital by Mr. Hatfield, baritone, and Henry Brynan, violinist. Both men have been acclaimed by New London music lovers on many occasions for their concert and solo work. Mr. Hatfield has sung full programs in many large cities of the east, and has been active here in making good music available to larger groups of people. Mr. Brynan is widely known for his activities in connection with the Philharmonic String quartet of Hartford.

On Jan. 31, the Friends of Music will hear Ludwig Juht, a member of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who is generally recognized as the greatest virtuose of the contra-bass. He was heard at the Mystic Art gallery a year ago by many who expressed great admiration for his handling of an instrument rarely used for solo work.

Miss Virginia Blair, dramatic soprano of New York, will be presented on the same program with Herr Juht. Her intrepretations are well received by those who have heard her in Mystic, and in Plainfield, N. J., where she is soloist in the Presbyterian church where Miss Roberta Bitgood is the organist.

A trio will be presented on March 7 with a varied program for voice, violin, and piano. Miss Blanche Haskell, soprano, and Miss Mildred Taylor Shaw, violinist, both well known to Boston audiences will be assisted by Carl Lamson at the piano. Mr. Lamson regularly accompanies Fritz Kreisler on his American tours and was heard in New London a year ago when the violinist was here.

The new series will replace the recitals formerly held at the Lighthouse inn under the name of the Lighthouse Musicales. A more spacious hall conveniently located will make excellent music available to greater numbers at new reduced rates. Membership cards are being distributed from Mr. Hatfield's studio at 38 Green street.

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

OCT 27 1938

Trustees Of Festival Decline Lenox Offer

Business Offices to be Continued in Stockbridge, With Leading Citizens of Latter Community Prepared to Give Land and Erect Building for Permanent Quarters—Plans Are Made for First Annual Harvest Ball on Nov. 5—Report is Made on Membership Campaign, Which Closes Nov. 1.

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival trustees have voted unanimously not to accept the "gracious invitation" of the seelctmen of Lenox to tion" of the selectmen of Lenox to town hall. The Lenox officials had offered the former postoffice quarters under a three-year lease at $1 per year with heat and light.

After action had been taken on the Lenox proposal, it was revealed that leading citizens of Stockbridge are prepared to give land and erect a building as permanent office quarters for the Festival. To help raise funds for this project or for some other project that will assist the Festival, Stockbridge citizens will conduct "the first annual harvest Festival ball" at Red Lion inn, Nov. 5.

The meeting of the Festival trustees was called to act on the Lenox proposal, to hear a report on the membership campaign for the 1939 concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra which closes Nov. 1 and to transact routine business. It was held at the home of Mrs. Charles Robinson Smith in Glendale. The reply delivered to the Lenox selectmen today and signed by Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, president, was as follows:

"At a meeting of the board of trustees of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc., held yesterday, your gracious invitation to use office space in the Lenox town hall was considered with deep appreciation of the proffered hospitality and of the kind expressions accompanying it.

"After earnest discussion it was resolved that this generous offer must be declined.

"The trustees are sure that you will understand and sympathize with the compelling reasons for this decision. Among others are the unwillingness to seem indifferent to the years of unfailing hospitality from Stockbridge and—of outstanding importance—the great business advantage to the Festival of continuing the office address used since its inception.

"With renewed thanks for your thoughtful and neighborly action.

"Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith."

A petition signed by 200 residents of Stockbridge was presented, but not until after action had been taken on the Lenox offer. This petition read: "We, the citizens of Stockbridge, appreciating the enduring significance of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, petition the trustees that the Festival, which originated in Stockbridge, continue to maintain its headquarters in Stockbridge village."

Then a second petition signed by 11 residents of the town, headed by Selectmen William G. MacClintic, Clinton Foster and Fred B. Williams, was presented. This petition, addressed to Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, Festival president, read:

"We understand finances are influencing consideration of a change of the Festival headquarters. If the trustees of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival so desire, citizens of Stockbridge will furnish the Festival with office quarters, rent free, rather than permit Stockbridge to be deprived of offering continuing hospitality to the Festival."

Other signers of this petition were Henry W. Dwight, president of the Housatonic National bank and Festival treasurer, Charles A. Acly, Stanley Harrod, Henry V. Rathbun, Miss Anna King, Bernhard Hoffmann, Heaton I. Treadway and Harold Williams.

NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE

OCT 27 1938

Berkshire Festival Membership Lists to Close Nov. 1st

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival reports an ever increasing number of members for the 1939 concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra at the new Tanglewood shed on Route 183 between Stockbridge and Lenox. Memberships, limited to 3,000, are available only until Nov. 1. All seats will be reserved next year, but prices will not be advanced.

Trustees point to advantages of membership as follows:

An appreciative saving in the cost of tickets. Members pay about 50% of what tickets would cost if bought singly. Under the membership plan it is possible to attend concerts for less than a dollar.

First choice of seat locations.

Attendance at no cost of a rehearsal by the orchestra.

Trustees have issued a brochure to all who have contributed to the building calling attention to accomplishments at Tanglewood—erection of the music shed at a cost of $91,193.95 which includes fees to the architect and engineer and chairs for the front section. The building contract. according to the brochure was completed under the contract price and one month ahead of schedule.

More than 82% of the donations came from people living within a radius of 50 miles of Tanglewood and the trustees themselves contributed more than 40% of the total. It is estimated that $75,000 more will be necessary to complete the shed and drain and level the parking area and install adequate lighting. An item of extreme urgency according to the trustees is the enclosing of the shed immediately with roll curtains for protection in winter and for the audience in case of storms during concerts.

Membership blanks may be obtained from the office in Stockbridge and contributions to the building fund may be addressed here, too.

47

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER - CITIZEN

OCT 27 1938

First Concert by Symphony Well Attended

Series of "Commuters' Matinees" by Boston Orchestra Opens Auspiciously—Bizet Anniversary Noted.

The Tuesday afternoon concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra, known popularly now as the Commuters Matinees, opened auspiciously before an audience which practically filled Symphony hall. These programs, set for the convenient hour of 3 o'clock this season, attract music lovers from all over New England. And interest in them has steadily increased.

Orchestral polish and virtuosity and pianistic subtleties and refinements inaugurated the season, with the latter characteristics displayed by Pierre Luboshutz and Genia Nemonoff, pairing their talents in the Mozart Concerto in E-flat for two pianofortes and orchestra.

As Georges Bizet was born in Paris 100 years ago to the day, Dr. Koussevitzky marked the anniversary by the performance of the first suite from his music to Daudet's play "L'Arlessienne." It is familiar by reason of frequent hearings over the air, played by groups of varying degrees of ability. Played by the Boston Symphony musicians it is revitalized, music of rare beauty and charm. If Dr. Koussevitzky took the Minuet at a brisk pace, that served only to bring out more effectively the contrast with the adagietto which follows in which the soft string effects were a sheer delight. The final carillon with its simulation of bell tones and clangor was given with verve and spirit.

The solo pianists, not entire strangers to Boston, matched their skill evenly in the Mozart Concerto. Refinement characterized their playing. The musical adornments of the themes were lightly and brightly limmed. Runs were fluid and limpid. There was evident desire for beautiful tonal effects. At times it seemed as if a little less restraint might have been effective. But the composition is lyrical rather than heroic. And Dr. Koussevitzky adjusted his orchestral support accordingly.

For the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven originally announced for performance the Brahms Fourth was substituted, possibly because the Beethoven masterpiece has figured so conspicuously on the programs of other symphony orchestras at the opening of the season. Dr. Koussevitzky's way with Brahms is now an old story. And the Fourth gives him the opportunities for effects which appeal to him and to the audience. Nobody would have suspected that there was day in the history of the orchestra when the music of Brahms was rated as not worth hearing or playing.

S. R. F.

HUDSON, N. Y.
DAILY STAR

OCT 28 1938

BOSTON SYMPHONY MAY TOUR EUROPE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and its famed conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, may tour Europe in May as well as make its annual appearance later at the Berkshire Symphonic Festival in August, according to reports from Boston, Mass.

Prospects for such a trip, seriously considered in 1929 and later dropped because of the depression, were revived last June when Dr. Koussevitzky returned from his annual trip abroad with assurances that only the lack of a $100,000 guarantee prevented the trip. He added that Europe was not only ready but "clamoring" for concerts by the Boston Symphony.

Ernest B. Dane, president of the board of trustees, declined to deny or confirm the report, while several other members of the board, when questioned, retorted they "couldn't say a word."

Questioning of some members, however, drew admissions that the board had met and that a tour abroad for the orchestra was discussed.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

OCT 28 1938

Music in Hartford

The season for music is at hand. On Sunday Mr. Rachmaninoff will cross the stage of the Bushnell Memorial to open the Kellogg Concert Course of 1938-39. Two days later the Hartford Symphony Orchestra will make its first appearance under the baton of its new conductor, Mr. Barzin, with Mr. Spalding as soloist, and two weeks later the Bushnell Concert Series will open under the welcome auspices of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky.

From then until spring the horns and the fiddles, the pianos and the drums will not long be silent in Hartford. Since 1930, when the Bushnell was opened, the musical fare of the city has grown increasingly richer and more varied. The Ballet Russe has already been announced for two evenings, and the Metropolitan Opera Association will make at least its usual two appearances. The field of choral music will not be neglected; the Oratorio Society has held its first trials and announced its first program, and the Choral Society has had its first rehearsals. Only chamber music seems to be lacking in proper quantity but before the season is over some enterprising group may join the Musical Club in sponsoring a performance or two.

Fortunately, with so much to hear, Hartford is not failing to develop its educational resources. The first event in the Junior Concert Series has already been given, and two more for the benefits of the children in the schools are still to come. The Layman's Music Course is about to resume its enlightenment of adults. Meantime, the schools of music are teaching more young people than ever before in the art of making music, many of them on scholarships made possible by the generosity of the music lovers of the community. Moreover, plans are now being shaped by a committee representing the schools and the private music teachers and the Board of Education to make possible instrumental instruction in the schools at prices within the reach of virtually every child.

Clearly the reputation lately gained by Hartford as an outstanding center of musical activity is not undeserved. The maintenance of its present renown depends upon the support that it continues to give to its many musical agencies. The claims of its schools, and particularly of its orchestra, which gives promise of being among the finest in the country, are particularly appealing. Their contributions to the culture of the city in the past have been so great as to leave small doubt of their adequate support in the future.

RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER

OCT 28 1938

The Theatre and Music
HERE AND THERE

By HELEN DeMOTTE.

WHEELER BECKETT, former conductor and founder of the Richmond Symphony Orchestra, is now in Boston, where he is giving a series of orchestra concerts for the children of the city with the co-operation of about seventy members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The series, which opened to a capacity house last week in Symphony Hall is distinctive, according to reports from Boston, in some important aspects.

First, with the aid of a generous group of sponsors, Mr. Beckett was able to offer 400 subscriptions at 60 cents for the entire series, which were quickly taken by twenty-five Boston Settlements. Some 1,800 seats were taken by public school students at $1 for the series and the rest went to private schools.

The other departure is that Mr. Beckett has decided to throw overboard demonstration of instruments, stereoscopic slides and long explanations. Instead, he has prepared music notes to be sent in advance to the young subscribers. It is said that musical Boston is keenly interested in the outcome of this series as a test in a hitherto uncertain field of endeavor.

PATERSON, N. J.
CALL

OCT 28 1938

Pianists To Open "Y" Music Series

Luboshutz And Nemenoff To Appear Here On Nov. 22

Luboshutz and Nemenoff, duo-pianists, will open the Y.M.-Y.W. H.A. music series of 1938-1939 on Tuesday evening, Nov. 22.

Joseph Thieberg, chairman of the "Y" music committee, has announced that the Philharmonic Symphony String Quartet and the Ancient Instrument Players will also appear on this year's music series.

Both of the duo-pianists, Luboshutz and Nemenoff, have been playing ensemble music since they were children. Pierre Luboshutz was one of a family of three gifted children who played together as a trio on concert tours throughout Russia. At the age of 4, Pierce Luboshutz had already won the distinction of being a fine concert violinist. At that time, through the influence of an older sister, he began to study piano. He progressed so rapidly on the piano that at the age of 12, when he was sent to the Conservatory of Music, he received the highest honors to be awarded at Moscow.

Fritz Kreisler visited Moscow to present a series of concerts and arrived without an accompanist. He had heard Luboshutz playing and engaged the boy to accompany him. So, at the age of 14, Pierre Luboshutz had accompanied Fritz Kreisler. In 1912 Luboshutz made an auspicious debut as the guest soloist with the Koussevitsky Orchestra, Koussevitsky himself, conducting.

When Luboshutz conducted a masters course in Paris, Genia Nemenoff enrolled as a pupil and they were married two years later. From that time on, the formed a partnership of duo-pianists. Last year they played 60 engagements and were acclaimed by all leading music critics as having given "a perfect performance."

Due to the popularity of the individual concerts, a limited number of series tickets will be sold at a reduced price.

JOURNAL
Hingham, Mass

OCT 28 1938

SYMPHONY—

A large and enthusiastic audience greeted Dr. Serge Kousevitsky as he conducted the first concert of the Monday-Tuesday Symphony series. Tuesday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Boston. The Monday and Tuesday concerts, usually slightly more conventional than the Friday and Saturday programs, have been combined this season to the same program. The first number was Bizet's Suite No. 1 from "L'Arlesienne" and the symphony for the afternoon was Symphony No. 4 in E-minor by Brahms. Pierre Luboshutz and his wife Genia Nemenoff, pianists were the guest soloists and their splendid rendition of Mozart's Concerto for two Pionofortes, in E-flat, was warmly received by the Boston audience.

Hingham subscribers to the Tuesday afternoon concerts, of which there are six, include Mrs. J. H. Bacheller, Jr., Mrs. Dudley M. Baker, Mrs. John Barnard, Mrs. John L. Barry, Miss Emily J. Blaney, Mrs. Clarence S. Burr and Mrs. Jonathan Chace. Other Tuesday subscribers are Mrs. Alice Connelly, Mrs. Richard M. Everett, Mrs. Rufus C. Folsom, Mrs. Bartlett Guild, Mrs. Herbert T. Hand, Jr., Mrs. Sydney Harrison, Mrs. John T. Hollis, Mrs. Gordon P. Marshall, Mrs. Mayo A. Shattuck, Miss Dorothy Shaw, Mrs. Robert Spencer and Mrs. Edward Wilder.

The Friday afternoon series is another popular choice for many Hingham people and among those attending are Mrs. Charles B. Barnes, Mrs. L. G. Bruggemann, Mrs. George K. Gardner, Mrs. Frederick R. Hall, Mrs. G. H. Hartwell, Mrs. T. S. Murfitt, Mrs. Walter H. Newey and Mrs. F. Morton Smith. Monday subscribers include Miss Bertha A. Garran and Miss Molly Pitcher, while the Saturday night subscribers include Mr. Foster M. Trainer, Mrs. Walter S. Fox and Mr. Walter S. Fox, Jr.

Natalie North

NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS

OCT 29 1938

Musical Recordings

Mention has been made here before of the credit due recording companies for their unwillingness to rest content with a single performance of the major classics. This recognition of the fact that great music has vital qualities which find varied expression as they pass through the interpretive ministrations of divers artists is exemplified by the issuance this month of new recordings of two Brahms symphonies, both of which had been recorded previously.

Columbia and Victor share in the plaudits which the two new releases undoubtedly will evoke from Brahms lovers. Victor issues the C Minor (No. 1) with Bruno Walter conducting the Vienna Philharmonic (M-470). Columbia's offering is the E Minor (No. 4) with Felix Weingartner directing the London Symphony (Set No. 335).

Both new sets face stiff competition. The Brahms First already has been recorded for Victor by Stokowski and the Philadelphians (M-301), for Columbia by Weingartner and the Royal Philharmonic (Set No. 103) and for Decca by Otto Klemperer and the Berlin Philharmonic (Nos. 25487 to 25492, inclusive). The Brahms Fourth previously has been recorded for Victor by Stokowski (M-185) and for the same company by Walter and the British Broadcasting Corp. Orchestra (M-242).

New Levels

It may be stated without further ado that both new recordings fully measure up to the earlier releases as to performance and excel in production. Certainly the Vienna Philharmonic's rendering of the magnificent Fourth Movement of the C Minor and the noble strength of the London Symphony's string choir in the First Movement of the E Minor set new levels in the field of recorded music.

Another instance of duplication, and again within the same company, is afforded by Victor's new release of Moussorgsky's entertaining program suite, "Pictures at an Exhibition." Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony recorded the work for Victor in M-102 and the present release is by Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra (M-442).

For those who have wondered at the inspirational source of the suite it may be of interest to know that one of Moussorgsky's dearest friends was a painter, Victor Hartman, who died at the age of 39. Friends arranged a memorial exhibition of his work and the composer wrote the descriptive suite as his tribute.

Originally composed for piano, the work had rich orchestral possibilities that induced the late Maurice Ravel to make a transcription in 1923, at the urging of Koussevitzky, who used that transcription in his recording. The present release is of a second transcription, made in 1936 by Lucien Caillet of the Philadelphia Orchestra, whose work in that line has won him international repute.

ALBANY, N. Y.
KNICKERBOCKER NEWS

OCT 29 1938

Festival Unit Remains at Stockbridge

THE Berkshire Symphonic Festival trustees have voted not to accept the 'gracious invitation" of the selectmen of Lenox to move the festival office to Lenox Town Hall. The Lenox officials had offered the former postoffice quarters under a three-year lease at $1 a year, with heat and light.

After action had been taken on the Lenox proposal it was revealed leading citizens of Stockbridge are prepared to give land and erect a building as permanent office quarters for the festival. To help raise funds for this project or for some other project that will assist the festival Stockbridge citizens will conduct "the first annual harvest festival ball" at Red Lion Inn Nov. 5.

The meeting of the festival trustees was called to act on the Lenox proposal, to hear a report on the membership campaign for the 1939 concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which closes Nov. 1, and to transact routine business. It was at the home of Mr. Charles Robinson Smith, Glendale.

CAMDEN, N. J.
POST

OCT 29 1938

Music's The Thing Not Glamor, Names, Records Show Again

Arrangement of 'Pictures at Exhibition' Should Find Appreciation

More and more we are coming to the conclusion that names in music are losing their force and that the music performed is what counts more, as far as today's listeners are concerned. Before the education that came with radio that state of affairs wasn't as evident, but now, we are sure, there is no doubt about it.

There have been those who, from the beginning, have said, "I don't know very much about music but I like it." And, ordinarily, one could and can trust their judgment over many, many more. Now, however, there are countless listeners who have left that behind. They know a lot more about music and they like it much more.

Thus, perhaps, we are coming to a time when that elusive quality, glamor, means less in music. Conductors who have it will perhaps take a back seat while those who lack it go to town through the medium of good music well played. What have gesticulations to do with good music? What have podium gyrations? What have the affectations so carefully arranged to impress?

Thus we come to mention of the new orchestration of Lucien Cailliet of the "Pictures At An Exhibition" of Moussorgsky. M. Cailliet is not an imposing, pushing musician. He sits in the clarinet section of the Philadelphia Orchestra. And yet his orchestrations and arrangements are as fine as anything of the sort being produced today and, for some reason, he gets full credit for them with Mr. Ormandy at the helm. Into his work M. Cailliet pours a genius that is partly a sense of humor, a tremendous energy and an enviable knowledge of instrumentation.

We liked this arrangement of the Moussorsky opus, which Victor has released for October. We liked the Ravel arrangement, played by the Boston Symphony, too. But somehow there is more color in the new transcription, more contrasts, less glamor of name. The orchestra under Mr. Ormandy plays it well. (M-422).

Something of a reverse faces us in our consideration of the recording of the Brahms First by Bruno Walter and the Vienna Philharmonic. For no matter whose interpretation you like best, this set will have meaning in that Mr. Walter is an exile and the Vienna Philharmonic a thing of the past, due to Nazi coups and the Continental apologists. Mr. Walter, beyond all that, is a splendid conductor, and it is to be hoped that he will be heard in this country soon. (M-470.)

In a two-pocket album are presented the Polovetzki Dances from Prince Igor, arranged by Leopold Stokowski and played by the Philadelphia Orchestra. (M-499.)

48

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Evening Public Ledger

OCT 29 1938

The Critic Talks to
MUSIC LOVERS

By SAMUEL L. LACIAR

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is of the opinion that a composer, when creating a work, transfuses it not only with his musical power but with the entire meaning of his life—the essence of his being. That is why we can and we must find a "central line" in the creation of every composer. This "central line" is the meaning of his life and ideals, which he brings to us through the medium of his music. With Bach the central line is religion, and we find in his whole life, his praise of God and the exaltation of heaven and divinity. Haydn's line, on the other hand, is joyfulness and humor, which he wants to share with others, and we feel it in every symphony, in every minuetto and allegro, while Mozart gives us pure tonal harmony and absolute purity of musical form.

If the creative work of Mozart be analyzed we will find how free he was of every outward influence. He believes in music for the sake of music, sound for sound and beauty for beauty. But Beethoven's central line is transcendality, for he reflects universal emotion in music. When Beethoven grieves he grieves with the world; when he is joyful it is universal joy; when he feels a tragedy it is a world tragedy. We can well say that the central line of Beethoven's art is the unifying element of universality. The central line of Wagner's art is love and devotion, which is apparent in all his creative work; Senta in "The Flying Dutchman," Elizabeth in "Tannhauser," King Marke in "Tristan und Isolde," et cetera. And so is found in the work of each master a central line expressed in sound.

* * *

HERE emerges, says Dr. Koussevitzky, the truth of interpretative art. When the artist-interpreter is able to perceive the central line, the inner meaning of a composition, he will find in himself the right and illuminating emotion to perform it. It is not difficult for a musician to analyze a score externally, to determine its form, its melodic and harmonic plan and its entire structure. But this takes us only half way; this is only the surface part of the central line, which will give us no true understanding of the depth and emotion of either work or composer. The most important part is that which can neither be read nor learned; it rests in the interpreter himself, in his own emotion, depth and feeling.

Today we often hear musical "authorities" declare when discussing a performance: "Let the music speak for itself." That up-to-date motto is dangerous, because it paves the way for mediocre performers to play a composition accurately from beginning to end and then claim that they "let the music speak for itself." The argument is also not correct because a talented artist, no matter how accurately he follows the markings in the score, renders the composition through his own prism, his own perception of the music and his own temperament and emotion. And the deeper the emotion of the interpreter, the greater and more vivid the performance.

* * *

A PERFECT interpretation may have two different aspects, each equally faithful to the score. One may be called mechanically perfect, the other organically perfect. The first gives the beauty of mathematical balance, symmetry and clarity; the second is the indivisible, living, pulsating "elan vital" of the composition. One aims to present a beautified surface or reflection of the composition; in the other the work—its central idea—lives as a reality. One is always enjoyable, pleasant and delightful, but remains, like a beautiful scene, external to the listener. The other carries him into the living spirit of the work and makes him colive and coexperience this vital feeling. Like a mystic experience, the organic interpretation puts the hearer in direct touch with the absolute reality hidden in a great piece of music.

Approaching the matter of orchestral performance, Dr. Koussevitzky finds that at no time has the standard of musical performance been set so high as it is in America today. This is not a mere verbal statement, because these facts speak for themselves. In Europe, even in the best of the old days, the symphony orchestra had not nearly the same possibilities as we have, nor was there the same intensity of work and interest. As an example, Dr. Koussevitzky cited the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, one of the oldest in all Europe. "How many concerts did that orchestra give in the course of one season under the leadership of a great conductor?" he inquired.

* * *

THE answer sounds amazing to us today, accustomed as we are to long seasons and concerts every week. Dr. Koussevitzky answered his own question by saying that "in its most brilliant period the Berlin Philharmonic gave ten concerts with Nikisch conducting and the remaining concerts were led by different and indifferent conductors. Yet that was the foremost orchestra of its time." He then spoke of the "heroic" period of musical Vienna, when Gustav Mahler was at the head of the Vienna Opera Orchestra. The same orchestra also gave concerts and was known as "The Philharmonic." But it was in the first place an opera orchestra, the concerts coming in between, and there were perhaps eight or ten concerts in a season, also led by different conductors.

The possibilities in America are infinitely better, declared Dr. Koussevitzky in conclusion, and give a new idea of orchestral performances. "It is a mistake," says the Boston conductor, "to think that musical life in America develops only because of America's wealth. This is wrong. Musical life in this country grows because there is the need for music. That need for music today has an explanation; men need an outlet for their best and deeper emotions, and they find it in music. For music is the recovered word of true feeling, liberated from the banality, hypocrisy and cruelty of life. Music is to help the souls of men. It is the pure language, regenerating like the mountain air."

This is the second of two articles discussing Dr. Koussevitzky's article, "Poetry and Music; Musical Interpretation; and Some Remarks About American Orchestras," written for the American Academy of Arts and Sciences. The first section was discussed in this column last Saturday.

NEW YORK CITY, N. Y., TIM
OCTOBER 30, 1938

BOSTON MAY SEND SYMPHONY ABROAD

Project for European Tour in Spring Under Koussevitzky Revived for Orchestra

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BOSTON, Oct. 29.—Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are understood to have voted to send the organization of 110 men, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, abroad in May for its long-contemplated European concert tour.

Prospects for such a trip, seriously considered in 1929 and later dropped because of the depression, were revived last June when Dr. Koussevitzky returned from his annual trip abroad with assurances that only the lack of a $100,000 guarantee prevented the trip. He added that Europe was not only ready but "clamoring" for concerts by the Boston Symphony.

Ernest B. Dane, president of the board of trustees, declined to deny or confirm the report, while several other members of the board, when questioned, retorted they "couldn't say a word."

Some members, however, admitted that the board had met and that a European tour for the orchestra was taken up.

It was understood here that the contemplated trip of Dr. Koussevitzky and his men would cover Great Britain, France and Belgium. Cities where concerts would be given would be London, Paris and Brussels, and possibly others would be added to the itinerary.

This would be the first trip abroad for the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a unit. The New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra made a European tour ten years ago under the direction of Arturo Toscanini to immense acclaim.

KRENEK TO BE SYMPHONY GUEST ON FRIDAY

Ernst Krenek, the Austrian composer who has recently made his residence in America, will be the guest at the Boston Symphony concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony hall, appearing as soloist in his new piano concerto. The composer's second work in this form will then have its first performance in this country. The name of Krenek came to the fore a decade ago on account of his opera in the jazz idiom, "Jonny spielt auf." His latest opera "Karl V," produced at Prague last July, marks a return to the twelve-tone technique of his earlier years. This system is also the basis of the new piano concerto.

Serge Koussevitzky will open the programme with Haydn's Symphony in D major, No. 86, one of the group which was composed for performance in Paris. Its last performance at the Boston Symphony concerts was in 1931. The third number will be Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem," for orchestra with pianoforte, English horn, and three trumpets obbligati.

SYMPHONY AT CAMBRIDGE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the second concert of the series in Sanders theatre, Cambridge, next Thursday evening at 8 o'clock. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announces this programme: Haydn's Symphony in D major, No. 86; Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem" (after Virgil); and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor.

It would take about 42 cents of every dollar spent in retail purchases in the United States last year to pay the cost of all governments.

Lowell Telegram -
Oct. 30/38

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES-DISPATCH

OCT 30 1938

Symphony Program Announced

Richmond's musical interest has been focused on the program arranged by Dr. Hans Kindler for the season's initial concert of the National Symphony Orchestra at the Mosque November 15.

The program has been announced here as follows by Samuel H. Gellman, secretary of the Symphony Society of Richmond and chairman of its music committee: Overture "Solonnell" (Glazounow), Symphony No. 1 (Bizet), allegro vivo, adagio, allegro vivace, allegro vivace; intermission; Symphony No. 2 in D Major (Brahms), allegro non troppo, adagio non troppo, allegretto grazioso, allegro con spirito.

Much of the fire and vivacity, color and drama that Georges Bizet imparted to his great opera, "Carmen," will be found in his symphonic creation, which the National Symphony will give for its first performance in Richmond. Though virtually unknown in the United States outside professional music circles, the Bizet symphony has long been a signal favorite in Europe. The selection of this work by Dr. Kindler is a marked tribute to his Richmond audience by a conductor who has carried his organization to rank as "one of the major American symphony orchestras."

Whenever the National Symphony goes on tour it crosses the paths of other great American orchestras, such as the Philadelphia Orchestra, the New York Philharmonic-Symphony and the Boston Symphony. At Hartford, Conn., the Washington orchestra's reception there has always been enthusiastic.

The National Symphony's Richmond series this season will be under the auspices of the Symphony Society of Richmond, which is endeavoring to place symphony on a permanent basis here. The National Symphony is scheduled for four concerts—November 15, January 16, February 13 and March 27—all to be conducted by Dr. Kindler. Only financial success of this premiere series will assure future symphony seasons for Richmond on a community basis, according to officials of the society, and a determined effort is being made to obtain sufficient season subscriptions to consummate the program. Subscriptions may be entered at the society's office in the New Leader Building or by telephone. Dial 3-3001.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
Sunday Journal & American

OCT 30 1938

Symphonic 'Births' Celebrated

By GRENA BENNETT

Symphonic orchestras all over the country are declaring this an "anniversary" season.

America's oldest organization in that group, the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, having begun its 97th year, is facing its centenary, its first public concert having been given Dec. 7, 1842, in the downtown Apollo Rooms.

The Boston Symphony entered its 58th year early this month and is celebrating the 15th anniversary of the appointment of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor, the longest record for a batonist with the Hub Band.

Chicago Celebrates, Too

Chicago is looking forward to observing the 50th anniversary of the founding of its Symphony Orchestra, which recently began its 48th season, with almost 100 concerts on its schedule. Dr. Stock, the permanent director of the orchestra, has held that post for more than 30 years.

The orchestra from Philadelphia will be 40 years old this time next year. Anticipating the celebration of the birth of a nation's important musical unit, the group from Pennsylvania will make visits to a greater number of cities than have ever before been included in its itinerary.

Many of the orchestras that operate under the banner of the Federal Music Project will spread the cause of music in towns and cities that have been unable to support such ensembles.

Cincinnati has patronized its Symphony for 44 years and the Minneapolis Orchestra will commence its 36th season this week.

Three conductors will have charge of the Cleveland orchestra during the Winter. They are Artur Rodzinski, Georges Enesco and Albert Stoessel, who will share the podium in the coming-of-age season of the band. In the District of Columbia, the National Symphony Orchestra will begin its 17th season today, conducted by the founder, Hans Kindler. Texas has enrolled as one of the country's most progressive States in sponsoring orchestral music with organizations devoted to symphonic programs functioning in Dallas, El Paso and Tyler.

Tucson's 10th Year

Tucson, Arizona, boasts of a symphony orchestra which will celebrate its 10th anniversary this year.

Indiana supports similar groups in Indianapolis, Terre Haute, Evansville, Fort Wayne and South Bend. Omaha and Lincoln represent Nebraska's quota to the cause; and Missouri is in line with the Kansas City Philharmonic.

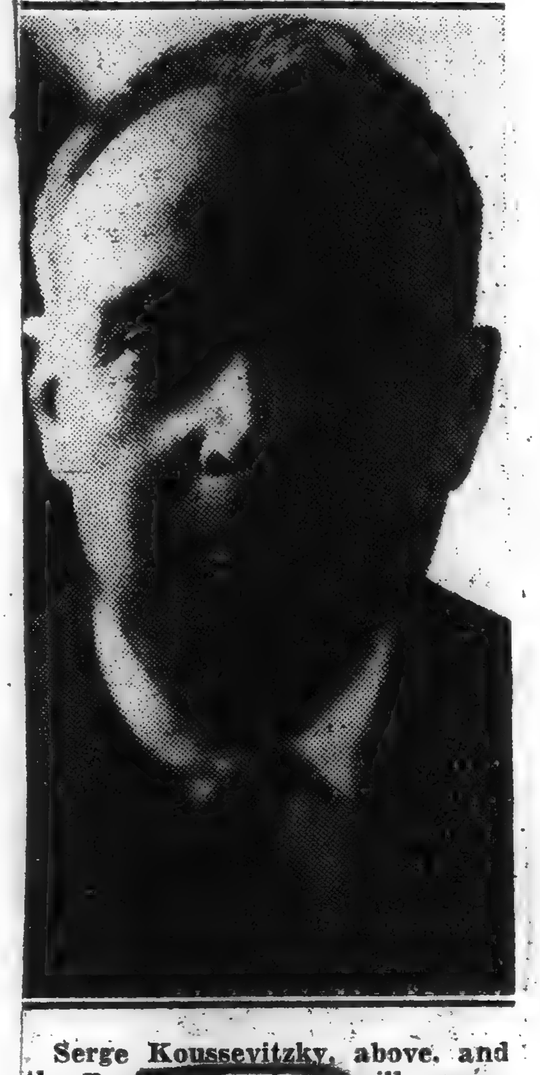
In the Far West, the Los Angeles Philharmonic will begin its jubilee season this week. The first symphony orchestra in San Francisco offered its initial concert in 1854, performing sporadically for 25 years. The present active band will open the season shortly after New Year's day, with Pierre Monteux on the podium and Jose Iturbi, solo pianist.

Seattle and Portland have maintained orchestras for many years under celebrated leaders and Detroit will celebrate its silver jubilee this season under Franco Ghione.

PITTSBURG, PA.
PRESS

OCT 30 1938

Coming Here



Serge Koussevitzky, above, and the Boston Symphony will appear in evening and matinee concerts at Syria Mosque on Dec. 10 and 11 respectively.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

OCT 30 1938

Boston Symphony Local Committee Will Meet

Mrs. Henry J. Davenport will entertain at a tea at her home, 40a Monroe Place, Tuesday afternoon, for members of the Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This will be the first meeting this Fall of the Brooklyn Committee, of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman and Mrs. Davenport acting chairman. The 1938-39 season of five symphonic concerts will open at the Academy of Music Friday evening, Nov. 18. The concerts, which are now in their 53d year, are presented under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which James G. McDonald is president, the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, of which R. Huntington Woodman is chairman, and the Brooklyn Committee.

Auxiliary chairmen are being appointed in different sections of the borough to assist the Brooklyn Committee in its activities. Mrs. Thomas F. Casey, a member of the Brooklyn Committee, is serving as chairman of this new regional committee. Mrs. Edward C. Blum is serving as chairman of boxes again this season.

Reports will be given by Mrs. Davenport, Mrs. Blum, Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, chairman of the membership committee; Mrs. William G. James, Junior League Committee chairman; Mrs. Casey, and Miss Irene Miles, acting director of the Institute at the Academy of Music.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 30 1938

To Lecture on Symphony

John Archer will give the second lecture of the season on the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Providence programs in the Providence Public Library next Sunday afternoon at 4 o'clock. The lecture, under the auspices of the Monday Morning Musical Club, is free to the public. This is the eighth consecutive season the club has sponsored these talks.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

OCT 30 1938

World In Music

By PIERRE KEY

Wise words drop now and again from lips that rarely utter them; and the lady was one hundred per cent right when she remarked to her escort, at the first breathing spell of the Philadelphia Orchestra's first New York concert a few evenings ago: "It's a great band, isn't it?"

One of the world's three greatest, without a doubt; the other two being the Boston Symphony and New York's Philharmonic-Symphony. I believe the newly-formed NBC Symphony (recently improved by sixteen replacements) is advanced by its satellites as one of the world's greatest; but that claim seems to me to be a bit too previous. You don't make a great symphony orchestra in a few weeks, or even months, and though splendidly personneled now, the NBC orchestra must be moulded into a plastic unit . . . something that requires time.

The Philadelphia Orchestra opened the New York season in Carnegie with Eugene Ormandy hitting some high spots in the Beethoven "Leonore" No. 3 overture and second Schumann concerto, and missing a few in the rugged second symphony of Sibelius. Gene has gone back to using a baton this season, which is as it should be.

There is a noble orchestra for you. An array of strings only one other band can match, and reeds and brasses that glow with emotional warmth.

Barbirolli and Philharmonic.

John Barbirolli is moving on and up. An abler conductor last season than during his introductory period as guest, he is improved over his final appearances here last spring. He got a hearty reception when he appeared on the Philharmonic-Symphony rostrum just forty-eight hours after the Philadelphians had given their Carnegie Hall concert. He was warmly applauded, too, after each composition on the program.

For me the Philharmonic-Symphony has vitality and virtuosity more than richness of tone. But it is a great orchestra and Barirolli is finding it increasingly responsive to his demands as he grows.

I heard some complaints about the arrangements of the compositions—which put the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven in the second half, immediately following the Mozart adagio and fugue for strings which had been preceded by Weber's "Der Freischutz" overture, two tone poems of Sibelius, and Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird" suite. Program making is an art few conductors appear able to master.

Also, no conductor can hope to satisfy much more than fifty-one per cent of any audience.

Television and Music.

Television has emerged from "just around the corner" to a place out in the open. At least, it will be operating in New York within a comparatively brief time; for the proving ground is to be the nation's metropolis. No one yet knows what direction television will take, nor how it will operate to aid the cause of music. But in time—and it will by no means be in the immediate future—television will probably add to the contribution sound-broadcasting has to music.

What should be understood is that television will not be well developed commercially for several years—and it may be quite a few years. The expense of transmitting pictures beyond fifty mile distances makes chain television something a considerable distance away.

Finally, there is the rule set up by the Federal Radio Commission which prohibits television broadcasting from being commercially sponsored. Just how the economic side of the problem is to be solved remains to be determined. But television will soon be with a few of us . . . for our sampling and subsequent verdict.

Opera and Dancing.

Opportunity to dance to the music of a popular band is now being used as an inducement to swell the gate receipts of a performance being given in the former Manhattan Opera House by an organization known as New York Grand Opera. Its manager is Amadeo Passeri and "La Traviata" was the first work offered a few evenings ago in this altogether unique endeavor in the field of lyric drama.

Shades of Oscar Hemmerstein! Not that that resourceful impressario would have been above letting his patrons dance after one, or more than one, performance until two o'clock next morning. But I can not forget that the Manhattan Opera House was the one-time scene of great opera given with great singing artists.

This venture is popular-priced. Like most of those ventures it is indeterminable but if performances continue up to the level set at the opening, it is quite possible that we may have a permanent addition to the swelling ranks of our popular-priced opera organizations. Cesare Sodero's authoritative conducting lent dignity even to an occasion wherein serious music had to compete with its lowlier, but livelier, distant cousin for audience favor.

As one conductor remarked, this fine musician (Mr. Sodero) "seemed to realize that Verdi's tunes had the power to survive if given half a chance." That "half" was just about the utmost that could be hoped for on a program that billed those strange companions, grand opera and "swing," as "two attractions for the price of one . . . no extra charge."

Lines-O'-News.

It is good to have Ernest Schelling back in musical harness again, after his withdrawal from activities for the entire season last year because of an eye injury and the pressure of other personal affairs. After four appearances in The Netherlands this month, leading the Concertgebouw Orchestra on one occasion and appearing with that body as star soloist under Willem Mengelberg's direction on three other occasions, Mr. Schelling has returned to America. Soon he will make several hundred young Philharmonic-Symphony admirers of "Uncle Ernest" very happy when he picks up the baton to preside again over the Society's Children's Concerts.

CHARLOTTE, N. C.
OBSERVER

OCT 30 1938

MUSIC COMMENT

BY LAURA HOWELL NORDEN.

THIS FESTIVAL idea has taken firm hold in America. The question in my mind is just what is a festival? Sometimes it seems as if it could be defined something like this: "Concert—a public performance of music. Festival—the plural of concert," since two or more concerts invariably are classified as a festival, when they occur consecutively at the same place, given under the same auspices.

The Salzburg Festival has for years been the mecca for musicians and musical tourists. Now, sad to say, it has been completely demoralized by political changes in Central Europe. Give it time to find its balance again and it may resume its musical priority. At present, however, there is considerable speculation in America as to whether some one of our numerous festivals may not assume world leadership in that field. Even in North Carolina promoters of the Asheville Mozart Festival have expressed this hope.

New England with her many festivals seems determined to capture the title of "American Salzburg." The Berkshire Symphonic Festival, which has been directed for five years by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, has, according to The New York Times "all that is needed to attract an immense public from all parts of the country," since it has developed adequate facilities and owns its permanent site. Its director, a very famous leader in matters musical, is ambitious to make it "the greatest music and art center in the world."

Oct. 25/38

Reviews and Previews

SYMPHONY HALL—The Monday and Tuesday series, which opened here last night, features the paired pianists, Pierre Luboschutz and Genia Nemenoff, who perform Mozart's Concerto for two pianofortes, in E flat major. The fourth pair of weekend concerts, to be conducted by Serge Koussevitzky Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Oct. 28-29, will be devoted to a program of music by French composers. Included will be the suite "Le Tombeau de Couperin", and "Rhapsodie Flamande". Jascha Heifetz will play here on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 6.

12 Cont.

ELMIRA, N. Y.
TELEGRAM

OCT 30 1938

MajorSymphonyOrchestras To Spend Five Millions On Programs This Season

By JOHN SELBY
Associated Press Arts Editor

New York—The 16 leading symphony orchestras of the country are getting ready to spend almost five million dollars to give their communities the music they want.

This figure does not include budgets of many excellent secondary orchestras. Thanks to music project efforts, there now is no city of the United States of 50,000 or better without some sort of orchestra. Many smaller cities also have them.

It does not touch the money spent on hundreds of college orchestras nor the cost of the high school orchestras which now number in the thousands.

The total spent for symphonic music in America has been estimated as high as 40 millions. Whatever it is, the record shows the communities like it.

Only one American city, Seattle, is reducing its symphony budget—and that is because of a peculiar local situation which may be changed with the advent of the new Seattle conductor, Dr. Nikolai Sokoloff.

MOST BUDGETS remain the same, although four cities will spend a little more this winter: Washington, Pittsburgh, Indianapolis and Rochester, which will spend more money on soloists.

Eleven of the 16 key cities report better ticket sales than last season, when most found attendance had improved over the preceding winter. Cleveland, where a new women's organization has got into the field, reports the largest advance sale in the orchestra's history, and even Boston, where big audiences have been the rule more than 50 years, is five per cent ahead.

Only Philadelphia reports a decrease, and that is "slight, and not alarming," according to Alfred Reginald Allen, manager. Philadelphia is one of three cities reporting changes in the status of its conductor. Eugene Ormandy is now "musical director," which means that he controls absolutely the personnel and the programs; Stokowski will appear as guest only, next spring.

IN PITTSBURGH Fritz Reiner becomes permanent conductor, his first similar berth since his days with the Cincinnati Symphony. In Seattle, Dr. Sokoloff replaces Dr. Basil Cameron, and although Eugene Goosens remains permanent conductor in Cincinnati, he will be late arriving, and Jose Iturdi, conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic, will take the first three pairs of the 20 comprising the season. Longest tenure among practicing conductors goes to Frederick Stock, now beginning his 34th season in Chicago.

Philadelphia will have the longest season—30 weeks, of which four will be spent on tour. Seattle has the shortest, 12 concerts. Kansas City, where Karl Krueger has built an excellent orchestra since 1933, adds 10 concerts to its season; Pittsburgh adds three weeks.

THE ONLY major departure from standard symphony practice is at Rochester, where the 50 men of the well known "civic" orchestra are engaged for a 28-week season, and are augmented by 35 more players for a concentrated symphony season of 12 weeks.

Twenty men have been added to four orchestras—newest additions being at Boston where one more double base will be found; most in Washington, where Hans Kindler will have 10 new men. Only one orchestra has reduced personnel. This is St. Louis, where three men have resigned, and have not been replaced as yet.

Philadelphia will play the most concerts, 118. Seattle plans fewest, only 13. But Boston, where the symphony has not only its regular season, but a spring popular season and several weeks of free concerts out of doors, as well as a festival in the Berkshires, will do all told more than 200 concerts, a unique record in American music. More than half will be directed by the permanent conductor, Dr. Serge Moussevitzky.

THE 16 ORCHESTRAS plan 1,315 concerts in their regular seasons. The budget total is $4,782,605. This is exactly $3,636.96 a concert. Approximately a quarter of this is returned through ticket sales; some orchestras are lucky, and have fairly extensive endowments, or (as in Detroit) radio contracts.

For most orchestras, however, October is the beginning of a battle. On one side is symphonic music, which the nation demands in larger and larger quantities. On the other is the big bad wolf—the deficit.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TELEGRAM

NOV 1 - 1938

Encouraging Symphony Orchestras

We sympathize with the efforts of the Hartford Symphony society to establish a self-supporting orchestra in Hartford and to make it the assured nucleus of symphonic concerts in that area. However, we have a slight feeling of resentment over both the name and slogan of the society. The name given to it at least in its literature is "Connecticut's Own Orchestra," and President Frances Goodwin of the society is quoted as saying:

"In addition to providing good music for Connecticut the Symphony Society is concerned with the provision of employment for worth while musicians residing in the state."

This, we contend, is taking in too much territory. Hartford is not Connecticut, though it is part of Connecticut and as far as we are concerned a valued and esteemed part. There is in Hartford just a little bit of confusion between the part and the whole. A symphonic society located in Hartford can hardly provide good music "for the state of Connecticut" for obvious reasons. Besides it overlooks the fact that New Haven has had its own symphony for 30 or 40 years and that Bridgeport has now an established symphony with a record of steadily increasing public approval. And of course, we might mention the visits of other organizations of nationwide fame both to New Haven and to such symphonic festivals as the Silvermine concerts.

As we said, we wish success to the Hartford Symphony Society but do not wish it to take in too much territory. When we try to appraise the value to any community of having its own symphony orchestra, we should not overlook the importance of giving encouragement to local players. America has made a great mistake in the past in relying on a few organizations such as the Boston Symphony, the New York Philharmonic or the Philadelphia Symphony, to supply symphonic music for the nation. The result has been a lack of symphonic players in all other communities. There is no training for a symphony orchestra except playing in one, and the more of these orchestras we have, the better for the real development of music throughout the nation.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 30 1938

BOSTON MAY SEND SYMPHONY ABROAD

Project for European Tour in Spring Is Revived

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BOSTON, Oct. 29.—Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are understood to have voted to send the organization of 110 men, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, abroad in May for its long-contemplated European concert tour.

Prospects for such a trip, seriously considered in 1929 and later dropped because of the depression, were revived last June when Dr. Koussevitzky returned from his annual trip abroad with assurances that only the lack of a $100,000 guarantee prevented the trip. He added that Europe was not only ready but "clamoring" for concerts by the Boston Symphony.

Ernest B. Dane, president of the board of trustees, declined to deny or confirm the report, while several other members of the board, when questioned, retorted they "couldn't say a word."

Some members, however, admitted that the board had met and that a European tour for the orchestra was taken up.

It was understood here that the contemplated trip of Dr. Koussevitzky and his men would cover Great Britain, France and Belgium. Cities where concerts would be given would be London, Paris and Brussels, and possibly others would be added to the itinerary.

This would be the first trip abroad for the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a unit. The New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra made a European tour ten years ago under the direction of Arturo Toscanini, to immense acclaim.

HERALD TRIBUNE N.Y.

OCT 30 1938

Funds Invited For Music Shed At Tanglewood

Berkshire Festival Needs $75,000 for Work on Building and Grounds; Memberships to Close

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival will close its membership lists for the sixth annual festival next August at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., next Tuesday. The number of memberships, with privileges including a considerable reduction in ticket prices, first choice of seats, and free attendance at one of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's rehearsals, is limited to 3,000. All seats in the Music Shed at Tanglewood will be reserved next summer, but the ticket prices will be unchanged.

In a brochure issued by the festival trustees, it is stated that the building of the Music Shed has cost $91,193.95, including the architect's and engineer's fees and the cost of the chairs in the front of the auditorium. The work was completed under the contract price and a month ahead of schedule. The trustees themselves contributed more than 40 per cent of the price of the building, and more than 82 per cent of the contributions came from persons living within fifty miles of Lenox.

It is estimated that $75,000 more will be needed for improvements in the Music Shed, the draining and leveling of the parking area and the installation of adequate lighting. The item which is considered most urgent is the provision of roll curtains to protect the Music Shed during winter weather, and to assure the protection of next summer's audiences in the event of severe storms. The trustees invite music-lovers to make contributions to assure the completion of this program. The money contributed thus far, it is pointed out, has been secured without professional aid at a cost of less than 3 per cent.

49

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

OCT 30 1938

World In Music

By PIERRE KEY

Wise words drop now and again from lips that rarely utter them; and the lady was one hundred per cent right when she remarked to her escort, at the first breathing spell of the Philadelphia Orchestra's first New York concert a few evenings ago: "It's a great band, isn't it?"

One of the world's three greatest, without a doubt; the other two being the Boston Symphony and New York's Philharmonic-Symphony. I believe the newly-formed NBC Symphony (recently improved by sixteen replacements) is advanced by its satellites as one of the world's greatest; but that claim seems to me to be a bit too previous. You don't make a great symphony orchestra in a few weeks, or even months, and though splendidly personneled now, the NBC orchestra must be moulded into a plastic unit . . . something that requires time.

The Philadelphia Orchestra opened the New York season in Carnegie with Eugene Ormandy hitting some high spots in the Beethoven "Leonore" No. 3 overture and second Schumann concerto, and missing a few in the rugged second symphony of Sibelius. Gene has gone back to using a baton this season, which is as it should be.

There is a noble orchestra for you. An array of strings only one other band can match, and reeds and brasses that glow with emotional warmth.

Barbirolli and Philharmonic.

John Barbirolli is moving on and up. An abler conductor last season than during his introductory period as guest, he is improved over his final appearances here last spring. He got a hearty reception when he appeared on the Philharmonic-Symphony rostrum just forty-eight hours after the Philadelphians had given their Carnegie Hall concert. He was warmly applauded, too, after each composition on the program.

For me the Philharmonic-Symphony has vitality and virtuosity more than richness of tone. But it is a great orchestra and Barirolli is finding it increasingly responsive to his demands as he grows.

I heard some complaints about the arrangements of the compositions,—which put the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven in the second half, immediately following the Mozart adagio and fugue for strings which had been preceded by Weber's "Der Freischutz" overture, two tone poems of Sibelius, and Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird" suite. Program making is an art few conductors appear able to master.

Also, no conductor can hope to satisfy much more than fifty-one per cent of any audience.

Television and Music.

Television has emerged from "just around the corner" to a place out in the open. At least, it will be operating in New York within a comparatively brief time; for the proving ground is to be the nation's metropolis. No one yet knows what direction television will take, nor how it will operate to aid the cause of music. But in time—and it will by no means be in the immediate future—television will probaly add to the contribution sound-broadcasting has to music.

What should be understood is that television will not be well developed commercially for several years—and it may be quite a few years. The expense of transmitting pictures beyond fifty mile distances makes chain television something a considerable distance away.

Finally, there is the rule set up by the Federal Radio Commission which prohibits television broadcasting from being commercially sponsored. Just how the economic side of the problem is to be solved remains to be determined. But television will soon be with a few of us . . . for our sampling and subsequent verdict.

Opera and Dancing.

Opportunity to dance to the music of a popular band is now being used as an inducement to swell the gate receipts of a performance being given in the former Manhattan Opera House by an organization known as New York Grand Opera. Its manager is Amadeo Passeri and "La Traviata" was the first work offered a few evenings ago in this altogether unique endeavor in the field of lyric drama.

Shades of Oscar Hemmerstein! Not that that resourceful impresario would have been above letting his patrons dance after one, or more than one, performance until two o'clock next morning. But I cannot forget that the Manhattan Opera House was the one-time scene of great opera given with great singing artists.

This venture is popular-priced. Like most of those ventures it is indeterminable but if performances continue up to the level set at the opening, it is quite possible that we may have a permanent addition to the swelling ranks of our popular-priced opera organizations. Cesare Sodero's authoritative conducting lent dignity even to an occasion wherein serious music had to compete with its lowlier, but livelier, distant cousin for audience favor.

As one conductor remarked this fine musician (Mr. Sodero) "seemed to realize that Verdi's tunes had the power to survive if given half a chance." That "half" was just about the utmost that could be hoped for on a program that billed those strange companions, grand opera and "swing," as "two attractions for the price of one . . . no extra charge."

Lines-O'-News.

It is good to have Ernest Schelling back in musical harness again, after his withdrawal from activities for the entire season last year because of an eye injury and the pressure of other personal affairs. After four appearances in The Netherlands this month, leading the Concertgebouw Orchestra on one occasion and appearing with that body as star soloist under Willem Mengelberg's direction on three other occasions, Mr. Schelling has returned to America. Soon he will make several hundred young Philharmonic-Symphony admirers of "Uncle Ernest" very happy when he picks up the baton to preside again over the Society's Children's Concerts.

CHARLOTTE, N. C.
OBSERVER

OCT 30 1938

MUSIC COMMENT

BY LAURA HOWELL NORDEN.

THIS FESTIVAL idea has taken firm hold in America. The question in my mind is just what is a festival? Sometimes it seems as if it could be defined something like this: "Concert—a public performance of music. Festival—the plural of concert," since two or more concerts invariably are classified as a festival, when they occur consecutively at the same place, given under the same auspices.

The Salzburg Festival has for years been the mecca for musicians and musical tourists. Now, sad to say, it has been completely demoralized by political changes in Central Europe. Give it time to find its balance again and it may resume its musical priority. At present, however, there is considerable speculation in America as to whether some one of our numerous festivals may not assume world leadership in that field. Even in North Carolina promoters of the Asheville Mozart Festival have expressed this hope.

New England with her many festivals seems determined to capture the title of "American Salzburg." The Berkshire Symphonic Festival, which has been directed for five years by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, has, according to The New York Times "all that is needed to attract an immense public from all parts of the country," since it has developed adequate facilities and owns its permanent site. Its director, a very famous leader in matters musical, is ambitious to make it "the greatest music and art center in the world."

SYMPHONY HALL—The Monday and Tuesday series, which opened here last night, features the paired pianists, Pierre Luboschutz and Genia Nemenoff, who perform Mozart's Concerto for two pianofortes, in E flat major. The fourth pair of weekend concerts to be conducted by Serge Koussevitzky Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Oct. 28-29, will be devoted to a program of music by French composers. Included will be the suite "Le Tombeau de Couperin", and "Rhapsodie Flamande". Jascha Heifetz will play here on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 6.

COMPLIMENTS OF
The Tech
Oct. 25/38
Reviews and Previews

Cont.

ELMIRA, N. Y.
TELEGRAM

OCT 30 1938

Major Symphony Orchestras To Spend Five Millions On Programs This Season

By JOHN SELBY
Associated Press Arts Editor

New York—The 16 leading symphony orchestras of the country are getting ready to spend almost five million dollars to give their communities the music they want.

This figure does not include budgets of many excellent secondary orchestras. Thanks to music project efforts, there now is no city of the United States of 50,000 or better without some sort of orchestra. Many smaller cities also have them.

It does not touch the money spent on hundreds of college orchestras nor the cost of the high school orchestras which now number in the thousands.

The total spent for symphonic music in America has been estimated as high as 40 millions. Whatever it is, the record shows the communities like it.

Only one American city, Seattle, is reducing its symphony budget—and that is because of a peculiar local situation which may be changed with the advent of the new Seattle conducter, Dr. Nikolai Sokoloff.

MOST BUDGETS remain the same, although four cities will spend a little more this winter: Washington, Pittsburgh, Indianapolis and Rochester, which will spend more money on soloists.

Eleven of the 16 key cities report better ticket sales than last season, when most found attendance had improved over the preceding winter. Cleveland, where a new women's organization has got into the field, reports the largest advance sale in the orchestra's history, and even Boston, where big audiences have been the rule more than 50 years, is five per cent ahead.

Only Philadelphia reports a decrease, and that is "slight, and not alarming," according to Alfred Reginald Allen, manager. Philadelphia is one of three cities reporting changes in the status of its conductor. Eugene Ormandy is now "musical director," which means that he controls absolutely the personnel and the programs; Stokowski will appear as guest only, next spring.

IN PITTSBURGH Fritz Reiner becomes permanent conductor, his first similar berth since his days with the Cincinnati Symphony. In Seattle, Dr. Sokoloff replaces Dr. Basil Cameron, and although Eugene Goosens remains permanent conductor in Cincinnati, he will be late arriving, and Jose Iturdi, conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic, will take the first three pairs of the 20 comprising the season. Longest tenure among practicing conductors goes to Frederick Stock, now beginning his 34th season in Chicago.

Philadelphia will have the longest season—30 weeks, of which four will be spent on tour. Seattle has the shortest, 12 concerts. Kansas City, where Karl Krueger has built an excellent orchestra since 1933, adds 10 concerts to its season; Pittsburgh adds three weeks.

THE ONLY major departure from standard symphony practice is at Rochester, where the 50 men of the well known "civic" orchestra are engaged for a 28-week season, and are augmented by 35 more players for a concentrated symphony season of 12 weeks.

Twenty men have been added to four orchestras—newest additions being at Boston where one more double base will be found; most in Washington, where Hans Kindler will have 10 new men. Only one orchestra has reduced personnel. This is St. Louis, where three men have resigned, and have not been replaced as yet.

Philadelphia will play the most concerts, 118. Seattle plans fewest, only 12. But Boston, where the symphony has not only its regular season, but a spring popular season and several weeks of free concerts out of doors, as well as a festival in the Berkshires, will do all told more than 200 concerts, a unique record in American music. More than half will be directed by the permanent conductor, Dr. Serge Moussevitzky.

THE 16 ORCHESTRAS plan 1,315 concerts in their regular seasons. The budget total is $4,782,605. This is exactly $3,636.96 a concert. Approximately a quarter of this is returned through ticket sales; some orchestras are lucky, and have fairly extensive endowments, or (as in Detroit) radio contracts.

For most orchestras, however, October is the beginning of a battle. On one side is symphonic music, which the nation demands in larger and larger quantities. On the other is the big bad wolf—the deficit.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 30 1938

BOSTON MAY SEND SYMPHONY ABROAD

Project for European Tour in Spring Is Revived

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BOSTON, Oct. 29.—Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are understood to have voted to send the organization of 110 men, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, abroad in May for its long-contemplated European concert tour.

Prospects for such a trip, seriously considered in 1929 and later dropped because of the depression, were revived last June when Dr. Koussevitzky returned from his annual trip abroad with assurances that only the lack of a $100,000 guarantee prevented the trip. He added that Europe was not only ready but "clamoring" for concerts by the Boston Symphony.

Ernest B. Dane, president of the board of trustees, declined to deny or confirm the report, while several other members of the board, when questioned, retorted they "couldn't say a word."

Some members, however, admitted that the board had met and that a European tour for the orchestra was taken up.

It was understood here that the contemplated trip of Dr. Koussevitzky and his men would cover Great Britain, France and Belgium. Cities where concerts would be given would be London, Paris and Brussels, and possibly others would be added to the itinerary.

This would be the first trip abroad for the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a unit. The New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra made a European tour ten years ago under the direction of Arturo Toscanini, to immense acclaim.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TELEGRAM

NOV 1 - 1938

Encouraging Symphony Orchestras

We sympathize with the efforts of the Hartford Symphony society to establish a self-supporting orchestra in Hartford and to make it the assured nucleus of symphonic concerts in that area. However, we have a slight feeling of resentment over both the name and slogan of the society. The name given to it at least in its literature is "Connecticut's Own Orchestra," and President Frances Goodwin of the society is quoted as saying:

"In addition to providing good music for Connecticut the Symphony Society is concerned with the provision of employment for worth while musicians residing in the state."

This, we contend, is taking in too much territory. Hartford is not Connecticut, though it is part of Connecticut and as far as we are concerned a valued and esteemed part. There is in Hartford just a little bit of confusion between the part and the whole. A symphonic society located in Hartford can hardly provide good music "for the state of Connecticut" for obvious reasons. Besides it overlooks the fact that New Haven has had its own symphony for 30 or 40 years and that Bridgeport has now an established symphony with a record of steadily increasing public approval. And of course, we might mention the visits of other organizations of nationwide fame both to New Haven and to such symphonic festivals as the Silvermine concerts.

As we said, we wish success to the Hartford Symphony Society but do not wish it to take in too much territory. When we try to appraise the value to any community of having its own symphony orchestra, we should not overlook the importance of giving encouragement to local players. America has made a great mistake in the past in relying on a few organizations such as the Boston Symphony, the New York Philharmonic or the Philadelphia Symphony, to supply symphonic music for the nation. The result has been a lack of symphonic players in all other communities. There is no training for a symphony orchestra except playing in one, and the more of these orchestras we have, the better for the real development of music throughout the nation.

HERALD TRIBUNE N.Y.

OCT 30 1938

Funds Invited For Music Shed At Tanglewood

Berkshire Festival Needs $75,000 for Work on Building and Grounds; Memberships to Close

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival will close its membership lists for the sixth annual festival next August at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., next Tuesday. The number of memberships, with privileges including a considerable reduction in ticket prices, first choice of seats, and free attendance at one of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's rehearsals, is limited to 3,000. All seats in the Music Shed at Tanglewood will be reserved next summer, but the ticket prices will be unchanged.

In a brochure issued by the festival trustees, it is stated that the building of the Music Shed has cost $91,193.95, including the architect's and engineer's fees and the cost of the chairs in the front of the auditorium. The work was completed under the contract price and a month ahead of schedule. The trustees themselves contributed more than 40 per cent of the price of the building, and more than 80 per cent of the contributions came from persons living within fifty miles of Lenox.

It is estimated that $75,000 more will be needed for improvements in the Music Shed, the draining and leveling of the parking area and the installation of adequate lighting. The item which is considered most urgent is the provision of roll curtains to protect the Music Shed during winter weather, and to assure the protection of next summer's audiences in the event of severe storms. The trustees invite music-lovers to make contributions to assure the completion of this program. The money contributed thus far, it is pointed out, has been secured without professional aid at a cost of less than 3 per cent.

Vol. LVIII, No. 16

MUSICAL AMERICA

Founded in 1898 by John C. Freund

Oct. 25/38

Four Major Orchestras Begin Seasons

Initial Symphonic Events in Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago and Cleveland Mark Noted Conductors' Return to Their Accustomed Posts

Koussevitzky in 15th Year

Ormandy Leads First Concert Under New Tenure as Musical Director—Stock and Rodzinski Greeted Warmly by Their Respective Publics

Underwood & Underwood

Serge Koussevitzky

Toppo

Arturo Toscanini

Mitchell

John Barbirolli

© Rembrandt

Eugene Ormandy

Photography, Inc.

Frederick Stock

Landesmann

Artur Rodzinski

Boston Commemorates Conductor's Anniversary

Boston, Oct. 20.—The Boston Symphony opened its fifty-eighth season on Oct. 7 in Symphony Hall. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted. The program was as follows:

Concerto in D Minor	Vivaldi-Siloti
Overture, 'The Roman Carnival', Op. 9	Berlioz
Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Op. 56a	Brahms
Symphony No. 5 in C Minor, Op. 67	Beethoven

The occasion held considerable excitement for the patrons of the orchestra. In the first place, this concert inaugurated Dr. Koussevitzky's fifteenth consecutive season as conductor, a record which has not been attained by any former conductor. Second, the concert was unexpectedly prefaced with a simple, but very earnest talk by Dr. Koussevitzky, appropriate to the circumstance of his anniversary and surprisingly well done, considering his consistent refusals in the past to speak in public because of his slender acquaintance with our perplexing language. Lastly, Dr. Koussevitzky set before us in identical order, the program which marked his Boston debut, plus the Beethoven Fifth which he conducted at his second appearance, and which he selected to replace the announced Scriabin and Honegger items, originally intended for performance this afternoon.

(Continued on page 13)

Boston Symphony Launches Season

(Continued from page 3)

Conductor's Fifteenth Year in Boston

Fifteen years is a considerable time for the listener to think back and recall with any degree of accuracy the minutiae of a symphonic performance, but even the most superficial listener must have been impressed with Dr. Koussevitzky's constantly expanding musicianship. During this decade and a half, he has spared neither himself nor his men. He has ruled his orchestra with an unfaltering hand; he has been as exacting a drill-master as Dr. Muck who preceded him by almost two decades, and he has brought the Boston Symphony to what may be termed the highest point in its artistic career. To be sure, he had the advantage of a large group thoroughly and well trained under estimable conductors over a long period of time, yet had Dr. Koussevitzky possessed a lesser talent for leadership, our orchestra would not occupy its present enviable position as one of the great orchestras of the world.

Of this season's opening program, in the Vivaldi and the Brahms the orchestra reached new heights in the realm of nuance and finesse, especially in the Largo of the concerto and in the delicacy of touch in the sixth and seventh variations by Brahms, and while the program as a whole would not tempt the seasoned concertgoer who likes a dash of spice, it nevertheless furnished good fare for an exceptional beginning of the musical season of 1938-'39 in Boston.

Novelties on Second Program

One first performance in Boston and a first performance at these concerts marked the program of the second Friday concert conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky on Oct. 14 in Symphony Hall. The program:

Divertimento in B Flat (K. 287)	Mozart
'El Salon Mexico'	Copland
Symphony No. 5 in E Minor	Dvorak

According to a program note by John N. Burk, upon whose shoulders has fallen the mantle of Philip Hale as editor of the Boston Symphony's program books, the Mozart had a performance as recently as last November in Town Hall, New York City, under the auspices of the New Friends of Music, at which time a half dozen of the Boston Symphony players under Arthur Fiedler, performed the work in its original form as a sextet. Those who heard it may consider themselves fortunate.

The Boston Symphony gave an unusually smooth performance, and one which gave a certain pleasure, once the uncommon volume of sound had been related to experience. Unfortunately, the piece does not gain anything through augmentation; rather, it loses that distinguishing delicacy which is fully revealed by a more intimate group.

Copland Music Well Received

As readers of the July issue of Musical America are aware, Aaron Copland's 'El Salon Mexico' was conducted in London last summer by Sir Adrian Boult (pleasantly remembered by Bostonians). By report, the piece made a considerable success. This afternoon, there was the customary applausive response, as there is to any work which keeps the orchestra very, very busy. Even our conservative Friday audience appeared to enjoy the excitement, observing its orchestra in lively action.

Although Mr. Copland's newest opus is of slight intrinsic value, it should furnish good entertainment for a Pops audience. It is pictorial music of a sort, in which the composer attempts to suggest "the Mexico of the tourist" to quote Mr. Copland, instead of "the more profound side of Mexico; the Mexico of the ancient civilizations or the revolutionary Mexico of today.' Incidently, Mr. Copland's harmonic scheme has been much modified; 'El Salon Mexico' presents no harmonic complications. The complications arise on the rhythmic side, complications in cross rhythms which demand all the concentration possible from the players. Despite a brilliant performance, however, the piece was singularly unimpressive, although the audience demanded the presence of Mr. Copland upon the stage several times.

The superficial brilliancy of the Copland opus brought into relief the more solid material of the Dvorak symphony. By radio and phonograph as well as concert hall, this work has become familiar to a listening public. It has become too familiar to the reviewer, yet as set forth by Dr. Koussevitzky this afternoon, it became endowed with unsuspected attributes and in performance brought well merited and applausive response from an obviously delighted audience.

Grace May Stutsman

Tuesday, November 1, 1938

Reviews and Previews

SYMPHONY—A busy week for the Boston Symphony starts Thursday evening when a concert including Haydn's Symphony in D major, No. 86, Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem," and Beethoven's Fifth will be given in Sanders Theatre. The weekend series in Symphony Hall will feature the appearance of Ernst Krenek, who will be soloist for his new piano concerto. The first two numbers listed for the Thursday concert will be given at this series also. Heifetz' recital on Sunday will include Bach's Prelude, Brahm's Sonata in D-minor, Paganini's Concerto and American Group, and Tchaikovsky's Valse and Siherzo.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
Brooklyn.
OCT 30 1938

GROUP IN BROOKLYN PLANS SYMPHONY

Committee Will Meet Tuesday to Prepare for Boston Orchestra

BOY TO GIVE RECITAL

Six Chamber Music Ensembles Are Formed at the Queens College

A tea for members of the Brooklyn committee for the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be held at the home of Mrs. Henry J. Davenport at 40A Monroe Place, Brooklyn, Tuesday afternoon, according to an announcement yesterday. The gathering will be the first this Fall of the committee, of which Mrs. Davenport is acting chairman.

The 1938-39 season of five symphonic concerts will open at the Brooklyn Academy of Music Friday night, Nov. 18. The sponsors are the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn and the Brooklyn committee.

Mrs. Thomas F. Casey is serving as chairman of a new regional committee for special activities to promote the 1938-39 season. Other chairmen are Mrs. Edward C. Blum, boxes; Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, membership committee, and Mrs. William G. James Jr., Junior League committee.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
DAILY WORKER
OCT 31 1938

By Martin McCall

In 1934, the Soviet composer Prokofieff wrote the music for what seems to have been a very amusing Russian movie, "Lieutenant Kije." A Suite has since been extracted from the movie's music. The music is irresistible and bouncing, and has been played often in Moscow, Paris, London, Boston and New York. The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Koussevitzky introduced the Suite to America, and their recording of it is now available (Victor Album M-459). The Set's odd side includes the popular March and Scherzo from Prokofieff's "Love for Three Oranges."

When the London impresario, Salomon, contracted in 1790 for Haydn to visit the city, the understanding was that the composer make three separate visits and produce a separate set of three symphonies each time. Haydn visited London only twice, and the twelve symphonies which he composed have become known as the "Salomon" set. His best orchestral works are among these; one, the Symphony No. 93 in D major (Salomon Set No. 2), never previously recorded, is now available in a recording by Beecham and the London Philharmonic (Columbia Set No. 336).

William Primrose, one of the greatest living viola soloists, has done a creditable arrangement of Brahms's Clarinet Sonata in E flat major, and he plays it with distinction and quality (Victor Album M-422). All the 19 Chopin Nocturnes are now out in a new recording by Arthur Rubinstein. Rubinstein plays these night pieces with superb lack of excess, and a careful recording job contributes to the worth of the two Albums (Victor Albums M-461, M-462).

Handel's Suite No. 5 in E major for Harpsichord, of which the last movement is better known as a separate piece ("Harmonious Blacksmith"), is played deftly and cleanly in a first complete domestic recording by Ernst Victor Wolf (Columbia Set, No. X-101).

Vol. LVIII, No. 16 50

MUSICAL AMERICA

Founded in 1898 by JOHN C. FREUND

Oct. 25/38

Four Major Orchestras Begin Seasons

Initial Symphonic Events in Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago and Cleveland Mark Noted Conductors' Return to Their Accustomed Posts

Koussevitzky in 15th Year

Ormandy Leads First Concert Under New Tenure as Musical Director—Stock and Rodzinski Greeted Warmly by Their Respective Publics

Underwood & Underwood

Serge Koussevitzky

Toppo

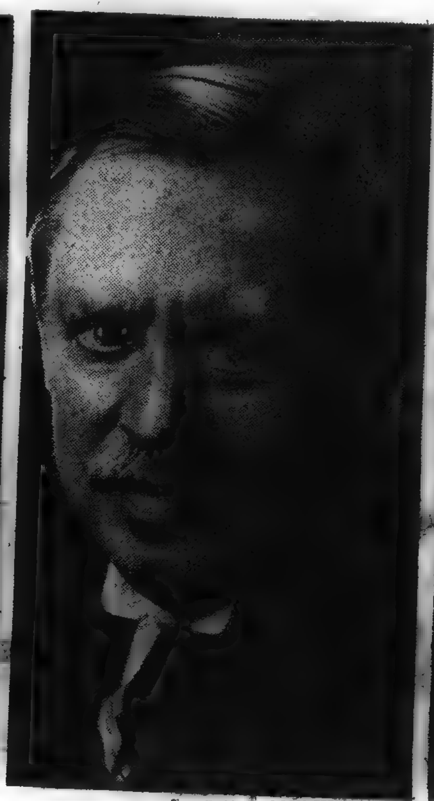
Arturo Toscanini

Mitchell

John Barbirolli

© Rembrandt

Eugene Ormandy



Photography, Inc.

Frederick Stock

Landesmann

Artur Rodzinski

Boston Commemorates Conductor's Anniversary

BOSTON, Oct. 20.—The Boston Symphony opened its fifty-eighth season on Oct. 7 in Symphony Hall. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted. The program was as follows:

Concerto in D Minor	Vivaldi-Siloti
Overture, 'The Roman Carnival', Op. 9	Berlioz
Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Op. 56a	Brahms
Symphony No. 5 in C Minor, Op. 67	Beethoven

The occasion held considerable excitement for the patrons of the orchestra. In the first place, this concert inaugurated Dr. Koussevitzky's fifteenth consecutive season as conductor, a record which has not been attained by any former conductor. Second, the concert was unexpectedly prefaced with a simple, but very earnest talk by Dr. Koussevitzky, appropriate to the circumstance of his anniversary and surprisingly well done, considering his consistent refusals in the past to speak in public because of his slender acquaintance with our perplexing language. Lastly, Dr. Koussevitzky set before us in identical order, the program which marked his Boston debut, plus the Beethoven Fifth which he conducted at his second ap-

(Continued on page 13)

MUSICAL AMERICA for October 25, 1938

Boston Symphony Launches Season

(Continued from page 3)

pearance, and which he selected to replace the announced Scriabin and Honegger items, originally intended for performance this afternoon.

Conductor's Fifteenth Year in Boston

Fifteen years is a considerable time for the listener to think back and recall with any degree of accuracy the minutiae of a symphonic performance, but even the most superficial listener must have been impressed with Dr. Koussevitzky's constantly expanding musicianship. During this decade and a half, he has spared neither himself nor his men. He has ruled his orchestra with an unfaltering hand; he has been as exacting a drill-master as Dr. Muck who preceded him by almost two decades, and he has brought the Boston Symphony to what may be termed the highest point in its artistic career. To be sure, he had the advantage of a large group thoroughly and well trained under estimable conductors over a long period of time, yet had Dr. Koussevitzky possessed a lesser talent for leadership, our orchestra would not occupy its present enviable position as one of the great orchestras of the world.

Of this season's opening program, in the Vivaldi and the Brahms the orchestra reached new heights in the realm of nuance and finesse, especially in the Largo of the concerto and in the delicacy of touch in the sixth and seventh variations by Brahms, and while the program as a whole would not tempt the seasoned concertgoer who likes a dash of spice, it nevertheless furnished good fare for an exceptional beginning of the musical season of 1938-'39 in Boston.

Novelties on Second Program

One first performance in Boston and a first performance at these concerts marked the program of the second Friday concert conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky on Oct. 14 in Symphony Hall. The program:

Divertimento in B Flat (K. 287)	Mozart
'El Salon Mexico'	Copland
Symphony No. 5 in E Minor	Dvorak

According to a program note by John N. Burke, upon whose shoulders has fallen the mantle of Philip Hale as editor of the Boston Symphony's program books, the Mozart had a performance as recently as last November in Town Hall, New York City, under the auspices of the New Friends of Music, at which time a half dozen of the Boston Symphony players under Arthur Fiedler, performed the work in its original form as a sextet. Those who heard it may consider themselves fortunate.

The Boston Symphony gave an unusually smooth performance, and one which gave a certain pleasure, once the uncommon volume of sound had been related to experience. Unfortunately, the piece does not gain anything through augmentation; rather, it loses that distinguishing delicacy which is fully revealed by a more intimate group.

Copland Music Well Received

As readers of the July issue of MUSICAL AMERICA are aware, Aaron Copland's 'El Salon Mexico' was conducted in London last summer by Sir Adrian Boult (pleasantly remembered by Bostonians). By report, the piece made a considerable success. This afternoon, there was the customary applausive response, as there is to any work which keeps the orchestra very, very busy. Even our conservative Friday audience appeared to enjoy the excitement, observing its orchestra in lively action.

Although Mr. Copland's newest opus is of slight intrinsic value, it should furnish good entertainment for a Pops audience. It is pictorial music of a sort, in which the composer attempts to suggest "the Mexico of the tourist" to quote Mr. Copland, instead of "the more profound side of Mexico; the Mexico of the ancient civilizations or the revolutionary Mexico of today." Incidently, Mr. Copland's harmoni scheme has been much modified; 'El Salon Mexico' presents no harmonic complications. The complications arise on the rhythmic side, complications in cross rhythms which demand all the concentration possible from the players. Despite a brilliant performance, however, the piece was singularly unimpressive, although the audience demanded the presence of Mr. Copland upon the stage several times.

The superficial brilliancy of the Copland opus brought into relief the more solid material of the Dvorak symphony. By radio and phonograph as well as concert hall, this work has become familiar to a listening public. It has become too familiar to the reviewer, yet as set forth by Dr. Koussevitzky this afternoon, it became endowed with unsuspected attributes and in performance brought well merited and applausive response from an obviously delighted audience.

GRACE MAY STUTSMAN

COMPLIMENTS OF
The Tech
Tuesday, November 1, 1938

Reviews and Previews

SYMPHONY—A busy week for the Boston Symphony starts Thursday evening when a concert including Haydn's Symphony in D major, No. 86, Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem," and Beethoven's Fifth will be given in Sanders Theatre. The weekend series in Symphony Hall will feature the appearance of Ernst Krenek, who will be soloist for his new piano concerto. The first two numbers listed for the Thursday concert will be given at this series also. Heifetz' recital on Sunday will include Bach's Prelude, Brahm's Sonata in D-minor, Paganini's Concerto and American Group, and Tchaikovsky's Valse and Siherzo.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
Brooklyn
OCT 30 1938

GROUP IN BROOKLYN PLANS SYMPHONY

Committee Will Meet Tuesday to Prepare for Boston Orchestra

BOY TO GIVE RECITAL

Six Chamber Music Ensembles Are Formed at the Queens College

A tea for members of the Brooklyn committee for the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be held at the home of Mrs. Henry J. Davenport at 40A Monroe Place, Brooklyn, Tuesday afternoon, according to an announcement yesterday. The gathering will be the first this Fall of the committee, of which Mrs. Davenport is acting chairman.

The 1938-39 season of five symphonic concerts will open at the Brooklyn Academy of Music Friday night, Nov. 18. The sponsors are the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn and the Brooklyn committee.

Mrs. Thomas F. Casey is serving as chairman of a new regional committee for special activities to promote the 1938-39 season. Other chairmen are Mrs. Edward C. Blum, boxes; Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, membership committee, and Mrs. William G. James Jr., Junior League committee.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
DAILY WORKER
OCT 31 1938

By Martin McCall

In 1934, the Soviet composer Prokofieff wrote the music for what seems to have been a very amusing Russian movie, "Lieutenant Kije." A Suite has since been extracted from the movie's music. The music is irresistible and bouncing, and has been played often in Moscow, Paris, London, Boston and New York. The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Koussevitzky introduced the Suite to America, and their recording of it is now available (Victor Album M-459). The Set's odd side includes the popular March and Scherzo from Prokofieff's "Love for Three Oranges."

When the London impresario, Salomon, contracted in 1790 for Haydn to visit the city, the understanding was that the composer make three separate visits and produce a separate set of three symphonies each time. Haydn visited London only twice, and the twelve symphonies which he composed have become known as the "Salomon" set. His best orchestral works are among these; one, the Symphony No. 93 in D major (Salomon Set No. 2), never previously recorded, is now available in a recording by Beecham and the London Philharmonic (Columbia Set No. 336).

William Primrose, one of the greatest living viola soloists, has done a creditable arrangement of Brahms's Clarinet Sonata in E flat major, and he plays it with distinction and quality (Victor Album M-422). All the 19 Chopin Nocturnes are now out in a new recording by Arthur Rubinstein. Rubinstein plays these night pieces with superb lack of excess, and a careful recording job contributes to the worth of the two Albums (Victor Albums M-461, M-462).

Handel's Suite No. 5 in E major for Harpsichord, of which the last movement is better known as a separate piece ("Harmonious Blacksmith"), is played deftly and cleanly in a first complete domestic recording by Ernst Victor Wolff (Columbia Set No. X-101).

57

Symphony Concert

American Premiere of Concerto By Krenek, Burgin Conducting

B. Trans. By MOSES SMITH Nov. 5/38

Two measures of the Second Piano Concerto of Ernst Krenek had not passed in the first American performance at yesterday's matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra before people began to squirm. The public, which is a difficult subject for generalization, may not know what it likes, but it seems to know pretty well what it doesn't like. The uneasiness of yesterday's audience in the presence of an uncompromising composition in the twelve-tone system persisted through most of the performance, to the point that a few persons left the hall. But there was not much fuss, and certainly less than had been expected by one familiar with the Concerto from rehearsal and private conversation with the composer.

The fact was that the matinee audience maintained its customary restraint. There was even enough applause at the end to bring the composer back three times—applause stimulated principally, I have little doubt, not by admiration for the new music or its performance, but by the custom that this was the thing to do. It was hard to decide whether to be grateful for an audience sufficiently civilized and tolerant to hear a new voice out or to lament the lack of feeling necessary to create a demonstration of honest disapproval such as a Continental audience might emit in similar circumstances.

* * *

By a curious coincidence Richard Burgin, concert master and assistant conductor of the Boston Orchestra, who had in 1930 presided over the introduction of Krenek's "Little" Symphony, the only previous work of Krenek's previously played at these concerts, also conducted yesterday's performance of the Concerto by reason of the indisposition of Serge Koussevitzky. Mr. Burgin, who will also conduct tonight's concert, was greeted by the audience as an old friend; went to his task in his customary business-like fashion; and, by the time the concert was over, had frequently reminded us of his interpretative as well as executive powers.

Haydn's Symphony in D major (No. 86), one of the less rarely heard works of the master, was presented with admirable precision, poise and feeling. The performance of the Concerto sounded remarkably good. It was not only that the notes seemed to be in the right place—a difficult task in itself—but also that the orchestral expression achieved an unexpected intensity. The 'cellos sounded their series of notes in the introduction as if they meant it as a tune. There was a dramatic character to the outburst of the brass just before the beginning of the allegro. . . . Before the afternoon was over Krenek had himself expressed pleasure with the performance.

The only other number on the program, Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," was beautifully played. Once again we were reminded of the superb instrument Dr. Koussevitzky has fashioned for himself and occasionally others to play on. The gorgeously-colored tonal fabric of Loeffler seemed to have been made to order for the present Boston Symphony Orchestra (even though Loeffler's original version was for a much smaller group). Jesus Maria Sanroma played the piano part, which has almost the range and difficulty of the solo part in a concerto, efficiently, stylistically and poetically. The English horn of Louis Speyer contributed the dolorous (Philip Hale's word) mood. Other solo instruments and the several sections were perfectly attuned to one another and to the conductor, who, if memory serves, has never before commanded such eloquent expression.

* * *

There remains the problem of "disposing" of the Concerto, a problem to which I address myself because it is the customary thing for a reviewer to do, not because I can pretend to have a judgment at such short notice about a difficult work in a language still strange to frequenters of the Bostonian concert-halls. About one thing I have tentatively made up my mind, at the risk of being relegated to the category of a minority of one. I liked the Concerto and found much in it that was stimulating if also much that was puzzling. And I should cheerfully have heard the whole thing all over again as soon as the performance had done.

The "easiest" section to like was the introductory andante, its pervading mood and quiet beauty having a quality similar to that in parts of the Violin Concerto of Alban Berg, one of the few other works of the Schoenberg school that has been heard here. The excitement familiar from the music of the past was generated by the first allegro in a strange vocabulary. Similarly, it was possible to admire the writing for the solo instrument, convincingly played by the composer, in the cadenza at the end of the movement, and later, in a different way, in the glinting allegro that serves for finale. It was the third-movement andante (there was no break between the movements) that was the hardest nut for the listener to crack. As in the rest of the Concerto what serves for thematic material was distributed usually among the instruments, not welded into a continuous line for a single instrument or section of instruments. This procedure, difficult for the listener because of its unfamiliarity in most music of the past, was at least compensated in the two allegros by the rhythmic drive of the music and, in the opening andante, by the establishment of a mood more readily grasped. Very likely some such mood (or series of moods) in the third movement and even perhaps the musical significance of the material itself will be made clear on subsequent hearings, if such opportunities are ever forthcoming. But for the present one was puzzled by the evident scrappiness and disjointedness of the line.

One impression it was hard to avoid: What few orchestral works of the twelve-tone composers we have heard in Boston seem to create similar moods, and all seem clearly to stem from Mahler. By virtue of this fact—if it is a fact—the music of the twelve-tone school, far from being a rebellion against impressionism, as Krenek says he desires, seems actually to rededicate the spirit of that movement. And instead of widening the range of musical expression—an avowed object of Schoenberg in creating his system and an object plausibly attained by the employment of the twelve tones of the chromatic scale as equals—the system would thus seem actually to limit it. . . . But closer familiarity and the passage of time will clear up these speculations, one way or another.

COMPOSER SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY

B. — Post

American Premiere of Krenek's Concerto Featured

Nov. 5/38

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In Richard Burgin the Boston Symphony Orchestra possesses both an able concertmaster and an assistant conductor who can take matters in hand whenever the need arises. Thus the sudden, though not serious, illness of Dr. Koussevitzky affected neither the programme of yesterday's concert nor the performance of it. As on other similar occasions, Mr. Burgin took over the reins and carried on with complete success.

PREMIERE OF CONCERTO

Aside from the eleventh-hour change in conductors, yesterday's concert was an eventful one, offering, as it did, the American premiere of Ernst Krenek's Second Piano Concerto, with the exiled Austrian composer as soloist. A formidable composition in the atonal style of Schoenberg and his disciples, the Concerto demanded a background of more readily assimilated music, and thanks to Dr. Koussevitzky it received such a setting. Before it came a Symphony of Haydn, one of the less familiar ones, No. 86 in D major, and after it the Pagan Poem of Loeffler, a daring piece in its own day, but one which yesterday must have provided solid satisfaction for those who are puzzled and perplexed or possibly irritated and annoyed by Mr. Krenek's uncompromising keylessness.

As is the case with all novel music of importance, the new Concerto had both supporters and detractors yesterday. Save for a momentary feeling that the third of the four movements, a would-be expressive Adagio, was not getting anywhere in particular, this reviewer found himself numbered with the piece's admirers.

Upside Down and Back-End-To

The vagueness, inseparable from all 12-tone music, seemed altogether appropriate in the improvisational, rhapsodical introduction, and in the two Allegros the element of rhythm supplies the necessary propulsion. The first of these, marked "con ferocita," lives up to its name; the second has a lightness and vivacity, a brightness of effect which appeared quite at variance with the usual studied character of the atonal technique. It may be explained that the Schoenbergians work with a series of 12 different notes, which may also be presented upside down and back-end-to, and the reversion may also be inverted.

To look for conventional melody or conventional harmony in a work of this character would be vain and futile, but no more futile than to look for Mozartian melody and harmony in Wagner's "Tristan." It is a question of a wholly different language.

Plays Like a Virtuoso

Like Alban Berg, whose music is not unknown here, Mr. Krenek seems to use the 12-tone system more cogently and persuasively than does Schoenberg himself. And not only is he a master of orchestral color; he also treats the piano with a sympathy rarely found in modernist concertos. Although not a professional pianist, Mr. Krenek gave yesterday a virtuoso performance.

The answering applause was sufficient to return him twice to the stage, and considering the nature of his music a more general and pronounced enthusiasm was hardly to be expected.

Loeffler's Masterpiece

The Symphony of Haydn, heard here but twice before, in 1902 and 1931, is chiefly remarkable for its slow introduction and its surprisingly modern Largo. The performance of Loeffler's most enduring, most significant orchestral piece was one of uncommon eloquence.

In this general commendation are included Messrs. Sanroma and Speyer, who played the solo piano and English horn parts, respectively, the three trumpeters "off-stage" and, of course, Mr. Burgin. Haydn, Krenek and Loeffler stand for three widely different eras in music and Mr. Burgin proved himself at home with all three.

B. Her.

MUSIC

Nov 5/38

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The fifth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Ernst Krenek, composer and pianist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Haydn.......Symphony in D major No. 86
Krenek.......Piano Concerto No. 2 Op. 81
Loeffler...."A Pagan Poem" (after Virgil) Op. 14

Even with the aid of the composer's considerable lecture on the subject of the 12-tone system and his venture into this curious, geometric world, it was impossible to extract any pleasure from listening to the Krenek Concerto. As sound it was horrid and as an intellectual puzzle it was too hard a nut to crack at one sitting.

The trouble is Mr. Krenek wants to have it both ways. In one breath he tells us that we are confronted with intellectual music of the most complicated nature and in the next that it is only the effect of the whole that counts. In brief he says to us: "Here's a tough problem for you, but don't bother to solve it."

We are quite prepared to admit that, score in hand, there might be a good deal of fun for the brain in this Concerto. As "Augenmusik" it may be a monument of art, but to listen to at the moment it is sheerly excruciating. There are, of course, examples of music not in the 12-tone system that are fully as discordant, but they are relieved or propelled by a strong sense of rhythm. Mr. Krenek, on the other hand, seems to have deliberately avoided any rhythmic attraction in this music. Even his "dance-like" finale is so described by courtesy.

Mr. Gerald Abraham in his very interesting book, "A Hundred Years of Music," says: "Genuine atonal music is inevitably amorphous, backboneless but Schoenberg saw that it might be given a sort of artificial backbone by basing the contrapuntal parts on certain frequently recurrent patterns." That is a fair statement of the reason for the 12-tone system. To the ear, though, a piece rigidly following out tihs system frequently sounds amorphous in spite of all. Take it by and large, amorphous is perhaps the kindest word we can find for the Concerto.

The best thing one can say of Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem" is that it is extraordinarily evocative and sensuous music; the worst that it is over-blown d'Indy, the "Symphony on a Mountain Air" got out of hand. The luscious beauty of this tone poem, the revelling in tone for tone's sake, was, naturally, more than welcome after the astringency of the preceding work. Had it been placed on a program with works of the same period and general tendency, would one be tempted to say that the score dated? Possibly, but by no means positively. Loeffler was a fine craftsman and he had a vivid, artistic imagination. His music is really poetic, and that kind of inspiration will not be bogged down in arguments about periods and influences.

It is odd to note in the program book that Loeffler once arranged this work for two pianos and three trumpets. Surely it must have sounded flat in that form, for if ever a work cried out for the full sweep and sparkle of orchestral tone it is this. Yesterday Mr. Burgin conducted a good performance, in which he was most ably and sensitively assisted by Messrs. Sanroma and Speyer in the piano and English horn parts.

"Leading the music back to the remoteness whence it came," as Mr. Krenek so feelingly and originally remarked, we may at last return to a piece of music that seems more as though it were played last week. The Haydn Symphony was the perfect, unspoiled work of art on the program, music of geniality and wit, of spotaneity and grace. Would that we could hear it soon again!

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Mr. Hill's new violin concerto will be heard, together with Beethoven's second symphony and Sibelius's fifth.

B. Trans. Nov. /38

MUSIC

News of Music

An indisposition prevented Serge Koussevitzky from conducting the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, last night, as also the concerts in Symphony Hall this afternoon and tomorrow evening. Richard Burgin, concert-master and assistant conductor, has taken his place.

The program for the Symphony concerts of next Friday and Saturday will contain the new Violin Concerto of Edward Burlingame Hill, with Ruth Posselt for soloist. Beethoven's Second Symphony and Sibelius's Fifth will round out the program.

* * *

The program of the second of the Youth Concerts under the direction of Wheeler Beckett, in Symphony Hall next Wednesday afternoon, will traverse "Morning" from Grieg's "Peer Gynt" music; "Forest Murmurs" by Wagner; the last two movements of Beethoven's "Pastorale" Symphony; Smetana's symphonic poem, "The Moldau"; excerpts from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade" and two movements from Respighi's "Pines of Rome,"

B. Globe

MUSIC

Nov 5 1938

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Second Piano Concerto by Ernst Krenek, Czech composer now living in Boston, was performed for the first time in America yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Krenek was soloist. Richard Burgin conducted, as he will again tonight, in place of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who is sick. The program began with a relatively unfamiliar symphony by Haydn, that in D major, No. 86, and ended with the late Charles Martin Loeffler's fantasy, "A Pagan Poem."

Mr. Krenek's Concerto, finished a year ago last August, is written in an atonal style according to the so-called "12-tone technic." Its form is unconventional, and there are four connected movements. As in many a contemporary work, the piano is not set off and contrasted according to classical principles of the concerto, but fits into the general structure of the whole.

"Atonality," which simply means music without any definite key, and "12-tone technic," a term indicating a particular method of writing music without any key, continue to baffle and annoy, even horrify, conservative listeners. That is quite natural because atonal music is full of dissonance, some of it agreeable, some of it downright unpleasant. Atonal music theoretically ought to be heard as a new medium of art, without pre-conceived notions. And that, in turn, is quite impossible for most people who have technical interest in music, and to whom music means enjoyable sounds and emotional expression.

The effectiveness of any style of music depends upon the talent of the composer. In theory there is no reason why great masterpieces should not be founded upon the atonal style. But most of the atonal music this reviewer has heard has sounded dry, cerebral and mathematical rather than inspired. Two notable exceptions come to mind, the "Lulu" suite of Arnold Schoenberg (who invented "12-tone technic"), and the Violin Concerto of his pupil, Alban Berg. Each of these was emotionally forceful.

With the best will, this reviewer cannot add Mr. Krenek's Concerto to that list, despite interesting pages and striking details in the piano part.

Haydn's 86th Symphony, the fifth written for the Concert de la Loge Olympique in pre-revolutionary Paris, is so utterly charming it is incredible that there have been only two previous performances by the Boston Symphony. To some extent it suggests Mozart more than Haydn, though the seal of illustrious Franz Joseph is conspicuous enough.

Loeffler was a rare figure, a scholarly, aristocratic musician of great imagination and extremely refined taste, who built his own individual style upon the classic past and the general tendencies of his time. Yet creatively he dwelt apart, finding much inspiration in ancient literature. Self-searching, he left behind comparatively few but treasurable compositions. "A Pagan Poem," based upon an eclogue of Virgil, is characteristic and an enduring masterpiece. A brilliant performance—as did an equally brilliant one of Haydn's Symphony—again testified to the growing powers as conductor of Mr. Burgin. C. W. D.

Křenek Symphony Soloist

Monitor Nov. 5/38

The Arts in Boston

Ernst Křenek, distinguished exponent of the Schönberg 12-tone technique, is the guest of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this week's pair of concerts. He is playing his own Pianoforte Concerto No. 2, Op. 81, which had its first American performance yesterday afternoon. In the unavoidable absence of Dr. Koussevitzky, Richard Burgin is acting as conductor for these concerts.

Křenek is chiefly known in America by his opera, "Jonny Spielt Auf," heard in New York in 1929, and his "Little Symphony," played by the Boston orchestra in 1930. In those compositions, however, he did not employ the strict 12-tone method. In this work he does, and he has supplied an elaborate program note explaining the selection of the 12-tone series and the resultant 48 basic patterns, in the apparent belief that this is all news to Boston.

He does, however, give a very clear and illuminating account of the construction of this concerto, which is in four connected movements. What is even more interesting, he confesses that the 12-tone technique is not intended to do more than regulate the technical side of composition, and that "the artistic, emotional and spiritual value of a work remains unaffected by it and depends still upon the same criteria as in all other music." For those of us who have long been insisting on precisely that point, this is welcome support.

His music, therefore, is to be judged as music, and not as a demonstration of a musical theory. Looking at it from this viewpoint, it must be said at once that it is far more interesting than the "jazz" opera and the "Little Symphony" already referred to. Those were both musical potpourris; this is an integral piece of music, consistent in style and fascinating in musical structure, from the atmospheric Introduction through the Allegro, the Adagio, and the final Allegretto. The composer attributes a concerto-grosso form to the Allegro, describes the Adagio as a canon in inversion, and calls the Allegretto a very free kind of passacaglia. In other words, he has leaned on classical forms, just as Berg did in his opera "Wozzeck," for example, which is one of the notable examples of music written according to the Schönberg formula.

Unhappily, the composer's musical ideas do not strike us as comparable to his musical scholarship. He has not produced distinguished material to match the brilliance of his composition. His concerto remains more a cerebral product than a spontaneous creation.

Nevertheless, it is interesting to note the way in which the essential affinity of these so-called atonal composers always comes to the top. It cannot be concealed, whether in Schönberg's "Glückliche Hand," Berg's "Wozzeck" or "Lulu," or even his Violin Concerto. For they are, all these Schönbergians, fundamentally neo-Romanticists. However harsh their dissonances (those of this concerto of Křenek's are not unduly harsh) their artistic ancestry shows through. In the end, no doubt, we shall yawn over their works. But the method they are employing may very probably become a recognized part of the equipment of the composer of the future.

The new concerto, which so far as one could judge was excellently performed, was coolly received by the Friday afternoon audience. The concert opened with Haydn's Symphony in D, No. 86, in a rather pedestrian performance, and closed with Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," with Mr. Sanromá at the piano and Mr. Speyer playing the English horn. The performance was good, but the colors of this poem, alas, have begun to fade.

L. A. S.

Reviews and Previews

SYMPHONY—Jascha Heifetz played here Sunday to an audience that refused to go home until the violinist had obliged them with no less than five encores. Violin lovers will have another opportunity to hear string music in the week-end series this Friday and Saturday. Ruth Posselt will appear as soloist in the first performance of a Violin Concerto by Edward Burlingame Hill. Two symphonies will also be given—the Second by Beethoven in D major, and the Fifth of Sibelius in E flat.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
SEP 1 0 1938

Music:

A Great Orchestra In Its Best Period

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

To speak of the Golden Age of anything is to recognize that the ink is dry on the minutes of a treasurable record and that history's page has been turned in the inexorable progress of more prosaic events.

There was once a disposition to think of the days of Gericke and Nikisch and Muck as a sort of Golden Age of the Boston Symphony Orchestra but fortunately no one gave the period that deadly designation, for important things began to happen back in the autumn of 1924 and after 15 years they have not ceased to eventuate.

A Repeat Performance

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has been leader of the Boston artists longer by far than any previous conductor and when the orchestra begins its 58th season at Symphony Hall on Oct. 7 the concert will be a sort of anniversary celebration. Three of the numbers appeared on his first American program—Vivaldi's D minor Concerto, Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" Overture and the Haydn Variations of Brahms. That's all there will be of birthday cake cutting. Actually Dr. Koussevitzky will be cutting out a new job of another hundred concerts for himself. During his Boston career he has conducted a total of not less than 1,400 performances.

George E. Judd, Boston Symphony manager, faced a dozen New England music chroniclers at a Harvard Club luncheon in Boston this week and talked informally of the orchestra's plans. There was no ballyhoo and big words, no claims for past achievements, nor fulsome promises. But one got the pulse of this proud and democratic organization which has its being very much in today. It wants patronage and asks for it with dignity. It wants to be useful, stimulating, idealistic, but it makes only considered and hard-headed plans.

For and of New England

The orchestra belongs to all New England but feels it does not need to lose its civic identity. Hartford, New Haven, Providence and other cities are visited and return visits by devotees in all these places are encouraged because they are found mutually warming.

The prospectus of this orchestra would be the basis of sensational reclame in many another quarter. Between the Tanglewood concerts, the "Pops" and the Esplanade series the body of the ensemble will be playing nearly all of next summer under the orchestra's official auspices. The Esplanade concerts were initated by Arthur Fiedler and carried along mainly on his responsibility but with the encouragement of the symphony administration. These concerts are now to have the official backing of the orchestra.

Esplanade Shell

On the Esplanade will be constructed a new shell costing about $250,000 donated by Maria E. Hatch of Brookline which is to be the last word in acoustical science. There will be no electrical amplification but every resource of sound engineering will be mobilized to bring outdoor music as near to perfection as possible. A large part of the orchestra will be at Lenox for several extra weeks next summer in the interest of the academical plan outlined at the opening Tanglewood concert last month.

For two weeks during the winter season at Symphony Hall Igor Stravinsky will appear as composer-conductor, as well as piano soloist in performances of his own works. Before Dr. Koussevitzky returns from France where he has been vacationing at Bourget-du-lac, he will confer with Stravinsky about the programs, although it is understood that one will include a revival of "Oedipus Rex."

Guests and Soloists

Georges Enesco and Eugene Goosens will each be guests of a single week. Soloists for the 24 pairs of concerts in Boston have been chosen with regard for important concertos. Jascha Heifetz will play the Beethoven Concerto, Zlatko Balokovic the violin concerto of Carpenter and Jesus Maria Sanroma, Boston Symphony's pianist, a new concerto by Dukelsky. Artur Rubinstein, Myra Hess, Rudolph Serkin, Ruth Posselt and Gregor Patigorsky will also be heard. Nicolai Berezowsky's Concerto for string quartet and orchestra will be performed with the assistance of the Coolidge Quartet and Ernst Krenek will appear in a piano concerto of his own.

Speaking as we were of Golden Ages, the Boston Symphony is undoubtedly in the midst of its greatest period today. It is not customary to take press agent releases at their face value but in order to weigh the present position of the Boston musicians there is no need whatever to find better words, or to put a discount on them, than these which are quoted from the circular in hand: "As Serge Koussevitzky opens his fifteenth season the Orchestra stands at the very height of its virtuosity and tonal beauty, the fulfillment of its leader's loftiest aim."

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM
OCT 3 0 1938

KRENEK TO BE SYMPHONY GUEST ON FRIDAY

Ernst Krenek, the Austrian composer who has recently made his residence in America, will be the guest at the Boston Symphony concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony hall, appearing as soloist in his new piano concerto. The composer's second work in this form will then have its first performance in this country. The name of Krenek came to the fore a decade ago on account of his opera in the jazz idiom, "Jonny spielt auf." His latest opera "Karl V," produced at Prague last July, marks a return to the twelve-tone technique of his earlier years. This system is also the basis of the new piano concerto.

Serge Koussevitzky will open the programme with Haydn's Symphony in D major, No. 86, one of the group which was composed for performance in Paris. Its last performance at the Boston Symphony concerts was in 1931. The third number will be Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem," for orchestra with pianoforte, English horn, and three trumpets obbligati.

SYMPHONY AT CAMBRIDGE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the second concert of the series in Sanders theatre, Cambridge, next Thursday evening at 8 o'clock. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announces this programme: Haydn's Symphony in D major, No. 86; Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem" (after Virgil); and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor.

LOWELL, MASS.
LEADER
NOV 4 - 1938

Mrs. Ralph A. Fletcher of Westford and Mrs. O. S. Marshall of Billerica are among the many well known women who have subscribed to the Saturday Morning Concerts for Juniors. The musicale Jan. 14 will feature Jesus Maria Sanroma who has appeared here at the Memorial Auditorium, solo pianist of the Boston Symphony orchestra and his wife, Mercedes Pasarell Sanroma, pianist.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE FOR NOVEMBER 6, 1938 Page 9

These Children Are Listening to Music

The youth of the land are not all jitterbugs. A good many of them prefer so-called "classical" music, and actually play it in school orchestras and bands. Children in the United States in most cases receive musical instruction in the public schools (for which they can thank Lowell Mason who just 100 years ago fought successfully to have music included in Boston public schools), and there are a few Summer camps for those with especial talent. The percentage of young Americans, not many years out of high school, in the symphony orchestras of this country is increasing every year. These pictures, taken at the first Youth Concert in Symphony Hall this month, show some Greater Boston youngsters enjoying symphonic music. They like opera, too, as the packed audience for the special "Faust" matinee at the Boston Opera House last Spring proved.

(Griffin, Globe Staff)

Krenek Symphony Soloist

Monitor Nov. 5/38

The Arts in Boston

Ernst Krenek, distinguished exponent of the Schönberg 12-tone technique, is the guest of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this week's pair of concerts. He is playing his own Pianoforte Concerto No. 2, Op. 81, which had its first American performance yesterday afternoon. In the unavoidable absence of Dr. Koussevitzky, Richard Burgin is acting as conductor for these concerts.

Krenek is chiefly known in America by his opera, "Jonny Spielt Auf," heard in New York in 1929, and his "Little Symphony," played by the Boston orchestra in 1930. In those compositions, however, he did not employ the strict 12-tone method. In this work he does, and he has supplied an elaborate program note explaining the selection of the 12-tone series and the resultant 48 basic patterns, in the apparent belief that this is all news to Boston.

He does, however, give a very clear and illuminating account of the construction of this concerto, which is in four connected movements. What is even more interesting, he confesses that the 12-tone technique is not intended to do more than regulate the technical side of composition, and that "the artistic, emotional and spiritual value of a work remains unaffected by it and depends still upon the same criteria as in all other music." For those of us who have long been insisting on precisely that point, this is welcome support.

His music, therefore, is to be judged as music, and not as a demonstration of a musical theory. Looking at it from this viewpoint, it must be said at once that it is far more interesting than the "jazz" opera and the "Little Symphony" already referred to. Those were both musical potpourris; this is an integral piece of music, consistent in style and fascinating in musical structure, from the atmospheric introduction through the Allegro, the Adagio, and the final Allegretto. The composer attributes a concerto-grosso form to the Allegro, describes the Adagio as a canon in inversion, and calls the Allegretto a very free kind of passacaglia. In other words, he has leaned on classical forms, just as Berg did in his opera "Wozzeck," for example, which is one of the notable examples of music written according to the Schönberg formula.

Unhappily, the composer's musical ideas do not strike us as comparable to his musical scholarship. He has not produced distinguished material to match the brilliance of his composition. His concerto remains more a cerebral product than a spontaneous creation.

Nevertheless, it is interesting to note the way in which the essential affinity of these so-called atonal composers always comes to the top. It cannot be concealed, whether in Schönberg's "Glückliche Hand," Berg's "Wozzeck" or "Lulu;" or even his Violin Concerto. For they are, all these Schönbergians, fundamentally neo-Romanticists. However harsh their dissonances (those of this concerto of Krenek's are not unduly harsh) their artistic ancestry shows through. In the end, no doubt, we shall yawn over their works. But the method they are employing may very probably become a recognized part of the equipment of the composer of the future.

The new concerto, which so far as one could judge was excellently performed, was coolly received by the Friday afternoon audience. The concert opened with Haydn's Symphony in D, No. 86, in a rather pedestrian performance, and closed with Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," with Mr. Sanromá at the piano and Mr. Speyer playing the English horn. The performance was good, but the colors of this poem, alas, have begun to fade.

L. A. S.

Reviews and Previews

SYMPHONY—Jascha Heifetz played here Sunday to an audience that refused to go home until the violinist had obliged them with no less than five encores. Violin lovers will have another opportunity to hear string music in the week-end series this Friday and Saturday. Ruth Posselt will appear as soloist in the first performance of a Violin Concerto by Edward Burlingame Hill. Two symphonies will also be given—the Second by Beethoven in D major, and the Fifth of Sibelius in E flat.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
SEP 10 1938

Music:

A Great Orchestra In Its Best Period

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

To speak of the Golden Age of anything is to recognize that the ink is dry on the minutes of a treasurable record and that history's page has been turned in the inexorable progress of more prosaic events.

There was once a disposition to think of the days of Gericke and Nikisch and Muck as a sort of Golden Age of the Boston Symphony Orchestra but fortunately no one gave the period that deadly designation, for important things began to happen back in the autumn of 1924 and after 15 years they have not ceased to eventuate.

A Repeat Performance

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has been leader of the Boston artists longer by far than any previous conductor and when the orchestra begins its 58th season at Symphony Hall on Oct. 7 the concert will be a sort of anniversary celebration. Three of the numbers appeared on his first American program—Vivaldi's D minor Concerto, Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" Overture and the Haydn Variations of Brahms. That's all there will be of birthday cake cutting. Actually Dr. Koussevitzky will be cutting out a new job of another hundred concerts for himself. During his Boston career he has conducted a total of not less than 1,400 performances.

George E. Judd, Boston Symphony manager, faced a dozen New England music chroniclers at a Harvard Club luncheon in Boston this week and talked informally of the orchestra's plans. There was no ballyhoo and big words, no claims for past achievements, nor fulsome promises. But one got the pulse of this proud and democratic organization which has its being very much in today. It wants patronage and asks for it with dignity. It wants to be useful, stimulating, idealistic, but it makes only considered and hard-headed plans.

For and of New England

The orchestra belongs to all New England but feels it does not need to lose its civic identity. Hartford, New Haven, Providence and other cities are visited and return visits by devotees in all these places are encouraged because they are found mutually warming.

The prospectus of this orchestra would be the basis of sensational reclame in many another quarter. Between the Tanglewood concerts, the "Pops" and the Esplanade series the body of the ensemble will be playing nearly all of next summer under the orchestra's official auspices. The Esplanade concerts were initated by Arthur Fiedler and carried along mainly on his responsibility but with the encouragement of the symphony administration. These concerts are now to have the official backing of the orchestra.

Esplanade Shell

On the Esplanade will be constructed a new shell costing about $250,000 donated by Maria E. Hatch of Brookline which is to be the last word in acoustical science. There will be no electrical amplification but every resource of sound engineering will be mobilized to bring outdoor music as near to perfection as possible. A large part of the orchestra will be at Lenox for several extra weeks next summer in the interest of the academical plan outlined at the opening Tanglewood concert last month.

For two weeks during the winter season at Symphony Hall Igor Stravinsky will appear as composer-conductor, as well as piano soloist in performances of his own works. Before Dr. Koussevitzky returns from France where he has been vacationing at Bourget-du-lac, he will confer with Stravinsky about the programs, although it is understood that one will include a revival of "Oedipus Rex."

Guests and Soloists

Georges Enesco and Eugene Goosens will each be guests of a single week. Soloists for the 24 pairs of concerts in Boston have been chosen with regard for important concertos. Jascha Heifetz will play the Beethoven Concerto, Zlatko Balokovic the violin concerto of Carpenter and Jesus Maria Sanroma, Boston Symphony's pianist, a new concerto by Dukelsky. Artur Rubinstein, Myra Hess, Rudolph Serkin, Ruth Posselt and Gregor Patigorsky will also be heard. Nicolai Berezowsky's Concerto for string quartet and orchestra will be performed with the assistance of the Coolidge Quartet and Ernst Krenek will appear in a piano concerto of his own.

Speaking as we were of Golden Ages, the Boston Symphony is undoubtedly in the midst of its greatest period today. It is not customary to take press agent releases at their face value but in order to weigh the present position of the Boston musicians there is no need whatever to find better words, or to put a discount on them, than these which are quoted from the circular in hand: "As Serge Koussevitzky opens his fifteenth season the Orchestra stands at the very height of its virtuosity and tonal beauty, the fulfillment of its leader's loftiest aim."

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM
OCT 30 1938

KRENEK TO BE SYMPHONY GUEST ON FRIDAY

Ernst Krenek, the Austrian composer who has recently made his residence in America, will be the guest at the Boston Symphony concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony hall, appearing as soloist in his new piano concerto. The composer's second work in this form will then have its first performance in this country. The name of Krenek came to the fore a decade ago on account of his opera in the jazz idiom, "Jonny spielt auf." His latest opera "Karl V," produced at Prague last July, marks a return to the twelve-tone technique of his earlier years. This system is also the basis of the new piano concerto.

Serge Koussevitzky will open the programme with Haydn's Symphony in D major, No. 86, one of the group which was composed for performance in Paris. Its last performance at the Boston Symphony concerts was in 1931. The third number will be Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem," for orchestra with pianoforte, English horn, and three trumpets obbligati.

SYMPHONY AT CAMBRIDGE

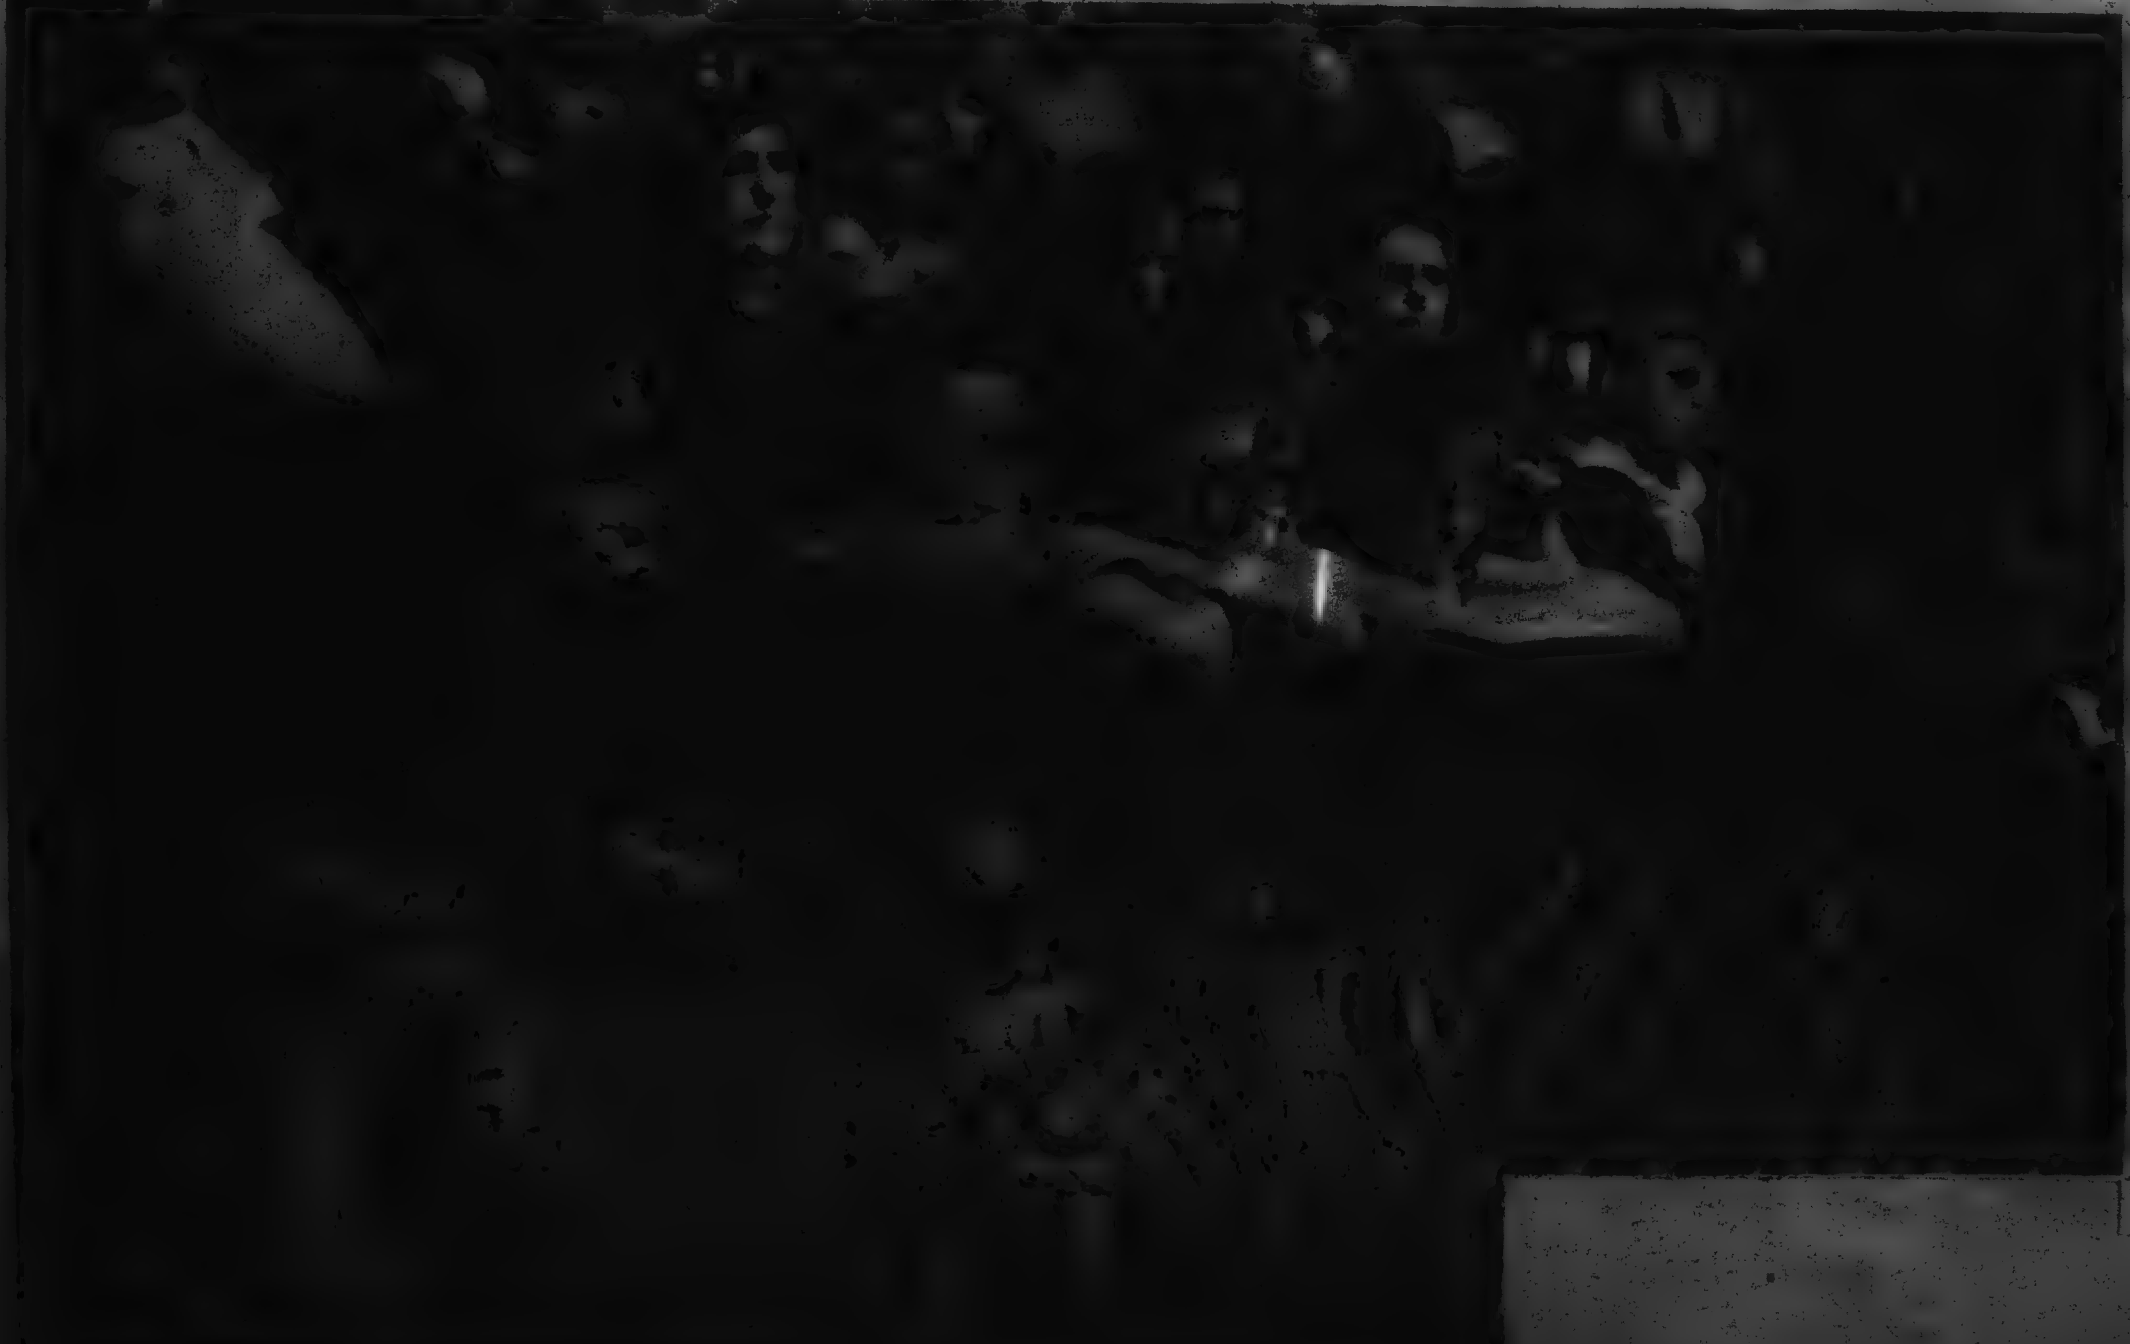
The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the second concert of the series in Sanders theatre, Cambridge, next Thursday evening at 8 o'clock. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announces this programme: Haydn's Symphony in D major, No. 86; Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem" (after Virgil); and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor.

LOWELL, MASS.
LEADER
NOV 4 - 1938

Mrs. Ralph A. Fletcher of Westford and Mrs. O. S. Marshall of Billerica are among the many well known women who have subscribed to the Saturday Morning Concerts for Juniors. The musicale Jan. 14 will feature Jesus Maria Sanroma who has appeared here at the Memorial Auditorium, solo pianist of the Boston Symphony orchestra and his wife, Mercedes Pasarell Sanroma, pianist.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE FOR NOVEMBER 6, 1938

These Children Are Listening to Music



The youth of the land are not all jitterbugs. A good many of them prefer so-called "classical" music, and actually play it in school orchestras and bands. Children in the United States in most cases receive musical instruction in the public schools (for which they can thank Lowell Mason who just 100 years ago fought successfully to have music included in Boston public schools), and there are a few Summer camps for those with especial talent. The percentage of young Americans, not many years out of high school, in the symphony orchestras of this country is increasing every year. These pictures, taken at the first Youth Concert in Symphony Hall this month, show some Greater Boston youngsters enjoying symphonic music. They like opera, too, as the packed audience for the special "Faust" matinee at the Boston Opera House last Spring proved.

(Griffin, Globe Staff)

The Critic Talks to Ledger - Oct. 22/38

MUSIC LOVERS

Philadelphia By SAMUEL L. LACIAR Pa.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, recently contributed a paper to the Proceedings of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, entitled "Poetry and Music; Musical Interpretation, and Some Remarks About American Orchestras." Naturally, from Dr. Koussevitzky's high position among the great orchestral conductors of the world, anything that he says about the matter of musical interpretation and about orchestras, either American or foreign, must be received with the greatest respect. Music, he says, gave rise to the art of interpretation, thus creating in its own sphere a second and auxiliary art which poetry does not know at all. In poetry, interpretation is very artificial and changes into a dramatic pose—a pose because it appears an imitation of theatrical art from which poetical interpretation must borrow, for in poetry's own sphere as an organic art it cannot arise.

Interpretation as an auxiliary art is above all most closely connected with music. Dr. Koussevitzky asserts that interpretation, especially the art of conducting, is still very young, when we consider that Berlioz, Mendelssohn and Wagner, who appeared at about the same time as the leading conductors of their epoch, were, indeed, the first conductor-interpreters. In fact, they founded a new school, and he says that Wagner was the first conductor who turned his back to the audience when leading an orchestra. Before him, conductors stood "a trois quart," facing the public. "You can well imagine," says the Boston conductor, "what little influence a conductor could have on an orchestra, standing with his back to the musicians. But in those days the art of interpretation in conducting was not known."

* * *

CONDUCTORS were then mostly "time beaters," who did not even trouble to rehearse, assigning the concertmaster to this duty, from which arose that title and the public performance consisted simply of playing in time without consideration for detail or perfection. Any virtuoso player having a solo passage to play, performed it with the utmost individuality, disregarding the whole conception of the work, its general meaning or line. It was Wagner and Mendelssohn who created the revolution in the sphere of conducting. They no longer "beat time" alone; they built up the musical phrase. Yet this was still far from the modern art of conducting. The geniuses of Mendelssohn and Wagner were totally opposite; Wagner was essentially romantic, Mendelssohn essentially constructive.

Dr. Koussevitzky believes that Mendelssohn's art of conducting is nearer to our day than the art of Wagner, because Mendelssohn's approach to musical compositions was more abstract than Wagner's approach. However, he calls attention to the fact that, in their time, almost the entire younger generation followed Wagner, and not Mendelssohn; because Wagner reflected his epoch immeasurably more than did Mendelssohn. It is also interesting to mark the difference of their conceptions of musical compositions. At this point in his address the Allegretto Scherzando from Beethoven's Eighth Symphony and the "Freischeutz" overture of Weber were played on a piano to illustrate the difference of tempo.

* * *

MENDELSSOHN'S interpretation was shown to be faster, more rigid and more precise; Wagner's was freer and more emotionally expressive in its phrasing. At the close of this illustration Dr. Koussevitzky asked: "Which of the two was right?" and answered his own question with "We cannot say.". Here, he said, we actually come to the problems of interpretation. Before the World War interpretative art was strongly influenced by the romantic school. That is, the interpreter regarded a musical composition as an artist-painter would regard a landscape; to him it was an "aspect of nature" which he took and reflected as he saw, felt and understood it. Therefore one and the same landscape in the hands of two artists will have a different reflection.

In all ages, continued Dr. Koussevitzky, artists have been the prophets of either the rise or the downfall of a culture, and thus, in the pre-war period, leading artists to such proportions that were the lights and shadings distorted, but the form itself was lost. At the same time, artists in other countries, also instinctively foreseeing that decline, attempted to straighten the distorted line of classical art.

* * *

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY deals at length with the right of musical performers to interpret compositions freely, and they hold that right from the composer himself. As illustration, he mentioned Bach, in whose works "we frequently find no nuances," but that positively does not mean that Bach intended to have his works played without nuances; he simply left that freedom to the performers. Thus, also, in the classical concertos of Mozart and Beethoven there are few if any cadenzas written by the composer, who left that to the interpreter. Wagner also intentionally wrote no exact definition of tempo, because, as he said in his book on conducting, the talented conductor will find the right tempo and the untalented one will never find it, even if printed in the score.

In this connection Dr. Koussevitzky related a personal experience with Sibelius regarding the fourth symphony of that composer. Failing either to feel or to understand a tempo mark of the scherzo he wrote the composer about it, and Sibelius replied that "the right tempo is the one that the artist feels." So, inquires Dr. Koussevitzy, "where is, after all, the truth of interpretation, and how can an artist justify that truth?"

That part of Dr. Koussevitzy's paper relating to the "central line" of the greatest composers and to American orchestras will be discussed in this column next Saturday.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

NOV 5 - 1938

LATEST PHONOGRAPH RECORDS

A number of important recordings have been released recently by the various companies, indicative, perhaps, of the listening public's manifold interests. They are presented here under the names of their composers, and in alphatical order:—

Bach Sonata No. 1, in G major for Harpsichord and Viola da Gamba. Played by Ernst Victor Wolff and Janos Scholz (Columbia).

Two twelve-inch discs are required to encompass this little known work. There is, undeniably, a musicianly give-and-take working smoothly between these two artists, each considerate of the other and both of the composer. The piece has some interesting moments, but the combined tone of harpsichord and viola da gamba is, to judge from this case, not a happy union for phonographic purposes.

Bach-Busoni Chaconne. Played by Johana Harris (Victor).

The pianist shows that she has ideas concerning this version of the famous composition. Her conception of it is in a non-epic frame, infatuated, more or less, with lyrical details. The execution is usually clean.

Beethoven Serenade-Trio, op. 8. Played by the Pasquire Trio (Columbia).

This gifted group delivers a persuasive reading of a work that possesses much charm. One overlooks the occasional inaccuracies in technique.

Brahms Symphony No. 1. Played by Bruno Walter and the Vienna Philharmonic (Victor).

One might describe this reading as definitive. Bruno Walter conducts with authority, precision, sweep and finesse. There are some startlingly beautiful effects in the harmonic modulations of the first movement. In general Brahms speaks expansively, thanks to a thoroughly sympathetic interpreter.

Brahms Symphony No. 4. Played by Felix Weingartner and the London Symphony (Columbia).

Issue might be taken with the renowned director's choice of a tempo in the first movement. But, hearing the whole performance, one is apt to agree with Mr. Weingartner's restraint at the beginning. He is continually building throughout, having in mind a completed structure and not a piecemeal fragmentation. A second hearing is even more convincing.

Cont.

De Falla "Three-Cornered Hat" Suite. Played by Arthur Fiedler and the Boston "Pops" Orchestra (Victor).

These ever popular excerpts are engagingly done by Mr. Fiedler and his men. The playing is replete with Spanish gusto and ping.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

OCT 31 1938

Ballet Composer Reveals "Little Marks" Mean Work

By George Y. Loveridge

Walter Piston, prominent American composer, came to town yesterday to sit in on a rehearsal of his music for "The Incredible Flutist," which the Providence Symphony Orchestra and the Hans Wiener ballet will present in Metropolitan Theatre on Nov. 22.

With the manuscript score balanced on the arm of his chair, Mr. Piston followed the rehearsal carefully, conferred now and then with the conductor, Dr. Wassili Leps, and at the conclusion expressed "agreeable surprise" at the quality of the orchestra.

Wrote For Radio

Mr. Piston is an associate professor of music at Harvard. His First Symphony was performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last season, and that orchestra and others have played several earlier compositions. He has had both the John Knowles Paine and Guggenheim Fellowships, and was one of the first six American composers commissioned by a radio company to write a work for radio broadcast. "The Incredible Flutist" was written specifically for the Boston "Pops" and had three performances at those concerts last season, with Arthur Fiedler conducting.

Mr. Piston can hardly be called a talkative man, least of all on the subject of his own work, but he was prevailed upon to give some of the facts concerning the writing of the ballet. It seems that the necessity of fulfilling a contract was a considerable help to inspiration.

"The contract was signed and the dates were set before a note had been written," he smiled. "Hans had the story, and we worked together on the ballet. I improvised at the piano while he worked out the dancing. He has a faculty of seeing things of that sort just about as they will be when they are completed. Now and then, as the work progressed, he would make suggestions such as reminding me that at a certain place the music would not last long enough to give a dancer time to get from the wings to the centre of the Symphony Hall stage, few meas-had been -hand arrangement for one piano, and Mr. Fiedler and I played it. Hans had a recording instrument at his studio. We made records of the piano version. He used them in rehearsing his dancers. But the records weren't very good, and they got so much wear that after a while you couldn't make much out of them.

"Meanwhile, I was scoring the music. As soon as one section was finished, it was sent off to the copyist, so he could prepare the parts for the players. Just before the score was to be delivered for rehearsal by the orchestra I started at 8 o'clock one night to finish the last pages. At 8 the next morning I was still working. The copyist sent around to ask for the rest of the music. I told him to send again in an hour. I finished it by then. I guess he had to work all that day and night to get the parts ready. It's surprising how long it takes to make all those little marks on paper.

"The orchestra got the music just in time. All the dancers went to sit in the balcony during the rehearsal. That was the first time they heard the music, except for what was on the records."

All of which indicates that a composer of music cannot simply dwell among roseate clouds far from all earthly considerations. Not if he wants anybody else to hear his music.

Fiedler Addresses Clef on Concerts

"Pops" Leader Tells Of Music In Esplanade Shell; Greene Talks

Arthur Fiedler, well-known conductor of the Pops Symphony orchestra, was guest speaker at a meeting held by the Clef last Friday in Room 6-120.

Fiedler, who is also famous for his Esplanade Concerts, spoke on his work there. He said that the state is planning to erect a huge shell on the Esplanade which would include a stage as large as that of the Boston Symphony Hall. Fiedler claimed that it is possible to educate the masses to good music merely by exposing them to it, and that his aim is to arouse music appreciation by that method. The success of the Esplanade Concerts has proved his point.

Professor Greene Also Speaks

Professor William C. Greene spoke on "Tech Students and the Arts," also claiming that exposure will result in appreciation. Both speakers were introduced by Edward C. Bishop, '41, president of the Clef.

The organization intends to have meetings every two weeks at which the members will discuss the various phases of music. Plans are being made to invite more speakers from time to time.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 6 - 1938

Today—Free lecture on Boston Symphony Orchestra program, John Archer; auspices Monday Morning Musical Club, Providence Public Library, 4 p. m. Recital, Ernest Ferdinand L'Heureux, boy soprano; Earl C. Snow, accompanist; Knights of Columbus Hall, evening.

ENGLEWOOD, N. J.
WEEKLY PRESS

OCT 20 1938

Philharmonic-Symphony League Releases Program

At a tea held at Mrs. Daniel E. Pomeroy's home on Wednesday, October 12, Mrs. Merredith Langstaff, secretary of the Philharmonic Symphony League, explained about the privileges offered by the league. Bruno Sabate gave a delightful program on his oboe.

A course of six lectures on symphonic music will be presented by the Philharmonic Symphony League for it's members this fall. The first lecture will be given by John Barbirolli, the orchestra's conductor, on Tuesday evening, November 1. Marion Rous, who is well known here through her explanatory lecture-recitals on the Philharmonic's programs, will give the second and third lectures on Thursday mornings, November 10 and December 1. Emil Kahn, who came here from Germany two years ago and is musical instructor and conductor of the New Jersey State Teachers College in Montclair and conductor of the Montclair Orchestra, will speak on Tuesday morning, January 10.

Provides Background

Nadia Boulanger, noted French musician and teacher, who was the first woman to conduct concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will lecture on Tuesday evening, January 31. The closing lecture, Tuesday evening, February 28 will be given by Harrist D. Johnson, artist director of the Layman's music courses.

The general purpose of the lectures is to help to provide a background of musical education and understanding which will give the listener greater appreciation of the music played by the Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra in its Carnegie Hall programs.

Members of the league also will be entitled to tickets to two private concerts held exclusively for them, monthly bulletins about the societies activities and a special recording of an unusual orchestral work made for league members only.

Information regarding membership may be obtained from Mrs. Malcolm S. Mackay, Jr., 256 Speer avenue, chairman. Other members are Mrs. Clarence D. Kerr, Mrs. Artur Nikoloric, Mrs. Eugene Homans, Mrs. Charles Richardson and Mrs. Malcolm Mackay.

Already Joined

Among those who have already subscribed are Mesdames R. Fenby Bausman, Dwight Beebe, LeRoy Clark, Douglas Coleman, Donald Cruse, Harvey Dunn, A. A. Harden, Herbert Johnson, Clarence D. Kerr, Robert R. Laidlaw, Abram A. Lebson, Malcolm S. Mackay, Malcolm S. Mackay, Jr., Dwight Whitney Morrow, William McIntire, Artur Nikoloric, Hugh Peters, William Rippon, C. Horace Tuttle, Hunter Goodrich, Daniel E. Pomeroy, Robert Westaway and Miss Elizabeth Sherwood.

A first meeting for members and potential members which was largely attended by those interested in the organization from most of the cities and towns in the environs of New York was held yesterday at the Hotel Plaza. Mrs. Clarence D. Kerr was among those who entertained at luncheon at the Plaza. She had among her guests Mrs. Gerardus L. Miller, Mrs. Charles G. DuBois, Mrs. Frederick B. Reinmund, Mrs. Arthur C. Sherwood, Miss Elizabeth Sherwood and Mrs. LeRoy B. Pitkin.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

NOV 5 - 1938

SYMPHONY OPENING

Mr. Spalding Complimented Orchestra On Fine Performance

To the Editor of The Courant:—

Last night I attended the opening of the Hartford Symphony series. This morning I read a review of the performance which sounded like a post-mortem. I understand that this particular program is a great favorite of T. H. P. who wrote the review and that he considers the performance of this program by Serge Koussevitzky's orchestra to be the acme of perfection.

Our dear E. N. C. considers that Irving's "Hamlet" is the finest theatrical performance that she has witnessed. This predilection, however, would not prevent her from heaping praise on the good points of any other "Hamlet."

I appreciate honest criticism and know that a good critic must tell the truth as he sees it. But why not praise all the many virtues of last night's performance instead of comparing it with one that we all agree can hardly be equalled? It may interest T. H. P. to know that Mr. Spalding said he was amazed at the excellence of an orchestra that kept him on his toes every minute.

Let me urge everyone who formed his or her idea of the Hartford Symphony's execution (using this word with apologies to T. H. P., who of course is the official executioner) from T. H. P.'s review, to go to the next performance with an expectation of an evening of musical delight.

M. V. RICE.

Hartford.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

NOV 5 - 1938

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE NOVEMBER 17

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its series of five pairs of concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 17, and Saturday evening, November 19. The present season is the fifteenth of the orchestra under the conductorship of Serge Koussevitsky. At the Saturday concert, Dr. Koussevitzky will perform Aaron Copland's Rhapsody "El Salon Mexico," which had its first public performance in the United States recently by this orchestra in Boston. The Saturday program will also include Mozart's Divertimento for Strings and Horns, K. No. 287, performed by the string orchestra, and Dvorak's "New World" Symphony. The Thursday evening program will consist of Ravel's Suite, "Le Tombeau de Couperin," the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius, and the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 6 - 1938

Tuesday—Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; Jascha Heifetz, violinist, soloist; Metropolitan Theatre, 8:30 p. m.

53

The Critic Talks to Oct. 23/38

MUSIC LOVERS

Philadelphia Pa.

By SAMUEL L. LACIAR

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, recently contributed a paper to the Proceedings of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, entitled "Poetry and Music; Musical Interpretation, and Some Remarks About American Orchestras." Naturally, from Dr. Koussevitzky's high position among the great orchestral conductors of the world, anything that he says about the matter of musical interpretation and about orchestras, either American or foreign, must be received with the greatest respect. Music, he says, gave rise to the art of interpretation, thus creating in its own sphere a second and auxiliary art which poetry does not know at all. In poetry, interpretation is very artificial and changes into a dramatic pose—a pose because it appears an imitation of theatrical art from which poetical interpretation must borrow, for in poetry's own sphere as an organic art it cannot arise.

Interpretation as an auxiliary art is above all most closely connected with music. Dr. Koussevitzky asserts that interpretation, especially the art of conducting, is still very young, when we consider that Berlioz, Mendelssohn and Wagner, who appeared at about the same time as the leading conductors of their epoch were, indeed, the first conductor-interpreters. In fact, they founded a new school, and he says that Wagner was the first conductor who turned his back to the audience when leading an orchestra. Before him, conductors stood "a trois quart," facing the public. "You can well imagine," says the Boston conductor, "what little influence a conductor could have on an orchestra, standing with his back to the musicians. But in those days the art of interpretation in conducting was not known."

* * *

CONDUCTORS were then mostly "time beaters," who did not even trouble to rehearse, assigning the concertmaster to this duty, from which arose that title andethe public performance consisted simply of playing in time without consideration for detail or perfection. Any virtuoso player having a solo passage to play, performed it with the utmost individuality, disregarding the whole conception of the work, its general meaning or line. It was Wagner and Mendelssohn who created the revolution in the sphere of conducting. They no longer "beat time" alone; they built up the musical phrase. Yet this was still far from the modern art of conducting. The geniuses of Mendelssohn and Wagner were totally opposite; Wagner was essentially romantic, Mendelssohn essentially constructive.

Dr. Koussevitzky believes that Mendelssohn's art of conducting is nearer to our day than the art of Wagner, because Mendelssohn's approach to musical compositions was more abstract than Wagner's approach. However, he calls attention to the fact that, in their time, almost the entire younger generation followed Wagner, and not Mendelssohn, because Wagner reflected his epoch immeasurably more than did Mendelssohn. It is also interesting to mark the difference of their conceptions of musical compositions. At this point in his address the Allegretto Scherzando from Beethoven's Eighth Symphony and the "Freischeutz" overture of Weber were played on a piano to illustrate the difference of tempo.

* * *

MENDELSSOHN'S interpretation was shown to be faster, more rigid and more precise; Wagner's was freer and more emotionally expressive in its phrasing. At the close of this illustration Dr. Koussevitzky asked: "Which of the two was right?" and answered his own question with "We cannot say." Here, he said, we actually come to the problems of interpretation. Before the World War interpretative art was strongly influenced by the romantic school. That is, the interpreter regarded a musical composition as an artist-painter would regard a landscape; to him it was an "aspect of nature" which he took and reflected as he saw, felt and understood it. Therefore one and the same landscape in the hands of two artists will have a different reflection.

In all ages, continued Dr. Koussevitzky, artists have been the prophets of either the rise or the downfall of a culture, and thus, in the pre-war period, leading artists introduced decadence in art before it manifested itself in the social and political life of the post-war period. Decadence in musical interpretation in some countries grew to such proportions that not only were the lights and shadings distorted, but the form itself was lost. At the same time, artists in other countries, also instinctively foreseeing that decline, attempted to straighten the distorted line of classical art.

* * *

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY deals at length with the right of musical performers to interpret compositions freely, and they hold that right from the composer himself. As illustration, he mentioned Bach, in whose works "we frequently find no nuances," but that positively does not mean that Bach intended to have his works played without nuances; he simply left that freedom to the performers. Thus, also, in the classical concertos of Mozart and Beethoven there are few if any cadenzas written by the composer, who left that to the interpreter. Wagner also intentionally wrote no exact definition of tempo, because as he said in his book on conducting, the talented conductor will find the right tempo and the untalented one will never find it, even if printed in the score.

In this connection Dr. Koussevitzky related a personal experience with Sibelius regarding the fourth symphony of that composer. Failing either to feel or to understand a tempo mark of the scherzo he wrote the composer about it, and Sibelius replied that "the right tempo is the one that the artist feels." So, inquires Dr. Koussevitzy, "where is, after all, the truth of interpretation, and how can an artist justify that truth?"

That part of Dr. Koussevitzy's paper relating to the "central line" of the greatest composers and to American orchestras will be discussed in this column next Saturday.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

NOV 5 - 1938

BIN DIA P

[illegible] of important recordings have been released recently by the various companies, indicative, perhaps, of the listening public's manifold interests. They are presented here under the names of their composers, and in alphatical order:—

Bach Sonata No. 1, in G major for Harpsichord and Viola da Gamba. Played by Ernst Victor Wolff and Janos Scholz (Columbia).

Two twelve-inch discs are required to encompass this little known work. There is, undeniably, a musicianly give-and-take working smoothly between these two artists, each considerate of the other and both of the composer. The piece has some interesting moments, but the combined tone of harpsichord and viola da gamba is, to judge from this case, not a happy union for phonographic purposes.

Bach-Busoni Chaconne. Played by Johana Harris (Victor).

The pianist shows that she has ideas concerning this version of the famous composition. Her conception of it is in a non-epic frame, infatuated, more or less, with lyrical details. The execution is usually clean.

Beethoven Serenade-Trio, op. 8, Played by the Pasquire Trio (Columbia).

This gifted group delivers a persuasive reading of a work that possesses much charm. One overlooks the occasional inaccuracies in technique.

Brahms Symphony No. 1. Played by Bruno Walter and the Vienna Philharmonic (Victor).

One might describe this reading as definitive. Eruno Walter conducts with authority, precision, sweep and finesse. There are some startlingly beautiful effects in the harmonic modulations of the first movement. In general Brahms speaks expansively, thanks to a thoroughly sympathetic interpreter.

Brahms Symphony No. 4. Played by Felix Weingartner and the London Symphony (Columbia).

Issue might be taken with the renowned director's choice of a tempo in the first movement. But, hearing the whole performance, one is apt to agree with Mr. Weingartner's restraint at the beginning. He is continually building throughout, having in mind a completed structure and not a piecemeal fragmentation. A second hearing is even more convincing.

De Falla "Three-Cornered Hat" Suite. Played by Arthur Fiedler and the Boston "Pops" Orchestra (Victor).

These ever popular excerpts are engagingly done by Mr. Fiedler and his men. The playing is replete with Spanish gusto and ping.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

OCT 3 1 1938

Ballet Composer Reveals "Little Marks" Mean Work

By George Y. Loveridge

Walter Piston, prominent American composer, came to town yesterday to sit in on a rehearsal of his music for "The Incredible Flutist," which the Providence Symphony Orchestra and the Hans Wiener ballet will present in Metropolitan Theatre on Nov. 22.

With the manuscript score balanced on the arm of his chair, Mr. Piston followed the rehearsal carefully, conferred now and then with the conductor, Dr. Wassili Leps, and at the conclusion expressed "agreeable surprise" at the quality of the orchestra.

Wrote For Radio

Mr. Piston is an associate professor of music at Harvard. His First Symphony was performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last season, and that orchestra and others have played several earlier compositions. He has had both the John Knowles Paine and Guggenheim Fellowships, and was one of the first six American composers commissioned by a radio company to write a work for radio broadcast. "The Incredible Flutist" was written specifically for the Boston "Pops" and had three performances at those concerts last season, with Arthur Fiedler conducting.

Mr. Piston can hardly be called a talkative man, least of all on the subject of his own work, but he was prevailed upon to give some of the facts concerning the writing of the ballet. It seems that the necessity of fulfilling a contract was a considerable help to inspiration.

"The contract was signed and the dates were set before a note had been written," he smiled. "Hans had the story, and we worked together on the ballet. I improvised at the piano while he worked out the dancing. He has a faculty of seeing things of that sort just about as they will be when they are completed. Now and then, as the work progressed, he would make suggestions such as reminding me that at a certain place the music would not last long enough to give a dancer time to get from the wings to the centre of the Symphony Hall stage, so I would have to add a few measures.

Used Recording

"When the music finally had been worked out, I made a four-hand arrangement for one piano, and Mr. Fiedler and I played it. Hans had a recording instrument at his studio. We made records of the piano version. He used them in rehearsing his dancers. But the records weren't very good, and they got so much wear that after a while you couldn't make much out of them.

"Meanwhile, I was scoring the music. As soon as one section was finished, it was sent off to the copyist, so he could prepare the parts for the players. Just before the score was to be delivered for rehearsal by the orchestra I started at 8 o'clock one night to finish the last pages. At 8 the next morning I was still working. The copyist sent around to ask for the rest of the music. I told him to send again in an hour. I finished it by then. I guess he had to work all that day and night to get the parts ready. It's surprising how long it takes to make all those little marks on paper.

"The orchestra got the music just in time. All the dancers went to sit in the balcony during the rehearsal. That was the first time they heard the music, except for what was on the records."

All of which indicates that a composer of music cannot simply dwell among roseate clouds far from all earthly considerations. Not if he wants anybody else to hear his music.

Fiedler Addresses Clef on Concerts

"Pops" Leader Tells Of Music In Esplanade Shell; Greene Talks

Arthur Fiedler, well-known conductor of the Pops Symphony orchestra, was guest speaker at a meeting held by the Clef last Friday in Room 6-120.

Fiedler, who is also famous for his Esplanade Concerts, spoke on his work there. He said that the state is planning to erect a huge shell on the Esplanade which would include a stage as large as that of the Boston Symphony Hall. Fiedler claimed that it is possible to educate the masses to good music merely by exposing them to it, and that his aim is to arouse music appreciation by that method. The success of the Esplanade Concerts has proved his point.

Professor Greene Also Speaks

Professor William C. Greene spoke on "Tech Students and the Arts," also claiming that exposure will result in appreciation. Both speakers were introduced by Edward C. Bishop, '41, president of the Clef.

The organization intends to have meetings every two weeks at which the members will discuss the various phases of music. Plans are being made to invite more speakers from time to time.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 6 - 1938

[illegible]day—Free lecture on Boston Symphony Orchestra program, John Archer; auspices Monday Morning Musical Club, Providence Public Library, 4 p. m. Recital, Ernest Ferdinand L'Heureux, boy soprano; Earl C. Snow, accompanist; Knights of Columbus Hall, evening.

ENGLEWOOD, N. J.
WEEKLY PRESS

OCT 20 1938

Philharmonic-Symphony League Releases Program

At a tea held at Mrs. Daniel E. Pomeroy's home on Wednesday, October 12, Mrs. Merredith Langstaff, secretary of the Philharmonic Symphony League, explained about the privileges offered by the league. Bruno Sabate gave a delightful program on his oboe.

A course of six lectures on symphonic music will be presented by the Philharmonic Symphony League for it's members this fall. The first lecture will be given by John Barbirolli, the orchestra's conductor, on Tuesday evening, November 1. Marion Rous, who is well known here through her explanatory lecture-recitals on the Philharmonic's programs, will give the second and third lectures on Thursday mornings, November 10 and December 1. Emil Kahn, who came here from Germany two years ago and is musical instructor and conductor of the New Jersey State Teachers College in Montclair and conductor of the Montclair Orchestra, will speak on Tuesday morning, January 10.

Provides Background

Nadia Boulanger, noted French musician and teacher, who was the first woman to conduct concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will lecture on Tuesday evening, January 31. The closing lecture, Tuesday evening, February 28 will be given by Harriet D. Johnson, artist director of the Layman's music courses.

The general purpose of the lectures is to help to provide a background of musical education and understanding which will give the listener greater appreciation of the music played by the Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra in its Carnegie Hall programs.

Members of the league also will be entitled to tickets to two private concerts held exclusively for them, monthly bulletins about the societies activities and a special recording of an unusual orchestral work made for league members only.

Information regarding membership may be obtained from Mrs. Malcolm S[illegible], Jr., 268 Speer avenue, chairman. Other members are Mrs. Clarence D. Kerr, Mrs. Artur Nikoloric, Mrs. Eugene Homans, Mrs. Charles Richardson and Mrs. Malcolm Mackay.

Already Joined

Among those who have already subscribed are Mesdames R. Fenby Bausman, Dwight Beebe, LeRoy Clark, Douglas Coleman, Donald Cruse, Harvey Dunn, A. A. Harden, Herbert Johnson, Clarence D. Kerr, Robert R. Laidlaw, Abram A. Lebson, Malcolm S. Mackay, Malcolm S. Mackay, Jr., Dwight Whitney Morrow, William McIntire, Artur Nikoloric, Hugh Peters, William Rippon, C. Horace Tuttle, Hunter Goodrich, Daniel E. Pomeroy, Robert Westaway and Miss Elizabeth Sherwood.

A first meeting for members and potential members which was largely attended by those interested in the organization from most of the cities and towns in the environs of New York was held yesterday at the Hotel Plaza. Mrs. Clarence D. Kerr was among those who entertained at luncheon at the Plaza. She had among her guests Mrs. Gerardus L. Miller, Mrs. Charles G. DuBois, Mrs. Frederick B. Reinmund, Mrs. Arthur C. Sherwood, Miss Elizabeth Sherwood and Mrs. LeRoy B. Pitkin.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

NOV 5 - 1938

SYMPHONY OPENING

Mr. Spalding Complimented Orchestra On Fine Performance

To the Editor of The Courant:—

Last night I attended the opening of the Hartford Symphony series. This morning I read a review of the performance which sounded like a post-mortem. I understand that this particular program is a great favorite of T. H. P. who wrote the review and that he considers the performance of this program by Serge Koussevitzky's orchestra to be the acme of perfection.

Our dear E. N. C. considers that Irving's "Hamlet" is the finest theatrical performance that she has witnessed. This predilection, however, would not prevent her from heaping praise on the good points of any other "Hamlet."

I appreciate honest criticism and know that a good critic must tell the truth as he sees it. But why not praise all the many virtues of last night's performance instead of comparing it with one that we all agree can hardly be equalled? It may interest T. H. P. to know that Mr. Spalding said he was amazed at the excellence of an orchestra that kept him on his toes every minute.

Let me urge everyone who formed his or her idea of the Hartford Symphony's execution (using this word with apologies to T. H. P., who of course is the official executioner) from T. H. P.'s review, to go to the next performance with an expectation of an evening of musical delight.

M. Y. RICE.

Hartford.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

NOV 5 - 1938

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE NOVEMBER 17

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its series of five pairs of concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 17, and Saturday evening, November 19. The present season is the fifteenth of the orchestra under the conductorship of Serge Koussevitsky. At the Saturday concert, Dr. Koussevitzky will perform Aaron Copland's Rhapsody "El Salon Mexico," which had its first public performance in the United States recently by this orchestra in Boston. The Saturday program will also include Mozart's Divertimento for Strings and Horns, K. No. 287, performed by the string orchestra, and Dvorak's "New World" Symphony. The Thursday evening program will consist of Ravel's Suite, "Le Tombeau de Couperin," the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius, and the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 6 - 1938

Tuesday—Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; Jascha Heifetz, violinist, soloist; Metropolitan Theatre, 8:30 p. m.

New Music Listing Boon to Reviewers

Macmillan's Encyclopedia Of Music and Musicians Concise, Comprehensive

(Reviewed by A.C.R.)

It has taken a good many hours on the trail to get acquainted with and to fairly estimate the recently issued Macmillan Encyclopedia of Music and Musicians, compiled and edited by Albert E. Wier. It is a single volume of 2,089 pages; very thin paper, allowing easily readable type. A random opening of the mammoth tome ("You Can't Take It with You") hit upon Marc Blitzstein, "The Cradle Will Rock," in Operas by American Composers—a proof that here is the last word in musical happenings.

Then began a hunt for names that might be overlooked, but a generally comprehensive though concise listing of ancient and modern composers and performers was revealed. No more running to the limited biographical section of the dictionary; searching "the graveyard," Victor Record catalogues, Who's Who. Here should be everything needed for the quick consulting after a concert that is the limitation of a reviewer on a morning paper—spelling, data to set one on the right track as to period, experience of artists, straightening out program errors. The first night of possession, the new book was used to settle an argument on the spelling of Spalding, American violinist. (Unfortunately for complete confidence, in an item on New York's Town Hall, the name appears with an incorrect "u", while Spaulding of Harvard in similar cross reference is without the "u" and Bruce Simonds, concert pianist and of the Yale musical faculty, is spelled "Simmons."

The classified sections are good points in the arrangement. One finds Musical Composition Over the Centuries; History of Music, with dates of contributing influences; Radio Concert Broadcasting, in which only the valuable programs are listed; Musical Literature (which among American folk music omits the J. Rosamond Johnson-Lawrence Brown "Book of American Negro Spirituals" with its authoritative introduction by the late James Weldon Johnson; as also the Kentucky ballads edited by Loraine Wyman and Howard Brockway).

It was an excellent idea to list separately for discussion such frequently appearing orchestral numbers as "The Fountains of Rome." "Finlandia," the Chorale (Ninth) Symphony, the "Appassionata" Sonata. Brief opera plots are given in generous impartiality. There are nearly eight pages on Two-piano Playing. Some ballet companies are considered.

Shakespeare's "The Tempest" stands alone for its many lyrics that have been set to music. Under "The Moonlight Sonata" is mention of the currently popular film record of the playing of Paderewski.

Mr. Wier asks his readers' cooperation in eliminating errors from future editions. We would question the omission of the American Opera Company, a lamented, disbanded group of young singers furnished with fresh translations and artistic settings; of the Boston Opera Company, for which Eben Jordan built the Opera House on Huntington Avenue that has been visited by the Metropolitan and Chicago Opera companies, the great ballet troupes, and famous Russian and Shakesperean productions; of Jordan Hall, where world-known concert artists are constantly appearing; of the fact that Arthur Fiedler among his multitudinous offices has been for some time established as the personable, popular and progressive conductor of Boston's long-established "Pop" Concerts, and was the organizer of the Esplanade concerts; above all, that neither under Festival, Berkshire nor Stockbridge can be found any mention of the August Symphonic Festival at Tanglewood now, in its fifth year, possessed of an auditorium of perfect acoustics for the perfections of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

We have vainly tried cross references for any credit to Dr. Archibald Davison, who long ago reorganized the Harvard Glee Club into a body of first rank in choral singing—a national propaganda for good music wherever Harvard alumni may settle. Mrs. Coolidge's frequent gifts of chamber music to Paine Hall, Harvard, and to the Boston Public Library lecture hall programs deserve mention. Mr. Wier, Chelsea born, New England Conservatory of Music and Harvard musically educated, seems modest about giving credit to his own city—perhaps because since 1900 (when all these things have happened) he has been in New York, editing a host of musical collections. He has even missed the wry joy of adding an explanatory ("H.T.P.") to the few lines on the late Henry Taylor Parker.

59

CAMDEN, N. J.
POST

NOV 5 - 1938

Ormandy Will Mark Armistice Day With Music of 6 Nations

Vivaldi, Beethoven, Schelling, Jenkins, Stravinsky and Ravel on List

The sixth pair of concerts by the Philadelphia Orchestra on Friday afternoon, Nov. 11, and Saturday evening, Nov. 12, will commemorate the twentieth anniversary of Armistice Day, November 11, 1918, with a special Armistice Day program in which Eugene Ormandy has incorporated the music of six nations.

Italy will be represented with the Vivaldi Concerto, transcribed for large orchestra by Lucien Cailliet; Germany by the Beethoven Concerto No. 1 in C major for piano and orchestra which introduces the brilliant young American pianist Hortense Monath for her first performance with the orchestra; the United States by Ernest Schelling's Fantasy for Orchestra "A Victory Ball"; England by the first performance of an orchestral transcription of a five-part Fantasy in D major for five strings by Jenkins; Russia by the "Pastorale" of Stravinsky, and France by Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite No. 1. In this latter work the orchestra will be assisted by the University of Pennsylvania Choral Society of which Dr. Harl McDonald is the director.

Antonio Vivaldi, described as "the best-known of all red-headed priests who became famous as composers," was an outstanding master of instrumental music in the early 18th century. He was director of music to Duke Philip of Hesse at Mantua, and in 1714 was appointed to the post of violinist at St. Mark's, Venice. He was also director of music at the Ospedale-della Pieta, where he remained until he died.

The work on the program adheres to the type of 18th century concerto grosso in being written for a group of solo instruments known as the "concertino," playing in contrast with the full body of strings. In the A minor concerto the solo group, in the first and third movements consists of two violins; in the central slow movement, a solo violin, solo viola and solo 'cello are set off against the full string choir.

Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 1, played previously with the orchestra by Alfred Cortot and Dalies Frantz, was published in 1801 as No. 1. It was this concerto which in 1887-88 introduced to New York a young pianist of ten named Josef Hofmann.

The composer himself played this concerto at the Vienna Burgtheatre.

The executant, Hortense Monath, studied in New York with Ernest Hutcheson and in Berlin with Arthur Schnabel. Her debut in Hamburg was followed by concerts in Rome, Florence, Bologne, Milan and other European cities. She has been a guest artist with the Vienna and Hamburg Philharmonic Orchestras. In Boston she was solo artist with the Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky.

Ernest Schelling began the composition of his "Victory Ball" in New York in 1922, and completed it in Switzerland the following Summer. It is inscribed "To the Memory of an American Soldier." The poem by Alfred Noyes "A Victory Ball" is the basis of the work which is a free fantasy, with a certain amount of thematic development. Two Army bugle-calls are used; the "Call to Arms" and "Charge" which ominously usher in the war Vision, and "Taps" which closes the piece.

Schelling wrote: "I had come back from Europe still very much under the impression of the cataclysm, much troubled for the future, and was amazed to find that so few seemed to remember what the war really had meant, with its sacrifice of life and youth. I had wondered when watching the seething mass of humanity at some cabaret what our boys would think of it all . . . I had occasion during the war to hear the Scotch Pipers, and to observe the extraordinary effect of their music on the troops; at the end of the work I have tried to make the whole orchestra a huge bag-pipe, perhaps the most pagan and primitive form of music."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

NOV 5 - 1938

Music and Musicians

A Letter to the Music Editor and Some Thoughts on Toscanini Worship.

By WILLIAM G. KING.

"As an obscure but earnest music lover, and as a person peculiarly sympathetic to the music of Tschaikowsky, I daresay I have heard every noteworthy performance of the Pathetic Symphony given in this city from the days of Anton Seidl down to the present time.

"I agree with Henry T. Finck that no one ever played the last movement as did Seidl, and that no one ever played the other three movements as did Safonoff. There are, however, many persons who have played this work satisfactorily; and of course, it must be pointed out that Dr. Koussevitzky, at the present time~~, gives a memor~~ably beautiful performance of this work.

"But for this music-lover nothing has ever been done comparable to Mr. Toscanini's incredible performance. The incredibleness lay, however, on the debit side. Not Gericke, not Gustav Mahler, whose contempt for the work was notorious, and who played it, if rumor is to be credited, only on box-office demand, more completely and ruthlessly destroyed the beauty, pathos and significance of this work than did Toscanini. Mr. Toscanini's mailed fist swept through this score as though he were performing an obnoxious task, with metronomic and unyielding tempi, with complete disregard of the tenderness, grace, dignity and loveliness implicit in the best pages of this score. To any one caring deeply for this work, his performance was calamitous.

"I am aware that it is utterly hopeless to attempt to bring the light of sanity, objectivity and common sense to bear upon the subject of Mr. Toscanini. He seems to have cast a spell over all independent, judicious, technical thinking, to a point where the critical faculties of even intelligent persons no longer function. But I do hope most earnestly that you will allow a person who, in company with many admirable and revered musicians, has held a lifelong affection for Tschaikowsky, to state most emphatically that, critical acclaim to the contrary, Mr. Toscanini's performance of the Pathetic Symphony was far from a true measure of that work's intrinsic beauty and significance."

Charles L. Buchanan.

The above letter, addressed to the Music Editor of The Sun, is printed here not only out of courtesy to Mr. Buchanan, who is unknown to me, but because, as another music-lover, I feel very strongly that "the light of sanity, objectivity and common sense" has indeed, in a number of quarters, been swallowed up in the blaze of adoration for Mr. Toscanini.

And I feel even more strongly that Mr. Toscanini is too inspired a conductor, too great a musician, and too noble a man to deserve being placed, with or without his consent or desire, in the position of a cult-leader.

Let it be made clear that I do not agree with Mr. Buchanan about Mr. Toscanini's performance (one week ago) of the Tschaikowsky Sixth Symphony. In the final analysis, all honest criticism can be no more than the expression of the critic's opinion, formed in the light of his knowledge and experience; and Mr. Buchanan, therefore has as much right to his views as the critics, professional and otherwise, who lavish their adulatory adjectives on Mr. Toscanini every time he conducts an orchestra.

More Important Matters.

There are, however, vastly more important matters than the merits of the performance of a single symphony implicit in Mr. Buchanan's letter, chief among them that Toscanini-worship has reached a point where objective, unbiased judgment of his achievements has all but vanished from the American musical scene.

If that is the case—and some of the purple prose that has been printed and some of the ecstasies that have been broadcast on the subject of Mr. Toscanini's conducting might be taken as indication that it is—a serious injustice is being done to other musicians and to Mr. Toscanini himself. Nor is the general cause of music being advanced.

My duties do not require that I sit in judgment upon performances—in other words, I am not a "music critic." I have no ax to grind, and no quarrel to pick with other writers on music, or with those who find fault with their writings. I do wish to align myself with Mr. Buchanan as "an earnest music lover," however, and as such to exercise my right to express an opinion.

It seems to me ridiculous to make full surrender to a musical faith which maintains, even by implication, that Arturo Toscanini is the be-all and end-all of conducting; that he is not only the greatest exponent of all the orchestral works of all composers of all time, but that he is the only living man capable of revealing these works in their true glory. I want to go on record as saying that many works, when played under certain other conductors, give me more joy and satisfaction than they do when Toscanini performs them.

There are other conductors of orchestras, in this country and elsewhere, who have legitimate claims to greatness. Even if it is granted that Toscanini is the greatest of them all, it is absurd either to belittle or ignore them and their achievements.

Mr. Toscanini is a great musician and we have cause for gratitude that his genius has been made manifest in our time, but he is a man, not a demi-god. He has his limitations, and to deny them is to place him above the art to which he has dedicated himself so gloriously for so long. He merits better treatment than that from his admirers.

Koussevitzky Forces Start Boston Year

Conductor Marks Beginning of His Fifteenth Season in Hub City by Reproducing First Program — Aaron Copland's El Salon Mexico in Local Premiere

Musical Courier Nov. 1/38

BOSTON.—With the opening concerts of the fifty-eighth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the local musical season may be said to have begun on October 7 and 8. It was the beginning of the fifteenth season of the regime of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky—the longest of any conductor's term in the orchestra's history. And so there was a sentimental note to the occasion, stressed in Dr. Koussevitzky's program, which had been culled from his first two programs in America: Vivaldi's D minor concerto (arranged by Siloti), Berlioz' Roman Carnival Overture, Brahms' Haydn Variations and Beethoven's fifth symphony. The brilliant performances proved that, with the Boston Orchestra, "mid-season" has lost its exclusive meaning.

COPLAND SCORE PLAYED

The second program, given a week later, contained Aaron Copland's rousing El Salon Mexico in first Bostonian performances, the Mozart divertimento in B flat major (K. 287) and the Dvorak New World Symphony. The remarkable playing of the entire first violin section in the divertimento was of a piece with the virtuosity of the orchestra throughout the program. There was also a political overtone: Dr. Koussevitzky had admitted (through this correspondent) that he was playing the Dvorak symphony at this time out of sympathy with the beleaguered Czechs.

DON COSSACKS IN CONCERT

To open the concert-recital series of Sunday afternoons in Symphony Hall came the Don Cossacks and acrobatic Serge Jaroff on October 9. Retailing their vocal splendors in a typical Cossack program, they were greeted by a fairly large audience with tremendous enthusiasm.

LEHMANN AT WELLESLEY

A trip to Wellesley College was more than repaid on October 13, when Lotte Lehmann began the series of concerts in Alumnae Hall before a large and cordially disposed audience. The beauty of voice, warmth and tenderness and infinite compassion and humanity that are all part of the Lehmann complex were seemingly this evening at their best in a program of Lieder by Schubert, Schumann, Brahms and Wolf, with Strauss added at the end for good measure.

M. S.

DURHAM, N. C.
HERALD

NOV 6 - 1938

MANY RECORDINGS ACQUIRED AT DUKE

Highlight Of New Series Is Symphony No. 5 In E Flat Major By Sibelius

Undoubtedly the highlight of the new series of phonograph recordings by Victor which has been added to the Duke record collection, is the Symphony No. 5 in E flat major by Sibelius as transcribed by the Boston symphony orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

These records—10 sides—were made in Symphony hall in Boston where the acoustic properties are excellent. Koussevitzky, who is an ardent Sibelius enthusiast, directs the Boston symphony in a magnificent performance of this work, generally considered one of the master's most popular symphonies. The tone poem, "Pohjola's Daughter" fills out the last three sides of this album.

The sparkling Le Coq d'Or-Suite by Rimsky-Korsakow has been given splendid interpretation by the London symphony orchestra conducted by Eugene Goossens, for the Victor company. The music is drawn from Rimsky's three-act opera, which was given its first performance in the United States a little more than 20 years ago. It was then produced as an opera pantomime. The suite can reasonably be considered ballet music. It is a colorful, melodic work.

Among the Victor red seal records that are listed in the Duke library is Arturo Toscanini's recording of the overture from "The Magic Flute," in which he directs the British Broadcasting symphony orchestra. Another red seal record offers Leopold Stokowski directing the Philadelphia orchestra in the "Invitation to the Waltz," the delightful composition of Von Weber.

Among the vocal numbers is a disc recorded by Marian Anderson. Miss Anderson's rich contralto is admirably suited to the two songs that she sings for this recording: "Komm' Susser Tod," by Bach and Handel's "Siciliana."

Another favorite soloist, John Charles Thomas has divided a disc between "I Heard a Forest Praying" by S. M. Lewis and Peter De Rose, and "Children of Men," by Sydney King Russell.

A number of Christmas songs done by organ and chorus are in the recent Victor release. "It Came Upon the Midnight Clear" and "Joy to the World" are the two favorites included on the record owned by Duke—a record sure to be much enjoyed as the Christmas season approaches.

KANSAS CITY, MO.
JOURNAL POST

NOV 6 - 1938

Record Releases Tend Toward Lighter Music

By Dave Dexter, Jr.

A Tschaikowsky Symphony

Serge Koussevitzky, conducting the Boston symphony orchestra, displays extreme ability and tasteful technique with the group's recorded rendition of Tschaikowsky's "Symphony No 4 in F-Minor," the first of a cycle of such works written by the Russian master during the last century. Elegantly encased in Album M-327, the symphony occupies four red seal 12-inch Victor records and rates as easily among the five best reissues of classics made in the last year by any company. An excellent addition to one's library.

New Music Listing Boon to Reviewers

Macmillan's Encyclopedia Of Music and Musicians Concise, Comprehensive

(Reviewed by A.C.R.)

It has taken a good many hours on the trail to get acquainted with and to fairly estimate the recently issued Macmillan Encyclopedia of Music and Musicians, compiled and edited by Albert E. Wier. It is a single volume of 2,089 pages; very thin paper, allowing easily readable type. A random opening of the mammoth tome ("You Can't Take It with You") hit upon Marc Blitzstein, "The Cradle Will Rock," in Operas by American Composers—a proof that here is the last word in musical happenings.

Then began a hunt for names that might be overlooked, but a generally comprehensive though concise listing of ancient and modern composers and performers was revealed. No more running to the limited biographical section of the dictionary; searching "the graveyard," Victor Record catalogues, Who's Who. Here should be everything needed for the quick consulting after a concert that is the limitation of a reviewer on a morning paper—spelling, data to set one on the right track as to period, experience of artists, straightening out program errors. The first night of possession, the new book was used to settle an argument on the spelling of Spalding, American violinist. (Unfortunately for complete confidence, in an item on New York's Town Hall, the name appears with an incorrect "u", while Spaulding of Harvard in similar cross reference is without the "u" and Bruce Simonds, concert pianist and of the Yale musical faculty, is spelled "Simmons."

The classified sections are good points in the arrangement. One finds Musical Composition Over the Centuries; History of Music, with dates of contributing influences; Radio Concert Broadcasting, in which only the valuable programs are listed; Musical Literature (which among American folk music omits the J. Rosamond Johnson-Lawrence Brown "Book of American Negro Spirituals" with its authoritative introduction by the late James Weldon Johnson; as also the Kentucky ballads edited by Loraine Wyman and Howard Brockway).

It was an excellent idea to list separately for discussion such frequently appearing orchestral numbers as "The Fountains of Rome," "Finlandia," the Chorale (Ninth) Symphony, the "Appassionata" Sonata. Brief opera plots are given in generous impartiality. There are nearly eight pages on Two-piano Playing. Some ballet companies are considered.

Shakespeare's "The Tempest" stands alone for its many lyrics that have been set to music. Under "The Moonlight Sonata" is mention of the currently popular film record of the playing of Paderewski.

Mr. Wier asks his readers' cooperation in eliminating errors from future editions. We would question the omission of the American Opera Company, a lamented, disbanded group of young singers furnished with fresh translations and artistic settings; of the Boston Opera Company, for which Eben Jordan built the Opera House on Huntington Avenue that has been visited by the Metropolitan and Chicago Opera companies, the great ballet troupes, and famous Russian and Shakesperean productions; of Jordan Hall, where world-known concert artists are constantly appearing; of the fact that Arthur Fiedler among his multitudinous offices has been for some time established as the personable, popular and progressive conductor of Boston's long-established "Pop" Concerts, and was the organizer of the Esplanade concerts; above all, that neither under Festival, Berkshire nor Stockbridge can be found any mention of the August Symphonic Festival at Tanglewood now, in its fifth year, possessed of an auditorium of perfect acoustics for the perfections of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

We have vainly tried cross references for any credit to Dr. Archibald Davison, who long ago reorganized the Harvard Glee Club into a body of first rank in choral singing—a national propaganda for good music wherever Harvard alumni may settle. Mrs. Coolidge's frequent gifts of chamber music to Paine Hall, Harvard, and to the Boston Public Library lecture hall programs deserve mention. Mr. Wier, Chelsea born, New England Conservatory of Music and Harvard musically educated, seems modest about giving credit to his own city—perhaps because since 1900 (when all these things have happened) he has been in New York, editing a host of musical selections. He has even missed the wry joy of adding an ex ("H.T.P.") to the few late Henry Taylor

---

CAMDEN, N. J.
POST

NOV 5 - 1938

Ormandy Will Mark Armistice Day With Music of 6 Nations

Vivaldi, Beethoven, Schelling, Jenkins, Stravinsky and Ravel on List

The sixth pair of concerts by the Philadelphia Orchestra on Friday afternoon, Nov. 11, and Saturday evening, Nov. 12, will commemorate the twentieth anniversary of Armistice Day, November 11, 1918, with a special Armistice Day program in which Eugene Ormandy has incorporated the music of six nations.

Italy will be represented with the Vivaldi Concerto, transcribed for large orchestra by Lucien Caillliet; Germany by the Beethoven Concerto No. 1 in C major for piano and orchestra which introduces the brilliant young American pianist Hortense Monath for her first performance with the orchestra; the United States by Ernest Schelling's Fantasy for Orchestra "A Victory Ball"; England by the first performance of an orchestral transcription of a five-part Fantasy in D major for five strings by Jenkins; Russia by the "Pastorale" of Stravinsky, and France by Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite No. 1. In this latter work the orchestra will be assisted by the University of Pennsylvania Choral Society of which Dr. Harl McDonald is the director.

Antonio Vivaldi, described as "the best-known of all red-headed priests who became famous as composers," was an outstanding master of instrumental music in the early 18th century. He was director of music to Duke Philip of Hesse at Mantua, and in 1714 was appointed to the post of violinist at St. Mark's, Venice. He was also director of music at the Ospedale-della Pieta, where he remained until he died.

The work on the program adheres to the type of 18th century concerto grosso in being written for a group of solo instruments known as the "concertino," playing in contrast with the full body of strings. In the A minor concerto the solo group, in the first and third movements consists of two violins; in the central slow movement, a solo violin, solo viola and solo 'cello are set off against the full string choir.

Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 1, played previously with the orchestra by Alfred Cortot and Dalies Frantz, was published in 1801 as No. 1. It was this concerto which in 1887-88 introduced to New York a young pianist of ten named Josef Hofmann.

The composer himself played this concerto at the Vienna Burgtheatre.

The executant, Hortense Monath, studied in New York with Ernest Hutcheson and in Berlin with Arthur Schnabel. Her debut in Hamburg was followed by concerts in Rome, Florence, Bologna, Milan and other European cities. She has been a guest artist with the Vienna and Hamburg Philharmonic Orchestras. In Boston she was solo artist with the Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky.

Ernest Schelling began the composition of his "Victory Ball" in New York in 1922, and completed it in Switzerland the following Summer. It is inscribed "To the Memory of an American Soldier." The poem by Alfred Noyes "A Victory Ball" is the basis of the work which is a free fantasy, with a certain amount of thematic development. Two Army bugle-calls are used; the "Call to Arms" and "Charge" which ominously usher in the war Vision, and "Taps" which closes the piece.

Schelling wrote: "I had come back from Europe still very much under the impression of the cataclysm, much troubled for the future, and was amazed to find that so few seemed to remember what the war really had meant, with its sacrifice of life and youth. I had wondered when watching the seething mass of humanity at some cabaret what our boys would think of it all . . . I had occasion during the war to hear the Scotch Pipers, and to observe the extraordinary effect of their music on the troops; at the end of the work I have tried to make the whole orchestra a huge bag-pipe, perhaps the most pagan and primitive form of music."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

NOV 5 - 1938

Music and Musicians

A Letter to the Music Editor and Some Thoughts on Toscanini Worship.

By WILLIAM G. KING.

"As an obscure but earnest music lover, and as a person peculiarly sympathetic to the music of Tschaikowsky, I daresay I have heard every noteworthy performance of the Pathetic Symphony given in this city from the days of Anton Seidl down to the present time.

"I agree with Henry T. Finck that no one ever played the last movement as did Seidl, and that no one ever played the other three movements as did Safonoff. There are, however, many persons who have played this work satisfactorily; and of course, it must be pointed out that Dr. Koussevitzky, at the present time gives a memorably beautiful performance of this work.

"But for this music-lover nothing has ever been done comparable to Mr. Toscanini's incredible performance. The incredibleness lay, however, on the debit side. Not Gericke, not Gustav Mahler, whose contempt for the work was notorious, and who played it, if rumor is to be credited, only on box-office demand, more completely and ruthlessly destroyed the beauty, pathos and significance of this work than did Toscanini. Mr. Toscanini's mailed fist swept through this score as though he were performing an obnoxious task, with metronomic and unyielding tempi, with complete disregard of the tenderness, grace, dignity and loveliness implicit in the best pages of this score. To any one caring deeply for this work, his performance was calamitous.

"I am aware that it is utterly hopeless to attempt to bring the light of sanity, objectivity and common sense to bear upon the subject of Mr. Toscanini. He seems to have cast a spell over all independent, judicious, technical thinking, to a point where the critical faculties of even intelligent persons no longer function. But I do hope most earnestly that you will allow a person who, in company with many admirable and revered musicians, has held a lifelong affection for Tschaikowsky, to state most emphatically that, critical acclaim to the contrary, Mr. Toscanini's performance of the Pathetic Symphony was far from a true measure of that work's intrinsic beauty and significance."

Charles L. Buchanan.

The above letter, addressed to the Music Editor of The Sun, is printed here not only out of courtesy to Mr. Buchanan, who is unknown to me, but because, as another music-lover, I feel very strongly that "the light of sanity, objectivity and common sense" has indeed, in a number of quarters, been swallowed up in the blaze of adoration for Mr. Toscanini.

And I feel even more strongly that Mr. Toscanini is too inspired a conductor, too great a musician, and too noble a man to deserve being placed, with or without his consent or desire, in the position of a cult-leader.

Let it be made clear that I do not agree with Mr. Buchanan about Mr. Toscanini's performance (one week ago) of the Tschaikowsky Sixth Symphony. In the final analysis, all honest criticism can be no more than the expression of the critic's opinion, formed in the light of his knowledge and experience; and Mr. Buchanan, therefore has as much right to his views as the critics, professional and otherwise, who lavish their adulatory adjectives on Mr. Toscanini every time he conducts an orchestra.

More Important Matters.

There are, however, vastly more important matters than the merits of the performance of a single symphony implicit in Mr. Buchanan's letter, chief among them that Toscanini-worship has reached a point where objective, unbiased judgment of his achievements has all but vanished from the American musical scene.

If that is the case—and some of the purple prose that has been printed and some of the ecstasies that have been broadcast on the subject of Mr. Toscanini's conducting might be taken as indication that it is—a serious injustice is being done to other musicians and to Mr. Toscanini himself. Nor is the general cause of music being advanced.

My duties do not require that I sit in judgment upon performances—in other words, I am not a "music critic." I have no ax to grind, and no quarrel to pick with other writers on music, or with those who find fault with their writings. I do wish to align myself with Mr. Buchanan as "an earnest music lover," however, and as such to exercise my right to express an opinion.

It seems to me ridiculous to make full surrender to a musical faith which maintains, even by implication, that Arturo Toscanini is the be-all and end-all of conducting; that he is not only the greatest exponent of all the orchestral works of all composers of all time, but that he is the only living man capable of revealing these works in their true glory. I want to go on record as saying that many works, when played under certain other conductors, give me more joy and satisfaction than they do when Toscanini performs them.

There are other conductors of orchestras, in this country and elsewhere, who have legitimate claims to greatness. Even if it is granted that Toscanini is the greatest of them all, it is absurd either to belittle or ignore them and their achievements.

Mr. Toscanini is a great musician and we have cause for gratitude that his genius has been made manifest in our time, but he is a man, not a demi-god. He has his limitations, and to deny them is to place him above the art to which he has dedicated himself so gloriously for so long. He merits better treatment than that from his admirers.

DURHAM, N. C.
HERALD

NOV 6 - 1938

MANY RECORDINGS ACQUIRED AT DUKE

Highlight Of New Series Is Symphony No. 5 In E Flat Major By Sibelius

Undoubtedly the highlight of the new series of phonograph recordings by Victor which has been added to the Duke record collection, is the Symphony No. 5 in E flat major by Sibelius as transcribed by the Boston symphony orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

These records—10 sides—were made in Symphony hall in Boston where the acoustic properties are excellent. Koussevitzky, who is an ardent Sibelius enthusiast, directs the Boston symphony in a magnificent performance of this work, generally considered one of the master's most popular symphonies. The tone poem, "Pohjola's Daughter" fills out the last three sides of this album.

The sparkling Le Coq d'Or-Suite by Rimsky-Korsakow has been given splendid interpretation by the London symphony orchestra conducted by Eugene Goossens, for the Victor company. The music is drawn from Rimsky's three-act opera; which was given its first performance in the United States a little more than 20 years ago. It was then produced as an opera pantomime. The suite can reasonably be considered ballet music. It is a colorful, melodic work.

Among the Victor red seal records that are listed in the Duke library is Arturo Toscanini's recording of the overture from "The Magic Flute," in which he directs the British Broadcasting symphony orchestra. Another red seal record offers Leopold Stokowski directing the Philadelphia orchestra in the "Invitation to the Waltz," the delightful composition of Von Weber.

Among the vocal numbers is a disc recorded by Marian Anderson. Miss Anderson's rich contralto is admirably suited to the two songs that she sings for this recording: "Komm' Susser Tod," by Bach and Handel's "Siciliana."

Another favorite soloist, John Charles Thomas has divided a disc between "I Heard a Forest Praying" by S. M. Lewis and Peter De Rose, and "Children of Men," by Sydney King Russell.

A number of Christmas songs done by organ and chorus are in the recent Victor release. "It Came Upon the Midnight Clear" and "Joy to the World" are the two favorites included on the record owned by Duke—a record sure to be much enjoyed as the Christmas season approaches.

Musical Courier Nov. 1/38

Koussevitzky Forces Start Boston Year

Conductor Marks Beginning of His Fifteenth Season in Hub City by Reproducing First Program — Aaron Copland's El Salon Mexico in Local Premiere

BOSTON.—With the opening concerts of the fifty-eighth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the local musical season may be said to have begun on October 7 and 8. It was the beginning of the fifteenth season of the regime of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky—the longest of any conductor's term in the orchestra's history. And so there was a sentimental note to the occasion, stressed in Dr. Koussevitzky's program, which had been culled from his first two programs in America: Vivaldi's D minor concerto (arranged by Siloti), Berlioz' Roman Carnival Overture, Brahms' Haydn Variations and Beethoven's fifth symphony. The brilliant performances proved that, with the Boston Orchestra, "mid-season" has lost its exclusive meaning.

COPLAND SCORE PLAYED

The second program, given a week later, contained Aaron Copland's rousing El Salon Mexico in first Bostonian performances, the Mozart divertimento in B flat major (K. 287) and the Dvorak New World Symphony. The remarkable playing of the entire first violin section in the divertimento was of a piece with the virtuosity of the orchestra throughout the program. There was also a political overtone: Dr. Koussevitzky had admitted (through this correspondent) that he was playing the Dvorak symphony at this time out of sympathy with the beleaguered Czechs.

DON COSSACKS IN CONCERT

To open the concert-recital series of Sunday afternoons in Symphony Hall came the Don Cossacks and acrobatic Serge Jaroff on October 9. Retailing their vocal splendors in a typical Cossack program, they were greeted by a fairly large audience with tremendous enthusiasm.

LEHMANN AT WELLESLEY

A trip to Wellesley College was more than repaid on October 13, when Lotte Lehmann began the series of concerts in Alumnae Hall before a large and cordially disposed audience. The beauty of voice, warmth and tenderness and infinite compassion and humanity that are all part of the Lehmann complex were seemingly this evening at their best in a program of Lieder by Schubert, Schumann, Brahms and Wolf, with Strauss added at the end for good measure.

M. S.

KANSAS CITY, MO.
JOURNAL POST

NOV 6 - 1938

Record Releases Tend Toward Lighter Music

By Dave Dexter, Jr.

A Tschaikowsky Symphony

Serge Koussevitzky, conducting the Boston symphony orchestra, displays extreme ability and tasteful technique with the group's recorded rendition of Tschaikowsky's "Symphony No 4 in F-Minor," the first of a cycle of such works written by the Russian master during the last century. Elegantly encased in Album M-327, the symphony occupies four red seal 12-inch Victor records and rates as easily among the five best reissues of classics made in the last year by any company. An excellent addition to one's library.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 6 - 1938

Duo-Pianists to Give Pawtucket Program

PIERRE LUBOSHUTZ and Genia Nemenoff, duo-pianists, who will open the Pawtucket Civic Music Association's season Thursday evening, in the Pawtucket senior high school, will include on their program a first performance in America of "Valses," by the modernistic Russian composer, Serge Prokofieff.

This work is based on several themes taken from the waltzes of Schubert. Other composers to be represented are Mozart, Bach, Mendelssohn, Saint-Saens and De Falla. Some will be heard in transcriptions made by Mr. Luboshutz.

Both he and Genia Nemenoff—she is Mrs. Luboshutz in private life—have been ensemble players since childhood. Mr. Luboshutz, with his sisters, formed a youthful string quartet which graduated from home performances to the concert platform in their native Russia.

Because of the desire of the sisters to have a pianist in the family Pierre obligingly shifted instruments and by the age of 14 was proficient enough to be chosen by Kreisler as his accompanist in a series of Moscow concerts. After studying in Paris the young pianist returned to Moscow to make his debut as soloist with the Koussevitzky Orchestra.

He first visited the United States 12 years ago and has taught and toured annually since in recitals of his own, with Norena and Piatigorsky and as soloist with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony under Toscanini. The last two seasons he has appeared successfully in recitals with his wife, the professional association growing out of their custom of duetting at home for their own pleasure and that of their friends.

The two met in the Summer of 1929 when he was conducting a master class in Paris and she was one of the pupils. "At the first lesson I gave her," says Luboshutz, "I was impressed by her talent. At the second lesson I was impressed with her personality, and by the third lesson I knew I was in love with her."

Mr. Luboshutz adds further that his wife "is the best cook and the best housekeeper in America." They were married seven years ago in New York, where they make their home three or four months of each year.

Miss Nemenoff likewise comes of a musical family. She was born in Paris of Russian parentage. Her first teacher was her mother. When she was six years old Moskowski heard her play some of his works and arranged for her to be enrolled at the Paris Conservatory, where she studied under Isidor Philipp. She made her recital debut in Paris and not long afterwards played in joint recital with Pablo Casals, the brilliant 'cellist. Abroad she has toured Algeria, Holland, Belgium, Spain and Germany.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

Nov. 6, 1938

Jascha Heifetz Will Be Soloist Tuesday

On Boston Symphony's Second Program of the Season.—Boy Soprano and Vocal Quartet Other Events This Week

WITH Jascha Heifetz, one of the world's greatest violinists as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will return for its second concert of the season Tuesday night in the Metropolitan Theatre. Mr. Heifetz will play concertos by Mozart and the modern Prokofieff. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct. Under the auspices of the Monday Morning Musical Club, a free lecture on the program will be given by John Archer this afternoon at 4 o'clock in the Providence Public Library, illustrated on the piano by Gertrude Joseffy Chase.

Tonight a recital by Ferdinand L'Heureux, boy soprano, is announced for Knights of Columbus Hall on Green street. Thursday night the Brown University department of music will present the Kedroff Vocal Quartet in a program of Russian music in Alumnae Hall. The audience is an invited one but if the capacity of the auditorium allows there will be free tickets for the public. The quartet is also scheduled for a concert at the Wheeler School Wednesday afternoon.

Thursday will be a big night musically in Pawtucket for that evening in the Senior high school the Pawtucket Civic Music Association will start its concert series for the season with Pierre Luboshutz and Genia Nemenoff, popular duo-pianists. Members of Civic Music Associations in other cities are entitled to admission if seats are available. Nearby cities having associations are Newport, Fall River, New Bedford and Attleboro.

Heifetz and Symphony

Serge Prokofieff's Second Concerto for violin and orchestra, which Jascha Heifetz will play with the Boston Symphony Tuesday night in the Metropolitan Theatre, was composed in 1935 and performed for the first time in this country in Boston last season by Heifetz and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's musicians. Its success was so great that it is to be repeated by Heifetz and the orchestra at a Symphony Hall concert this season in addition to the Providence hearing.

Heifetz appears in this modern concerto at the opening of the second half of the program and in the first half will play a contrasting concerto from the 18th century, Mozart's famous D-major, No. 4, Koechel, No. 218. Vivaldi and Tschaikowski are other composers represented on the program which Dr. Koussevitzy will conduct. The order follows:

Concerto in F-minor for Orchestra (Edited by A. Siloti) .... Vivaldi
I. Maestoso
II. Largo
III. Ollegro
Violin Concerto in D-major, No. 4 (Koechel No. 1) .... Mozart
I. Allegro
II. Andante cantabile
III. Rondo: Andante grazioso
Violin Concerto No. 2 in G-minor, opus 63 Prokofieff
I. Allegro
II. Andante assai
III. Allegro ben marcato
Overture—Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet" Tschaikowski

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
RECORD

NOV 6 - 1938

PATRICIA BOWMAN
For the first time . . .

Julius Katchen, 12-year-old pianist from Long Branch, whom Eugene Ormandy "discovered" last year, will give his first New York recital next Sunday. Josef Hofmann will make only one appearance with orchestra in New York this season, when he donates his services as soloist in a special Philharmonic benefit program next month.

Toscanini took the New York Philharmonic to Europe 10 years ago. Now the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Koussevitzky, is planning a European tour next spring. Our turn next?

Lost and Found Dept.: Discovered in Leningrad, an opera by Haydn, called "Unexpected Meeting." Unearthed in London, a Haydn symphony, in D minor. Dug up in Berlin, a violin sonata by Schumann, dated 1853. Add to these findings, the "lost" Schumann concerto; the four Mahler symphonies Mengelberg announced from Amsterdam; a Dvorak opera, "Alfred," discovered by Dvorak's son; a Rumanian piano rhapsody by Liszt, dated 1847; a Haydn woodwind sextet; and a Gluck opera, "La Couronne."

Stell Anderson, New York pianist, will play the new Milhaud piano concerto with the Orchestra Symphonique in Paris in its world premiere next February. And Patricia Bowman, well-known stage dancer, will appear for the first time with a regular ballet company when the Mordkin Ballet opens its season in New York Thursday.

KNOXVILLE, TENN.
NEWS-SENTINEL

NOV 6 - 1938

Young Soprano Will Begin Negro Music Series Dec. 5

Otis Holy, sonprano, will open the Negro Concert Series in Knoxville Monday evening, Dec. 5, John Henderson, who has sponsored the series for four years, announced yesterday.

The young singer was discovered and taught by Oscar Seagle of New York. She won the Rosenwald scholarship which enabled her to study at the Fontainebleau School of Music in France. She is now soloist at the Fort Washington Presbyterian Church in New York.

Hazel Harrison, one of the greatest of the Negro pianists, will give the second concert Feb. 27 at Austin High. She studied for eight years with the German teacher, Busoni, and has been soloist with the Minneapolis, National and Boston Symphony orchestras in America and the Philharmonic Orchestra in Berlin. She has given concerts both in this country and abroad.

Todd Duncan, who sang the leading role in the late George Gershwin's "Porgy and Bess," will give the final concert at Knoxville High School April 5. He is now director of voice at Howard University.

A reserve seat ticket sale will begin Tuesday. Season tickets will be available at Clark and Jones Music Store or through John Henderson, 311 East Clinch Avenue. Single admissions to the first two concerts will be 50 cents each and 75 cents for the Todd Duncan concert. Season tickets will be $1 each.

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

NOV 6 - 1938

NOTES ON RECORDS

BY FREDERICK YEISER.

HARDLY have all the symphonies of Sibelius been put on records but what the Victor Company begins to remake some of them. The Fifth Symphony, together with the tone poem, "Pohjola's Daughter," played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, appear on this month's list of releases. They will undoubtedly relegate to the scrap heap the none too successful recordings of these works by the composer's friend, Robert Kajanus, which made up Volume 1 of the Sibelius Society.

Since Kajanus's death, Koussevitsky has come generally to be accepted as the foremost interpreter of the Finnish master. How he stacks up to Kajanus as a purveyor of the Sibelius tradition—if any such thing exists—would be difficult to determine at the present time. Between their respective recorded performances, however, grounds for comparison rest on more tangible evidence. For one thing, Koussevitsky with the Boston orchestra at his disposal has an enormous advantage. That and improved reproduction produce thrilling results.

Those who are accustomed to regarding the Fifth Symphony as being in four movements may be confused by the labeling of these records, which divides it into three. The accompanying booklet of program notes—an excellent one, by the way—explains this point. Cecil Gray, the Sibelius expert, considers the tempo molto moderato and the allegro moderato, ma poco a poco stretto as one movement, the first. Sibelius, on the other hand, refers in a letter to the fourth movement. But the record people follow the reasoning of Gray, who calls attention to the recurrence of thematic material and to Sibelius's failure to mark the movements on the score. No one should lose any sleep over this matter. It has no effect on the actual performance.

The booklet also throws some light on "Pohjola's Daughter" for the listener who looks for associative themes as he would in the tone poems of Richard Strauss. It goes on to say that no one who reads the story, and a fantastic one it is, will miss the significance of the various musical episodes.

(Five twelve-inch records in Victor Album M-474.)

Rimsky-Korsakov's "Coq d'or," holds the stage today both in its original form as an opera and as a ballet. (The Ballet Russe performed it here last winter). It has also been arranged into a symphonic suite by Glazunov and Steinberg.

It is this suite which appears on the Victor label in its first modern recording by the London Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Eugene Goossens. In four movements, the suite embraces virtually the same material that Tcherepnine uses for the ballet presentation. Musically it represents Rimsky at just about his peak as delineator of character, a creator of lush harmonies and a master of orchestral color.

Mr. Goossens gives a vivid performance. The engineers did not do too well by him in the reproduction of some of the passages, notably those where the percussion instruments come into play. Like all European recordings, this one presents the illusion of having been made in a hall. (Three twelve-inch records in Victor Album M-504).

Victor, quick to capitalize on the success of the "Gaite Parisienne," as done by the Monte Carlo Ballet Russe to the music of Offenbach, and the possible vogue of the can-can resulting therefrom has issued a collection of Jacques's best.

You have heard these tunes all your life played for jugglers, acrobats, and animal acts in circuses and vaudeville houses, but you probably never realized that they came from the pen of the incomparable but gouty Offenbach. The other side of the record contains a half dozen polkas by Johann Strauss. What goes for the can-can goes for these—except about the gout. (Victor No. 36213.)

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

NOV 6 - 1938

Boxholders for Boston Symphony Concerts Listed

Mrs. Henry J. Davenport announces the list of those who have taken boxes for the series of five concerts the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in the Academy of Music this season. Mrs. Davenport is acting chairman of the Brooklyn Committee sponsoring the 53rd season of the Boston Symphony beginning Nov. 18 and Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman. Mrs. Edward C. Blum is chairman of boxes.

Mrs. Thomas E. Murray Jr. will occupy box one for three concerts and Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt will occupy it for the March 31, concert, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne has taken box two for the season and Mrs. Benjamin Prince has taken box three for the season. Box four will be used consecutively by Mrs. William H. Good, Mrs. Robert E. Blum, Mrs. David C. Johnson, Miss Florence L. Logan and Mrs. Edward C. Blum. Miss Jessie Ogg has engaged box five for the Adelphi Alumnae. Mrs. Oliver G. Carter and Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock have engaged box six for the Brooklyn Woman's Club. The Army and Navy will use box eight during the season, alternating with the Navy using it at the opening concert Nov. 18. Miss Mary Eleanor Mills will occupy box ten for the season; and Mrs. James Maclay will use box thirteen.

The concerts will be given on Nov. 18, Jan. 6, Fb. e9, Mar. 10, and Mar. 31. The concerts are presented under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which James G. McDonald is president; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, of which R. Huntington Woodman is president and the Brooklyn Committee.

Chairmen assisting the Brooklyn Committee are Mrs. Blum, in charge of boxes; Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, membership; Mrs. William C. James Jr., Junior League members; and Mrs. Thomas F. Casey who heads a new regional committee.

DAVENPORT, IA.
DEMOCRAT & LEADER

NOV 6 - 1938

IT IS SAID

. . . that Serge Koussevitsky will take the Boston Symphony orchestra for its long contemplated European trip next May. However, nothing definite has been announced by the board of trustees for a very large guarantee is needed to finance the trip. If taken, the tour will cover Great Britain, France and Belgium with concerts in London, Paris and Brussels. This would be the first trip abroad by the Boston orchestra as a unit altho the New York Philharmonic Symphony made a European tour with Toscanini about 10 years ago.

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

56

NOV 6 - 1938

THE WAX LIBRARY:

Koussevitzky Plays Fifth of Sibelius

Superb Recording of Favorite Work Of Finnish Symphonist—Le Tricorne

BY JOHN ROSENFIELD.

SYMPHONY NO. 5 IN E FLAT MAJOR, OPUS 82.—By Jan Sibelius. Performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky. (5 disks, 12-inch.) Victor.

THE WONDERFUL SIBELIUS FIFTH comes this month in a new recording by the Boston Symphony, conducted by the especial confidant of the Finnish composer, Serge Koussevitzky. This is by no means the first album of the Fifth nor even Victor's first, but the union of Sibelius and Koussevitzky, to say nothing of the matchless Boston Symphony, make it outstanding and undoubtedly this is the set to own as the world now pursues Sibelius as the master spirit of the times.

The Sibelius Fifth Symphony in its original form dates from 1915. It was substantially rewritten for a performance in 1916 and drastically revised again during 1918-19. This intensive reworking of the material has made the Fifth as we know it quite another composition. And the harder Sibelius labors, the stronger and mightier his creation. Within recent years the Fifth has displaced the Melancholy Fourth as the pet of regular concertgoers. The composer's own preferential affection for the Fifth is well known.

Only the overcautious would now deny Sibelius a place in the line of Beethoven and Brahms. The Finlander understands his orchestra of today as the two B's knew theirs—and what an infinitely nobler instrument is Sibelius'. He yields nothing to them in afflatus, in musical disembodiment, in personal detachment, in facile invention, in temperamental vigor. And one must go to Beethoven and Brahms for Sibelius' equal in originality—an individuality that has absorbed all in music before, has assimilated it into his blood and marrow and has mastered tradition so completely as to be free of it.

To admire the Fifth Symphony is only to hear it with the ears and not the mind. It is to hear it for the cosmic whirr of the fluttering strings, for the primeval density of full orchestra, for the pounding rhythms that pace either the mastodon's stride or the throb of gigantic machines not yet built.

Playing and reading are superb.

Three-Cornered Hat

EL SOBRERO DE TRES PICOS.—Suite from the ballet by Manuel De Falla. Performed by the Boston Pops Orchestra conducted by Arthur Fiedler. (Two disks—10-inch) Victor.

The Three-Cornered Hat with De Falla's music, Picasso's settings and the dancing of Massine and Toumanova was the unchallenged masterpiece of the De Basil Ballet Russe repertoire. De Basil, as is known, inherited everything and everybody save Karsavina from Diaghilev under whose aegis the ballet was created.

The De Falla music has won attention in the concert halls detached from the ballet. In it is heard the Spaniard's flair for profound realism. His Spain is not the Iberia of street dances and Andalusian moons. De Falla's Spain has a rhythm the snarls, a melodic line that straightens out for dramatic utterance, a harmony fiery with complications and contradictions.

The new recording uses the three favorite excerpts, the neighbors dance, Massine's miller's dance and the grand finale, "a gallimaufry of gambols."

The Boston Pops Orchestra is richer and fuller than the Light Symphony that has recorded the work in London. It cannot be said that Fiedler's kapellmeister direction is superior to that of Sir Malcolm Sargeant of the earlier black seal edition.

Two From Opera

JUSSI BJOERLING.—Tenor singing E Lucevan le Stelle from Puccini's Tosca and Ch'ella Mi Creda Libero Lontano from Puccini's La Fanciulla del West. Orchetra conducted by Nils Grevillius. (One disk—10-inch) Victor.

As the recordmakers stand ready at last to permanize opera with opera house balance of voice and orchestra where are the Carusos to sing it? Victor takes a chance with 27-year-old Jussi Bjoerling, Swedish tenor, who joins the Metropolitan this season after winning his spurs last year in concert and with the Chicago Civic. On a ten-inch disk he sings E Lucevan le Stelle from Puccini's Tosca and the Ch'ella Me Creda Libero Lontano aria from the last act of the same composer's Girl of the Golden West. Mr. Bjoerling's voice is neither honey nor gold but it is susceptible to finesse and contains some thrilling notes. As far as the records are concerned, Mr. Bjoerling sings with tasteful fervor, giving Puccini plenty of "schmaltz" and avoiding opera house excesses.

Come to think of it, this is the first time that we ever heard the muted violins in a recorded accompaniment of E Lucevan le Stelle.

The Girl of the Golden West aria is representative Puccini—good to hear along with Rodolfo's Racconto and Cavaradossi's Recondita Armonia.

Classical Anderson

MARIAN ANDERSON.—Contralto with Kosti Vehanen at the piano. Singing Bach's Komm' Suesser Tod and Handel's Siciliana. (One disk—10-inch) Victor.

The Negro contralto is never greater than in the classics. Bach's Komm' Suesser Tod (Come, Sweet Death) is given with unalloyed purity and a voice drenched with pathos. Equally perfect in style and tone coloring is Handel's Siciliana.

Komm' Suesser Tod is interesting to this neighborhood. Ever memorable is Stokowski's playing of his own transcription on the Philadelphia Symphony visit of 1936. The Dallas Symphony will play it next Thursday in a new orchestra transcription by Jacques Singer, the conductor.

—Associated Press Photo.

CONTEMPORARY MASTER. — Jan Sibelius, whose Fifth Symphony has had a new recording.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 7 - 1938

MUSIC

Jascha Heifetz to Play Here Tomorrow With Boston Symphony

While the ballots are still flying tomorrow night and the hysteria of election time is in full sway, art will venture to lift its innocent head in Metropolitan Theatre. The daring protagonists will be Jascha Heifetz, violinist, and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Heifetz will play two concertos, the Mozart in D major, K. 218, and the one written by Prokofieff in 1935 and first performed in this country last season by Mr. Heifetz and the Bostonians.

The program will begin with a concerto grosso in D minor by Antonio Vivaldi, who lived from 1680 to 1743. He was a priest and a violinist. The influence of his writings on Bach and later writers was considerable. The concerto grosso is for string orchestra, with a solo group of two violins and 'cello. The movements are an allegro, an intermezzo and another allegro.

The Mozart concerto is one of several he wrote, perhaps the most popular of them. In form and content it is Mozart at his best, and it contains many opportunities for the soloist to demonstrate his technical command of the instrument. The Prokofieff concerto was so popular last season that it is being repeated on the Boston programs this season. Incidentally, Dr. Koussevitzky generally includes a Mozart piece on a program with Prokofieff, who, particularly in his Classical symphony, often harks back to the older thought and manner.

The overture-fantasia "Romeo and Juliet," by Tchaikovsky, will end the program. It was written before the composer was 30, and is characteristic of the moody and romantic Russian. It contains a musical love-scene that is exceptionally beautiful, and tells, in its own way, the tragic story that Shakespeare told in his.

In a letter to Nadeja von Meck from Vienna, explaining that he had not gone to a concert because he did not want to meet and be patronized by the "big guns" of music, Tchaikovsky mentioned that "last year they placed my overture to 'Romeo and Juliet' on their program without being asked which was unanimously hissed anyway." But nowadays it is more appreciated.

G. Y. L.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
ENQUIRER

NOV 6 - 1938

Orchestra Has Piano Soloist

Hortense Monath On Armistice List

PROGRAM

Eugene Ormandy, Conducting
Hortense Monath, Piano Soloist
Vivaldi-Cailliet — Concerto in A Minor
Beethoven ——— Concerto No. 1 in C
Hortense Monath, Pianist
Schelling — Fantasy, "A Victory Ball"
Jenkins-Cailliet Five-Part Fantasy No. 1 in D, for Five Strings
Stravinsky ——— Pastorale
Ravel "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite No. 1

The concerts by the Philadelphia Orchestra on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will commemorate the 20th anniversary of Armistice Day, Nov. 11, 1918, with a special Armistice Day program in which Eugene Ormandy has incorporated the music of six nations.

Italy will be represented with the Vivaldi Concerto in A minor, transcribed for large orchestra by Lucien Cailliet; Germany by the Beethoven Piano Concerto No. 1 in C, which introduces the young American pianist, Hortense Monath, for her first performance with the orchestra; the United States by Ernest Schelling's Fantasy, "A Victory Ball"; England by the first performance of an orchestral transcription of a five-part Fantasy in D for five strings, by John Jenkins; Russia by the "Pastorale" of Stravinsky, and France by Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite No. 1. In this latter work the orchestra will be assisted by the University of Pennsylvania Choral Society, of which Dr. Harl McDonald is the director.

IN ORCHESTRA DEBUT

The Vivaldi work adheres to the type of 18th-Century concerto grosso in being written for a group of solo instruments known as the "concertino," playing in contrast with the full body of strings. In the A Minor concerto the solo group in the first and third movements consists of two violins; in the central slow movement a solo violin, viola and 'cello are set off against the full string choir.

The Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 1 has been played previously with the orchestra by Alfred Cortot and Dalies Frantz. It was this concerto which in 1887-88 introduced to New York a pianist of 10 named Joseph Hofmann.

The soloist, Hortense Monath, studied in New York with Ernest Hutcheson and in Berlin with Artur Schnabel. Her debut in Hamburg was followed by concerts in many European cities. She has been a guest artist with the Vienna, Hamburg and Boston orchestras. She was soloist at the Academy last April 14 in Beethoven's Fourth Concerto, in a concert for the benefit of Loyalist Spain.

JENKINS BORN IN 1592

Ernest Schelling's "Victory Ball," inscribed "To the memory of an American soldier," is based on the poem by Alfred Noyes. Two Army bugle-calls are used: the "Call to Arms" and "Charge" which ominously usher in the War Vision, and "Taps" which closes the piece.

John Jenkins, born in 1592, was one of the best-known instrumental composers in the England of his time. He was a voluminous composer of what were called in his time "Fancies)) (Fantasies), actually free forms of composition for various instruments and combinations; they were frequently of great length and elaboration, and enjoyed vast popularity in their time.

The Five-Part Fantasy in D, originally for strings, is a typical example of Jenkins' skill and imagination. It has been transcribed by Lucien Cailliet for strings, wood, brass and timpani.

CHORUS IN "DAPHNIS"

From his ballet "Daphnis and Chloe," which he described as "a choreographic symphony" in three parts, and composed in 1910 to a scenario by Fokine, Maurice Ravel later extracted two concert suites. The first comprises "Nocturne," "Interlude" and "Danse Guerriere."

In the original score Ravel's ballet contained parts for mixed chorus, singing without words. In the First Suite the voices are heard behind the scenes in the section entitled "Interlude." Through the darkness and silence they are heard remotely. Trumpets sound in the distance . . the voices come nearer. Wind instruments and 'cellos are gradually introduced and the curtain rises on the scene of the Pirates' Camp.

The original form of the score, with chorus, was used at the Paris premiere of the ballet in 1912, as in the present concert performances. The University of Pennsylvania Choral Society will supply the vocal score.

YOUNGSTOWN, O.
VINDICATOR

NOV 6 - 1938

Woman Pianist Comes To Symphony Thursday

Amparo Iturbi to Be Guest—Sibelius Symphonies in New Record Series

By L. R. Boals

The Fifth Symphony of Sibelius is certainly the most popular of his works in this form, and very possibly the greatest. As played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, in the Victor "Masterpiece" set, M-474, released this month, it is to be heard under the most favorable circumstances. Performed by one of the greatest orchestras and conductors with the finest acoustical conditions, and beautifully recorded, this set will be a valuable addition to any library of records.

The set comprises five disks, seven sides being taken up with the recording of the symphony, and the remaining three with Sibelius' Symphonic Fantasia, "Pohjola's Daughter."

The symphony, in its original form, was written during the World War, mostly in 1915. It was given its first performance at Helsingsfors in the composer's 50th birthday, Dec. 8, 1915, under the direction of Robert Kajanus.

The English critic, Cecil Gray, author of one of the most vital volumes on the subject of music history and whose admiration for Sibelius is idolatrous, regards the "tempo molto moderato" and the "allegro moderato, ma poco a poco stretto," as one movement (the first); and he justifies this by two pertinent facts — the recurrance of thematic material, and the fact that in the score Sibelius did not number the movements.

The second section of the first movement is regarded by many as a scherzo, though there is no break between the two sections. In this first movement Sibelius does not follow the traditions of the sonata allegro. At the expected point there is no bona fide second theme introduced. But Sibelius' tendency here as elsewhere in his symphonic works is typically modern in its effort for freedom. A work of this nature may be symphonic event though it forsakes the formal structural features of the sonata; "the result being in his hands an abstract symphonic fabric—always suffused with significant emotional content—always intensely human and often impressively dramatic."

Between the composing of his fourth and his fifth symphonies, Sibelius wrote considerable "program" music, but now he wished to write purely symphonic music, "in contrast to the depicting," as he said.

Pohjola's Daughter

In Sibelius' early and middle period, he was more interested in "program" music. In almost every case the poetry, which inspired the work, was some episode from the "Kalevala," the great mythological folk epic of Finland. "Pohjola's Daughter," or the "Daughter of the North," was composed in 1906, dating approximately from the time of the composer's Second Symphony.

The episode to which this work pertains concerns two characters: one, Vainamoinen, a hero of the epic, usually represented as a vigorous old man; the other is the daughter of Pohjola (pronounced Poh-yola).

He discovers her sitting on a rainbow weaving tapestry and urges her to return to his country with him. To try him, she sets him impossible tasks all of which he accomplishes but one, and goes sadly away.

Gray says of the music: "The chief interest of the work is coloristic. From the dark, sombre harmonies of the opening to the brilliant, glittering texture of the 'rainbow' music, the whole gamut of the tonal spectrum is traversed from end to end."

While Sibelius' scores call for no supernumerary instruments, yet all critics seem to agree that "without being a gadgeteer Sibelius is a great master of orchestral color."

B. Trans. MUSIC Nov. 7/38

Week-End Concerts

Heifetz Plays in Symphony Hall; Krenek's Piano Concerto Again

By MOSES SMITH

The weather was not propitious yesterday afternoon for those who make music by drawing a bow across strings. Within Symphony Hall, almost as much as without, the atmosphere was stuffy and heavy and moist while Jascha Heifetz presented a program of violin music. Perhaps that was why Heifitz played not like a god but like a mortal who must measure the position and movement of his bow and the distances between fingers on the strings, and who may sometimes err in his judgment. Perhaps, too, he was a little disheartened at the sight of huge blocks of empty chairs, a condition that certainly disheartened some of us in the audience. The turnout for the first living master of the violin was not a confirmation of the supposed culture of the Athens of America.

Heifetz not at his best—only ninety-nine and forty-four hundredths per cent pure—provided something of a shock to those who have come to expect from him nothing less than perfection. A slightly confused entrance during the course of the Brahms D minor Sonata would have been part of the day's work in the case of any other violinist. In the case of Heifetz it was almost incredible. A harmonic that did not quite come off, the bare suggestion of an occasional scratch from the bow—one is not prepared for such things. One's entire set of values, for Heifetz, is absolute: sheer perfection, nothing else.

Obviously the sensible thing was to do as the overwhelming majority of the frantically applausive audience did: accept Heifetz for the day merely as a mortal and settle down to beautiful violin playing of a kind which would honor any other violinist. The familiar Heifetz virtues were in evidence, even if the listener's rapture was modified as indicated. The violinist's transcription of a Bach prelude was delivered with marvellous precision and poise and without loss of musicality. The presentation of the Paganini Concerto in D major remained almost a miracle of virtuosity. And in the playing of the second half of the program, containing a group of American pieces and two numbers by Tchaikovsky, the violinist was once again his usual self, unerring in precision and beauty of tone. He was also more persuasive and ingratiating than within previous memory.

It was a pity that the American group did not include at least some matter of a more robust sort. A little sentimentalism, added to bare virtuosity, goes a long way; and half a dozen pieces of the sort are a very long way, indeed. The violinist's announced decision to play American music may be applauded. But is it possible that he could not have found at least a single more robust item by a Gruenberg or a Copland, a Roger Sessions or a Roy Harris?

The violinist had the assistance of the admirable Emanuel Bay, who not only provided efficient accompaniments but also combined with Heifetz in an exciting performance of the Sonata.

Second Thoughts

The performance of the Piano Concerto of Ernst Krenek at the Saturday evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Richard Burgin conducting and the composer as soloist, was even more engrossing than had been that of the preceding afternoon. The audience, too, was on the whole more intent, and applauded more voluminously and at greater length, bringing the composer-pianist back four times.

It remains for the present writer to add that for him the Concerto grew rather than receded in stature on second hearing. The third movement, which was described here on Saturday as the most difficult for the listener, began to emerge in a little clearer shape. In fact there were moments when it seemed that this movement contained the profoundest thoughts of the entire Concerto.

Junior Concerts On the Way Again

The first of the current Saturday Morning Concerts for Juniors was held the other morning in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, with Russell Ames Cook, as in previous years, conducting thirty members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra ("the Symphonic Ensemble of Boston"). This first program presented a varied menu consisting of the Overture to the opera-ballet, "Anacreon," of Cherubini, the Allegretto from the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven, "In the Village" from the "Caucasian Sketches" of Ippolitov-Ivanov, "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," and the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

In the problem of program-making for a young people's concert, as indeed for all concerts, it is all too easy to advance critical suggestions. Together with choosing selections varied and musically worth-while, there exists the necessity for brevity, and, even more ticklish, for music tolerably congenial to young listeners. Considered in the large over the course of the past few years, Mr. Cook and his group have handled the problems with discretion. The only real lack in their program, of good contemporary music for children, has unquestionably been due to circumstances beyond their control.

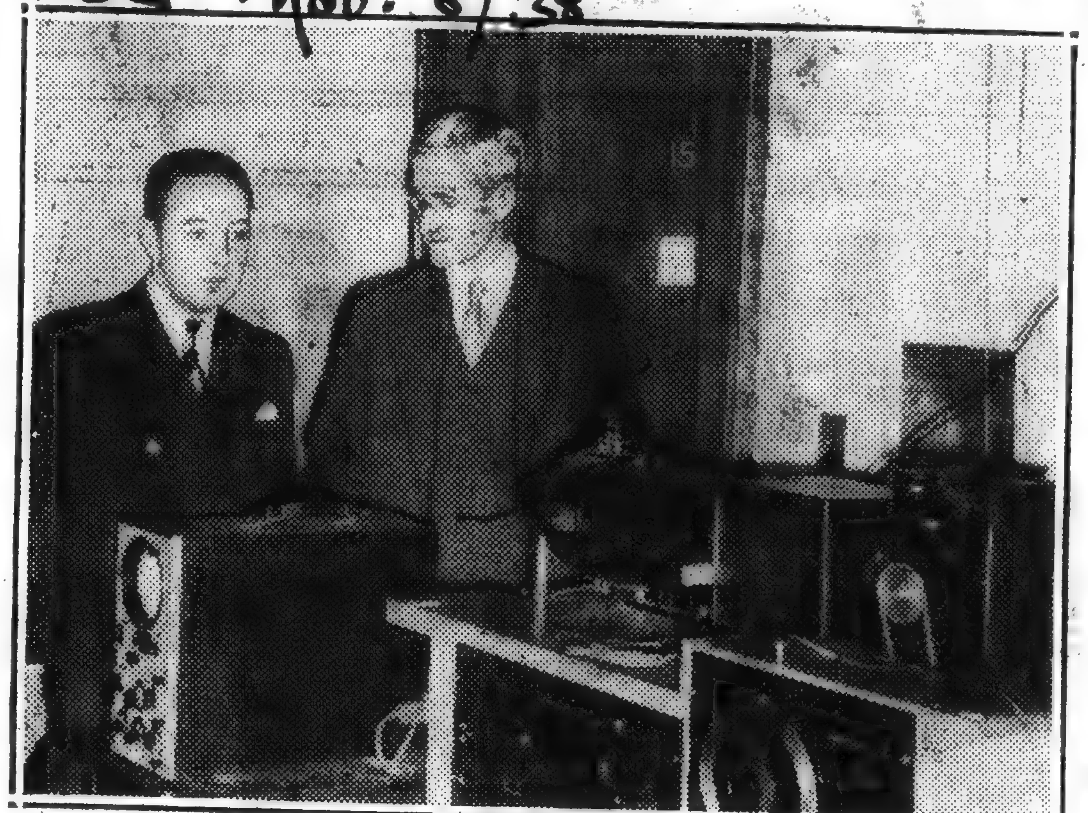
The seeming preponderance of Wagner in the program of the other day was partly owing to the repetition of the "Siegfried" selection from last year, when it was voted most popular in a ballot taken at one of the concerts. The fondness of children for Wagner, not so strange a phenomenon as it might seem at first, was proved again by the enthusiasm manifest on this occasion. Also popular was the Ippolitov-Ivanov piece, over which this reviewer clearly remembers swooning with delight at the age of eleven. A happy innovation was the singing of the march, "Men of Harlech," by the audience, accompanied by the orchestra, in lieu of an intermission.

As in previous year, Mr. Cook made a few remarks anent each selection before it was played. The other day it seemed that they should either be amplified somewhat or omitted entirely, since it is so difficult to speak to a group of such varied ages. Perhaps the music should be allowed to speak for itself. The performance, of course, was more than acceptable—it would be impossible for the group to play badly—even if, especially in the case of the Beethoven Allegretto, it was anything but inspired. The audience seemed to be enjoying itself thoroughly in addition to being trained in concert-hall deportment.

J. F.

Famed Violinist Gives "Concert" for Science

B. Post - Nov. 8/38



INSPECTS SOUND CAMERA

Jascha Heifetz, left, noted violinist, as he examined machine that recorded his violin notes in a test conducted at Harvard yesterday by Professor Frederick A. Saunders, right.

Jascha Heifetz, world famous concert violinist, cancelled an important rehearsal yesterday in the interests of scientific research.

Scheduled to rehearse for a Symphony Hall programme at 3:30 p. m., Heifetz abruptly changed his plans and spent the afternoon playing 64 single notes for five seconds at a time before a one-man audience of Professor Frederick A. Saunders, Harvard University physicist, who is attempting to find a formula that will enable the manufacture of fine tonal violins for the price of a $5 "fiddle."

Accompanied only by Professor Saunders, the noted violinist nonchalantly entered the Harvard physics laboratories early yesterday afternoon, carrying $150,000 worth of violins in a leather case under his arm.

BRONX, N. Y.
HOME NEWS

NOV 7 - 1938

Bishop Manning to Install Rev. C. F. Kellogg, Rector of Mediator Church, on Wednesday

Bishop William T. Manning, on Wednesday night, will install Rev. Charles Flint Kellogg as rector of the P. E. Church of the Mediator, Kingsbridge Ave. and 231st St. The program will include a procession in which visiting clergymen will participate. A reception will follow.

On Tuesday night, Nov. 15, under the auspices of the combined guilds of the church, the Hall of Fame Singers of New York University will give a concert of sacred and secular music in the downstairs Sunday school room of the church. Prof. Alfred M. Greenfield is director of the singers. Funds raised will aid the church.

It will be the first time that a glee club has appeared there.

Helped Win Cup

The singers include some men from the New York University undergraduate and faculty glee clubs, but consists mostly of former N. Y. U. glee club members, a number of whom helped win the National Intercollegiate Glee Club championship cup at Carnegie Hall, in 1931. The following year they took part in the St. Louis contest.

They have appeared in major concert halls and theatres, on coast-to-coast networks, in motion pictures, and with such organizations as the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the New York Oratorio Society.

Prof. Greenfield, the director, is chairman of the department of music at the University Heights College of N. Y. U.

One of the charter members of the troupe has attended Mediator Church for more than 20 years, since he began kindergarten at the age of 5, and has been singing in the choir during most of that period. Another member belonged to the church and sang in its choir for a number of years.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING JOURNAL

NOV 9 - 1938

A Library in Miniature

Boston Symphony Orchestra ope[illegible]—News Item.

Questions.

1. What were the earliest forerunners of the Boston Slmphony Orchestra?
2. Were there any others?

Answers.

1. The musical organization known as the Philharmonic Society which gave concerts from 1812 to 1824, and the Handel and Haydn Society, which, between the years 1815 and 1841, gave 600 performances—continuing after that date with a proportionately large number of performances.

2. Yes. The Germania Orchestra, which gave the first performance of Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony" ever played in Boston. Carl Zerrahn, a member of the orchestra, began the concerts of a philharmonic society in 1857.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

57

NOV 8 - 1938

Boston Symphony Concert Dates Are Announced; Boxholders Listed for Fifty-third Season

Boxholders for the series of five concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Brooklyn Academy of Misic this season have been announced by Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, acting chairman of the Brooklyn committee sponsoring the fifty-third borough season of the orchestra. The first of the concerts will be given on Friday evening, Nov. 19.

Mrs. Thomas E. Murray, Jr., has taken Box 1 for three concerts and Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt will occupy the box for the concert on March 31. Mrs. Dean C. Osborne has taken Box 2 for the season. Mrs. Benjamin Prince is the holder of Box 3.

Box 4 will be used consecutively by Mrs. William H. Good, Mrs. Robert E. Blum, Mrs. David C. Johnson, Miss Florence L. Logan and Mrs. Edward C. Blum. Miss Jessie Ogg has engaged Box 5 for the Adelphi Alumnae.

Mrs. Oliver Goldsmith Carter and Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock have taken Box 6 for the Brooklyn Woman's Club. The Army and Navy will use Box 8 alternately during the season, with the Navy using it at the opening concert.

Miss Mary Eleanor Mills will occupy Box 10 for the season. Miss Frances C. Hays and Mrs. James Maclay will use Box 13.

Following the first concert of the series, the orchestra will be heard here on Jan. 6, Feb. 9, March 10 and March 31.

The concerts are presented under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences of which James G. McDonald is president; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, of which R. Huntington Woodman is chairman, and the Brooklyn Committee, of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman.

Mrs. Edward C. Blum is chairman of boxes. The membership committee is headed by Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow and Mrs. William G. James, Jr., is chairman of a Junior League committee. A group formed to foster borough-wide interest in the concerts is headed by Mrs. Thomas F. Casey.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

NOV 8 - 19

Adelphi Alumnae Group Plans Future Events

The board of directors of the Associate Alumnae of Adelphi Academy held a meeting yesterday afternoon in the graduate room of the academy. Plans for the meeting of the alumnae on Friday afternoon, Nov. 18, at the academy, were discussed. The meeting will be in the form of a cruise to England by way of the Bahamas, Virgin Island. The trustees of the faculty of Adelphi will be guests of honor and Alexander McCullock will be lecturer. That evening the alumnae box at the Boston Symphony concert at the Academy of Music will be occupied by Miss Emma Jessie Ogg, president of the alumnae, and Mrs. Ray Hart and their guests. A carnival is planned for Dec. 2 at the academy for the benefit of the Jackson Street Settlement.

Among those present yesterday were Miss Ogg, Miss S. Augusta Uhlich, Mrs. William C. Bowden Jr., Mrs. J. Valentine MacDonough, Mrs. Max E. May, Mrs. Benjamin Cooke, Mrs. Russell Rome, Miss Katharine Freeman, Mrs. Donald Ross, Mrs. Frederic Gurney, Mrs. Kenneth Hillyer, Mrs. Alexander Macrae, Mrs. Stanley D. Pemberton and Mrs. Verdi E. B. Fuller.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

NOV 9 1938

58

Meet the Maestros: III: Koussevitzky The Bull Fiddler

The Volga Showboat Man Jettisons His Big Bass Viol and Ties Up in Boston, Evidently for Good

By MICHEL MOK

In the official biographies of Serge Alexandrovitch Koussevitzky you will find that the boss of the Boston Symphony learned the art and mystery of conducting at the Royal Hochschule in Berlin under the great Artur Nikisch, but in this town there lives and breathes another well-known Russian pianist who tells a different story.

Long ago, says this key-tickler, when he was a youth, he was hired by Koussevitzky, then also a young fellow, to play the piano scores of the entire standard symphony repertoire.

He pounded away by the hour, the day and the week, while Koussevitzky conducted, watching himself in a set of three tall mirrors in a corner of the drawing room of his Moscow home. The job lasted just about a year, and our pianist had never looked at a conductor since.

There's also an anecdote to the effect that, much earlier, when Serge was still a little boy in his small native town in the province of Tver, in northern Russia, he would arrange the parlor chairs in rows and, with some score open in front of him, conduct them. Once in a while he'd stop short and berate the chairs. Then little Serge's language was something awful.

He Does Seem Rehearsed

Whether these stories are true or not, the fact remains that Mr. Koussevitzky became a conductor and a great one—one of the greatest. The yarn of the mirrors is the most credible of the lot, for the Russian batonist's platform appearance is so meticulous and his movements are so obviously studied to produce the desired effects that he seems to conduct before an imaginary pier glass.

For elegant tailoring he has no peer among orchestral chiefs, except, perhaps, Mr. Stokowski. It's a toss-up between the two. Both are as sleek as chromium statues. Mr. Stokowski, slim, lithe, romantic in a virile way, looks as a poet should look, but never does. Mr. Koussevitzky, broad-shouldered, narrow-waisted, extremely military and virile in a dramatic way, looks as a captain of dragoons in civvies should have looked but never did.

Mr. Koussevitzky's conductorial gestures are literally high, wide and handsome. His wing-spread, so to speak, is much larger than that of either Mr. Stokowski or Mr. Toscanini, and he has a greater repertoire of unpredictable motions than both of them put together. Time cannot wither, nor custom stale, the infinite variety of his shadow boxing.

He Played the Big Fiddle

Those who know his history look upon Mr. Koussevitzky's joyous, unrestrained gymnastics with tolerant eyes. They realize that, for years, he was forced to hide his fine figure and athletic prowess from thousands of potential admirers.

For Mr. Koussevitzky, before he became a conductor, was a world-famous performer on the double bass, that big growling brute of an instrument popularly known as the bull fiddle. In those days all that was visible of his impressive person was his head, one of his shoulders and his arms.

He didn't want to be a bull fiddler any more than you or you or you, and it's greatly to his credit and indicative of his iron will, consuming ambition and extraordinary musicianship that he developed, according to authoritative opinion, into the best bull fiddler of his time.

Here's what happened:

Serge was the son of a violinist who scratched away for a meager living in a third-rate theatre orchestra. The boy, intensely musical, wished to be a fiddler like his father. When he was fourteen, his family gave him their blessing, which was all they had to give, and sent him to Moscow to try for a scholarship at the Philharmonic School.

He arrived with three rubles in his pocket. At the school he was told that the only available scholarship was one in bull fiddling. Serge tried for it and won. He was, so far as is known, the first musician to make the barking monster into a solo instrument.

An overburdened troubadour, he dragged the cumbersome thing all over Russia and played it in recitals with amazing success. In 1903, when Mr. Koussevitzky was twenty-nine (he's sixty-four now but looks a mettlesome fifty), the Czar decorated him—the only instance in history of a decoration bestowed for bull fiddling.

His Wedding Present

That same year, while giving a concert in Moscow, the virtuoso happened to look into the audience and his eyes met those of a stunning brunette in the front row. The owner of the lovely eyes, Natalya Konstantinova Ushkova, became his wife two years later.

Natalya, the daughter of a wealthy merchant and a rich girl in her own right, promised him anything he wanted for a wedding gift. "Give me a symphony orchestra," was Koussevitzky's startling request. The bride was taken aback, for it was with the bull fiddle that he had wooed and won her and she hated to see him give it up, but she kept her word.

Now here is where our old pianist comes in. It was at that time, he says, that Mr. Koussevitzky sent for him and began an intensive course of study before the triple mirror.

A year or so later Natalya hired eighty-five of the best musicians in Moscow. After a season of rehearsals Mr. Koussevitzky took his band on tour aboard a steamer—a little gift from his father-in-law.

They rode up and down the Volga. Every evening the vessel—a sort of musical showboat—tied up at a different city, town or village and the orchestra gave a concert, often before peasants and small-town folk who had never heard symphony music before. In seven years Mr. Koussevitzky and his men traveled some 3,000 miles.

Came the revolution. Kerensky ordered Koussevitzky and his men: "Keep up with your music." They did, but it wasn't easy. It was a terribly severe winter; the country was in the killing grip of cold and famine.

Artists in Mittens

Koussevitzky and his players starved for weeks on end. The boss conducted in mittens. The men wore mittens, too, but they had holes in them so they could finger the strings and keys of their instruments.

The Bolsheviks made Mr. Koussevitzky director of the state orchestras which, in those early Soviet days, were at low musical ebb. He labored in that job for three years, from 1917 to 1920, but he was out of sympathy with the Lenin-Trotzky regime and asked permission to leave the country. It was refused because, officials said, "Russia needs your music."

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY . . . "AT REHEARSALS HE GIVES HIMSELF NO AIRS . . ."

The fiery Koussevitzky told the Government that, unless he were allowed to travel abroad, he'd never play or conduct another note in Russia. They let him go.

It Cost Him a Million

Mr. Koussevitzky says that the Bolsheviks robbed him of about a million in money, land and other property. In illustration of the state of things that impelled him to leave his native land, he likes to tell this story:

A minor Bolshevik official came in one day to check up on the affairs of the orchestra. "Who are those people?" he asked, pointing to a group of players at the conductor's left. "Those," said Koussevitzky, "are the first violins."

"And those over there?" asked the inspector, indicating a group at the conductor's right. "The second violins," was the reply.

"What!" yelled the official. "Second violins in a Soviet state orchestra? Clear them out!"

It's Better in Paris

Mr. Koussevitzky went to Paris, where he conducted a series of orchestral concerts and performances of Moussorgsky's "Boris Godounoff" and Tschaikowsky's "Pique Dame" at the Opera. Between 1921 and 1924 he also appeared in Barcelona, Rome and Berlin. In Paris he established a music publishing house (still in existence), which issued the works of such modern Russian composers as Stravinsky, Scriabine, Medtner, Prokofieff and Rachmaninoff.

In 1924, the offer of a $50,000 salary and the opportunity of rebuilding the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which had sadly deteriorated since the days of Dr. Karl Muck, lured him to this country.

American customs, he now admits, at first appalled him. He was amazed to find musicians smoking in intermissions at rehearsals and concerts. This he called "an insult to art." He forbade smoking. The players raised an unholy rumpus but Koussevitzky persisted. The men haven't taken a puff in Symphony Hall since that time.

A Young Man's World

The next unpopular move he made was to fire a number of the old standbys who had sat in the orchestra for most of its forty-four-year history. "I vant yongk blott!" he cried in his then still very thick accent. "If dose old chentlemen vant to sleep, let dem sleep in deir houses!"

The Boston music lovers didn't like it. To them the Symphony is a sacred cow and they regarded the older members in the light of special pets. But when, at the opening of the new season, they heard a brilliant, completely rejuvenated orchestra, they forgave the new conductor. Since then, he has restored the Symphony to its old-time glory. Today Beacon Hill has no greater favorite than Serge Alexandrovitch Koussevitzky.

The orchestra men, too, learned to like him. They discovered that, with all his public histrionics, he was on the level as a musician. He is a merciless task master, but in rehearsals he gives himself no airs. Dressed in an old pair of pants and a disreputable brown woolen sweater, which he has worn in private since the day he landed in Boston, he works like a stevedore. When he, the pants and the sweater had been with the Symphony ten years, the men gave him a testimonial dinner.

Volcano—Under Control

Next to Mr. Toscanini he's the world's most temperamental conductor, but he has the ability to keep himself in check—when he wants to. "Koussevitzky," says Ernest Newman, the eminent English music critic, "has a volcanic temperament, yet never have I known it to run away with him. It is precisely when his temperament is at the boiling point that his hand on the regulator is steadiest."

At a concert in Carnegie Hall four years ago he gave a dramatic demonstration of self-control. He was conducting Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," when smoke from an incinerator fire in a neighboring building penetrated the hall. The smoke grew dense. People rose, rushed for the exits in near-panic. Women screamed.

He stopped the orchestra, turned to the audience, held up his hand and shouted:

"Come back! Sit down! Sit down—all of you! Everything is all right!"

The customers meekly resumed their seats. Mr. Koussevitzky swung 'round and continued playing Debussy's brooding, sensuous dream-piece as if nothing had happened.

No Labels!

Because he has done so much, both as conductor and publisher, for living composers (he is the high priest of the Sibelius cult), he has been called a modernist. The label infuriates him.

"Nonsense!" he snarls. "I'm not a modernist and I'm not a classicist. I'm a musician! The first movement of the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven is the greatest music ever written and Georege Gershwin's 'Rhapsody in Blue' is a masterpiece.

"There you are! Make the best of it!"

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

NOV 13 1938

GOOSSENS GUEST CONDUCTOR

The Boston Symphony orchestra, being occupied with its first New York tour of the season during the coming week, will give the next pair of concerts in Symphony hall a week from Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, November 25 and 26. There will likewise be a concert in Sanders theatre, Cambridge, on Thursday evening, November 24. The distinguished guest conductor for these three concerts will be the English musician, Eugene Goossens. Mr. Goossens conducted this orchestra as guest in 1926 and again in 1930. He has been the regular conductor of the orchestra in Cincinnati for a number of seasons. The programme for each of the three concerts which he will conduct here will be as follows: Handel's Overture to the "Occasional Oratorio"; an arrangement for orchestra of Schumann's "Carnival," by Rimsky-Korsakov, Liadov, Glazounov, and Tcherepnin; the Conductor's Two Nature Poems, "Pastoral" and "Bacchanal"; and Tchaikovsky's Symphony on Byron's "Manfred."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
Brooklyn

NOV 13 1938

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS HERE FRIDAY

Dr. Koussevitzky to Conduct at Concert in Academy

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will open its Brooklyn season Friday night in the Brooklyn Academy of Music, it was announced yesterday.

The concert will mark the fifteenth year Dr. Koussevitzky has conducted this series. The program will be Beethoven's Symphony No. 2 in D major, Aaron Copland's "El Salon Mexico" and Dvorak's Symphony No. 5 in E minor.

The series is under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Committee.

Nelson Sprackling and Winslow Cheney will give the first of their "preparatory hearings" of the Brooklyn programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday at 11 A. M. at the Neighborhood Club, 104 Clark Street, Brooklyn. Mr. Sprackling will explain the forthcoming program and he and Mr. Cheney will illustrate it at the piano.

sevitzky

Fiddler

BOSTON SYMPHONY PRESENTS HEIFETZ

Violin Master Is Soloist for Second Concert of Season at Metropolitan Theatre.

Prov. Journal

PLAYS MOZART CONCERTO

Nov. 9 1938

Guest and Orchestra Heard at Best in Vivaldi Work Demonstrating His Splendid Technique

The Boston Symphony Orchestra with Richard Burgin conducting, and Jascha Heifetz as soloist, offered the second concert of the current season at the Metropolitan Theatre last evening, with the following program:

Concerto in D minor for orchestra
(edited by A. Siloti) ....Vivaldi
I. Maestoso
II. Largo
III. Allegro
Violin Concerto in D major, No. 4
(Koechel No. 218) .... Mozart
I. Allegro
II. Andante cantabile
III. Rondo: Andante grazioso
INTERMISSION
Violin Concerto No. 2 in G minor,
Op. 63 ....Prokofieff
I. Allegro moderato
II. Andante assai
III. Allegro ben marcato
"Romeo and Juliet," Overture-
Fantasia ....Tchaikovsky

For those who love the olden form in music, with its matter-of-fact progressions and meticulous little phrases all arranged exactly so-and-so, there was the Vivaldi orchestral "Concerto," and the Mozart violin "Concerto" (in D major). Those who thrill at expectant moods or revel in the intricacy of modern orchestration were regaled with the comparatively new Prokofieff "Concerto" which received its American premiere last season.

The formality of the Vivaldi "Concerto" was adequately portrayed under Mr. Burgin's baton, and the contrapuntal interweavings of the Maestoso were given with a definiteness that quickly established the conductor's ability: and he led his men through the "Largo" and "Allegro" in a manner which placed the listeners in a peculiarly receptive mood for the enjoyment of the Mozart "Concerto" which followed. Here, the orchestra provided a carefully tempered setting for Mr. Heifetz, and 'ere the "Andante Cantabile" was begun, orchestra and soloist combined in giving as gracious a performance as one might expect.

Mr. Heifetz's tone became almost vocal in the "Andante", and his bowings are subtly tinged with inflective delicacy; which of course made the concluding "Andante Grazioso" a sheer bit of violinistic delight.

In the Vivaldi "Concerto" both soloist and orchestra were at their best. It is primarily the type of work in which Mr. Heifetz excels, and the brilliance of his technic was enhanced by the excellent support of the orchestra in both the first and final movements. Dazzling sequences of spiccato bowings scintillated against the studied background provided by the orchestra, while muted strings, and pizzicati, countered by a singing portamento all vied with each other in the kaleidoscopic whirl of musical color which this brilliant concerto provides.

The Overture-Fantasia "Romeo and Juliet" by Tschaikowsky, brought the program to a close.

W. P. Jr.

MUSIC IN REVIEW

Jewish Advocate

By JULES WOLFFERS Nov. 11/38

Krenek - Burgin - Gideon

It was evident that not many persons attending the concerts last week of the Boston Symphony Orchestra understood or liked Ernst Krenek's new Pianoforte Concerto. This was, of course, inevitable. To ears accustomed since infancy to the fixed tonality of the major and minor scales, music written in the so-called twelve-tone system must seem formless, vague, wandering—at first.

It is of absolutely no importance that this writer derived a great deal of pleasure from the performance, the first, incidentally, in America. Yet to those who claim this music to be not music but mush, explain why at least one person was able to enjoy the concerto. As far as the writer knows, he is a normal person with unperverted tastes, musically or otherwise, nor is he given to delusions or hallucinations. This music, this new idiom, is not much more familiar to him than to the average concert-goer, but the fact remains—the writer not only "likes" the concerto, but considers it a fine piece of music—sincere, well-formed, logical, and—most important—beautiful.

Now it is true that individual tastes vary, that one man may prefer Bach to Chaminade, another dote on Chaminade and dislike Bach because "Bach has no melody." But certainly the lover of light music will at least grant the possibility of Bach being a great composer, and if he is honest he will admit he does not care for Bach because he does not understand him and because he has not gone to the trouble of getting acquainted with Bach's work. In the case of Krenek's concerto, those who said they did not like it were using very much the same reasoning or lack of reasoning that a child does when it bursts out crying at the sight of a strange face. To the child, the new face is terrifying because it is unfamiliar. More mature minds know it is wiser to reserve judgment on people and things until closer acquaintance makes just judgment possible. Therefore the conclusion is inevitable that it is unjust to dismiss Krenek's concerto as sheer trash without giving oneself the chance of understanding it.

There are two ways of becoming used to a new musical idiom. The first is by a slow process of infiltration. One hears works which at first sound strange; one hears them again a little later, and then again. Gradually and unconsciously the ear grows accustomed to the new technique and accepts it as quite normal. This manner of absorbing new musical idioms is a natural but long-drawn-out process. The second way is to seek to understand the unfamiliar by study and by conscious hearing. Nor is this way open only to the trained musician; it is open to every music-lover. As stated before in this column, the writer had the privilege of hearing an analysis of the Krenek concerto by the composer, together with some observations on the twelve-tone technique. A discussion on this subject will appear at the earliest opportunity. The above remarks may serve as introduction and as plea for an open mind.

To come back to the concert. Due to the indisposition of Dr. Koussevitzky, Richard Burgin was conductor for this pair of concerts in a program which besides the Krenek concert also included the Haydn Symphony No. 86 and Loeffler's "Pagan Poem." This column has expressed its admiration for Mr. Burgin's marked conductorial abilities on previous occasions. The present concert was added proof of Mr. Burgin's fine musicianship and excellent baton work. His accompaniment in the difficult and unfamiliar Krenek was, according to the composer himself, superbly done. The Haydn and Loeffler were skilfully and beautifully performed. Particularly noteworthy was the exactness of the attack, a quality much needed in both the newest and oldest works on the program.

Hill's Violin Concerto

Monitor Nov. 12/38

The Arts

Dr. Koussevitzky returned yesterday after a week's absence to a welcoming audience and orchestra at Symphony Hall. His interesting program was made up of Beethoven's Second Symphony, Edward Burlingame Hill's Violin Concerto, and the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius, in E flat major. Ruth Posselt was the soloist.

Mr. Hill's Concerto had its first performance yesterday. It is his first effort in this special form, although he has written for orchestra and piano. His development as a composer has been gradual, he does not rush into things. This concerto, according to the program notes, was written in 1933, and revised the following year. Then, in the summer of 1937, still not satisfied, the composer again revised the first movement and added a cadenza with the advise and collaboration of Richard Burgin, the concertmaster and assistant conductor of the Boston orchestra.

The work in its present form, therefore, represents a considerable amount of labor. It must be confessed that in the first movement the labor is evident. It opens badly, with a very slight orchestral background drawn in before the entrance of the solo instrument. The thematic material is unlyrical, unviolinistic, the rhythms choppy, the structure vague on a first hearing.

The slow movement is the most successful of the three. It sings charmingly, its harmonies are piquant, its instrumental colors are delicately laid on. Its nostalgic atmosphere brought spontaneous applause from the audience.

The last movement is entertaining but less characteristic. There are echoes, no doubt unconscious, of various things out of the past, such as, in the main theme, a recollection of the Sibelius Second Symphony. There are also echoes of the modern dance hall. These doubtless are intentional, for Mr. Hill has experimented before with popular music. On the whole, not so integrated and certainly not so profound a work as Mr. Hill's Third Symphony, which was introduced last season.

Miss Posselt played with an agreeable tone, and conquered the technical difficulties of the piece with authority. Moreover, she brought out the lyrical values of the second movement. The orchestra supplied an alert accompaniment. The composer was present, and there was an ovation for all concerned in the performance.

The Beethoven was played superbly, with all the fluency, delicacy, subtlety, and flexibility of which the orchestra is capable under its great conductor. The Sibelius, too, with its so different demands, came to eloquent utterance at the hands of this master-interpreter. L. A. S.

B. Globe

MUSIC

Nov. 12/38

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted at the Boston Symphony concert yesterday afternoon the first performance of the Violin Concerto by Prof. Edward Burlingame Hill of Harvard. Ruth Posselt was soloist. Happily recovered from the indisposition which prevented him from appearing last week, Dr. Koussevitzky secured brilliant performance of a program that began with the Second Symphony of Beethoven and ended with the Fifth Symphony by Sibelius.

The predominantly acid turn which musical composition has taken in the last two decades has placed additional obstacles in the path of composers who essay concertos for stringed instruments. The orchestra by itself can caper in the pastures of dissonance and make an effect. But when a violin or cello is set off against an orchestra in music of the sort which most young composers write today, the result is likely to be of questionable beauty.

Prokofieff managed to adapt the uses of the form remarkably well to his own brusque style in his Second Violin Concerto. In a manner quite different, the late Alban Berg succeeded at making music of anomalous beauty with the devices of atonality and "12-tone technic." These are exceptions.

Prof. Hill, among the most resourceful and technically accomplished of American creative musicians, has solved the problem by writing his Violin Concerto in a relatively conservative style suited to the traditional capabilities of the solo instrument. As a result, his work is polished and very enjoyable. First composed in 1933 and twice revised since then, this Concerto is not pretentious, nor, in a manner of speaking, does it take itself too seriously. The first movement is a lively allegro giocoso, the second a slow movement of genuine lyricism with a superb song for the violin to sing. And the finale is discreetly touched with jazzy syncopation.

Both public and composer benefited by the fact that Miss Posselt was chosen as soloist. This young woman is not only a virtuoso fiddler but an excellent musician. Her big, lustrous tone, accurate pitch, and the poise that characterized her phrasing were a continual joy. Composer, soloist, orchestra and conductor were all included in a warming reception of the work.

Like the Fourth, the "Pastoral" and the Eighth Symphonies of Beethoven, the Second is frequently overlooked because of the immensities of the odd-numbered symphonies. More's the pity, because in the Second may plainly be seen the Beethoven who was shortly to astound the musical world with the epic sweep of the "Eroica." Granted that the slow movement of the Second is lesser Beethoven, the opening allegro, the scherzo and finale are delightfully engaging, even exciting.

Yesterday's performance, full of proverbial Boston Symphony magnificence, was electrifying. So, too, in its own way and under the magical ministrations of Dr. Koussevitzky, was the dark-hued music of Sibelius.

There are still some who sneer at Sibelius' Fifth Symphony, finding its basic melody and the composer's unique treatment not to their liking. Yet the work endures and it continues to seem fresh. Surely that amazing last movement, with its brass peroration and those half-dozen thunderous chords at the end, is one of the most expressive symphonic movements ever created.

The program will be repeated tonight. Next week the orchestra goes on tour; at the Symphony Hall concerts two weeks hence Eugene Goossens will be guest conductor.

C. W. D.

B. Her.

MUSIC

Nov. 12/38

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The sixth regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Ruth Posselt, violinist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Beethoven
Symphony No. 2 in D major Op. 36
Hill............Concerto for Violin Op. 38
Sibelius
Symphony No. 5 in E flat major Op. 83

One could not honestly say that Beethoven's 2nd Symphony differed in any essential from the late symphonies of Haydn. The romantic Beethoven and the abstruse and intellectual Beethoven were still in the future. The 2nd Symphony is purely classical and, though it contains many unusual and fascinating details, it was not the romantic imagination that ordered them but the same inquisitive mind that is the joy of Haydn's later work.

The symphony is one of the most delightful in existence. Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra yesterday brought out to the best advantage its graceful and genial qualities. The exquisite sonority and perfection of finish which we have [illegible] to expect from the Boston Symphony were admirably displayed in this work. The finale was almost breathless in its speed, but that it in point of fact came off successfully was enough.

The new concerto was a disappointment to us. Mr. Hill can usually be counted on to write effective and adroit music, as he has ably proved in the past in such works as the concertino for piano and orchestra and the sinfonietta for string orchestra. But the present work is dull. Mr. Hill does not succeed in making plausible or effective the contrasts in mood between the jocose and the rhapsodic. The slow movement has perhaps the finest pages of the whole concerto, but the finale has more bustle than point. Miss Posselt, a highly accomplished violinist, played the concerto with great spirit and precision. She was most cordially applauded, as was also Mr. Hill who was in the audience to hear the first performance of his concerto.

Sibelius' 5th Symphony is in some ways a return to the mood of his more familiar, but in no sense finer, 2nd Symphony. It does not continue in the spare and bleak mood of the 4th. In the slow movement, indeed, its lyricism becomes almost sentimental, and in many ways this is the least interesting in the symphony.

The first movement, whether you consider it one or two, is remarkable for its power and the subtlety with which, as Sibelius so often wrote, the merest scraps of themes are woven into the texture of the music and emerge in the end as somthing strangely moving and exciting. The last movement is one of the most unusual in music. The very end can be ruined by an insensitive performance. Yesterday the interpretation under Dr. Koussevitzky was one of supreme eloquence. In response to the superb playing of the orchestra and moved by the Sibelius symphony the audience remained to cheer and applaud.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the orchestra will make its first visit of the season to New York. For the concerts of Nov. 25 and 26 Eugene Goossens, distinguished English composer and regular conductor of the Cincinnati orchestra, will be guest conductor. The program will include one of his own works, the Manfred Symphony of Tchaikovsky, and rarely heard works by Handel and Schumann.

38.

SYMPHONY GIVES NEW CONCERTO

B. Post Nov. 12/38

Hill's Charming Work With Ruth Posselt as Soloist

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The brightest spot in yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert, if not indeed in the quarter of a season now completed, was the initial performance of Edward Burlingame Hill's Concerto for Violin, with Ruth Posselt as the soloist.

For the rest of a generally interesting concert, Dr. Koussevitzky, now restored to health and high spirits, offered Beethoven's Second Symphony and the Fifth of Sibelius.

MR. HILL'S CONCERTO

From Mr. Burk's programme notes one might learn that the new concerto is, after all, not so very new, since the first draft of it was made five years ago. Be that as it may, the concerto resembles the composer's Third Symphony of last season in its seeming spontaneity and pervading charm, its freedom from any compulsion to be profound, or from the equally regretable urge to be orignal at all costs.

Mr. Hill writes from a mind apparently bubbling over with attractive and arresting, if not always wholly novel, musical ideas and with a hand so skilled that the workmanship makes for a pleasure in itself. It is not easy to recall any modern violin concerto in which the solo part is set so clearly and naturally to the fore, not even excepting the Second of Prokofieff, one of the pronounced successes of last season. Particularly is this true of the second movement, where cool and limpid woodwinds make an ideal background for the warm tones of the violin.

Youthful Soloist

This expressive slow division and the gay, brisk finale, with its not unpleasing reminiscence of Smetana's "Bartered Bride," are somewhat happier in effect than the sharply rhythmed first movement, although the latter's jaunty opening immediately announced that entertaining doings were afoot.

Fortunate in his orchestra and conductor yesterday, Mr. Hill was no less blessed in his soloist. There was a sharp visual contrast between the violinist, blond and youthful, and the modest white-haired, scholarly composer; but the music of the one seemed made for the playing of the other and vice versa. Given this picturesque and dramatic antithesis and two resident musicans who are an object of justifiable local pride and add to them the particular piece and performance of yesterday, and the resulting demonstration in favor of both was altogether inevitable.

Beethoven and Sibelius

For this most auspicious premiere the performance of Beethoven's captivating symphony, unjustly neglected here of late years, made excellent preparation. And if any in the audiend mo elo

of
to Si
of like the famous
ject to change without notice. The recent release of the orchestra's recording of the Fifth made yesterday's performance timely and appropriate. But is it not high time that we heard again the Third and the Fourth? Of late the Fifth seems to have had more than its share of attention at Symphony Hall.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

NOV 12 1938

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S SERIES OPENS FRIDAY

Koussevitzky Orchestra to Begin Five-Concert Season at Brooklyn Academy

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its first Brooklyn concert of the current season next Friday evening in the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The concert marks the fifteenth year that Serge Koussevitzky has conducted this annual series. The program, as announced by Dr. Koussevitzky, will contain Beethoven's "Symphony No. 2 in D major," Aaron Copland's "El Salon Mexico" and Dvorak's "Symphony No. 5 in E minor (from the New World.")

Aaron Copland, a native of Brooklyn, has won general attention by his briliant rhapsody, the result of his visit to Mexico in 1932. It was chosen to represent the United States at the Festival of the International Society for Contemporary Music in London last summer. Carlos Chavez gave the piece its first performance in Mexico City, Sir Adrian Boult introduced it at a broadcast concert from New York last May, and Dr. Koussevitzky gave the work its first performance at a public concert in the United States, in Boston, on Oct. 14. "El Salon Mexico," named after a famous dance hall in Mexico City, is based upon characteristic popular tunes of that country. It is scored for full orchestra with great richness of color.

The concert is held under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn committee. It is the first of a series of five which Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct in Brooklyn for the season 1938-1939.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PRESENTS HEIFETZ

Violin Master Is Soloist for Second Concert of Season at Metropolitan Theatre.

Prov. Journal

PLAYS MOZART CONCERTO

Nov. 9 1938

Guest and Orchestra Heard at Best in Vivaldi Work Demonstrating His Splendid Technique

The Boston Symphony Orchestra with Richard Burgin conducting, and Jascha Heifetz as soloist, offered the second concert of the current season at the Metropolitan Theatre last evening, with the following program:

Concerto in D minor for orchestra
(edited by A. Siloti) .... Vivaldi
I. Maestoso
II. Largo
III. Allegro
Violin Concerto in D major, No. 4
(Koechel No. 218) .... Mozart
I. Allegro
II. Andante cantabile
III. Rondo: Andante grazioso
INTERMISSION
Violin Concerto No. 2 in G minor,
Op. 63 .... Prokofieff
I. Allegro moderato
II. Andante assai
III. Allegro ben marcato
"Romeo and Juliet," Overture-
Fantasia .... Tchaikovsky

For those who love the olden form in music, with its matter-of-fact progressions and meticulous little phrases all arranged exactly so-and-so, there was the Vivaldi orchestral "Concerto," and the Mozart violin "Concerto" (in D major). Those who thrill at expectant moods or revel in the intricacy of modern orchestration were regaled with the comparatively new Prokofieff "Concerto" which received its American premiere last season.

The formality of the Vivaldi "Concerto" was adequately portrayed under Mr. Burgin's baton, and the contrapuntal interweavings of the Maestoso were given with a definiteness that quickly established the conductor's ability: and he led his men through the "Largo" and "Allegro" in a manner which placed the listeners in a peculiarly receptive mood for the enjoyment of the Mozart "Concerto" which followed. Here, the orchestra provided a carefully tempered setting for Mr. Heifetz, and 'ere the "Andante Cantabile" was begun, orchestra and soloist combined in giving as gracious a performance as one might expect.

Mr. Heifetz's tone became almost vocal in the "Andante", and his bowings are subtly tinged with inflective delicacy; which of course made the concluding "Andante Grazioso" a sheer bit of violinistic delight.

In the Vivaldi "Concerto" both soloist and orchestra were at their best. It is primarily the type of work in which Mr. Heifetz excels, and the brilliance of his technic was enhanced by the excellent support of the orchestra in both the first and final movements. Dazzling sequences of spiccato bowings scintillated against the studied background provided by the orchestra, while muted strings, and pizzicati, countered by a singing portamento all vied with each other in the kaleidoscopic whirl of musical color which this brilliant concerto provides.

The Overture-Fantasia "Romeo and Juliet" by Tschaikowsky, brought the program to a close.

W. P. Jr.

Hill's Violin Concerto

Monitor Nov. 12/38

The Arts

Dr. Koussevitzky returned yesterday after a week's absence to a welcoming audience and orchestra at Symphony Hall. His interesting program was made up of Beethoven's Second Symphony, Edward Burlingame Hill's Violin Concerto, and the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius, in E flat major. Ruth Posselt was the soloist.

Mr. Hill's Concerto had its first performance yesterday. It is his first effort in this special form, although he has written for orchestra and piano. His development as a composer has been gradual, he does not rush into things. This concerto, according to the program notes, was written in 1933, and revised the following year. Then, in the summer of 1937, still not satisfied, the composer again revised the first movement and added a cadenza with the advise and collaboration of Richard Burgin, the concertmaster and assistant conductor of the Boston orchestra.

The work in its present form, therefore, represents a considerable amount of labor. It must be confessed that in the first movement the labor is evident. It opens badly, with a very slight orchestral background drawn in before the entrance of the solo instrument. The thematic material is unlyrical, unviolinistic, the rhythms choppy, the structure vague on a first hearing.

The slow movement is the most successful of the three. It sings charmingly, its harmonies are piquant, its instrumental colors are delicately laid on. Its nostalgic atmosphere brought spontaneous applause from the audience.

The last movement is entertaining but less characteristic. There are echoes, no doubt unconscious, of various things out of the past, such as, in the main theme, a recollection of the Sibelius Second Symphony. There are also echoes of the modern dance hall. These doubtless are intentional, for Mr. Hill has experimented before with popular music. On the whole, not so integrated and certainly not so profound a work as Mr. Hill's Third Symphony, which was introduced last season.

Miss Posselt played with an agreeable tone, and conquered the technical difficulties of the piece with authority. Moreover, she brought out the lyrical values of the second movement. The orchestra supplied an alert accompaniment. The composer was present, and there was an ovation for all concerned in the performance.

The Beethoven was played superbly, with all the fluency, delicacy, subtlety, and flexibility of which the orchestra is capable under its great conductor. The Sibelius, too, with its so different demands, came to eloquent utterance at the hands of this master-interpreter.

L. A. S.

MUSIC IN REVIEW

Jewish Advocate Nov. 11/38

By JULES WOLFFERS

Krenek - Burgin - Gideon

It was evident that not many persons attending the concerts last week of the Boston Symphony Orchestra understood or liked Ernst Krenek's new Pianoforte Concerto. This was, of course, inevitable. To ears accustomed since infancy to the fixed tonality of the major and minor scales, music written in the so-called twelve-tone system must seem formless, vague, wandering—at first.

It is of absolutely no importance that this writer derived a great deal of pleasure from the performance, the first, incidentally, in America. Yet to those who claim this music to be not music but mush, explain why at least one person was able to enjoy the concerto. As far as the writer knows, he is a normal person with unperverted tastes, musically or otherwise, nor is he given to delusions or hallucinations. This music, this new idiom, is not much more familiar to him than to the average concertgoer, but the fact remains—the writer not only "likes" the concerto, but considers it a fine piece of music—sincere, well-formed, logical, and—most important—beautiful.

Now it is true that individual tastes vary, that one man may prefer Bach to Chaminade, another dote on Chaminade and dislike Bach because "Bach has no melody." But certainly the lover of light music will at least grant the possibility of Bach being a great composer, and if he is honest he will admit he does not care for Bach because he does not understand him and because he has not gone to the trouble of getting acquainted with Bach's work. In the case of Krenek's concerto, those who said they did not like it were using very much the same reasoning or lack of reasoning that a child does when it bursts out crying at the sight of a strange face. To the child, the new face is terrifying because it is unfamiliar. More mature minds know it is wiser to reserve judgment on people and things until closer acquaintance makes just judgment possible. Therefore the conclusion is inevitable that it is unjust to dismiss Krenek's concerto as sheer trash without giving oneself the chance of understanding it.

There are two ways of becoming used to a new musical idiom. The first is by a slow process of infiltration. One hears works which at first sound strange; one hears them again a little later, and then again. Gradually and unconsciously the ear grows accustomed to the new technique and accepts it as quite normal. This manner of absorbing new musical idioms is a natural but long-drawn-out process. The second way is to seek to understand the unfamiliar by study and by conscious hearing. Nor is this way open only to the trained musician; it is open to every music-lover. As stated before in this column, the writer had the privilege of hearing an analysis of the Krenek concerto by the composer, together with some observations on the twelve-tone technique. A discussion on this subject will appear at the earliest opportunity. The above remarks may serve as introduction and as plea for an open mind.

To come back to the concert. Due to the indisposition of Dr. Koussevitzky, Richard Burgin was conductor for this pair of concerts in a program which besides the Krenek concert also included the Haydn Symphony No. 86 and Loeffler's "Pagan Poem." This column has expressed its admiration for Mr. Burgin's marked conductorial abilities on previous occasions. The present concert was added proof of Mr. Burgin's fine musicianship and excellent baton work. His accompaniment in the difficult and unfamiliar Krenek was, according to the composer himself, superbly done. The Haydn and Loeffler were skilfully and beautifully performed. Particularly noteworthy was the exactness of the attack, a quality much needed in both the newest and oldest works on the program.

MUSIC

B. Globe Nov. 12/38

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted at the Boston Symphony concert yesterday afternoon the first performance of the Violin Concerto by Prof. Edward Burlingame Hill of Harvard. Ruth Posselt was soloist. Happily recovered from the indisposition which prevented him from appearing last week, Dr. Koussevitzky secured brilliant performance of a program that began with the Second Symphony of Beethoven and ended with the Fifth Symphony by Sibelius.

The predominantly acid turn which musical composition has taken in the last two decades has placed additional obstacles in the path of composers who essay concertos for stringed instruments. The orchestra by itself can caper in the pastures of dissonance and make an effect. But when a violin or cello is set off against an orchestra in music of the sort which most young composers write today, the result is likely to be of questionable beauty.

Prokofieff managed to adapt the uses of the form remarkably well to his own brusque style in his Second Violin Concerto. In a manner quite different, the late Alban Berg succeeded at making music of anomalous beauty with the devices of atonality and "12-tone technic." These are exceptions.

Prof. Hill, among the most resourceful and technically accomplished of American creative musicians, has solved the problem by writing his Violin Concerto in a relatively conservative style suited to the traditional capabilities of the solo instrument. As a result, his work is polished and very enjoyable. First composed in 1933 and twice revised since then, this Concerto is not pretentious, nor, in a manner of speaking, does it take itself too seriously. The first movement is a lively allegro giocoso, the second a slow movement of genuine lyricism with a superb song for the violin to sing. And the finale is discreetly touched with jazzy syncopation.

Both public and composer benefited by the fact that Miss Posselt was chosen as soloist. This young woman is not only a virtuoso fiddler but an excellent musician. Her big, lustrous tone, accurate pitch, and the poise that characterized her phrasing were a continual joy. Composer, soloist, orchestra and conductor were all included in a warming reception of the work.

Like the Fourth, the "Pastoral" and the Eighth Symphonies of Beethoven, the Second is frequently overlooked because of the immensities of the odd-numbered symphonies. More's the pity, because in the Second may plainly be seen the Beethoven who was shortly to astound the musical world with the epic sweep of the "Eroica." Granted that the slow movement of the Second is lesser Beethoven, the opening allegro, the scherzo and finale are delightfully engaging, even exciting.

Yesterday's performance, full of proverbial Boston Symphony magnificence, was electrifying. So, too, in its own way and under the magical ministrations of Dr. Koussevitzky, was the dark-hued music of Sibelius.

There are still some who sneer at Sibelius' Fifth Symphony, finding its basic melody and the composer's unique treatment not to their liking. Yet the work endures and it continues to seem fresh. Surely that amazing last movement, with its brass peroration and those half-dozen thunderous chords at the end, is one of the most expressive symphonic movements ever created.

The program will be repeated tonight. Next week the orchestra goes on tour; at the Symphony Hall concerts two weeks hence Eugene Goossens will be guest conductor.

C. W. D.

MUSIC

B. Her. Nov. 12/38

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The sixth regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Ruth Posselt, violinist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Beethoven
Symphony No. 2 in D major Op. 36
Hill............Concerto for Violin Op. 38
Sibelius
Symphony No. 5 in E flat major Op. 83

One could not honestly say that Beethoven's 2nd Symphony differed in any essential from the late symphonies of Haydn. The romantic Beethoven and the abstruse and intellectual Beethoven were still in the future. The 2nd Symphony is purely classical and, though it contains many unusual and fascinating details, it was not the romantic imagination that ordered them but the same inquisitive mind that is the joy of Haydn's later work.

The symphony is one of the most delightful in existence. Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra yesterday brought out to the best advantage its graceful and genial qualities. The exquisite sonority and perfection of finish which we have come to expect from the Boston Symphony were admirably displayed in this work. The finale was almost breathless in its speed, but that it in point of fact came off successfully was enough.

The new concerto was a disappointment to us. Mr. Hill can usually be counted on to write effective and adroit music, as he has ably proved in the past in such works as the concertino for piano and orchestra and the sinfonietta for string orchestra. But the present work is dull. Mr. Hill does not succeed in making plausible or effective the contrasts in mood between the jocose and the rhapsodic. The slow movement has perhaps the finest pages of the whole concerto, but the finale has more bustle than point. Miss Posselt, a highly accomplished violinist, played the concerto with great spirit and precision. She was most cordially applauded, as was also Mr. Hill who was in the audience to hear the first performance of his concerto.

Sibelius' 5th Symphony is in some ways a return to the mood of his more familiar, but in no sense finer, 2nd Symphony. It does not continue in the spare and bleak mood of the 4th. In the slow movement, indeed, its lyricism becomes almost sentimental, and in many ways this is the least interesting in the symphony.

The first movement, whether you consider it one or two, is remarkable for its power and the subtlety with which, as Sibelius so often wrote, the merest scraps of themes are woven into the texture of the music and emerge in the end as somthing strangely moving and exciting. The last movement is one of the most unusual in music. The very end can be ruined by an insensitive performance. Yesterday the interpretation under Dr. Koussevitzky was one of supreme eloquence. In response to the superb playing of the orchestra and moved by the Sibelius symphony the audience remained to cheer and applaud.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the orchestra will make its first visit of the season to New York. For the concerts of Nov. 25 and 26 Eugene Goossens, distinguished English composer and regular conductor of the Cincinnati orchestra, will be guest conductor. The program will include one of his own works, the Manfred Symphony of Tchaikovsky, and rarely heard works by Handel and Schumann.

SYMPHONY GIVES NEW CONCERTO

B. Post Nov. 12/38

Hill's Charming Work With Ruth Posselt as Soloist

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The brightest spot in yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert, if not indeed in the quarter of a season now completed, was the initial performance of Edward Burlingame Hill's Concerto for Violin, with Ruth Posselt as the soloist.

For the rest of a generally interesting concert, Dr. Koussevitzky, now restored to health and high spirits, offered Beethoven's Second Symphony and the Fifth of Sibelius.

MR. HILL'S CONCERTO

From Mr. Burk's programme notes one might learn that the new concerto is, after all, not so very new, since the first draft of it was made five years ago. Be that as it may, the concerto resembles the composer's Third Symphony of last season in its seeming spontaneity and pervading charm, its freedom from any compulsion to be profound, or from the equally regrettable urge to be orignal at all costs.

Mr. Hill writes from a mind apparently bubbling over with attractive and arresting, if not always wholly novel, musical ideas and with a hand so skilled that the workmanship makes for a pleasure in itself. It is not easy to recall any modern violin concerto in which the solo part is set so clearly and naturally to the fore, not even excepting the Second of Prokofieff, one of the pronounced successes of last season. Particularly is this true of the second movement, where cool and limpid woodwinds make an ideal background for the warm tones of the violin.

Youthful Soloist

This expressive slow division and the gay, brisk finale, with its not unpleasing reminiscence of Smetana's "Bartered Bride," are somewhat happier in effect than the sharply rhythmed first movement, although the latter's jaunty opening immediately announced that entertaining doings were afoot.

Fortunate in his orchestra and conductor yesterday, Mr. Hill was no less blessed in his soloist. There was a sharp visual contrast between the violinist, blond and youthful, and the modest white-haired, scholarly composer; but the music of the one seemed made for the playing of the other and vice versa. Given this picturesque and dramatic antithesis and two resident musicans who are an object of justifiable local pride and add to them the particular piece and performance of yesterday, and the resulting demonstration in favor of both was altogether inevitable.

Beethoven and Sibelius

For this most auspicious premiere the performance of Beethoven's captivating symphony, unjustly neglected here of late years, made excellent preparation. And if any in the audience later felt the need of a graver, more sobering note, the remarkably eloquent performance of the symphony of Sibelius supplied it.

It is both too early and too late to pass pontifical judgment upon the Sibelius symphonies. At present, all of us have our favorites and these, like the railroad timetables, are subject to change without notice. The recent release of the orchestra's recording of the Fifth made yesterday's performance timely and appropriate. But is it not high time that we heard again the Third and the Fourth? Of late the Fifth seems to have had more than its share of attention at Symphony Hall.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

NOV 12 1938

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S SERIES OPENS FRIDAY

Koussevitzky Orchestra to Begin Five-Concert Season at Brooklyn Academy

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its first Brooklyn concert of the current season next Friday evening in the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The concert marks the fifteenth year that Serge Koussevitzky has conducted this annual series. The program, as announced by Dr. Koussevitzky, will contain Beethoven's "Symphony No. 2 in D major," Aaron Copland's "El Salon Mexico" and Dvorak's "Symphony No. 5 in E minor (from the New World.")

Aaron Copland, a native of Brooklyn, has won general attention by his briliant rhapsody, the result of his visit to Mexico in 1932. It was chosen to represent the United States at the Festival of the International Society for Contemporary Music in London last summer. Carlos Chavez gave the piece its first performance in Mexico City, Sir Adrian Boult introduced it at a broadcast concert from New York last May, and Dr. Koussevitzky gave the work its first performance at a public concert in the United States, in Boston, on Oct. 14. "El Salon Mexico," named after a

Blast at Krenek

B. Trans. - Nov. 14/38

To the Music Editor:

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is one of the best in America. Its conductor, Mr. Koussevitzky, is internationally outstandnig. He has forged the orchestra into a marvelously sensitive instrument and is tireless in his efforts to achieve for it the quintessence of perfection. Because I appreciate the excellence of the orchestra and its conductor, I am compelled to write. On the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given on Nov. 4 and 5, we heard the Pianoforte Concerto by Ernst Krenek, with the composer as soloist. In the program notes we were informed that this was the first performance of this concerto in America. Without intention to minimize Mr. Koussevitzky's musical judgment, but as one of the audience who was subjected to a most agonizing aesthetic torture, I would like to learn why, with all the standard works of proven merit at the disposal of the orchestra, it was necessary to expose the audience to such a musical monstrosity as the above-mentioned Krenek Concerto.

In the descriptive notes of the program Mr. Krenek is quoted as saying: "The structure of this Concerto is based upon the so-called twelve-tone technique." About this technique, he says: "The main objections against the twelve-tone technique have always been that it subjects music to a merely mechanical procedure and that it involves a serious limitation of the inspiration." In regard to the third movement, the composer tells us: "All intervals played by the orchestra upward are repeated by the piano downwards and vice versa and the whole complex of harmonic layers is turned upside down." I, as one of the listeners, must confess that I do not understand music "turned upside down." But I do knew when I have a headache. To make the suffering of the audience complete, the Concerto's four movements are played continuously. This, I assume, was subconsciously felt by the composer to be necessary to prevent the audience from leaving between movements, although those persons who could get out without disturbing others did so. I decided to hold out and sit through it. It was interesting to observe the people during the intermission. Many of them looked as if they had just been through a taxing ordeal, and even the sheepish ones, with whom applause is chronic, looked strained and worn.

For a number of years in the past, hospitals for nervous disorders have used music for therapeutic purposes and obtained encouraging results. However, I am inclined to think that if Mr. Koussevitzky continues to give us musical abominations like the Krenek Concerto, the number of people suffering from nervous disorders will increase. Many dairymen have installed radios in their barns because it was found that when the cows are made to listen to music they give a larger quantity of milk. I am inclined to think that the most prolifically milk-oozing cow, if exposed to music of the twelve-tone technique, would instantly dry up.

ABRAHAM FINKELSTEIN

Boston, Nov. 6.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 20,

N.Y. [illegible]

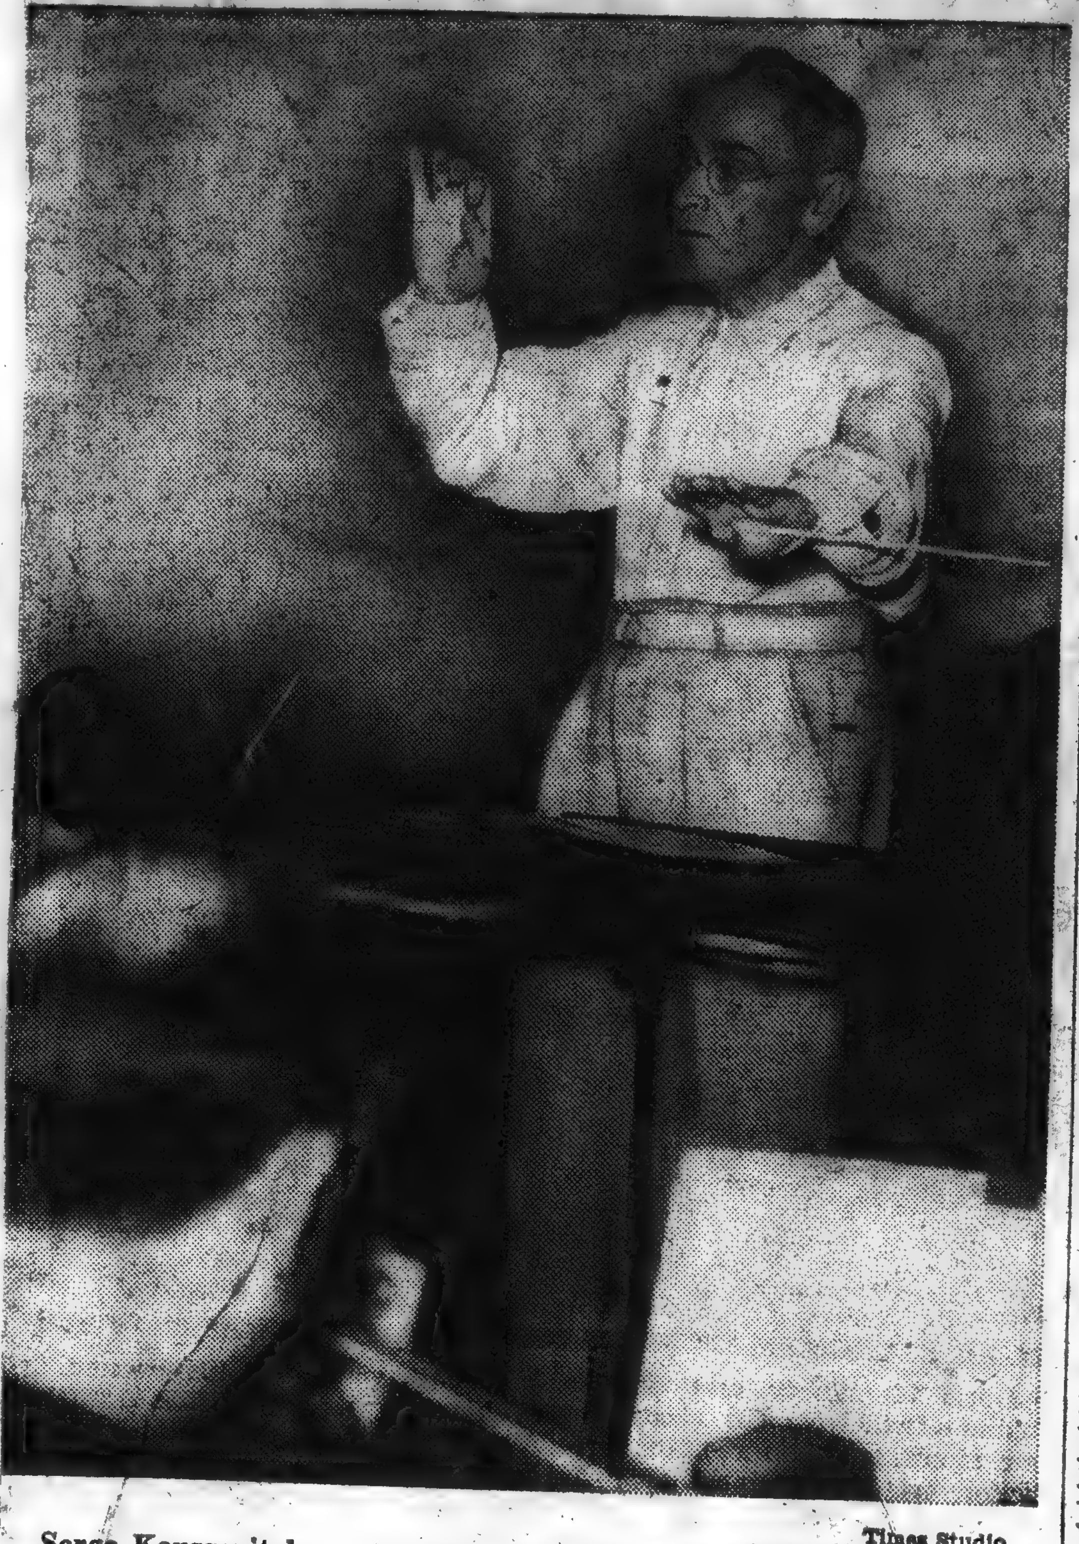
Boston Symphony Heard Again in Carnegie Hall

Aaron Copland's Mexican Piece Warmly Received

The Boston Symphony gave its second concert of the season yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall in the presence of an audience that filled every available set. The program, in addition to holding two familiar masterworks, the second symphony of Beethoven and the fourth symphony of Brahms, also brought Aaron Copland's "El Salon Mexico," which had received its first performance in this country last May by the N. B. C. Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Sir Adrian Boult.

Mr. Koussevitzky's extraordinarily eloquent interpretations of the Beethoven and Brahms symphonies, invested with such glowing and translucent tone by his superb orchestra, made this concert a memorable one. Mr. Copland's potpourri on Mexican themes is skilfully orchestrated and effective in an obvious way and at least serves to reveal that although he has created such things as the granitic piano variations, he has not forgotten the practical value of stereotyped distonic harmonies. "El Salon Mexico" was warmly received and the composer bowed his acknowledgements, first from his box and then from the stage. J. D. B.

CURRENT COMMENT



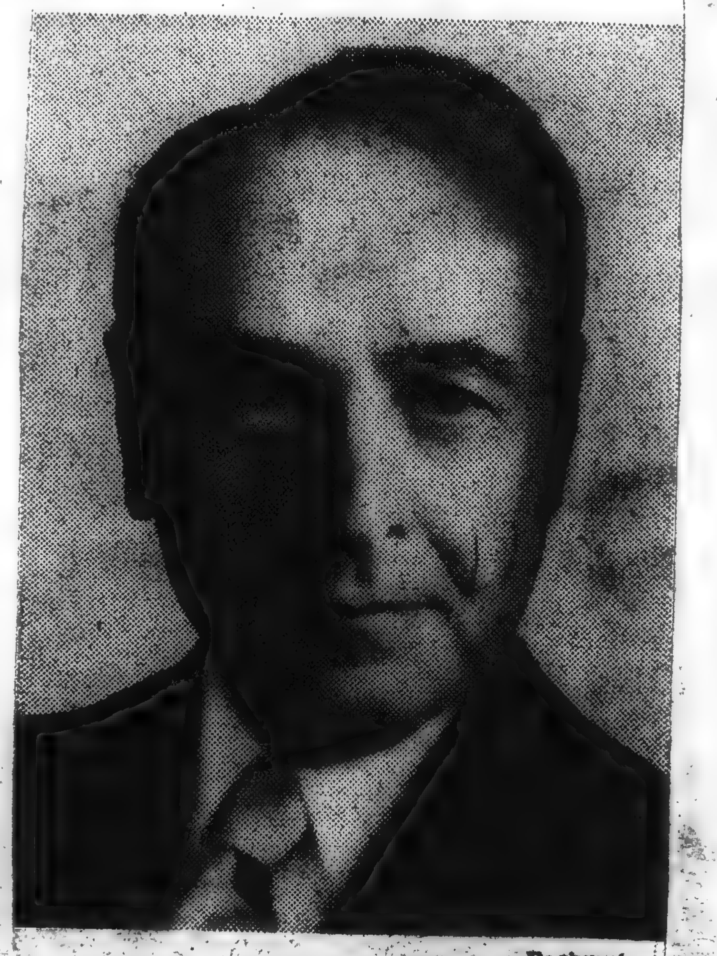
Times Studio

Serge Koussevitzky, returning with Boston Symphony this week.

N.Y. Herald

NOVEMBER 13, 1938

e Hall Concerts



Bachrach

on Tuesday night; Moriz Rosenthal, ebut; Serge Koussevitzky, conduct- urday

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra now in its fifty-eighth season and its fifteenth under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, will give its first New York concerts of the season next Thursday night and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall and Friday night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. On Thursday Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin" and the fifth symphonies of Sibelius and Beethoven. The novelty of the Saturday program, which opens with Beethoven's second symphony, instead of the originally announced Mozart divertimento, is Aaron Copland's "El Salon Mexico."

DANCING INSTRUCTION

This was composed by Mr. Copland in Mexico in the summer of 1937, and first played here by the NBC Symphony Orchestra under Sir Adrian Boult in its regular radio concert of May 14, 1938. The first concert performance in this country was under Dr. Koussevitzky in Boston earlier this fall. Brahm's fourth symphony will be heard after the intermission. The Brooklyn program consists of the Beethoven second symphony, the Copland work and Dvorak's symphony "From the New World."

CONCERT AND OPERA ASIDES

B. Trans. Nov. 13/38

ALTHOUGH the Boston Symphony Orchestra's proposed jaunt to Europe is still in the realm of the probable, present substantial activities behind the scenes suggest an early emergence into the world of reality. The organization in whose hands the project is being shaped is the French-American Art Association, with Eduard Herriot (ex-Premier of France and biographer of Beethoven) as honorary president. Its acting president and American representative is Ernest Guy of the French consular staff, who is in Baltimore.

Present plans, which are subject to the whims of fate and finance, are to have the B. S. O. play in England, France, Belgium and Holland, with concerts distributed as follows: four in Paris, one in Strasbourg, one in Lyons (M. Herriot is Mayor there and plans a special municipal celebration); four in London and four more in other English cities not yet selected; two in Amsterdam, one in The Hague and two, most likely, in Brussels. Nineteen concerts in all.

Planning appearances is one thing; raising funds to make them possible is another; and it is upon that undertaking that the association is devoting its time and effort. It feels that the prospective trip will require a guarantee fund of from $100,000 to $150,000, and has set about raising that sum mainly from the cities that shall have the pleasure of hearing the B. S. O., which seems fair enough.

The French-American Art Association is the revival of an organization that was formed during the World War. Some readers may remember that during the war a body known as the French High Commission, under André Tardieu, was responsible for the importation of several French artists and cultural organizations, using the French-American Art Association as the administrative medium. Its basic purpose was the stimulation of good-will in an embittered world. To that end, it brought to this country such artists as the eminent stage director Jacques Copeau and a theatrical company that counted in its cast the admirable Louis Jouvet; the orchestra of the Paris Conservatoire under André Messager, and the Galerie Publicaine, which is not an art exhibition but a military band.

Holding the opinion that the world is still somewhat embittered and in need of a little good-will, the old association was brought to life. One personal link between the old and the new is M. Guy, who was a French official under the commission.

The first step in the tightening of the bonds of friendship between France and the United States is the proposed trip of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It seems not unreasonable to suppose that an exchange of cultures will follow, and, though not a word of definite announcement has been made, Henri Casadesus, a French representative of the association, is working overseas to make the B. S. O. trip a reality.

A few more good things to be revealed at the proper time are also being considered. That time should be after the successful realization or assurance of the B. S. O.'s trip.

Still in the province of fond hopes and good intentions, the association wants to extend its activities to all the arts and the sciences too. But those are bridges to be crossed at a later day.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1938 C

B. Trans MUSIC

Week-End Concerts

Myra Hess in Persuasive Recital; Hill Concerto Anew; Rare Schubert

By MOSES SMITH

Second Thoughts

The performance of the Hill Violin Concerto, as of the other numbers on the program, was greeted even more enthusiastically at Saturday evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra than on Friday afternoon. Ruth Posselt's playing of the solo part seemed actually to have gained in intensity, bravura and emotional depth over the remarkable performance of the matinee. The orchestral playing, too, was on a very high level, and the cheers which were added to the more normal applause were richly deserved.

Intrinsically the Concerto gave approximately the same impression on second hearing as at first. It is neither an important work nor a dull one. It reveals anew and gratefully the familiar lyrical vein of the composer. The first movement seemed a little more robust than it had on first acquaintance. Much of the violin pattern-making, on the other hand, seemed even more conventional.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
NOV 9 - 1938

Boston Symphony Traces Development of Concerto

A beautiful exposition of "the development of the concerto" was heard by the capacity audience at the Boston Symphony orchestra's concert last evening at the Metropolitan Theatre. Music by Vivaldi, Mozart and Prokofieff provided the illustrations and Heifetz and the orchestra, conducted by Richard Burgin, assistant conductor, did a magnificent piece of work in their interpretations. Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture-fantasia completed the program, which, taken from any angle, was one of the most interesting and thoroughly satisfactory heard here in some time.

Jascha Heifetz is a great artist. He was in excellent form last evening and the beauty of his tone, combined with his impeccable technique, never displayed as such, proved unquestionably his right to be placed at the top of the list for musicianship. His playing of the Mozart Violin Concerto in D major, No. 4, was a joy. Mozart was alive and glowing. The andante cantabile and the graceful rondo were beautifully phrased. The orchestra played charming accompaniment. This is music which can be and is played by many violinists and so was all the more pleasing to hear in this superb rendition.

The second Violin Concerto No. 2 in G minor, Op. 63, by the modern Russian composer Prokofieff is different stuff. A virtuoso piece from start to finish, it held the interest all the way. In structure and melodic content it is understandable modern music. Granted that it had the advantage of the finest available in the interpretive medium, nevertheless, it was a splendid illustration of the latest in violin concerto writing. Perhaps it stood out in contrast against the unpleasant attempt to be different, a concerto written on the 12-tone scale heard recently in Boston. Perhaps we are unalterably prejudiced in favor of the diatonic scale (we learned it in Grade 1). The fact remains that when a beautiful bit of melody comes out of a Stradivarius played by Heifetz, accompanied by the Boston Symphony, we are storing it away as a priceless possession. This bit is the opening phrase of the Andante. Heifetz was recalled many times and he insisted on sharing the applause with Mr. Burgin.

The opening number was the Concerto in D minor for orchestra, by Vivaldi. In this the freshness and vigor of the early Italian writing made a fitting prelude to the Mozart. The sonority and breadth of phrasing and the tone color, in the contrapuntal style of that era, displayed to advantage the proficiency of the string choir of this orchestra.

The Tschaikowsky "Romeo and Juliet" was given a splendid performance. Never has the beautiful 'cello theme seemed so all-inclusive at its opening phrase, as it drops a seventh before continuing on its delightful way. We regret very much that Mr. Koussevitzky was unable to be present. When we must have a substitute, we hope he will be Mr. Burgin. He is a first-rate conductor. R. T.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER - CITIZEN
NOV 9 - 1938

Boston Programs.

At the Boston Symphony concerts Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this week Ruth Posselt will be the soloist, playing in first performance the new Violin Concerto by Edward Burlingame Hill. Beethoven's Second Symphony and the Fifth of Sibelius will round out the programs.

61

HARTFORD DAILY COURANT: WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 1938.

Koussevitzky and Taft Arrive

Courant Photos.

Serge Koussevitzky, left, famous conductor, led the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday night at the Bushnell Memorial in the first event of the new Bushnell Concert Series. Dr. Koussevitzky is shown with Edward A. Taft of Boston, chairman of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Hartford Club, where they stopped while here.

Koussevitsky And Boston In Concert

1938-39 Symphonic Series Opens at Bushnell Hall With Interesting Program

Under the conductorship of Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard in concert at the Bushnell Memorial auditorium, Tuesday night. The program:

Le Tombeau de Couperin ...... Rave
Symphony No. 5 in E Flat Major ...... Sibelius
Symphony No. 5 in E minor .. Dvorak

With sufficient fanfaring during the course of the evening to launch a millenium, the 1938-39 Bushnell Memorial Symphonic Series was opened last night, when the city's favored conductor and orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston, played the first of their two scheduled concerts here.

The program was one which made small concession to the fact that we have had a long vacation from the major orchestras and their more massive programs, and plunged us into symphony again, practically up to the neck. After a few moments of Ravel to sharpen our ears and wits, we were left to sink or swim in the mighty sea of Sibelius' Fifth Symphony, and then taken on a cross-country jog with the original musical promulgator of the idea "See America First," Dvorak—who had room for two countries in his big, gemuetlich heart. The Memorial had already brought to its customers' attention that it had never before offered any of these three works, and although it seems somewhat bland to speak of the Dvorak as new, in view of the number of times it has been heard here under other roofs, still and all it was stimulating and gratifying to open a new season by hearing two definitely new and one quasi-new works, all in one night.

Ravel's Tomb.

The tomb which Ravel has erected for Couperin turns out to be a fine, elegant rococco structure, for which Tschiakowsky seems to have been consulting architect and Debussy the interior decorator. It would seem, too, to be a cenotaph in which the early Frenchman's spirit might dwell with a great deal of amused satisfaction, for Ravel's music has about it a sophistication and a sardonic quality Couperin would have much relished, together with its finely-meshed form and a remarkably pure romantic content, both of which were ultra-dear to the latter's heart. "Le Tombeau" is certainly not a copy of Couperin's music, but it is homage that Couperin would understand and cherich acros sthe gulf of the intervening ages.

A more radical contrast to the Ravel than the Sibelius, would be hard to discover, and passing from the one to the other was going from the precious to the heroic, the epigrammatic to the epic, the miniature to the immense. Though the composer and the symphony still cherish within them the secret meaning of this enormous composition, it is impossible not to imagine, at least, that you glimpse the panorama of a gaunt world and the introspection of an austere spirit behind it.

Real Sibelius.

At any rate, its composite of the cryptic and the radiant we know to be one of the world's great symphonies, and we must be grateful for the opportunity to hear it from Dr. Koussevitzky whom we have come to recognize as Sibelius's chief interpreter and authentic translator. It was possible to believe last night that you were hearing all that Sibelius meant this symphony to say, musically and philosophically, because there was about Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of it, the impression of authority on the one hand and deep affection for the composer, on the other. Dr. Koussevitzky was able to evoke the impression of a perplexed and agitated spirit gathering new strength and calm from being close to the earth, and finally projecting itself into release in a great triumphant vision. It was a stirring concept and not without contagion and lesson, and even more than the actual musical statement, something to be grateful to Dr. Koussevitzky for.

As a performance, last night's concert offered some of the most exciting passages of virtuosity. We will long remember the way in which the second movement of the Dvorak floated out of existence on the double basses, the wonderful English horn solo work, the exquisite muted violin fragments from the concertmaster, the elegant work of the woodwinds in the Ravel, the remarkbale remoteness of the horns in the early Sibelius and their bigness in the Dvorak, the trilling of the strings, flutes and clarinets in the Scherzo of this same work—and so along even to the almost amusing crescendo on the triangle in the "New World." All told, it was a richly played evening. If it did not have that elastic dazzlement of spirit that sometimes has astounded us, this must be written off to the nature of the scores, and to the fine restraint with which Dr. Koussevitzky played the entire program, especially the "New World." This latter quality is one we vaunt most highly in this conductor, his ability to perform works beckoning into sentimentality or bombast, without succumbing to such temptation. It was an evening of superlative interpretation of content and continually exciting surfaces across the notes. That's why we have the Boston twice.

T. H. P.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

NOV 10 1938

Boston Symphony Program for First Concert Announced

The program for the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, first of the current Bushnell Concert Series, to be given next Tuesday evening, has been announced.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct "Le Tombeau de Couperin" by Ravel, the Fifth Symphony in E flat major by Sibelius and and Dvorak's Symphony from the New World.

The program will start at 8:15. Dr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony are scheduled to make a second appearance at the Bushnell Memorial later in the season.

I, FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 18, 1938.

N. Y. World-Telegram

Concert Series Begun by Boston Symphony

Opening a local seasonal series of five pairs of Thursday evening-Saturday afternoon concerts, the Boston Symphony Orchestra stirred a Carnegie Hall audience to thunderous applause last night with its superb playing. Serge Koussevitzky occupied his usual place on the podium.

Of the three numbers on the program Sibelius' Fifth Symphony came in for the warmest demonstration. Of course, Mr. Koussevitzky is an American pioneer in the Sibelius terrain and his powers of evoking the full poetic and tonal grandeur of the great Finn's music are an old story.

The performance was rich in subtle dynamic contrasts and overwhelmingly gripping in its cumulative surge of power. Closest attention to minute instrumental episodes made keen and vivid that epigrammatic terseness and incisive fragmentariness that are peculiar qualities of Sibelius' method of thematic development.

It is unquestionably one of the great symphonies, and we are again reminded of Sibelius' strange entry in his diary during the composition of the work:—"God opens the door for a moment and his orchestra plays the fifth symphony!" There were those last night who piously regarded Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra as the next best thing to a celestial broadcast.

Mr. Koussevitzky opened the program with Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin." This is nothing new on a Boston Symphony program, but the performance had a freshness and unanimity of response through all the delicate weavings of Ravel's fancy that made it a new experience.

And, of course, however one may disagree with Mr. Koussevitzky's ideas of tempo and dynamics in Beethoven's Fifth Symphony — the concluding number on the program —there is no resisting the sheer splendor of tone and perfection of detail he gets from his men in this work.

The audience gave him every proof of enjoying the symphony to the full.

* * *

Big Concerto Program at Theater of Music.

Another Gargantuan concerto program drew a good-sized audience to the Theater of Music last night, when the federal concerto forces covered one more lap in their historical survey of piano literature.

The soloists were Judith Sidorsky, Anna Auerbach, Henry Harris and Drusilla Huffmaster — pianists one and all—and, as usual, Edgar Schenkamn conducted the Greenwich Orchestra.

A balanced four-part program began with Mendelsohn's G minor concerto, went on to Schumann's A minor concerto and after the intermission continued with Cesar Franck's "Variations Symphoniques" and the D minor concerto of Rubinstein.

Soloists, orchestra and conductor gave of their technical best and the audience applauded them all to the echo.

* * *

NEW YORK TIMES, FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 18, 1938.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA OPENS SEASON HERE

Serge Koussevitzky Conducts Carnegie Hall Concerts for Appreciative Audience

RAVEL SUITE IS FEATURED

'Tombeau de Couperin' Wins Applause—Music of Sibelius and Beethoven Follow

By OLIN DOWNES

The unrivaled Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor whose catholicity of taste and brilliancy as a leader have made that orchestra what it is today, gave its first New York concert of the season last night in Carnegie Hall before an audience which packed the house and comprised the musically elect of the city.

Tribute was paid the memory of Maurice Ravel, who died last year by the performance of his suite, "Tombeau de Couperin," which, according to the story, was composed by Ravel in memory of a comrade who fell in the World War. The story may or may not be true. The curious will find no hint of the lugubrious or the specifically elegiac in this music. They will rather discern the finish and precision of the French classic style, and the spirit, though conveyed by modern idioms, of the old dances of the eighteenth century.

And the listener might say, "Pooh! The death of a friend! This is lament. This is sheer style sufficient unto itself, and consummate technical mastery. Tragic? It is archaic, in a piquant manner; it is formal, suave, ironical, aloof from emotion." It may be said that if Ravel had thought when he wrote this music of a friend who fell in battle, he would have taken exactly such means as these of commemorating him—not with groans of protestation, or self-pity disguised as mourning, but with a courtliness and laconism that covered proudly his grief. He would have summoned the images of his ancestral past, and its proud and ancient culture. The reality of his emotion would be comprehensible only to the few who understood his gallantry.

A Music of Fascination

In any case, this music, so perfect in style, so adroit and self-conscious in its fabrication, has a singular fascination. It was said of Ravel that he always adapted his technique to the special subject, or experiment, of the occasion, and that he loved experiments. He would have heartily underscored Wilde's essay upon the truth of masks. Here the style is the art, and also the man. After every movement of the suite the listener is prone to split his palms at the sheer admiration of the triumph of idea and workmanship—plus, last night, a most precise, subtle and brilliant performance.

The contrast between this music and Sibelius's Fifth symphony could hardly have been greater. For that matter, it may be said that each of Sibelius's later symphonies is a law unto itself. There is no preconceived formula. The music follows where the idea leads, the idea having as its inevitable consequence the manner of its development. One is aware of a germination, always mysterious and never fully explicable by traditional principles, in these works. Thus the effect of the opening measures of Sibelius's Fifth, like those of his Second, is pastoral, but with what completely different consequences as the two movements, in entirely different ways and through differing harmonic formulae, develop!

Not Easy to Analyze

There is a sense of solitude, always profoundly present in Sibelius's representative scores. The music seems to merge with the vibrations of the natural world, and the thought of the composer to become one with nature about him.

The music is not easily to be analyzed in the sense of personal emotion. It is not possible to put the finger on this measure or that and explain that the passage has such and such a significance. Why? Because this is purest music. Thanks to its power of metamorphosis, the most conventional successions of tones, such as those which make the motive of the middle movement, become extraordinary in their unfoldments. Then occurs in the finale the gradual emergence, from the midst of the murmurings and hummings of the instruments, of the extremely energetic motive, which gathers force and recoils upon and multiplies itself in a fashion almost cellular, until it reaches the culmination, which is as savage and grand as a northern sunrise.

The orchestra played this music magnificently. Dr. Koussevitzky presented in a way which involved a complete synthesis of the composer's thought the long lines of the tonal structure which are created by an accumulation of detail. He understood the composer's instinct for tone-colors and juxtapositions of chords and keys which are not predicated in the textbooks, and of which no other composer than Sibelius was aware.

Sibelius owes much to this interpreter. Could one say more than that this symphony was not made secondary or inadequate by the elemental drama of Beethoven's Fifth symphony, which brought the concert to an end, with a clamorous recognition by the audience of the achievements of the players and the conductor?

TERRE HAUTE, IND.
TRIBUNE

NOV 11 1938

Memberships for the Berkshire Symphonic Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra and Serge Koussevitsky at the new Tanglewood shed next year have been received from 13 states and Canada. Memberships have come from such distant states as Arkansas, California and Florida.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING JOURNAL

NOV 11 1938

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT NOV. 18

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its first Brooklyn concert of the current season Nov. 18, in the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The concert marks the 15th year that Serge Koussevitzky has conducted this annual series. The program will include Beethoven's "Symphony No. 2," Aaron Copland's "El Salon Mexico" and Dvoraks "Symphony No. 5."

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

NOV 17 1938

Boston Symphony Plays in New York

NEW YORK, Nov. 16.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky will make its first appearance of the season in New York Thursday night playing at Carnegie Hall. The program will include two symphonies, Beethoven's Fifth and Sibelius' Fifth. Opening the concert will be Ravel's Le Tombeau de Couperin.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
TIMES

NOV 12 1938

* * *

MEMBERSHIPS for the Berkshire Symphonic Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitsky at the new Tanglewood shed next year have been received from 13 states and Canada. Memberships have come from such distant states as Arkansas, California and Florida.

N.Y. Her. Tribune Nov. 18/38

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

The Boston Symphony Starts Its New York Season at Carnegie Hall

First New York concert this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Sergei Koussevitzky conductor, at Carnegie Hall.

PROGRAM

Ravel . . . "Le Tombeau de Couperin," Suite
I. Prélude.
II. Forlane.
III. Menuet.
IV. Rigaudon.
Sibelius
Symphony No. 5, in E-flat major, Op. 82
I. Tempo molto moderato.
II. Allegretto—moderato, ma poco a poco stretto.
III. Andante mosso, quasi allegretto.
IV. Allegro molto.

Intermission

Beethoven.
Symphony No. 5, in C Minor, Op. 67
I. Allegro con brio.
II. Andante con moto.
III. Allegro: rio.
IV. Allegro.

THE audience that gathered in Carnegie Hall for the first Boston Symphony concert of the season was a sight to cheer the most despondent music-lover—if any such were in the neighborhood. The occasion wore an unmistakable air of festival. No palms or wreaths or smilax or potted plants adorned the stage or auditorium. They were not required. The audience itself provided the adornment and the festal note.

* * *

It was a remarkable audience—so large that one had the odd impression that there were at least two persons occupying every seat. A sense of well-bred eagerness hummed through the hall—for this audience was nothing if not well-bred. It was an audience that diffused intelligence and well-being and responsiveness and gentle manners. It was both excited and restrained. It was electrically vibrant. It was determined to be musically pleased, and certain that it would be. It greeted Mr. Koussevitzky, when he appeared upon the stage, with an explosive outburst of applause; and one expected to see it rise to its feet, in emulation of the orchestra's action—undoubtedly it wanted to, but felt a bit shy.

The words Success—Prestige—Achievement were not inscribed upon banners or in electric lights above the platform. They did not need to be, for one could read their meaning in every facet of the spectacle.

* * *

And this was a concert by an orchestra which, approximately twenty years ago, seemed to be as nearly down and out as an orchestra could be and survive; an orchestra that had lost, through the accidents of War and public circumstance and misfortune, most of the brilliant distinction and prosperity that it had won during its long and illustrious history of three generations.

Out of that melancholy slough the Orchestra has climbed, slowly, steadily, indomitably. Today, twenty years after the disaster that it suffered, it has come through, magnificently and completely. It is now one of the two of three excelling orchestras of the world, a superb instrument of beauty and eloquence; and the organization that directs it is a model of dignity, efficiency, and artistic self-respect.

If all this is not a triumph of will and spirit and integrity over adversity and mischance, a triumph that cannot be too loudly cheered, one does not know what else to call it.

* * *

Mr. Koussevitzky is a deft and canny program-builder, with a lively sense of public psychology. He had devised for his first evening concert in Carnegie Hall a perfectly constructed list of pieces, fit for the occasion, the place, the mood, the time. First the "Tombeau de Couperin" of Ravel, with its exquisite artificiality and grace, its delicate touch of harmonic asperity, its craft and guile and charm. Then the great Fifth Symphony of Sibelius, with its nobly heroic passion and inspiration. And, as closing piece, another Fifth Symphony, which, as Sir James Barrie's Policeman would certainly have recognized, is infalliable.

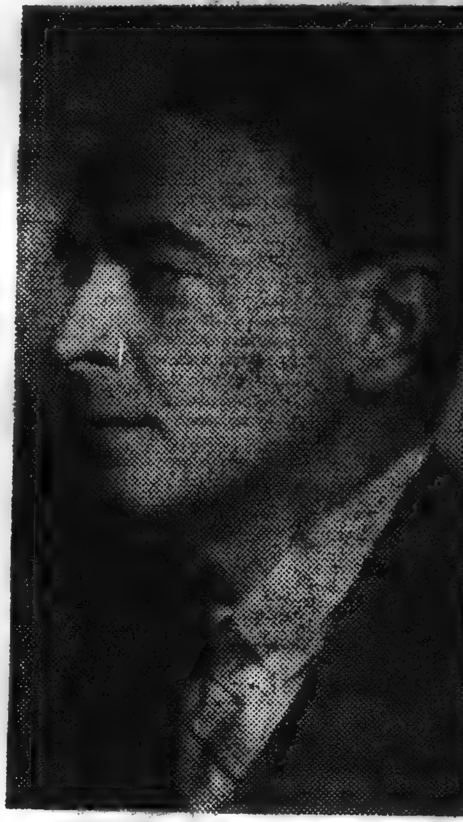
* * *

The whole program, in fact, was infalliable. Its hearers followed it with absorbed intentness, and rewarded each performance with that peculiar kind of fervor that one notes at a Boston Symphony concert.

It was a joy to hear once more the splendid orchestra, especially in its playing of the Sibelius symphony. In the matchless finale, with its strange and mystical coda—music which is uplifted upon a secret wave of valor and exaltation and heroic strength—one thought, as one listened, of the composer's own description of his mood at the time that he composed it:

> ". . . As if I were preparing to quit this life, and while descending into my grave, shot an eagle on the wing—sighted well and skillfully, and without a thought of what was to come."

Serge Koussevitzky



Conducting the Boston Symphony at its first New York concert

Boston Symphony Returns

Visitors Give First Concert of Their Fifty-third Season in New York.

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

Consecutive fifths may or may not have ceased to be an issue of orthodox harmony, but they can be effective in program-making, as Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony made manifest in Carnegie Hall last night. In this instance the consecutives were the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius and the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven. Prefaced by Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin" suite, they supplied the musical substance of the first concert of the Boston Symphony's fifty-third New York season.

If it contained no element of novelty, the list of compositions presented was one shrewdly chosen to exhibit the finest and most characteristic qualities of this remarkable ensemble. The Ravel suite is music stylistic and coloristic. In performance it requires most of all a lapidary cut and polish, that it may flash its facets with no clouding of detail. There was an abundance of glitter. The Boston Symphony obviously was its distinctive self and Dr. Koussevitzky as fastidious as ever.

The E flat symphony of Sibelius, as time has done much to make clear, is not a gloomy or a steely work. Its close is jubilant and along the way leading to this triumphant pæan is a play of sunlight only to be realized by brilliant and buoyant playing. The brass color of the Boston ensemble is peculiarly right for this music. But the same must be said for the woodwinds and for the strings. Conceivably the symphony never has stated its case here more clearly. But with clarity and tonal opulence went a tingling vitality.

In the past Dr. Koussevitzky's playing of the Beethoven C minor symphony has had its debatable points, among them a certain hardening of the tone in what has seemed to this reviewer an excess of nervous drive. There was less of this in last night's performance of the C minor than in some of its predecessors, though it remained on the bright and sharp-edged side. In its details it represented individual and group playing of the highest finish. Is there anywhere a double-bass section that meets the famous old challenge of the scherzo as this one does? Or is the ear influenced more than ordinarily by the eye, because of the unusual position of the big fiddles well up front at the left of the platform?

If last night's audience troubled itself at all with such speculations they had no effect on its enthusiasm. Dr. Koussevitzky was rousingly applauded at all the proper places, and his musicians were called to their feet that they might have their share.

THE JEWISH ADVOCATE, FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 18, 1938

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By JULES WOLFFERS

Boston Symphony

For the sixth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitsky chose the second Symphony of Beethoven; a new Concerto for violin by Professor Hill of Harvard University; and the Sibelius Fifth Symphony. Ruth Posselt was violin soloist.

Professor Hill has probably not written an unpleasant page of music in his life. The present violin concerto is no execption to his other works. It is pleasant music, melodious, well-turned, neat and flexible. Now and then a mildly non-consonant passage reminds us that we are indeed past the first third of the 20th century, but this need not disturb any person. Yet this much can be said for the Concerto—it has not a cheap passage in it, and the music is well-written and well-orchestrated. Miss Posselt met and overcame the considerable technical difficulties of the solo violin part. Her playing is clear and clean-cut, her tone is good and her devotion to the music and to the composer's intentions was unmistakable.

The conductor's reading of both the Beethoven and Sibelius was, in the opinion of this reviewer, beyond criticism. The orchestra and Dr. Koussevitsky were simply superb; the effect on the listener was overwhelming as the tremendous ovation at the close of each symphony attested.

This week the orchestra is on a tour that embraces concerts in Hartford, New Haven, New York and Brooklyn. The next regular pair of concerts will take place November 25 and 26. Eugene Goosens will be guest conductor. The program will include: Overture to the "Occasional Oratorio", Handel; Carnival, Schumann, orchestrated by Rimsky-Korsakov, Liadov, Glazounov and Tcherepnin; Two Nature Poems, Goosens; (all the above being first performances at these concerts); "Manfred" Symphony, Tschaikovsky.

New Orchestra Scores

Books and Music, Inc., publishers of the International Music Edition, has just issued the first volume of a library of orchestra scores designed for musicians, musical amateurs, music schools and libraries. Dr. Hugo Leichtentritt of Harvard University, editor-in-chief of the firm, contributes biographies of the composers together with a history and synopsis of each composition. The publications will average about 400 pages of score and text. The retail price of each volume will be $3; the subscription price is $2.25.

Judging from the first volume which contains Beethoven overtures, these scores will be a welcome addition to any music library. The printing is clear and correct, the paper is of good quality and the volume is very durably bound. Below each score page is an excellent piano transcription with all cues clearly marked. The volume comes enclosed in a cardboard box with the names of composer and compositions printed on the outside. All in all, this is an excellent edition. The fact that Dr. Leichtentritt is in editorial charge of this venture speaks for itself.

Ballon Appointed

Director Joseph Malkin of the Malkin Conservatory of Music announces the appointment of Hedda Ballon, for 18 years with the Vienna Conservatory, as Harpsichord instructor. Mrs. Ballon, who arrived here from Vienna in September, plans to make her home permanently in Boston. Her experience as harpsichordist and harpsichord teacher has been extensive.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
OCT 30 1938

In The World Of Music . . . .

By H. Earle Johnson

FULLY recognizing that great art movements are rarely self-supporting, the friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have undertaken to enlist the aid of its audiences everywhere toward meeting the inevitable deficit. The Metropolitan Opera Guild is similarly organized for the same purpose, and the New Haven Orchestra Association has made appeals for a guaranty fund. Similar efforts, of one kind or another, are regularly made throughout the country, and brought to function with gratifying success.

There is wisely no attempt made to disguise the fact that the immediate need is for funds, but neither have the Bostonians indicated that by the obeying of that gracious gesture there is nought to be gained by the donor. Bostonians, after all, are a tight little race which likes to know the wherefore of a matter; they enjoy perusing a budget which reveals the exact need and, at the same time, renews awareness to the extensive program carried on by one of the world's great cultural forces. Thus apprized, they are delighted to contribute to a work in which they have an exceeding pride.

Good Figures

The corporation is under the control of a board of trustees serving as directors; it now owns Symphony Hall, subject to a small mortgage, and manages invested funds of approximately $400,000 which yield a small income. These funds have accumulated through bequests and generous gifts. Beginning with 24 concerts a year, the number has now increased to over 200 in the eastern part of the country, more than 20,000 persons attend in Boston, and approximately 200,000 in all. Next summer the orchestra assumes direction of the Esplanade outdoor concerts, establishing a completely graded set of activities, what with "Pops" during June, children's concerts, and that gleaming hope—the Berkshire Festival, a potential movement of inestimable scope for the world at large.

New Haven was among the first cities regularly visited by the Bostonians, if the writer's investigation is correct, having been a part of the first tour to New York in 1886. For this reason, and in view of its continuing association with our musical life, we may feel a pride in the fortunes of the Boston Symphony. It is today the only attraction unfailingly certain of selling out Woolsey Hall to the rafters.

Incidentally, it's able and courteous management is famed far and wide among local sponsorships and the press at large.

Boston's Plan

In an art where much undue extravagance is the rule, one may be grateful for the exercise of certain New England virtues relating to economy, for one of the principal convictions to be gained by reading the statement of the Boston Symphony relates to the efficiency of its operation. Accordingly, all but 15 per cent of the total expenses are met by the regular channels of income; the remainder must be provided by friends.

The friends of the Orchestra make contributions in either large or small amounts toward maintenance; the number of donors has increased from less than 700 to well over 2,000 in four years. Enrollments for the forthcoming season are now invited since appeal is made at the beginning of the season in order that complete assurance may be early available of abundant support toward fulfilling those commitments already negotiated. Several New Haven persons are constant in subscribing and other friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are invited to make themselves known.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
NOV 13 1938

A large and enthusiastic audience greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday evening at the Metropolitan Theatre, where the second concert of its season was presented under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

Nov. 20/38

COPLAND NOVELTY IN PREMIERE HERE

'El Salon Mexico' Performed by Boston Symphony Under Serge Koussevitzky

By OLIN DOWNES

The place that Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Orchestra hold in the esteem of the New York public was shown again yesterday afternoon by the audience which packed Carnegie Hall and testified after each performance to its enthusiasm. As is customary at these concerts, there was no soloist. None is required. In fact, in most cases at these concerts a soloist would be an intrusion. For the orchestra, when Koussevitsky and his men made music, is itself the supreme soloist.

A novelty by Aaron Copeland, "El Salon Mexico," was performed for the first time in this city on this occasion. This music was suggested to Mr. Copeland in the course of a visit that he made to Mexico six years ago. He heard the players and watched the dancers in a popular resort in Mexico City, and he has transcribed his impression.

In a program note Mr. Copland is careful to state that he has not attempted to portray the Mexico of ancient civilization or modern revolution. Neither is this a tone-picture of the Mexican land. It is Mexican in the same sense, presumably, that a Frenchman's music would be American if he had gone to the Casino in Harlem and later composed about it on the basis of what he heard there, or rather the sort of music that he heard there. For Mr. Copland does not take his themes from a sketchbook wherein they were noted down as he listened. He has taken them from two Mexican collections of popular melodies, as Chabrier wove his "España" from known folk-melodies of Spain.

This music is ingeniously orchestrated, with the aid of certain percussion instruments which are exotic and with suggestive effects which bestow color and twang. The harmonization does not seek for strangeness, yet avoids the conventional and pursues a course dictated by the nature of the themes.

Adventure in Idiom

It is a brilliant adventure in a certain idiom. There is always the danger, where many themes are employed and especially when they are dance themes of a clearly defined length and rhythmical physiognomy, of a composition that will be patchwork. This danger is met competently by the composer because the motives are made to cohere and in the process of development to accumulate—at least technically. The work was very well received. After Dr. Koussevitzky had brought Mr. Copland to the stage, the latter returned by himself to acknowledge the welcome of the audience.

With the exception of this work—and for the writer rather regrettably—the program was confined to classics of an order imminently safe and sane. This is not to slight the beauty and the delight of Beethoven's Second symphony and Brahms' Fourth. But most of the orchestral programs given in this city follow the beaten track, whereas in former seasons one could always look to the orchestra from Boston to let us know what many contemporaneous composers were doing and in a majority of cases to produce some worth-while novelties. No doubt for some in the audience the present type of Koussevitzky programs is comforting. Yet we are supposed to be a public curious and receptive to new ideas.

Note on Second Symphony

The performance of the Second symphony was ravashing for its finish and for the beautiful blend of the sonorities. Though early Beethoven, it is a perfect masterpiece, and it was received with an enthusiasm that belied its years. For it is as fresh today as the day it was born. However, the performance tended over-much to the discreet. Doubtless Mr. Koussevitzky views this early symphony of Beethoven as purest classicism—as Beethoven still the dutiful heir of Haydn and Mozart. The conductor evidently intended to keep it to that scale of sonorous values.

But there is much in this score which is revolutionary, of an explosive force, and a jocosity peculiarly Beethoven's. It was in the last movement, principally, that this quality found expression yesterday. As a whole, we heard a Beethoven who was somewhat on his good manners. There is impoliteness in the Second symphony.

One might say that the whole era of the classic symphony was synthesized in the concert which began with Beethoven's Second and ended with the autumnal music which Brahms composed only a few months before his death, and which will endure as one of the supreme movements of the tonal art.

Koussevitzky and His Band Please the Manhattanites

B. Trans. - Nov. 19/38

Report from the Scene as the Conductor Commences His Fifteenth Season There

NEW YORK.

Certainly the Boston Symphony is New York's orchestra. In Carnegie Hall on a Thursday evening there is no reason to doubt that the orchestra was created, rehearsed and mounted upon the Georgian stage solely for metropolitan delectation. The Bostonian, sitting modestly by, can only note with pleasure the warmth with which the city welcomes Dr. Koussevitzky and his men, sigh wistfully for his lost muse: for it is no longer his; he is a stranger before the familiar fire that was his orchestra. A mere provincial, he is tempted to reason, is fortunate to be vouchsafed this blessing; lucky he is to be able to attend this occasion, let alone participate in it.

And what an occasion it is! When New York does these things, it does them well. The maze of cabs, the glitter of limousines, the sea of toppers, the rustle of silk and satin, the pervasive aroma of a hundred gardenias, the tantalizing discretion of the ubiquitous orchid. The Bostonian recalls an opera opening, thinks of the ballet first-night, makes mental calculation of the importance of the moth-ball in preserving Boston between its dozen seasonal functions. New York takes these things in stride; sensing an occasion, it honors its guests and itself with a graciousness that is in keeping with the significance of the event in hand.

Dr. Koussevitzky had drawn upon the nineteenth and the twentieth centuries for music to celebrate the opening of his fifteenth season in New York. Ravel provided "Le Tombeau de Couperin" to initiate the proceedings; Sibelius and Beethoven each offered a Fifth Symphony to continue and conclude. The acoustics of Carnegie Hall, while dissimilar to those of Symphony Hall, have much to recommend them. They have not, however, the power to project a soaring mass of sonorous tone through space so that it may be perceived as a tangible entity. They cannot produce sonority that will encompass and engulf. Thus the audience could not be swallowed up by the fierce demands of the Finnish symphony, but it could marvel at the conductor's insight, his fine passion in projecting this absorbing music.

Many Boston hands have sought to recount in words the aptness of the conductor's way with Sibelius' Fifth Symphony, and it is neither the duty or the intention of this writer to add to the neat effusions already composed. He would like to record, however, that the audience was plainly electrified by the magnificence of the music in Dr. Koussevitzky's compelling interpretation. The still, small voices of the woodwind, the ominous calls of the horns over rumbling drums, the steady mounting to heights of passionate intensity, the subsiding and surging, the propulsion and festal sweep of the climaxes—all these the conductor heard and projected. The audience was plain in showing that it had seen his vision.

Earlier in the evening it had listened to the many exquisite charms of Ravel's orchestral masterpiece. After the intermission it turned its attention to that thrice-familiar ceremony, the Fifth of Beethoven. Yet with the first sounding forth of the tragic kernel that is to be the dominating and enkindling spark of the whole, a wave of light seemed to pass from pit to gallery; a refreshed attention took visible form in the stiffening of backs and eagerness of eye. Not through the first movement did it flag, not through the lengthy and "moralizing" slow movement, not, indeed, through the alternating ardors of the scherzo or the trumpeting and continued heights of the plateau-like finale; this new spirit of discovery pervaded the round upon round of applause and sent the dazzled listeners from the hall with a fresh understanding of the wizardry of Beethoven. . . . There is no doubt that the Boston Symphony is New York's orchestra.

G. H. L. S.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

NOV 12 1938

Boston Symphony Concerts Begin Here Next Week

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, will open next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall the season of five pairs of concerts in New York. The program for the Thursday evening concert will consist of Ravel's Suite "Le Tombeau de Couperin," the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius in E flat and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor.

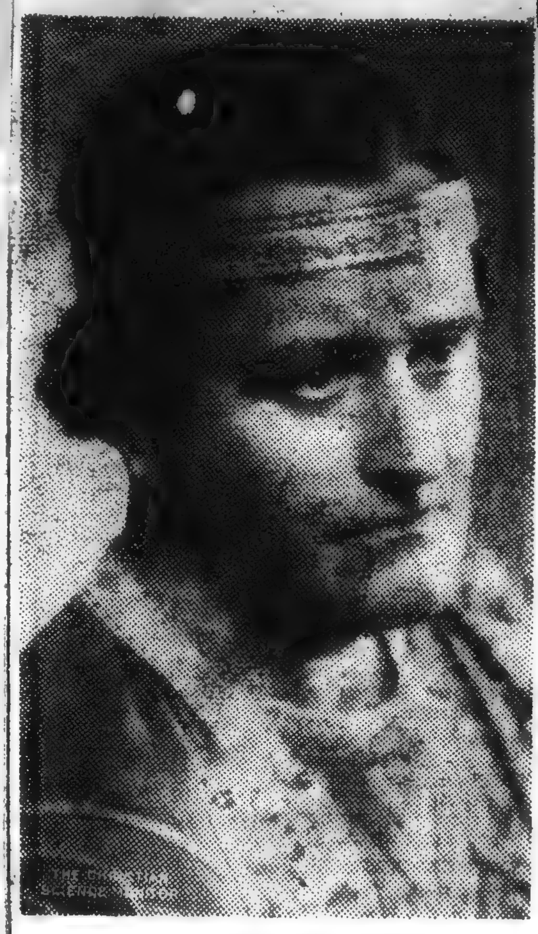
At the Saturday afternoon concert Mr. Koussevitzky will give the first public performance in New York of Aaron Copland's Rhapsody, "El Salon Mexico." The piece is the result of a visit to Mexico by the composer and utilizes popular Mexican tunes, such tunes which are heard at the cafe in Mexico City which gives the rhapsody its name. "El Salon Mexico" has been performed in Mexico City under Chavez. It was chosen to represent the United States at the Festival of the International Society for Contemporary Music in London last summer. Sir Adrian Boult, conducting it there, likewise led a broadcast performance in New York. The matinee program will also include Beethoven's Second Symphony in D major and the Fourth Symphony of Brahms in E minor.

The orchestra will give its first Brooklyn concert of the season next Friday evening, November 18, in the Brooklyn Academy of Music. This concert marks the fifteenth year that Koussevitzky has conducted this annual series. The program will contain Beethoven's Symphony No. 2, Aaron Copland's "El Salon Mexico" and Dvorak's "New World Symphony."

B. T. Trans. Nov /38

Three Musicians in the [illegible] News

Monitor - Nov. 22/38



Aroldo Lindi

Of the San Carlo Opera Company, currently at the Boston Opera House.

Eugene Goossens

Who is conducting the Boston Symphony concerts this week.

© Bachrach

Ludwig Juht

Who will give a recital in Jordan Hall, Monday evening.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
TIMES

NOV 11 1938

Our Town

By Anton Scherrer

Have You Heard Latest Sevitzky Story? Well, It Seems Some Other Conductors Had Same Experience.

CASES without comment: Indianapolis has a Venus Beauty Shoppe; what's more a Nu-Venus Beauty Salon. . . The Ayres people are featuring "Shirred Eggs a la Georgia Sand." . . . There's a Book-A-Zine Shop on E. Washington St. . . . In the northeast part of town three out of every dozen Negro babies, bless their little hearts, are baptized Shirley Temple. . . . The reason the pavement at Pennsylvania and 21st Sts. won't stay put is because the old State Ditch continues to run through that part of town; P. J. Ryan told me so. . . . Miss Sappho Zilch wears smoked glasses since she learned that a good bridge hand dilates the eye pupils. . . .

Mr. Scherrer

There's the latest Sevitzky story, too. Chances are you've heard it, but even if you have you've only heard the beginning. The story: Last year, for some reason or other, Mr. Sevitzky had occasion to fire one of his musicians. That ended the rehearsal. On his way out the discharged musician passed the dressing room where the conductor was sitting gloomily hunched over a table. The musician stopped. "Nuts to you, Sevitzky," he bellowed. Mr. Sevitzky turned his tired head. "It's too late to apologize," he snapped.

Well, as I said in the beginning, that's only the start of the story. A month ago, on Oct. 10, to be exact, Time ran a six-column feature article covering every phase of the life and behavior of Sergei Koussevitzky, and doggone if they didn't hang the same story on the conductor of the Boston Symphony. But wait, there's more to it.

Mr. Knopf Is Astonished

Last week Time ran a letter written by Alfred A. Knopf, the publisher. "I am astonished," said Mr. Knopf, "that Time should have fallen for an old and, I believe, authentic Toscanini story."

And certainly I would be ducking a duty to my readers if I failed to tell them about a book by Adrien de Meeus I picked up in Paris last summer. It's called "Amusante Amerique" and lives up to its title. As far as I know the book hasn't been translated which is why I didn't reach the chapter titled "In the Jungle of Marriage" until last night. If you'll put up with the way I translate French, this is what Mr. Meeus says on page 203:

"The universities themselves attach the greatest importance to the problem. One finds, for example, at Butler University a course on marriage designed to solve the family problems of the married or to prepare people for marriage before their union. The professor in charge is Ch. R. Metzger, a one-time lawyer, twice married, who has had a vast experience in affairs of divorce."

There's nothing like a trip to Paris to broaden a fellow.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

NOV 9 - 1938

BOSTON SYMPHONY PRESENTS HEIFETZ

Violin Master Is Soloist for Second Concert of Season at Metropolitan Theatre.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra with Richard Burgin conducting, and Jascha Heifetz as soloist, offered the second concert of the current season at the Metropolitan Theatre last evening, with the following program:

Concerto in D minor for orchestra
(edited by A. Siloti) .... Vivaldi
  I. Maestoso
  II. Largo
  III. Allegro
Violin Concerto in D major, No. 4
(Koechel No. 218) .... Mozart
  I. Allegro
  II. Andante cantabile
  III. Rondo: Andante grazioso
INTERMISSION
Violin Concerto No. 2 in G minor,
Op. 63 .... Prokofieff
  I. Allegro moderato
  II. Andante assai
  III. Allegro ben marcato
"Romeo and Juliet," Overture-
Fantasia .... Tchaikovsky

For those who love the olden form in music, with its matter-of-fact progressions and meticulous little phrases all arranged exactly so-and-so, there was the Vivaldi orchestral "Concerto," and the Mozart violin "Concerto" (in D major). Those who thrill at expectant moods or revel in the intricacy of modern orchestration were regaled with the comparatively new Prokofieff "Concerto" which received its American premiere last season.

The formality of the Vivaldi "Concerto" was adequately portrayed under Mr. Burgin's baton, and the contrapuntal interweavings of the Maestoso were given with a definiteness that quickly established the conductor's ability: and he led his men through the "Largo" and "Allegro" in a manner which placed the listeners in a peculiarly receptive mood for the enjoyment of the Mozart "Concerto" which followed. Here, the orchestra provided a carefully tempered setting for Mr. Heifetz, and 'ere the "Andante Cantabile" was begun, orchestra and soloist combined in giving as gracious a performance as one might expect.

Mr. Heifetz's tone became almost vocal in the "Andante", and his bowings are subtly tinged with inflective delicacy; which of course made the concluding "Andante Grazioso" a sheer bit of violinistic delight.

In the Prokofieff "Concerto" both soloist and orchestra were at their best. It is primarily the type of work in which Mr. Heifetz excels, and the brilliance of his technic was enhanced by the excellent support of the orchestra in both the first and final movements. Dazzling sequences of spiccato bowings scintillated against the studied background provided by the orchestra, while muted strings, and pizzicati, countered by a singing portamento all vied with each other in the kaleidoscopic whirl of musical color which this brilliant concerto provides.

The Overture-Fantasia "Romeo and Juliet" by Tschaikowsky, brought the program to a close.

W. P. Jr.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
NOV 9 - 1938

BOSTON SYMPHONY PRESENTS HEIFETZ

Violin Master Is Soloist for Second Concert of Season at Metropolitan Theatre.

PLAYS MOZART CONCERTO

Guest and Orchestra Heard at Best in Vivaldi Work Demonstrating His Splendid Technique

The Boston Symphony Orchestra with Richard Burgin conducting, and

Etc. like above →

Koussevitzky and His Band Please the Manhattanites

B. Trans. - Nov. 19/38

Report from the Scene as the Conductor Commences His Fifteenth Season There

NEW YORK.

Certainly the Boston Symphony is New York's orchestra. In Carnegie Hall on a Thursday evening there is no reason to doubt that the orchestra was created, rehearsed and mounted upon the Georgian stage solely for metropolitan delectation. The Bostonian, sitting modestly by, can only note with pleasure the warmth with which the city welcomes Dr. Koussevitzky and his men, sigh wistfully for his lost muse: for it is no longer his; he is a stranger before the familiar fire that was his orchestra. A mere provincial, he is tempted to reason, is fortunate to be vouchsafed this blessing; lucky he is to be able to attend this occasion, let alone participate in it.

And what an occasion it is! When New York does these things, it does them well. The maze of cabs, the glitter of limousines, the sea of toppers, the rustle of silk and satin, the pervasive aroma of a hundred gardenias, the tantalizing discretion of the ubiquitous orchid. The Bostonian recalls an opera opening, thinks of the ballet first-night, makes mental calculation of the importance of the moth-ball in preserving Boston between its dozen seasonal functions. New York takes these things in stride; sensing an occasion, it honors its guests and itself with a graciousness that is in keeping with the significance of the event in hand.

Dr. Koussevitzky had drawn upon the nineteenth and the twentieth centuries for music to celebrate the opening of his fifteenth season in New York. Ravel provided "Le Tombeau de Couperin" to initiate the proceedings; Sibelius and Beethoven each offered a Fifth Symphony to continue and conclude. The acoustics of Carnegie Hall, while dissimilar to those of Symphony Hall, have much to recommend them. They have not, however, the power to project a soaring mass of sonorous tone through space so that it may be perceived as a tangible entity. They cannot produce sonority that will encompass and engulf. Thus the audience could not be swallowed up by the fierce demands of the Finnish symphony, but it could marvel at the conductor's insight, his fine passion in projecting this absorbing music.

Many Boston hands have sought to recount in words the aptness of the conductor's way with Sibelius' Fifth Symphony, and it is neither the duty or the intention of this writer to add to the neat effusions already composed. He would like to record, however, that the audience was plainly electrified by the magnificence of the music in Dr. Koussevitzky's compelling interpretation. The still, small voices of the woodwind, the ominous calls of the horns over rumbling drums, the steady mounting to heights of passionate intensity, the subsiding and surging, the propulsion and festal sweep of the climaxes—all these the conductor heard and projected. The audience was plain in showing that it had seen his vision.

Earlier in the evening it had listened to the many exquisite charms of Ravel's orchestral masterpiece. After the intermission it turned its attention to that thrice-familiar ceremony, the Fifth of Beethoven. Yet with the first sounding forth of the tragic kernel that is to be the dominating and enkindling spark of the whole, a wave of light seemed to pass from pit to gallery; a refreshed attention took visible form in the stiffening of backs and eagerness of eye. Not through the first movement did it flag, not through the lengthy and "moralizing" slow movement, not, indeed, through the alternating ardors of the scherzo or the trumpeting and continued heights of the plateau-like finale; this new spirit of discovery pervaded the round upon round of applause and sent the dazzled listeners from the hall with a fresh understanding of the wizardry of Beethoven. . . . There is no doubt that the Boston Symphony is New York's orchestra.

G. H. L. S.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

NOV 1 2 1938

Boston Symphony Concerts Begin Here Next Week

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, will open next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall the season of five pairs of concerts in New York. The program for the Thursday evening concert will consist of Ravel's Suite "Le Tombeau de Couperin," the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius in E flat and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor.

At the Saturday afternoon concert Mr. Koussevitzky will give the first public performance in New York of Aaron Copland's Rhapsody, "El Salon Mexico." The piece is the result of a visit to Mexico by the composer and utilizes popular Mexican tunes, such tunes which are heard at the cafe in Mexico City which gives the rhapsody its name. "El Salon Mexico" has been performed in Mexico City under Chavez. It was chosen to represent the United States at the Festival of the International Society for Contemporary Music in London last summer. Sir Adrian Boult, conducting it there, likewise led a broadcast performance in New York. The matinee program will also include Beethoven's Second Symphony in D major and the Fourth Symphony of Brahms in E minor.

The orchestra will give its first Brooklyn concert of the season next Friday evening, November 18, in the Brooklyn Academy of Music. This concert marks the fifteenth man fear him (with any reasonable excuse) he will probably take himself off and go back to his wife.

---

are of Thanksgiving We

B. Trans. Nov [illegible]/38

Three Musicians in the News

Monitor - Nov. 22/38

Aroldo Lindi
Of the San Carlo Opera Company, currently at the Boston Opera House.

Eugene Goossens
Who is conducting the Boston Symphony concerts this week.

© Bachrach

Ludwig Juht
Who will give a recital in Jordan Hall, Monday evening.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
TIMES

NOV 1 1 1938

Our Town

By Anton Scherrer

Have You Heard Latest Sevitzky Story? Well, It Seems Some Other Conductors Had Same Experience.

CASES without comment: Indianapolis has a Venus Beauty Shoppe; what's more a Nu-Venus Beauty Salon. . . The Ayres people are featuring "Shirred Eggs a la Georgia Sand." . . . There's a Book-A-Zine Shop on E. Washington St. . . . In the northeast part of town three out of every dozen Negro babies, bless their little hearts, are baptized Shirley Temple. . . . The reason the pavement at Pennsylvania and 21st Sts. won't stay put is because the old State Ditch continues to run through that part of town; P. J. Ryan told me so. . . . Miss Sappho Zilch wears smoked glasses since she learned that a good bridge hand dilates the eye pupils. . . .

Mr. Scherrer

There's the latest Sevitzky story, too. Chances are you've heard it, but even if you have you've only heard the beginning. The story: Last year, for some reason or other, Mr. Sevitzky had occasion to fire one of his musicians. That ended the rehearsal. On his way out the discharged musician passed the dressing room where the conductor was sitting gloomily hunched over a table. The musician stopped. "Nuts to you, Sevitzky," he bellowed. Mr. Sevitzky turned his tired head. "It's too late to apologize," he snapped.

Well, as I said in the beginning, that's only the start of the story. A month ago, on Oct. 10, to be exact, Time ran a six-column feature article covering every phase of the life and behavior of Sergei Koussevitzky, and doggone if they didn't hang the same story on the conductor of the Boston Symphony. But wait, there's more to it.

Mr. Knopf Is Astonished

Last week Time ran a letter written by Alfred A. Knopf, the publisher. "I am astonished," said Mr. Knopf, "that Time should have fallen for an old and, I believe, authentic Toscanini story."

And certainly I would be ducking a duty to my readers if I failed to tell them about a book by Adrien de Meeus I picked up in Paris last summer. It's called "Amusante Amerique" and lives up to its title. As far as I know the book hasn't been translated which is why I didn't reach the chapter titled "In the Jungle of Marriage" until last night. If you'll put up with the way I translate French, this is what Mr. Meeus says on page 203:

"The universities themselves attach the greatest importance to the problem. One finds, for example, at Butler University a course on marriage designed to solve the family problems of the married or to prepare people for marriage before their union. The professor in charge is Ch. R. Metzger, a one-time lawyer, twice married, who has had a vast experience in affairs of divorce."

There's nothing like a trip to Paris to broaden a fellow.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
NOV 9 - 1938

BOSTON SYMPHONY PRESENTS HEIFETZ

iolin Master Is Soloist for Second Concert of Season at Metropolitan Theatre.

PLAYS MOZART CONCERTO

uest and Orchestra Heard at Best in Vivaldi Work Demonstrating His Splendid Technique

The Boston Symphony Orchestra vith Richard Burgin conducting, and Etc. like above →

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

NOV 9 - 1938

BOSTON SYMPHONY PRESENTS HEIFETZ

Violin Master Is Soloist for Second Concert of Season at Metropolitan Theatre.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra with Richard Burgin conducting, and Jascha Heifetz as soloist, offered the second concert of the current season at the Metropolitan Theatre last evening, with the following program:

Concerto in D minor for orchestra (edited by A. Siloti) .... Vivaldi
- I. Maestoso
- II. Largo
- III. Allegro

Violin Concerto in D major, No. 4 (Koechel No. 218) .... Mozart
- I. Allegro
- II. Andante cantabile
- III. Rondo: Andante grazioso

INTERMISSION

Violin Concerto No. 2 in G minor, Op. 63 .... Prokofieff
- I. Allegro moderato
- II. Andante assai
- III. Allegro ben marcato

"Romeo and Juliet," Overture-Fantasia .... Tchaikovsky

For those who love the olden form in music, with its matter-of-fact progressions and meticulous little phrases all arranged exactly so-and-so, there was the Vivaldi orchestral "Concerto," and the Mozart violin "Concerto" (in D major). Those who thrill at expectant moods or revel in the intricacy of modern orchestration were regaled with the comparatively new Prokofieff "Concerto" which received its American premiere last season.

The formality of the Vivaldi "Concerto" was adequately portrayed under Mr. Burgin's baton, and the contrapuntal interweavings of the Maestoso were given with a definiteness that quickly established the conductor's ability: and he led his men through the "Largo" and "Allegro" in a manner which placed the listeners in a peculiarly receptive mood for the enjoyment of the Mozart "Concerto" which followed. Here, the orchestra provided a carefully tempered setting for Mr. Heifetz, and 'ere the "Andante Cantabile" was begun, orchestra and soloist combined in giving as gracious a performance as one might expect.

Mr. Heifetz's tone became almost vocal in the "Andante", and his bowings are subtly tinged with inflective delicacy; which of course made the concluding "Andante Grazioso" a sheer bit of violinistic delight.

In the Prokofieff "Concerto" both soloist and orchestra were at their best. It is primarily the type of work in which Mr. Heifetz excels, and the brilliance of his technic was enhanced by the excellent support of the orchestra in both the first and final movements. Dazzling sequences of spiccato bowings scintillated against the studied background provided by the orchestra, while muted strings, and pizzicati, countered by a singing portamento all vied with each other in the kaleidoscopic whirl of musical color which this brilliant concerto provides.

The Overture-Fantasia "Romeo and Juliet" by Tschaikowsky, brought the program to a close.

W. P. Jr.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

NOV 13 1938

Symphony Will Play Friday

Opening Concert Will Attract Society to The Academy of Music

Brooklyn society will attend the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra when the fifty-third season in Brooklyn opens on Friday night in the Academy of Music.

Many members of the committee will occupy box and orchestra seats. Members of Brooklyn Woman's Club will occupy Box 6 and faculty and students from Adelphi Academy will occupy Box 5.

New members of the Brooklyn Committee, which is headed by Adrian Van Sinderen, chairman, and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, acting chairman, will attend the opening concert. New members are Mrs. James G. McDonald, Miss Agness Ritchie, Mrs. John Bauer and Miss Mary Ogg. Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow is membership chairman and Mrs. Edward C. Blum is chairman of boxes.

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, will offer as his opening program Beethoven's Symphony No. 2 in D major, Opus 36; Copland's "El Salon Mexico" and Dvorak's Symphony No. 5 in E minor, "From the New World," Opus 95.

Boxholders the opening night will be Mrs. Thomas E. Murray Jr., Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Adelphi Academy Alumnae Association, in charge of Miss Jessie Ogg; the committee box, which will be occupied by leaders of high school orchestras in Brooklyn; Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Mrs. William H. Good, Mrs. Oliver G. Carter, Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock and Rear Admiral Clarke H. Woodward, commander of the Brooklyn Navy Yard.

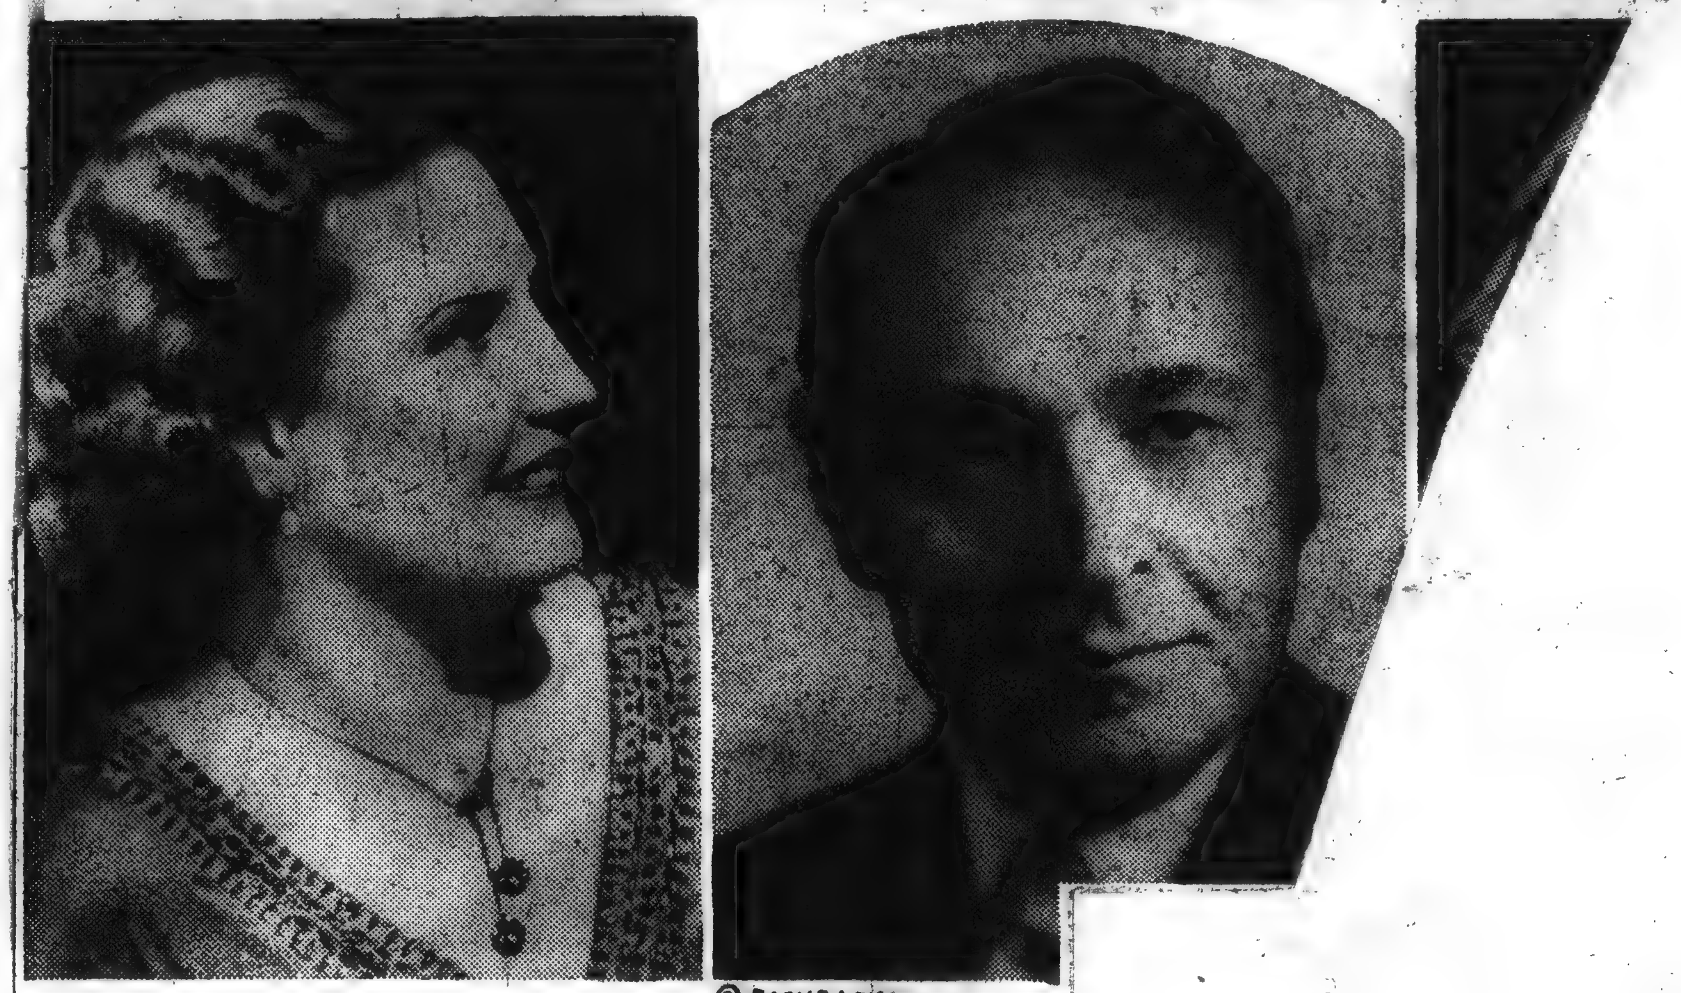
The fifty-third season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn is presented under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which James G. McDonald is president; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, of which R. Huntington Woodman is chairman, and the Brooklyn Committee.

Members of the Brooklyn Committee announced for the first time this season by Mrs. Davenport are Dr. Joseph Dana Allen, Juan A. Almirall, John Anderson, Mrs. Ernest Ash, Dr. Frank L. Babbott, Miss Phyllis Barnes, Mrs. John L. Bauer, Justice William R. Bayes, Mr and Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Robert E. Blum, Mrs. Samuel T. Brown, Mrs. Glentworth R. Butler, Mrs. Otis Swan Carroll, Mrs. Edmund H. Cahill, Mrs. Oliver G. Carter, Mrs. Thomas F. Casey, Mrs. I. Sherwood Coffin, Mrs. Ellwood Colahan, Miss Frances H. Coutts, Mrs. Gordon Weir Colton, Walter H. Crittenden, Mrs. Russell V. Cruikshank, Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, Mrs. Mary Childs Draper, Mrs. H. Edward Dreier, Mrs. Guy Du Val, S. Raymond Estey, Mrs. Merrill N. Foote, Mrs. Lewis W. Francis, Mrs. Charles W. Franklin, Dr. and Mrs. George H. Gartlan, Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin, Mrs. Charles R. Gay, Mrs. Emil Goetsch, Miss Louise Goetze, Miss Theodora Goldsmith, Mrs. William H. Good, Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, Mrs. William B. Greenman, Mrs. J. Morton Halstead, Mrs. William Peter Hamilton, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Hammitt ,Frank Hancock, Mrs. James M. Hills, Mrs. Roy Hart, Mrs. Russell S. Hume, Mrs. O. Paul Humpstone, William T. Hunter, Henry A. Ingraham, Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives, Mrs. Charles Jaffa, Mrs. William G. James, Dr. William A. Jewett, Mrs. Frederick L. Johanns, Mrs. David C. Johnson, Ralph Jonas, James H. Jourdan, Mrs. Hans V. Kaltenborn, Jacob C. Klinck, Mrs. B. Meredith Langstaff, David H. Lanman, Mrs. John Eadie Leech, Mrs. Maxwell Lester, Mrs. W. H. Lohman, Miss Hilda Loines, Mrs. Frederick D. MacKay, Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock, Mrs. James G. McDonald, Mrs. William W. Marshall, Mrs. E. P. Maynard Jr., Miss Irene Miles, Miss Mary Ogg, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Mrs. Frank H. Parsons, Mrs. Charles Elwell Pe.kins, Mrs. Charles E. Potts, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Mrs. Roland Rasch, G. William Rasch, Miss Agnes Ritchie, Mrs. Frank Reynolds, Miss Jessie Righter, Mrs. Donald Ross, Mrs. F. R. Schepmoes, Mrs. John D. H. Schulz, Mrs. Helen Warren Seeley, Robert Alfred Shaw, Mrs. Frank E. Simmons, Mrs. William Slater, Mrs. Harold Irving Small, Miss Arrietta Smith, Mrs. W. C. Spelman, Nelson Sprackling, Mrs. Ernest K. Tanner, Mrs. Franklin Taylor, Miss Marion J. Terry, Mrs. Hollis Thayer, Thornton C. Thayer, Carl H. Tollefsen, Mrs. Walter Truslow, Dr. Joshua M. Van Cott, Mr. and Mrs. Andrian Van Sinderen, Mrs. James P. Warbasse, Mrs. Edwin Carrington Ward, Mrs. Clarence Waterman, Mrs. Walter F. Wells, Mrs. George Whittlesey, Mrs. William H. Whitton, Surrogate George Albert Wingate, Mrs. Harry Michael Wingle, R. Huntington Woodman, Mrs. Maude B. Wood, Miss Elizabeth Wright and Edward J. A. Zeiner.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

NOV 12 1938

AMONG THOSE MAKING FIRST APPEARANCES OF THE SEAS



© BACHRACH

Left—Kirsten Flagstad, the Metropolitan's reigning queen of song, who gives a recital in Carnegie Hall on Tuesday evening. Right—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which begins its season here with a pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon.

Boston Symphony Begins Season

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky begins its New York season next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon with concerts in Carnegie Hall.

The Saturday afternoon program schedules the first public performance in New York of Aaron Copland's rhapsody, "El Salon Mexico." The piece is the result of a visit to Mexico City by the composer and is based on popular Mexican tunes heard in the cafes. Sir Adrian Boult, English conductor, directed a radio performance of the work here last season. The Thursday evening program includes Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin," the Sibelius Fifth Symphony and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

NOV 18 1938

Boston Symphony Gives N. Y. Concert

Orchestra Begins 53d Series in New York City

NEW YORK, Nov. 17 (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, second oldest in the United States, tonight began its 53d series of concerts in New York, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, himself beginning his 15th season as conductor of the orchestra.

Excepting the first five years of its existence, the Boston Symphony has played every year in New York, much of that time giving 15 concerts each season, 10 in New York and five in Brooklyn. In more than half a century, no concert has been canceled and only one postponed, in the blizzard of 1888.

Dr. Koussevitzky, American apostle of Jean Sibelius, opened with a performance of the Finnish composer's Fifth Symphony. There was another fifth symphony on the list, Beethoven's, and the program was completed by "Le Tombeau de Couperin," by the late Maurice Ravel.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

NOV 18 1938

BEGINS N. Y. CONCERTS

Boston Symphony Orchestra Begins Its 53rd Series.

New York, Nov. 17.—(AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, second oldest in the United States, tonight began its 53rd series of concerts in New York, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, himself beginning his 15th season as conductor of the orchestra.

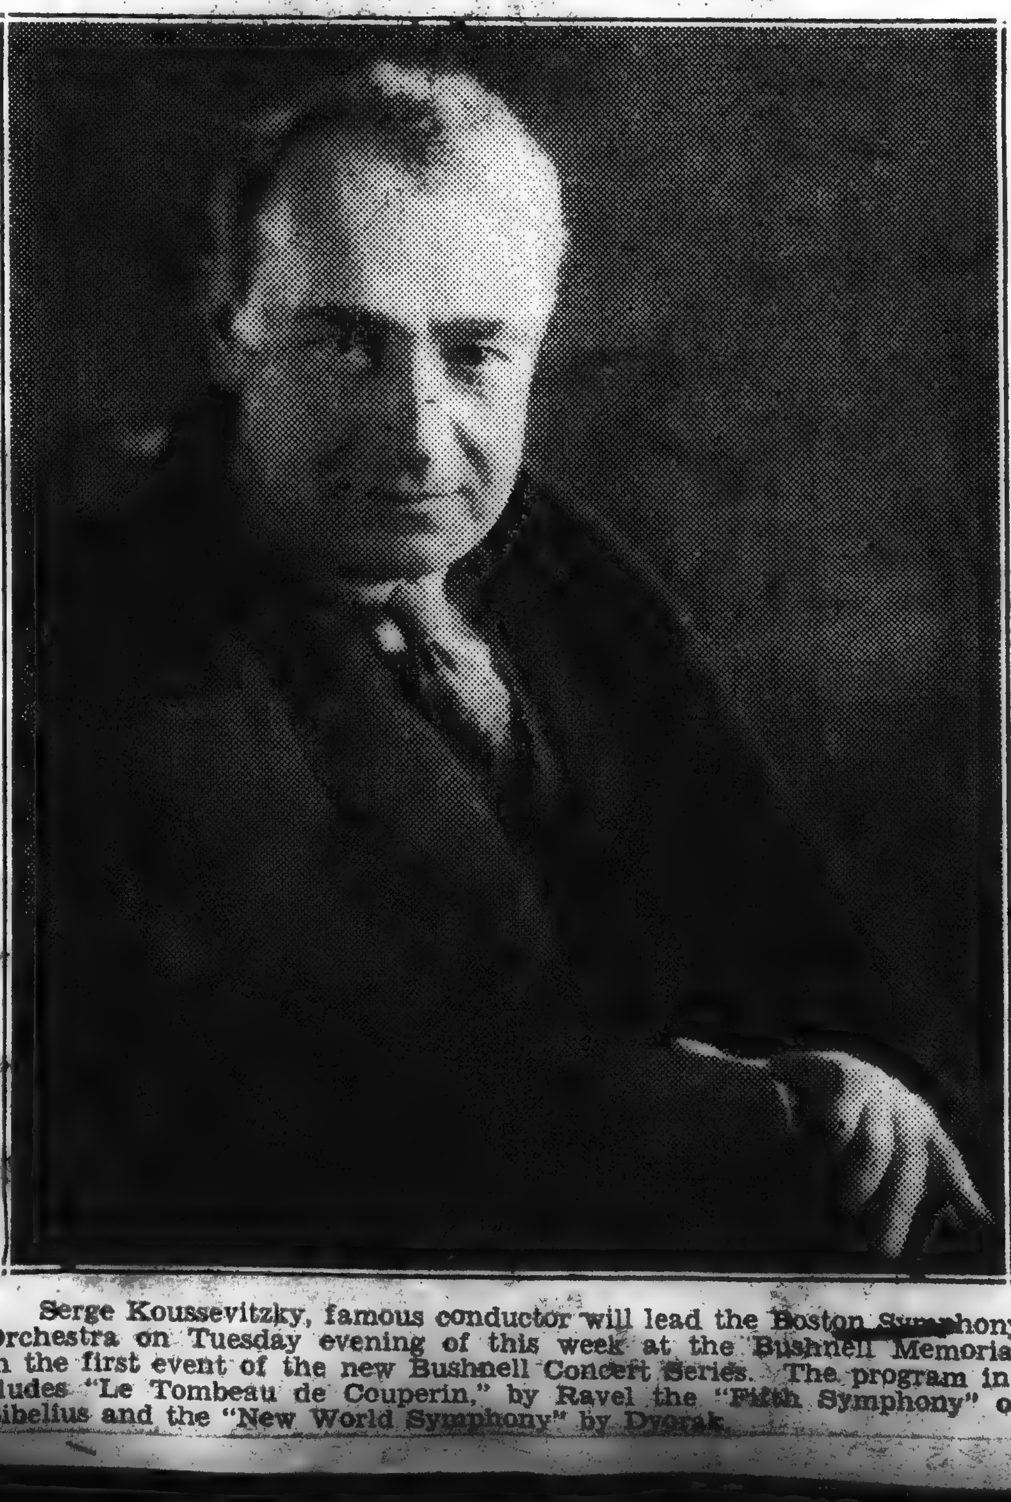
Excepting the first five years of its existence, the Boston Symphony has played every year in New York, much of that time giving 15 concerts each season, 10 in New York and five in Brooklyn. In more than half a century, no concert has been cancelled and only one postponed, in the blizzard of 1888.

Dr. Koussevitzky, American apostle of Jean Sibelius, opened with a performance of the Finnish composer's Fifth Sympony. There was another fifth symphony on the list, Beethoven's, and the program was completed by "Le Tombeau de Couperin," by the late Maurice Ravel.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

NOV 13 1938

Leads Orchestra Here Tuesday



Serge Koussevitzky, famous conductor will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday evening of this week at the Bushnell Memorial in the first event of the new Bushnell Concert Series. The program includes "Le Tombeau de Couperin," by Ravel the "Fifth Symphony" of Sibelius and the "New World Symphony" by Dvorak.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

NOV 13 1938

Bostonians To Feature Beethoven And Brahms

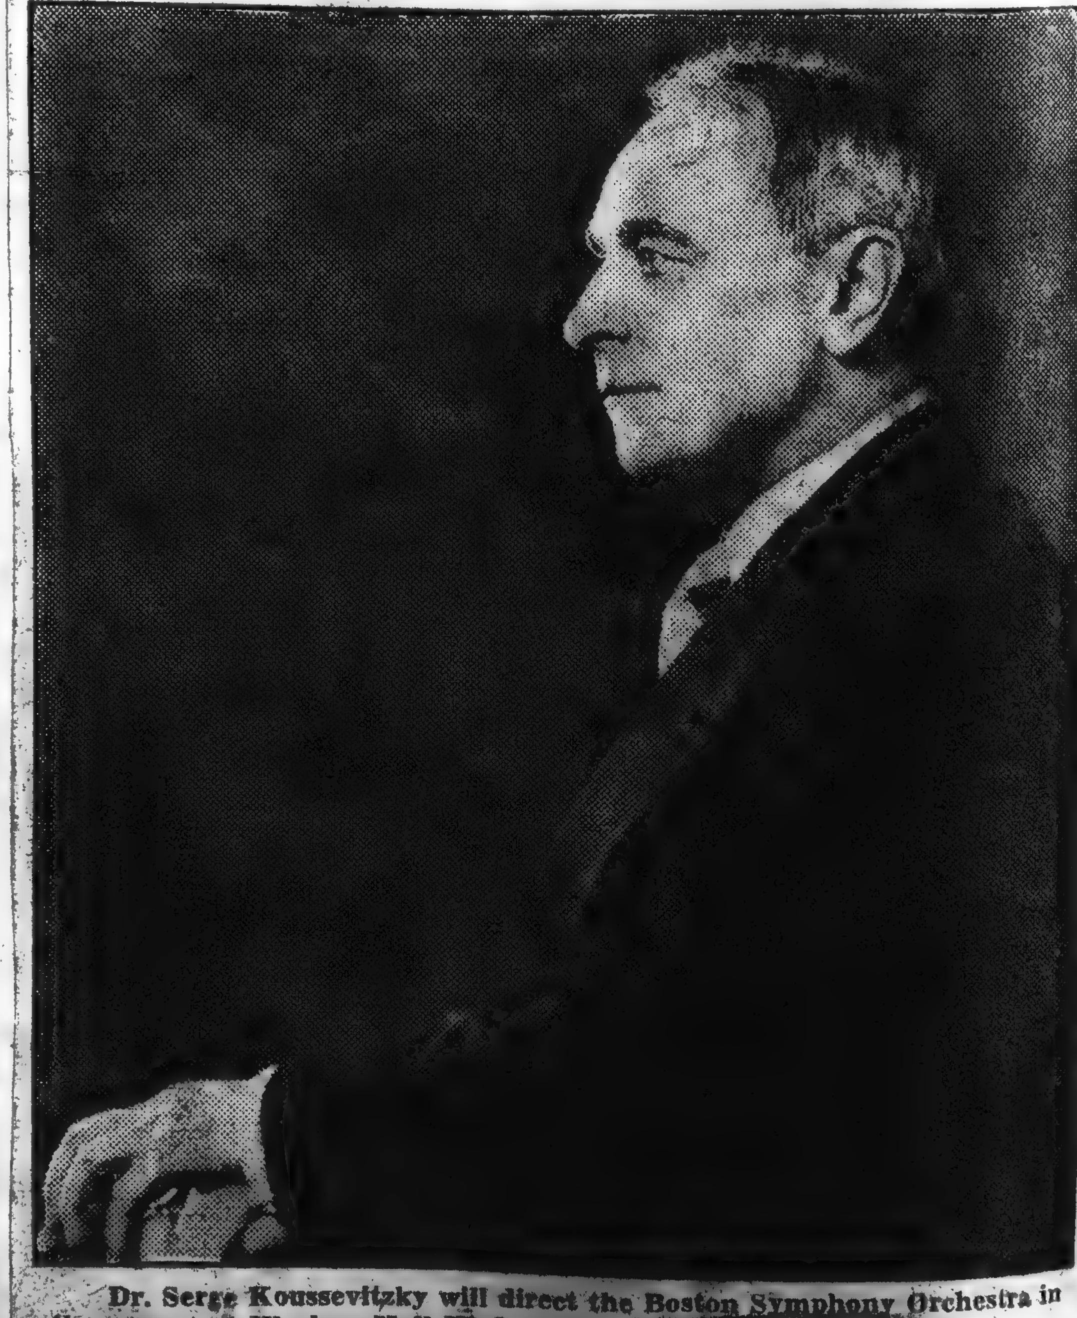
On Wednesday evening in Woolsey Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first appearance of the season in New Haven, the occasion marking the second offering of the Woolsey Hall Concert Series of 1938-1939. Directed by the dynamic Russian conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the great muscal organization of 110 performers will be heard in one of the finest programs ever presented on the local concert platform,—a program that will consist of two great symphonies and a distinguished work by an American composer.

The Second Symphony of Beethoven, in D major, will open the notable musical evening, and the Fourth of Brahms in E minor will be the concluding number. Aaron Copland's "El Salon Mezico" will be the third selection to be played, thus rounding out a trio of sterling compositions that should prove of tremendous interest to a host of music lovers from this vicinity.

The Beethoven and Brahms works need no introduction to patrons of symphonic music, for both selections are standard compositions that have great followings. Copland's Rhapsody is the result of a visit by the American composer to Mexico several years ago. It is a brilliant setting for large modern orchestra of popular tunes which are to be heard in the dance hall in Mexico City which gives the piece its title. "El Salon Mexico" represented American music at the Festival of the International Society of Contemporary Composers in London last summer. Dr. Koussevitsky gave the piece its first performances with the Orchestra in Boston last month, where it was received with great enthusiasm.

When Dr. Koussevitsky steps upon the Woolsey Hall platform next Wednesday evening it will be his first appearance in the auditorium since last June, when he was given an honorary degree of Doctor of Music by Yale University. Ranked among the foremost conductors of the world, Dr. Koussevitsky had already been honored by Brown University in 1926, and Harvard University in 1929, having been awarded honorary doctorates by both.

Exiling himself from his native land in 1920 because of bitterness toward the Bolshevik regime, he became conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1924 and has since directed this outstanding musical organization. Decorated by the Czar of Russia in 1903, he was made a Knight of the French Legion of Honor in 1924 and was promoted to the rank of officer in that honorary body in 1930. In quitting Moscow he relinquished the post of conductor of the Russian State Orchestra.



Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its concert at Woolsey Hall Wednesday evening.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

NOV 13 1938

Upper left—Kirsten Flagstad, Norwegian diva, in recital at Carnegie Hall next Tuesday evening. Upper center—Trio of New York, in recital at Town Hall Tuesday night. Upper right—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which opens its Brooklyn season at the Academy of Music next Friday night. Lower—Members of the company which Argentinita, Spanish dancer, will head at the Majestic Theater tonight for one performance only

Koussevitzky Opens Season

Boston Orchestra Will Play Copland Rhapsody at Academy Next Friday; Program Talks at Neighborhood Club

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its first Brooklyn concert of the season next Friday evening, Nov. 18, at the Academy of Music. The concert marks the fifteenth year that Serge Koussevitzky has conducted this annual series. The program will contain Beethoven's Symphony No. 2 in D major; Aaron Copland's rhapsody, "El Salon Mexico," and Dvorak's Symphony No. 5 in E minor ("From the New World").

Aaron Copland, a native of Brooklyn, has won general attention by his brilliant rhapsody, the product of his visit to Mexico in 1932. It was chosen to represent the United States at the festival of the International Society for Contemporary Music in London last Summer. Carlos Chavez gave the piece its first performance in Mexico City, Sir Adrian Boult introduced it at a broadcast concert from New York last May and Dr. Koussevitzky conducted it for the first time at a public concert in the United States, in Boston on Oct. 14.

"El Salon Mexico," named after a famous dance hall in Mexico City, is based upon characteristic popular tunes of that country. It is scored for full orchestra with great richness of color.

The concert will be held under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn committee. It is the first of a series of five which Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct in Brooklyn for the season 1938-1939.

Nelson Sprackling and Winslow Cheney will give the first of their preparatory hearings of the Brooklyn programs of the Boston Orchestra on Tuesday morning at 11 o'clock at the Neighborhood Club, 104 Clark St., Brooklyn Heights. The orchestral program for Friday evening will be reviewed and illustrated at the piano. In addition to the Beethoven and Dvorak symphonies, Aaron Copland's rhapsody will be presented from the manuscript through the co-operation of the composer.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 18 1938

BEGINS N. Y. CONCERTS

Boston Symphony Orchestra Begins Its 53rd Series.

New York, Nov. 17.—(AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, second oldest in the United States, tonight began its 53rd series of concerts in New York, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, himself beginning his 15th season as conductor of the orchestra.

Excepting the first five years of its existence, the Boston Symphony has played every year in New York, much of that time giving 15 concerts each season, 10 in New York and five in Brooklyn. In more than half a century, no concert has been cancelled and only one postponed, in the blizzard of 1888.

Dr. Koussevitzky, American apostle of Jean Sibelius, opened with a performance of the Finnish composer's Fifth Sympony. There was another fifth symphony on the list, Beethoven's, and the program was completed by "Le Tombeau de Couperin," by the late Maurice Ravel.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TELEGRAPH

NOV 14 1938

Boston Band Sets Program

Symphony Orchestra to Open at Carnegie Hall Under Koussevitzky.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will open next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, in Carnegie Hall, the season of five pairs of concerts in New York. The program for the Thursday evening concert will consist of Ravel's Suite "Le Tombeau de Couperin," the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius in E-flat, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor.

At the Saturday matinee concert, Serge Koussevitzky will give the first public performance in New York of Aaron Copland's Rhapsody, "El Salon Mexico." The piece is the result of a visit to Mexico by the composed, and utilizes popular Mexican tunes, such tunes which are heard in the cafe in Mexico City which gives the rhapsody its name. "El Salon Mexico" has been performed in Mexico City under Cravez. It was chosen to represent the at It was chosen to represent the United States at the Festival of the International Society for Contemporary Music in London last Summer. Sir Adrian Boult, conducting it there, likewise led a broadcast performance in New York. The matinee program will also include Beethoven's Second Symphony in D major, and the Fourth Symphony of Brahms in E minor.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

NOV 15 1938

Boston Symphony's Program Is Unusual

Three compositions never previously played in the Bushnell Concert Series, make up the program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky will play at the Bushnell Memorial tonight. This concert, the first event of the Bushnell symphony series, will start at 8:15 o'clock.

The program includes "Le Tombeau de Couperin," by Ravel; the "Fifth Symphony" of Sibelius and "Symphony From the New World," by Dvorak.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

NOV 16 1938

Boston Orchestra Opens Another Bushnell Season

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

Another Bushnell season and another concert by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Tuesday night, was the axis upon which events turned in anticipation and others will turn again in the recollection.

It is hard to know what happened to musical Hartford last night, since the impact of any great aesthetic moment has the aspects both of a beginning and a conclusion. It is now fairly clear that Bach, Beethoven and Wagner culminated their respective periods, but in their times no one could be sure whether each was an Orson Welles calling time on his world or setting a new one in motion.

A New Standard

Dvorak's Symphony "From the New World" has been played here often before, but it is doubtful that it will be interesting again in anything much short of the perfection in which it was delivered last night. There may have been those who found the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius taxing, in a considered sense of the word, and others who were susceptible to its aliment. Both would agree that a less skillful performance would be neither endurable nor assimilable.

The white light of this orchestra is meteoric in its intensity. It blinds while it illuminates; and while it ignites, it sterilizes, too. How much struggling undergrowth was swept away in this visitation no one can say; certainly only the hardier vegetation will take root again, once the ground cools off. The effect of such a concert on the Hartford musical scene is something about which each will have to make up his own mind.

Men and Leader As One

Dr. Koussevitzky and his men are not to be dissociated. This leader has had a longer tenure by many years than that of any other conductor with a major orchestra in the country, with perhaps one exception. What he and the players do they have arrived at together. This time there was Ravel's Le Tombeau de Couperin, a jewelled wreath which the Parisian composer fashioned to the memory of his countryman; the melodious patterns which a homesick Bohemian wove from Negro tunes during a sabbatical summer on the hot plain of Iowa; and the symphonic runes chiseled by a modern prophet on a crag in Finland. The radical over this strange algebra of art was the reaching arm of Koussevitzky who made fine sense of it all.

The rustle in the audience which followed the Largo of the New World Symphony testified to the mesmeric spell which its playing induced. Taken so slowly that at times its diaphanous web seemed almost motionless in midair, the most exquisite care was lavished upon it. So finely spun a tonal thread was safe only in the hands of artists. In the last movement there were chords which set a new high for brilliance by stringed instruments.

Those Strings Again

The strings are ever the marvel of the Boston Orchestra and they were in top form last night. In the Forlane and Rigaudon of Ravel it was the strings which will be best remembered. It was upon this choir that most of the burden of integrating the Sibelius Symphony fell.

Technically this symphony has many interesting phases. It has some dated dissonances as distinguished from the timeless sort which Sibelius was not afraid to use both before and after his Fifth. It is a study in the use of endlessly repeated figures; and a study too in sustained crescendos of which Sibelius has always been the master.

It is bleak and uncompromising but the same was thought of Brahms so recently as to be fairly uncomfortable to long memories. The Fifth Symphony, like the Fourth and the Seventh, requires attention and acquaintance to be properly appreciated and there is likely to be opportunity for both. Familiarity with the work in E flat does not appear to disturb that divine balance between inevitability and the unpredictable, which is one of the reasons we still listen to Bach and Beethoven.

At any rate, when another Sibelius symphony is played in Hartford we can hope to, and probably shall, receive it at the hands of Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston orchestra.

The Soul and the Heart of an Orches

—[Hartford Times Photo

Serge Koussevitzky, celebrated conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Edward A. Taft, chairman of the board of the Friends of the Boston Symphony, compare observations before last night's concert in the Bushnell.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

NOV 15 1938

Boston Symphony Opens Bushnell Series Tonight

The current Bushnell Concert Series will be opened this evening when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky takes the podium to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the first of its two promised concerts.

The program will be made up of "Le Tombeau de Couperin" by Ravel, the Fifth Symphony in E flat major by Sibelius and the Symphony "from the New World" by Dvorak.

The program will start at 8:15.

NORWICH, CONN.
BULLETIN
NOV 18 1938

The Boston Symphony orchestra, second oldest in the United States, began its 53rd series of concerts in New York, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, himself beginning his 15th season as conductor of the orchestra.

64

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

NOV 16 1938

Koussevitzky and Taft Arrive

Courant Photos.

Serge Koussevitzky, left, famous conductor, led the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday night at the Bushnell Memorial in the first event of the new Bushnell Concert Series. Dr. Koussevitzky is shown with Edward A. Taft of Boston, chairman of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Hartford Club, where they stopped while here.

Koussevitsky And Boston In Concert

1938-39 Symphonic Series Opens at Bushnell Hall With Interesting Program

Under the conductorship of Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard in concert at the Bushnell Memorial auditorium, Tuesday night. The program:

Le Tombeau de Couperin ...... Rave
Symphony No. 5 in E Flat Major ...... Sibelius
Symphony No. 5 in E minor .. Dvorak

With sufficient fanfaring during the course of the evening to launch a millenium, the 1938-39 Bushnell Memorial Symphonic Series was opened last night, when the city's favored conductor and orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston, played the first of their two scheduled concerts here.

The program was one which made small concession to the fact that we have had a long vacation from the major orchestras and their more massive programs, and plunged us into symphony again, practically up to the neck. After a few moments of Ravel to sharpen our ears and wits, we were left to sink or swim in the mighty sea of Sibelius' Fifth Symphony, and then taken on a cross-country jog with the original musical promulgator of the idea "See America First," Dvorak—who had room for two countries in his big, gemuetlich heart. The Memorial had already brought to its customers' attention that it had never before offered any of these three works, and although it seems somewhat bland to speak of the Dvorak as new, in view of the number of times it has been heard here under other roofs, still and all it was stimulating and gratifying to open a new season by hearing two definitely new and one quasi-new works, all in one night.

Ravel's Tomb.

The tomb which Ravel has erected for Couperin turns out to be a fine, elegant rococco structure, for which Tschiakowsky seems to have been consulting architect and Debussy the interior decorator. It would seem, too, to be a cenotaph in which the early Frenchman's spirit might dwell with a great deal of amused satisfaction, for Ravel's music has about it a sophistication and a sardonic quality Couperin would have much relished, together with its finely-meshed form and a remarkably pure romantic content, both of which were ultra-dear to the latter's heart. "Le Tombeau" is certainly not a copy of Couperin's music, but it is homage that Couperin would understand and cherich acros sthe gulf of the intervening ages.

A more radical contrast to the Ravel than the Sibelius. would be hard to discover, and passing from the one to the other was going from the precious to the heroic, the epigrammatic to the epic, the miniature to the immense. Though the composer and the symphony still cherish within them the secret meaning of this enormous composition, it is impossible not to imagine, at least, that you glimpse the panorama of a gaunt world and the introspection of an austere spirit behind it.

Real Sibelius.

At any rate, its composite of the cryptic and the radiant we know to be one of the world's great symphonies, and we must be grateful for the opportunity to hear it from Dr. Koussevitzky whom we have come to recognize as Sibelius's chief interpreter and authentic translator. It was possible to believe last night that you were hearing all that Sibelius meant this symphony to say, musically and philosophically, because there was about Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of it, the impression of authority on the one hand and deep affection for the composer, on the other. Dr. Koussevitzky was able to evoke the impression of a perplexed and agitated spirit gathering new strength and calm from being close to the earth, and finally projecting itself into release in a great triumphant vision. It was a stirring concept and not without contagion and lesson, and even more than the actual musical statement, something to be grateful to Dr. Koussevitzky for.

As a performance, last night's concert offered some of the most exciting passages of virtuosity. We will long remember the way in which the second movement of the Dvorak floated out of existence on the double basses, the wonderful English horn solo work, the exquisite muted violin fragments from the concertmaster, the elegant work of the woodwinds in the Ravel, the remarkbale remoteness of the horns in the early Sibelius and their bigness in the Dvorak, the trilling of the strings, flutes and clarinets in the Scherzo of this same work—and so along even to the almost amusing crescendo on the triangle in the "New World." All told, it was a richly played evening. If it did not have that elastic dazzlement of spirit that sometimes has astounded us, this must be written off to the nature of the scores, and to the fine restraint with which Dr. Koussevitzky played the entire program, especially the "New World." This latter quality is one we vaunt most highly in this conductor, his ability to perform works beckoning into sentimentality or bombast, without succumbing to such temptation. It was an evening of superlative interpretation of content and continually exciting surfaces across the notes. That's why we have the Boston twice.

T. H. P.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

NOV 17 1938

Music

BOSTON SYMPHONY SUPERB IN CONCERT AT WOOLSEY HALL

The triumph of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is hardly an item for remark by patrons of the Woolsey Series of Concerts, but the fact bears restatement as eloquent testimony of the continued magnificence of this superb ensemble. Dr. Kousevitsky often plans his enroute concerts as dress rehearsals for the Manhattan series, but no subsequent audience is likely to hear a finer account of at least two of the three works played last evening.

Odd Numbers Win

Beethoven's even-numbered symphonies are infrequently heard in comparision with the extraordinary acclaim given the others, and the Second is probably the least familiar of them all. In some quarters where it is thought necessary to array them in order, one as better than another, these "even" works are considered less worthy. Whatever the accounting may be, we have by no means exhausted the quiet beauties of this work, nor comprehended the cast of sadness which is not so intensely expressed here as in his later works. The Second symphony looks backward and forward alternately, polished with the Viennese classicist's refinement, but stepping resolutely forward to the achievement of the definitely individual Eroica.

Salon Mexico

One must admit the past and accept the present with as good a grace as possible. Aaron Copland's present of "El Salon Mexico" was received begrudgingly by the majority of last evening's audience, although the supporters were in sufficient number to make a lusty noise while the malcontent fled the Salon Woolsey. The first excuse which comes to mind—that Mr. Copland's music, while very well in its way, etc., isn't concert music for an audience whose members are in the majority dedicated to the preservation of the past, is not a very good excuse.

Sargent's "El Jaleo," so splendidly hung in Fenway Court, may suggest a background for this music as it emerges spontaneously from a dozen or so performers who sit informally against the wall strumming on various and unconventional instruments, suddenly fired into action by a mometary inspiration, and united in a common urge to translate unanalyzed emotion into bodily expression. In a smoke-filled, tense atmosphere of the Latin cafe, these alternately sombre and gay figures spend the hour, the night, or the festival season in executing these near-primitive pastimes. At times a high degree of sensuousness is reached, contrasted with utmost resignation and seeming lifelessness as the body traces out the intricate design in which every gesture has an almost mystical signifieance.

Mr. Copland has evidently spent many evenings, and stayed far into the night, in the numerous cafes of Mexico, a fascinated observer of these unfamiliar customs; he has become intrigued with musician's ear by the subtleties of rhythm unknown to the prosaic neighbor far above the Rio Grande. His score is a rather conscious, but remarkably skilled manipulation of the modern ensemble into a re-creation of this scene; it will be enjoyed to the extent of the listener's ability to visualize it.

Brahms' Maturity

Brahms' Fourth Symphony stands as a monument bringing the classic and romantic periods to a definite close. It is a noble one, replete with his most massive and stately beauties, and making acknowledgement to his masters. The wonderful episode of the first movement strongly suggests that in a similar place in Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, while the tendency to enter on the offibeat of the measure is typical of Bach. Dr. Koussevitsky and the players performed these works with a richness and authority now constant with them, but shared by few others; Mr. Copland will have further occasion to bless the providence which leaves nothing to be desired in displaying his interesting and omplexc score.

H. EARLE JOHNSON.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

NOV 18 1938

SYMPHONY CONCERTS OPEN HERE TONIGHT

Boston Orchestra, Under Dr. Koussevitsy, Offers First Program of Series

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra this evening in its first concert of the Brooklyn season 1938-39 at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Featured on the program will be the first concert performance in the metropolitan area of "El Salon Mexico," by Aaron Copland, young American composer.

Included on tonight's program are Beetthoven's "Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 36;" and Dvorak's "Symphony No. 5 in E minor (from the 'New World'), Op. 95."

The Brooklyn series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra consists of five concerts, each conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky. The series is held under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn committee. The second concert of the season will be given on Jan. 6.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

NOV 16 1938

Koussevitzky Lauds Kaskas; Sad at Sibelius' Shaking Hand

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky arrived in Hartford yesterday in a communicative mood. He had eaten a hearty dinner on trainboard in company with Edward A. Taft, chairman of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra, and was comfortably settled at the Hartford Club.

Hartford looked good to the Boston conductor and there was some thought of a late afternoon walk, but he was persuaded that the weather was deceptively cold and windy, whereupon the time was given over to the interviewer.

Much of Sibelius

There was some talk of modern composers and a great deal about Sibelius. Dr. Koussevitzky speaks slowly, with carefully chosen phrases. His accent is unique and exceedingly pleasant to the listener. Under combined Russian and French influence, he makes unexpected music of the most everyday English words.

He seems to like to look ahead, mentioning his forthcoming presentation of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis with evident anticipation. And wasn't Anna Kaskas to be a soloist?

No sooner had the name been mentioned than Dr. Koussevitsky launched into a stream of praise as unreserved as is seldom accorded a prima donna of experience and renown.

"She has a marvelous voice and great musical intelligence. She sings with warmth and with authority. Miss Kaskas knows how to produce tones with the throat—" and the great conductor touched his throat to indicate that he was speaking of technique—"but she has music in her head too!"

Brief—But Sufficient

Mr. Judd, who was standing nearby, offered that Miss Kaskas' audition was one of the shortest on record at Symphony Hall.

"Yes, I was satisfied immediately," Dr. Koussevitsky agreed and then recalled fondly one of the Stockbridge concerts. "And how she sings Wagner! The part of Erda she took with such understanding."

Did the Doctor know that Anna Kaskas was a Hartford girl?

"Indeed! Hartford should be very proud. Congratulations! Congratulations!"

He remarked upon her youth, just as a few moments before he had observed it was the younger generation of American composers to whom we must look for the important creative work of the future. He mentioned Sessions, Harris and Copland and called attention to the fact the compositions of these men have been and are to be heard at Symphony Hall. He was enthusiastic about Berezowsky whose Toccata and Variations for orchestra and string quartet was recently played, and Edward Burlingame Hill's new violin concerto, opus 38.

Finished, But Unwritten

Asked if there was any prospect of ever hearing the much-discussed eighth symphony of Sibelius, Dr. Koussevitzky shook his head sadly.

"It is already finished in the composer's head, but it will never be written down. The hand of Sibelius shakes so that he cannot hold a pen. The last letter I had from him could hardly be read. But the symphony is there; that is definite because I know how he composes. It is entirely a mental process. The thing is finished before he starts to write, and once written never a note is changed.

"When I played a cycle of all his symphonies Sibelius cabled me that I might announce also the eighth. We did so. But then came another cable to say that it could not be. That is the last I know of the eighth symphony. I have not seen Sibelius for three years. Many times I have urged him to come to America, but he refuses."

And with that Dr. Koussevitzky retired for a rest prior to the concert in which he presented the Finnish master's Fifth Symphony.

C. E. L.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

Nov. 18/38

Boston Symphony Opens Concert Series in Gotham

NEW YORK, Nov. 17 (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, second oldest in the United States, tonight began its 53rd series of concerts in New York, under the direction of Serge Kuossevitzky, himself beginning his 15th season as conductor of the orchestra.

Excepting the first five years of its existence, the Boston Symphony has played every year in New York, much of that time giving 15 concerts each season, 10 in New York and 5 in Brooklyn. In more than half a century, no concert has been cancelled and only one postponed, in the blizzard of 1888.

Dr. Koussevitzky, American apostle of Jean Sibelius, opened with a performance of the Finnish composer's fifth symphony. There was another fifth symphony on the list, Beethoven's, and the program was completed by "Le Tombeau De Couperin," by the late Maurice Ravel.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
NOV 18 1938

Society Notes

By LUCILE MINTZ

Boston Symphony Concert Tonight; Opening of 53d Borough Season To Be Marked By Entertaining

Brooklyn society and leaders of cultural groups here will welcome the Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight at 8:30 o'clock when it presents the first of five concerts to be given this season at Brooklyn Academy of Music tonight, marking the orchestra's fifty-third season in this borough.

Boxholders for the opening concert will be Mrs. Thomas E. Murray, Jr., Mrs. Benjamin Prince, the Adelphi Alumnae Association, headed by Miss Jessie Ogg, Mrs. John J. Schoonhoven, Mrs. William H. Good, Mrs. Oliver Goldsmith Carter, and Rear Admiral and Mrs. Clarke H. Woodward of Brooklyn Navy Yard.

Admiral and Mrs. Woodward will have as their box guests: Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Learned, Mr. and Mrs. Ebenezer Hill and Captain and Mrs. Garrett Bunker.

Mrs. Good will give a dinner at her home, No. 880 St. Marks avenue, later taking her guests to the concert. The party will include Mr. and Mrs. Edward C. Blum, former Federal Judge and Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin, Mrs. Henry Joralemon Davenport, Hamilton Preston and Rudolph Reimer.

Mrs. Prince will have as her box guests Aaron Copland, composer; Mr. and Mrs. James G. McDonald, Mr. and Mrs. Karp Mikhalenkoff, Mme. Serge Koussevitzky, wife of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, and Walter Golde. Mr. Copland is composer of "El Salon Mexico," which the orchestra will play tonight. Mr. McDonald is the president of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences.

Box guests of Mrs. Schoonhoven will be Mr. and Mrs. Floyd S. Neely, Mrs. John A. Morison, Mrs. Thomas E. Haines and Miss Dorothy Haines. Mrs. Schoonhoven will occupy the box of Mrs. Dean C. Osborne. Mrs. Osborne will have as her guests in the orchestra Mr. and Mrs. Carl Weiler.

Mrs. Oliver G. Carter will have as her box guests Mrs. Arthur S. Tuttle, Mrs. Robert F. Ives, Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock, Mrs. Wilson Briggs Zimmer, Mrs. Frederick W. Burbank, Mrs. Frederic M. Davison and Mrs. Theodore L. Vosseler.

The Brooklyn committee this year has presented its box to Dr. George H. Gartlan, director of music in New York City schools, for disposal among players in the high school orchestras. Dr. Garlan has selected members of the All-City High School Orchestra to use the box this evening.

The program will include Beethoven's Symphony No. 2 in D major; Copland's "El Salon Mexico" and Dvorak's Symphony No. 5 in E minor "From the New World," op. 95.

The concert series is presented here under auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, of which R. Huntington Woodman is president; and the Brooklyn Committee, of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman and Mrs. Henry Joralemon Davenport, acting chairman.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE
NOV 18 1938

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

The Boston Symphony Starts Its New York Season at Carnegie Hall

First New York concert this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Sergei Koussevitzky conductor, at Carnegie Hall.

PROGRAM

Ravel....."Le Tombeau de Couperin," Suite
I. Prélude.
II. Forlane.
III. Menuet.
IV. Rigaudon.
Sibelius
Symphony No. 5, in E-flat major, Op. 82
I. Tempo molto moderato.
II. Allegretto—moderato, ma poco a poco stretto.
III. Andante mosso, quasi allegretto.
IV. Allegro molto.

Intermission

Beethoven,
Symphony No. 5, in C Minor, Op. 67
I. Allegro con brio.
II. Andante con moto.
III. Allegro: rio.
IV. Allegro.

THE audience that gathered in Carnegie Hall for the first Boston Symphony concert of the season was a sight to cheer the most despondent music-lover—if any such were in the neighborhood. The occasion wore an unmistakable air of festival. No palms or wreaths or smilax or potted plants adorned the stage or auditorium. They were not required. The audience itself provided the adornment and the festal note.

* * *

It was a remarkable audience—so large that one had the odd impression that there were at least two persons occupying every seat. A sense of well-bred eagerness hummed through the hall—for this audience was nothing if not well-bred. It was an audience that diffused intelligence and well-being and responsiveness and gentle manners. It was both excited and restrained. It was electrically vibrant. It was determined to be musically pleased, and certain that it would be. It greeted Mr. Koussevitzky, when he appeared upon the stage, with an explosive outburst of applause; and one expected to see it rise to its feet, in emulation of the orchestra's action—undoubtedly it wanted to, but felt a bit shy.

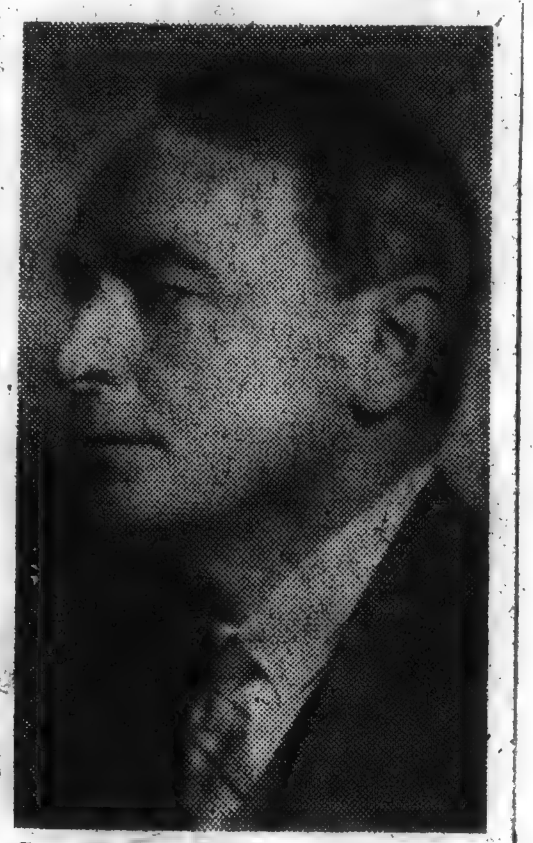
The words Success—Prestige—Achievement were not inscribed upon banners or in electric lights above the platform. They did not need to be, for one could read their meaning in every facet of the spectacle.

* * *

And this was a concert by an orchestra which, approximately twenty years ago, seemed to be as nearly down and out as an orchestra could be and survive; an orchestra that had lost, through the accidents of War and public circumstance and misfortune, most of the brilliant distinction and prosperity that it had won during its long and illustrious history of three generations.

Out of that melancholy slough the Orchestra has climbed, slowly, steadily, indomitably. Today, twenty years after the disaster that it suffered, it has come through, magnificently and completely. It is now one of the two

Serge Koussevitzky



Conducting the Boston Symphony at its first New York concert and eloquence; and the organization that directs it is a model of dignity, efficiency, and artistic self-respect.

If all this is not a triumph of will and spirit and integrity over adversity and mischance, a triumph that cannot be too loudly cheered, one does not know what else to call it.

* * *

Mr. Koussevitzky is a deft and canny program-builder, with a lively sense of public psychology. He had devised for his first evening concert in Carnegie Hall a perfectly constructed list of pieces, fit for the occasion, the place, the mood, the time. First the "Tombeau de Couperin" of Ravel, with its exquisite artificiality and grace, its delicate touch of harmonic asperity, its craft and guile and charm. Then the great Fifth Symphony of Sibelius, with its nobly heroic passion and inspiration. And, as closing piece, another Fifth Symphony, which, as Sir James Barrie's Policeman would certainly have recognized, is infalliable.

* * *

The whole program, in fact, was infalliable. Its hearers followed it with absorbed intentness, and rewarded each performance with that peculiar kind of fervor that one notes at a Boston Symphony concert.

It was a joy to hear once more the splendid orchestra, especially in its playing of the Sibelius symphony. In the matchless finale, with its strange and mystical coda—music which is uplifted upon a secret wave of valor and exaltation and heroic strength—one thought, as one listened, of the composer's own description of his mood at the time that he composed it:

". . . As if I were preparing to quit this life, and while descending into my grave, shot an eagle on the wing—sighted well and skillfully, and without a thought of what was to come."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 18 1938

BOSTON ORCHESTRA OPENS SEASON HERE

Serge Koussevitzky Conducts Carnegie Hall Concerts for Appreciative Audience

RAVEL SUITE IS FEATURED

'Tombeau de Couperin' Wins Applause—Music of Sibelius and Beethoven Follow

By OLIN DOWNES

The unrivaled Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor whose catholicity of taste and brilliancy as a leader have made that orchestra what it is today, gave its first New York concert of the season last night in Carnegie Hall before an audience which packed the house and comprised the musically elect of the city.

Tribute was paid the memory of Maurice Ravel, who died last year by the performance of his suite, "Tombeau de Couperin," which, according to the story, was composed by Ravel in memory of a comrade who fell in the World War. The story may or may not be true. The curious will find no hint of the lugubrious or the specifically elegiac in this music. They will rather discern the finish and precision of the French classic style, and the spirit, though conveyed by modern idioms, of the old dances of the eighteenth century.

And the listener might say, "Pooh! The death of a friend! This is lament. This is sheer style sufficient unto itself, and consummate technical mastery. Tragic? It is archaic, in a piquant manner; it is formal, suave, ironical, aloof from emotion." It may be said that if Ravel had thought when he wrote this music of a friend who fell in battle, he would have taken exactly such means as these of commemorating him—not with groans of protestation, or self-pity disguised as mourning, but with a courtliness and laconism that covered proudly his grief. He would have summoned the images of his ancestral past, and its proud and ancient culture. The reality of his emotion would be comprehensible only to the few who understood his gallantry.

A Music of Fascination

In any case, this music, so perfect in style, so adroit and self-conscious in its fabrication, has a singular fascination. It was said of Ravel that he always adapted his technique to the special subject, or experiment, of the occasion, and that he loved experiments. He would have heartily underscored Wilde's essay upon the truth of masks. Here the style is the art, and also the man. After every movement of the suite the listener is prone to split his palms at the sheer admiration of the triumph of idea and workmanship—plus, last night, a most precise, subtle and brilliant performance.

The contrast between this music and Sibelius's Fifth symphony could hardly have been greater. For that matter, it may be said that each of Sibelius's later symphonies is a law unto itself. There is no preconceived formula. The music follows where the idea leads, the idea having as its inevitable consequence the manner of its development. One is aware of a germination, always mysterious and never fully explicable by traditional principles, in these works. Thus the effect of the opening measures of Sibelius's Fifth, like those of his Second, is pastoral, but with what completely different consequences as the two movements, in entirely different ways and through differing harmonic formulae, develop!

Not Easy to Analyze

There is a sense of solitude, always profoundly present in Sibelius's representative scores. The music seems to merge with the vibrations of the natural world, and the thought of the composer to become one with nature about him.

The music is not easily to be analyzed in the sense of personal emotion. It is not possible to put the finger on this measure or that and explain that the passage has such and such a significance. Why? Because this is purest music. Thanks to its power of metamorphosis, the most conventional successions of tones, such as those which make the motive of the middle movement, become extraordinary in their unfoldments. Then occurs in the finale the gradual emergence, from the midst of the murmurings and hummings of the instruments, of the extremely energetic motive, which gathers force and recoils upon and multiplies itself in a fashion almost cellular, until it reaches the culmination, which is as savage and grand as a northern sunrise.

The orchestra played this music magnificently. Dr. Koussevitzky presented in a way which involved a complete synthesis of the composer's thought the long lines of the tonal structure which are created by an accumulation of detail. He understood the composer's instinct for tone-colors and juxtapositions of chords and keys which are not predicated in the textbooks, and of which no other composer than Sibelius was aware.

Sibelius owes much to this interpreter. Could one say more than that this symphony was not made secondary or inadequate by the elemental drama of Beethoven's Fifth symphony, which brought the concert to an end, with a clamorous recognition by the audience of the achievements of the players and the conductor?

WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN
NOV 18 1938

BOSTON SYMPHONY BEGINS ITS 53D GOTHAM SEASON

New York, Nov. 17. —(AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, second oldest in the United States, tonight began its 53rd series of concerts in New York, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, himself beginning his 15th season as conductor of the orchestra.

Excepting the first five years of its existence, the Boston Symphony has played every year in New York, much of that time giving 15 concerts each season. 10 in New York and 5 in Brooklyn. In more than half a century, no concert has been canceled and only one postponed, in the blizzard of 1888.

Dr. Koussevitzky, American apostle of Jean Sibelius, opened with a performance of the Finnish composer's Fifth Symphony. There was another Fifth Symphony on the list, Beethoven's, and the program was completed by "Le Tombeau de Couperin," by the late Maurice Ravel.

TERRE HAUTE, IND.
TRIBUNE
NOV 24 1938

The World of Music

NEW YORK, Nov. 2 .—(UP)—

Eugene Goossens, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, commented on his return from Europe that the present disturbed condition of the world has hampered musical composition. He complained that few works are being written which deserve to be ranked as masterpieces.

Goossens said that while great upheavals tend to produce great music when they have died down and artists are able to retire into a calm, creative atmosphere, the present upheaval is a continuing process that gives no interlude for contemplation.

Goossens praised the quality of contemporary English composition, which he feels has been unduly neglected. One of the new works which he has brought back is a "Variation on the Theme of Frank Bridges," by Benjamin Bridges, young English composer.

After conducting the Boston Symphony in New York this week,

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING JOURNAL
NOV 18 1938

Symphony Concert at Carnegie

By GRENA BENNETT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its series of ten local concerts in Carnegie Hall last evening. Serge Koussevitzky, celebrating his fifteenth year as batonist of the Bostonians, occupied his customary position at the director's desk.

The event attracted one of the season's largest and most distinguished audiences. The program was conservative and familiar, consisting of Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperen" suite; Sibelius' Fifth Symphony; and Beethoven's Symphony No. 5.

There was an abundance of interest manifested by those present, for the performance of the visitors maintained the high standard of musicianship that has ever marked the offerings of the organization.

While no new composition was presented "there was considerable contrast in the works, the list opening with the Ravel suite, performed with rare delicacy and sensitiveness in tones that seemed to float from the stage to the auditorium.

MUSIC

GRENA BENNETT AT CONCERT

With a remarkable economy of gesture, so much so in fact that the indications of the conductor were mere suggestions, the men disclosed the message and substance of the music with ecstatic loveliness and rare charm.

Matter more profound and devised on more heroic lines was the Sibelius work in which themes of poignant melancholy and stirring vitality were artfully incorporated into a fabric at once noble and intriguing.

In disclosing the music of the master composer of Finland, the orchestra played with splendid efficiency, a dazzlingly brilliant revelation and cunningly wrought disclosure of the four sections.

Beethoven's "Fate" Symphony brought the concert to a brilliant close.

68

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
NOV 14 1938

Boston Symphony Committee Lists Four New Members; Concert Series to Ope nFriday

Four new members have been announced by the Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opens its fifty-third borough season Friday evening at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The new members, named by Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, membership chairman, are Mrs. James G. McDonald, Miss Agnes Ritchie, Mrs. John Bauer and Miss Mary Ogg.

Boxholders for the first of the five concerts include Mrs. Thomas E. Murray Jr., Mrs. Benjamin Prince, the Adelphi Academy Alumnae Association, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Mrs. William H. Good, Mrs. Oliver Goldsmith Carter, Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock and Rear Admiral Clarke H. Woodward. The committee box will be occupied by the leaders of Brooklyn high school orchestras. Mrs. Edward C. Blum is chairman of boxes.

Thec oncerts are presented here under the auspices of Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which James G. McDonald is president; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, R. Huntington Woodman, chairman, and the Brooklyn Committee, Adrian Van Sinderen chairman and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, acting chairman.

The program, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conducting, will include Beethoven's Symphony No. 2 in D Major; Copland's El Salon Mexico and Dvorak's Symphony No. 5 in E Minor, "From the New World."

Serving on the Brooklyn Committee are: Dr. Joseph Dana Allen, Juan A. Almirall, John Anderson, Mrs. Ernest Ash, Dr. Frank L. Babbott, Miss Phyllis Barnes, Mrs. John L. Bauer, Judge William R. Bayes, Mr. and Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Robert E. Blum, Mrs. Samuel T. Brown, Mrs. Glentworth R. Butler, Mrs. Otis Swan Carroll, Mrs. Edmund H. Cahill, Mrs. Oliver G. Carter, Mrs. Thomas F. Casey, Mrs. I. Sherwood Coffin, Mrs. Ellwood Colahan, Miss Frances H. Coutts, Mrs. Gordon Weir Colton, Walter H. Crittenden, Mrs. Russell V. Cruikshank, Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, Mrs. Mary Childs Draper, Mrs. H. Edward Dreier, Mrs. Guy Du Val, S. Raymond Estey, Mrs. Merrill N. Foote, Mrs. Lewis W. Francis, Mrs. Charles W. Franklin, Dr. and Mrs. George H. Gartlan, Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin, Mrs. Charles R. Gay, Mrs. Emil Goetsch, Miss Louise Goetze, Miss Theodora Goldsmith, Mrs. William H. Good, Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, Mrs. William B. Greenman, Mrs. J. Morton Halstead, Mrs. William Peter Hamilton, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Hammitt, Frank Hancock, Mrs. James M. Hills, Mrs. Roy Hart, Mrs. Russell S. Hume, Mrs. O. Paul Humpstone, William T. Hunter, Henry A. Ingraham, Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives, Mrs. Charles Jaffa, Mrs. William G. James, Dr. William A. Jewett, Mrs. Frederick L. Johans, Mrs. David C. Johnson, Ralph Jonas, James H. Jourdan, Mrs. Hans V. Kaltenborn, Jacob C. Klinck, Mrs. B. Meredith Langstaff, David E. Lanman, Mrs. John Eadie Leech, Mrs. Maxwell Lester, Mrs. W. H. Lohman.

Also Miss Hilda Loines, Mrs. Frederick D. MacKay, Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock, Mrs. James G. McDonald, Mrs. William W. Marshall, Mrs. E. P. Maynard, Jr., Miss Irene Miles, Miss Mary Ogg, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Mrs. Frank H. Parsons, Mrs. Charles Elwell Perkins, Mrs. Charles E. Potts, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Mrs. Roland Rasch, G. William Rasch, Miss Agnes Ritchie, Mrs. Frank Reynolds, Miss Jessie Righter, Mrs. Donald Ross, Mrs. F. R. Schepmoes, Mrs. John D. H. Schulz, Mrs. Helen Warren Seeley, Robert Alfred Shaw, Mrs. Frank E. Simmons, Mrs. William Slater, Mrs. Harold Irving Small, Miss Arrietta Smith, Mrs. W. C. Spelman, Nelson Sprackling, Mrs. Ernest K. Tanner, Mrs. Franklin Taylor, Miss Marion J. Terry, Mrs. Hollis Thayer, Thornton C. Thayer, Carl H. Tollefsen, Mrs. Walter Truslow, Dr. Joshua N. Van Cott, Mr. and Mrs. Adrian Van Sinderen, Mrs. James P. Warbasse, Mrs. Edwin Carrington Ward, Mrs. Clarence Waterman, Mrs. Walter F. Wells, Mrs. George Whittlesey, Mrs. William H. hitten, Surrogate George Albert Wingate, Mrs. Harry Michael Wingle, R. Huntington Woodman, Mrs. Maude B. Wood, Miss Elizabeth Wright, Edward J. A. Zeiner.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
NOV 19 1938

Henry's Painting Of Koussevitzky On Exhibition

An oil painting of Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra by Stuart C. Henry, curator of the art department of the Berkshire Museum, is included in an exhibition of "Koussevitzkyana" currently showing in Boston Symphony Hall.

Mr. Henry's painting was done in 1937 and later bought by Donald L. Wilson of Boston, who has loaned the painting and the preliminary study sketch for the exhibit.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
NOV 18 1938

Boston Symphony Returns

Visitors Give First Concert of Their Fifty-third Season in New York.

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

Consecutive fifths may or may not have ceased to be an issue of orthodox harmony, but they can be effective in program-making, as Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony made manifest in Carnegie Hall last night. In this instance the consecutives were the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius and the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven. Prefaced by Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin" suite, they supplied the musical substance of the first concert of the Boston Symphony's fifty-third New York season.

If it contained no element of novelty, the list of compositions presented was one shrewdly chosen to exhibit the finest and most characteristic qualities of this remarkable ensemble. The Ravel suite is music stylistic and coloristic. In performance it requires most of all a lapidary cut and polish, that it may flash its facets with no clouding of detail. There was an abundance of glitter. The Boston Symphony obviously was its distinctive self and Dr. Koussevitzky as fastidious as ever.

The E flat symphony of Sibelius, as time has done much to make clear, is not a gloomy or a steely work. Its close is jubilant and along the way leading to this triumphant pæan is a play of sunlight only to be realized by brilliant and buoyant playing. The brass color of the Boston ensemble is peculiarly right for this music. But the same must be said for the woodwinds and for the strings. Conceivably the symphony never has stated its case here more clearly. But with clarity and tonal opulence went a tingling vitality.

In the past Dr. Koussevitzky's playing of the Beethoven C minor symphony has had its debatable points, among them a certain hardening of the tone in what has seemed to this reviewer an excess of nervous drive. There was less of this in last night's performance of the C minor than in some of its predecessors, though it remained on the bright and sharp-edged side. In its details it represented individual and group playing of the highest finish. Is there anywhere a double-bass section that meets the famous old challenge of the scherzo as this one does? Or is the ear influenced more than ordinarily by the eye, because of the unusual position of the big fiddles well up front at the left of the platform?

If last night's audience troubled itself at all with such speculations they had no effect on its enthusiasm. Dr. Koussevitzky was rousingly applauded at all the proper places and his musicians were called to their feet that they might have their share.

Tomorrow's Programs.

Philharmonic-Symphony Young People's Concert, Schelling conducting. Carnegie Hall, 11 A. M.

Program devoted to works of Richard Wagner.

Boston Symphony Orchestra. Carnegie Hall, 2:30 P. M.

"El Salon Mexico," Copland; Symphony No. 2, in D major, Beethoven; Symphony No. 4, in E Minor, Brahms.

Gerald Tracy, pianist. Town Hall, 3 P. M.

Toccata in C Minor, Bach; Sonata in B Flat, Schubert; Davidsbundler, Op. 6, Schumann; "Les collines d' Anacapri" and "La serenade interrompue," Debussy; Navarra, Albeniz.

Budapest String Quartet and William Primrose, violinist. Town Hall, 5:30 P. M.

Quartet in A Minor, Op. 51, No. 2, Brahms; Viola Quintet in G Minor, Mozart; "Death and the Maiden" Quartet, Schubert.

Adolf Vogel, bass-baritone. Town Hall, 8:30 P. M.

German lieder recital of works of Schubert, Brahms, Wolf, Graener and Loewe.

N. B. C. Symphony Orchestra. N. B. C. Studios, 10 P. M.

"Manfred" Overture, Schumann; "Reformation" Symphony, Mendelssohn; love scene from the Dramatic Symphony "Romeo and Juliet," Berlioz; two dances from "William Tell," Rossini.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE
NOV 20 1938

Boston Symphony Heard Again in Carnegie Hall

Aaron Copland's Mexican Piece Warmly Received

The Boston Symphony gave its second concert of the season yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall in the presence of an audience that filled every available set. The program, in addition to holding two familiar masterworks, the second symphony of Beethoven and the fourth symphony of Brahms, also brought Aaron Copland's "El Salon Mexico," which had received its first performance in this country last May by the N. B. C. Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Sir Adrian Boult.

Mr. Koussevitzky's extraordinarily eloquent interpretations of the Beethoven and Brahms symphonies, invested with such glowing and translucent tone by his superb orchestra, made this concert a memorable one. Mr. Copland's potpourri on Mexican themes is skillfully orchestrated and effective in an obvious way and at least serves to reveal that although he has created such things as the granitic piano variations, he has not forgotten the practical value of stereotyped diatonic harmonies.

J. D. B.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION
NOV 19 1938

Mr. and Mrs. Karl R. Kunze of Belmont Avenue are the parents of a son born in Wesson Maternity Hospital. Mr. Kunze is district supervisor of the National Youth Administration. The child is a grandson of Max Kunze, first double bass player in the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD - TELEGRAM
NOV 18 1938

Concert Series Begun by Boston Symphony

Opening a local seasonal series of five pairs of Thursday evening-Saturday afternoon concerts, the Boston Symphony Orchestra stirred a Carnegie Hall audience to thunderous applause last night with its superb playing. Serge Koussevitzky occupied his usual place on the podium.

Of the three numbers on the program Sibelius' Fifth Symphony came in for the warmest demonstration. Of course, Mr. Koussevitzky is an American pioneer in the Sibelius terrain and his powers of evoking the full poetic and tonal grandeur of the great Finn's music are an old story.

The performance was rich in subtle dynamic contrasts and overwhelmingly gripping in its cumulative surge of power. Closest attention to minute instrumental episodes made keen and vivid that epigrammatic terseness and incisive fragmentariness that are peculiar qualities of Sibelius' method of thematic development.

It is unquestionably one of the great symphonies, and we are again reminded of Sibelius' strange entry in his diary during the composition of the work:—"God opens the door for a moment and his orchestra plays the fifth symphony!" There were those last night who piously regarded Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra as the next best thing to a celestial broadcast.

Mr. Koussevitzky opened the program with Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin." This is nothing new on a Boston Symphony program, but the performance had a freshness and unanimity of response through all the delicate weavings of Ravel's fancy that made it a new experience.

And, of course, however one may disagree with Mr. Koussevitzky's ideas of tempo and dynamics in Beethoven's Fifth Symphony—the concluding number on the program—there is no resisting the sheer splendor of tone and perfection of detail he gets from his men in this work.

The audience gave him every proof of enjoying the symphony to the full.

* * *

Big Concerto Program at Theater of Music.

Another Gargantuan concerto program drew a good-sized audience to the Theater of Music last night, when the federal concerto forces covered one more lap in their historical survey of piano literature.

The soloists were Judith Sidorsky, Anna Auerbach, Henry Harris and Drusilla Huffmaster—pianists one and all—and, as usual, Edgar Schenkamn conducted the Greenwich Orchestra.

A balanced four-part program began with Mendelsohn's G minor concerto, went on to Schumann's A minor concerto and after the intermission continued with Cesar Franck's "Variations Symphoniques" and the D minor concerto of Rubinstein.

Soloists, orchestra and conductor gave of their technical best and the audience applauded them all to the echo.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST
NOV 18 1938

WORDS AND MUSIC

Boston Symphony Thrills Huge Audience at Carnegie

Koussevitzky Wins Plaudits With Program of Ravel, Sibelius and Beethoven

By SAMUEL CHOTZINOFF

Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave their first evening concert of the season at Carnegie Hall last night. The program consisted of Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin," the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius and Beethoven's C minor Symphony. A huge audience heard the concert and demonstrated its delight and satisfaction after each number.

This reviewer was overwhelmed by the beauty of the orchestra. The tone quality seems even better than it was last year and the balance of the choirs is the very height of sensitive adjustment. Quite apart from the music it was discoursing the orchestra continually ravished the ear, and the magical sounds that came from it seemed sufficient entertainment by itself. Not less remarkable was the precision of attack. The Boston's conductor's beat is anything but decisive, and an outsider cannot help wondering just by what esoteric means Mr. Koussevitzky achieves his results. The fact is that his men do understand and obey him and that the Russian conductor is therefore a miracle worker of a high order.

The Sibelius Fifth is less "bardic" than some of the other symphonies of the popular Finn and, to my mind, the better for it. Though it is of good length, its material is pretty economically handled. It is not as parsimonious as the Fourth and the listener never has the feeling that he is being cheated. Brassy passages which begin "forte" diminish to a "pianissimo" and then grow into "forte" again are conspicuous by their absence. There are no intimations of a Northern program. The symphonic content is absolute, and the emotions it engenders are solid, though they defy analysis.

Mr. Koussevitzky's way with Beethoven's Fifth tends less toward melodrama than it used to, but he still is unable to capture the relentless onslaught of the first movement. But here, as in the Sibelius, the orchestra covered itself with glory, playing with marvelous delicacy in the softer passages and in the climaxes with a massive brilliance that never once exceeded the limits of beautiful sound.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD - TELEGRAM
NOV 19 1938

Boston Orchestra Honors Composer

Aaron Copland, a native of Brooklyn, listened in a box at the Brooklyn Academy of Music last evening to the visiting Boston Symphony Orchestra play his latest orchestral piece, "El Salon Mexico." This work had its world premiere in Mexico City a year ago August and was broadcast in this country last May. According to the composer, "El Salon Mexico" is an attempt to put into music the "spirit" which he felt in a dance hall of that name in Mexico City.

Mexican tunes and rhythms are used freely, and the large orchestra includes many percussion instruments. Serge Koussevitzky directed a tonally splendid performance of the attractive, if rather surprisingly decorous, score. In response to the hearty applause Mr. Copland bowed acknowledgments first from his box, then from the stage.

Before "El Salon Mexico" Mr. Koussevitzky led his men in Beethoven's Second Symphony, ravishing to hear, and after the quasi-novelty in Dvorak's "New World" symphony.

P. S.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

NOV 18 1938

Times Wide World

NOTED CONDUCTOR AND WIFE BACK FROM EUROPE

Eugene Goossens of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra and Mrs. Goossens aboard the Queen Mary yesterday.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

NOV 19 1938

Off the Record

McDonald Proves Excellent and Handsome Host at Academy—Harvard Man, He Belittles Yale!—Newspaperman (English Journalist) Wildly Acclaimed; Attacks Chamberlain.

James G. McDonald, a tall, lanky man of 51 years, but with a good crop of white hair, worn fairly longish, stood before a crowded house at the Brooklyn Academy of Music last night. Dressed in formal white tie and tails, he was a handsome man of middle years. He then proved himself to be a man of unusual speaking ability and presence. He greeted the audience at the first appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, told them of his plans for the Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which he is the new president, and in all was a perfect host.

He then went into an anecdote that proved rather timely. Born in Ohio and educated in Indiana, he went to Harvard for post-graduate work. It was there, he said, last night, that he was introduced to symphony music.

"The Boston Symphony used to come to Cambridge to give us some culture," he related. "I do not know what success they had, possibly not much. But (and now we may assure Heywood Broun that the public still likes to hear Harvard men wittily look down at the "barbarians" of Yale) I'm sure they had far more success than when they went to New Haven."

We don't know how many of the audience, which laughed at the traditional jibe, realized that the annual Yale-Harvard game was only a few hours in the offing. It occurred to us. It also occurred to us that the Harvards, playing at New Haven today, are the hefty abysmal brutes, expected by the critics to sweep the weaker and milder Yales right out of the Bowl.

MUSIC SEEN HURT BY WORLD UNREST

Goossens, Back From Europe, Finds Blow to It Greater Than to Any Other Art

The world's political ills will wreak more harm on music than on any other art, Eugene Goossens, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, declared yesterday on his return from Europe on the Queen Mary. He will direct the Boston Symphony next week as guest conductor and then go to Cincinnati, where he will present during the remaining season several new compositions by European and American composers.

"There is even now a decline in the quality of musical composition and one encounters masterpieces less frequently than ten years ago," he said. "These are not congenial times for composition. The first requisite is an atmosphere of mental and physical tranquillity. It is true that great upheavals bring musical creation, but after the stimulus one must be removed from the field of unrest, unless he is one of those rare birds who can compose under any conditions.

"With the recent widespread turbulence, I am afraid music will suffer a great deal, at least temporarily, and we will be deprived of possible great works that we might otherwise have enjoyed."

Mr. Goossens spoke of recent English composition and said that as a musical nation, England was greatly underestimated, probably as a result of a psychological misapprehension as to the real nature of the Englishman.

"I happen to be able to speak on this subject with some authority and I believe that there is more actual music of the creative sphere being produced in England today than in any other nation," he declared. "When an Englishman chooses to say something he takes care that he has something to say. If England were to wave the flag a little more, in respect to her arts, the world would be staggered."

One of the new works which Mr. Goossens brought back is a "Variation on the Theme of Frank Bridges," by Benjamin Bridges, 25 years old, whom he described as one of the outstanding young English composers.

Mr. Goossens received a leave of absence from the Cincinnati orchestra and is returning to his post seven weeks behind schedule.

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

NOV 18 1938

Symphony Still Unfinished Because Of Crisis Abroad, Goossens Says On Return

N. Y. Bureau, 1001 Herald-Tribune Bldg.
SPECIAL DISPATCH TO THE ENQUIRER.

New York, November 17—Eugene Goossens, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, returned today on the Queen Mary, Cunard White Star liner, to rejoin his orchestra which has been led by Jose Iturbi, Spanish conductor-pianist, and Dr. Hans Lange, associate conductor of the Chicago Orchestra, since Goossens has been conducting a series of operas and concerts in England. He was accompanied by his wife and their seven-year-old daughter, Sidonie, who is a pupil at Notre Dame Convent in Cincinnati.

Goossens, who sailed for England last August after a short trip through the United States during which he gave 12 concerts, including five in the Hollywood Bowl, conducted a series of five operas at Covent Garden in London before leaving on a concert tour with the London Philharmonic Orchestra to Manchester, Liverpool, Oxford, Leeds, Sheffield, and several other cities in the north of England. This was the first opportunity Goossens had had in 15 years to conduct during the London season.

At the conclusion of his tour Goossens went to Paris, where his three older daughters are living and where he hoped to complete the symphony which he is composing and dedicating to the Cincinnati Symphony.

"Unfortunately for my work," Goossens said this morning, "my visit coincided with the European crisis. Daladier was on one side of me and the Italian Embassy on the other, and, although I felt myself that there would be a peaceful solution, I simply could not shut out the atmosphere and it was impossible to get any work done."

Goossens added he was hopeful of enough leisure during the winter to finish the work.

"Rather than hurry or skimp, however," he said, "I shall postpone introducing it until next season."

Goossens will not arrive in Cincinnati until November 27, as next Monday night he is beginning a week as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His last concert in Boston will be on the night of November 26 and he will leave immediately for Cincinnati.

Although his three older daughters have no particular musical aptitude Goossens said Sidonie was "almost an expert pianist."

"I have great hopes for her," he said. "Perhaps some day we may even give concert together. Who knows?"

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

NOV 19 1938

Boston Symphony Orchestra Season Opened Last Night

Society leaders occupied the orchestra and boxes at the Academy of Music opera house last evening to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra present the first of the season's five concerts in its 53d season in Brooklyn. Enthusiastically received was the program Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, offered. It included Beethoven's Symphony No. 2 in D major, Opus 36; Copland's "El Salon Mexico" and Dvorak's Symphony No. 5 in E minor from the "New World," Opus 95.

The concert series is presented under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences of which James G. McDonald is president; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn of which R. Huntington Woodman is president and the Brooklyn Committee of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport acting chairman. Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow is membership chairman and Mrs. Edward C. Blum, chairman of boxes.

Mrs. William H. Good entertained at dinner at her home, 880 St. Mark's Ave., before the concert for her box guests who were Mr. and Mrs. Edward C. Blum, former Judge and Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin, Mrs. Davenport, Hamilton Preston and Rudolph Reimer.

Mrs. Benjamin Prince had as her box guests Aaron Copland, the composer; Mr. and Mrs. McDonald, Mr. and Mrs. Karp Mikhalenkoff, Mme. Koussevitsky and Walter Golde.

Mrs. John J. Schoonhoven's guests in Mrs. Dean C. Osborne's box were Mr. and Mrs. Floyd S. Neely, Mrs. John A. Morison, Mrs. Thomas E. Haines and Miss Dorothy Haines. Mrs. Osborne had Mr. and Mrs. Carl Weiler as her orchestra guests.

Mrs. Oliver Goldsmith Carter entertained as her box guests Mrs. Arthur S. Tuttle, Mrs. Robert F. Ives, Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock, Mrs. Wilson Briggs Zimmer, Mrs. Frederick W. Burbank, Mrs. Frederic M. Davison and Mrs. Theodore L. Vosseler.

Rear Admiral Clarke H. Woodward of the Brooklyn Navy Yard and Mrs. Woodward were hosts in another box. Robert Alfred Shaw, a member of the Brooklyn Committee, had the Countess de Malroy as his guest.

The Brooklyn Committee presented its box to Dr. George H. Gartlan, director of music in New York City school for disposal among players in the high school orchestra. Dr. Gartlan selected members of the All-City High School Orchestra to use the box at the opening concert.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

NOV 19 1938

Society Greets Boston Symphony Orchestra at Opening Concert of 53rd Season in Brooklyn

Members of Brooklyn society and leaders in the borough's cultural life thronged the Brookyn Academy of Music last evening for the first of five concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its 53rd season here. Many attended the concert with guests and several dinner parties were given in advance of the program.

Preceding the second half of the program, James G. McDonald, president of Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, through whose efforts, coupled with those of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn and a Brooklyn Committee, the concerts are given here, announced that all seats had been sold for last evening's program, as well as those for the remaining four of the series.

Following the playing of Aaron Copland's El Salon Mexico, its first concert performance in the metropolitan area, the composer who was a guest in the box of Mrs. Benjamin Prince, was called to the stage, where he was welcomed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra. The program also included Beethoven's Symphony No. 2 in D Major and Dvorak's No. 5 in E minor (From the New World).

The boxholders were Mrs. Thomas E. Murray Jr., Mrs. Prince, the Adelphi Academy Alumnus Association, Mrs. John J. Schoohhoven, who entertained in the box of Mrs. Dean C. Osborne; Mrs. William H. Good, Mrs. Oliver Goldsmith Carter and Rear Admiral Clarke H. Woodward of Brooklyn Navy Yard, and Mrs. Woodward.

The second concert of the series will be given here on Jan. 6.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

NOV 20 1938

COPLAND NOVELTY IN PREMIERE HERE

'El Salon Mexico' Performed by Boston Symphony Under Serge Koussevitzky

BASED ON POPULAR SONGS

Beethoven Second and Brahms Fourth Complete Program at Carnegie Hall

By OLIN DOWNES

The place that Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Orchestra hold in the esteem of the New York public was shown again yesterday afternoon by the audience which packed Carnegie Hall and testified after each performance to its enthusiasm. As is customary at these concerts, there was no soloist. None is required. In fact, in most cases at these concerts a soloist would be an intrusion. For the orchestra, when Koussevitsky and his men made music, is itself the supreme soloist.

A novelty by Aaron Copeland, "El Salon Mexico," was performed for the first time in this city on this occasion. This music was suggested to Mr. Copeland in the course of a visit that he made to Mexico six years ago. He heard the players and watched the dancers in a popular resort in Mexico City, and he has transcribed his impression.

In a program note Mr. Copland is careful to state that he has not attempted to portray the Mexico of ancient civilization or modern revolution. Neither is this a tone-picture of the Mexican land. It is Mexican in the same sense, presumably, that a Frenchman's music would be American if he had gone to the Casino in Harlem and later composed about it on the basis of what he heard there, or rather the sort of music that he heard there. For Mr. Copland does not take his themes from a sketchbook wherein they were noted down as he listened. He has taken them from two Mexican collections of popular melodies, as Chabrier wove his "España" from known folk-melodies of Spain.

This music is ingeniously orchestrated, with the aid of certain percussion instruments which are exotic and with suggestive effects which bestow color and twang. The harmonization does not seek for strangeness, yet avoids the conventional and pursues a course dictated by the nature of the themes.

Adventure in Idiom

It is a brilliant adventure in a certain idiom. There is always the danger, where many themes are employed and especially when they are dance themes of a clearly defined length and rhythmical physiognomy, of a composition that will be patchwork. This danger is met competently by the composer because the motives are made to cohere and in the process of development to accumulate—at least technically. The work was very well received. After Dr. Koussevitzky had brought Mr. Copland to the stage, the latter returned by himself to acknowledge the welcome of the audience.

With the exception of this work—and for the writer rather regrettably—the program was confined to classics of an order imminently safe and sane. This is not to slight the beauty and the delight of Beethoven's Second symphony and Brahms' Fourth. But most of the orchestral programs given in this city follow the beaten track, whereas in former seasons one could always look to the orchestra from Boston to let us know what many contemporaneous composers were doing and in a majority of cases to produce some worth-while novelties. No doubt for some in the audience the present type of Koussevitzky programs is comforting. Yet we are supposed to be a public curious and receptive to new ideas.

Note on Second Symphony

The performance of the Second symphony was ravashing for its finish and for the beautiful blend of the sonorities. Though early Beethoven, it is a perfect masterpiece, and it was received with an enthusiasm that belied its years. For it is as fresh today as the day it was born. However, the performance tended over-much to the discreet. Doubtless Mr. Koussevitzky views this early symphony of Beethoven as purest classicism—as Beethoven still the dutiful heir of Haydn and Mozart. The conductor evidently intended to keep it to that scale of sonorous values.

But there is much in this score which is revolutionary, of an explosive force, and a jocosity perculiarly Beethoven's. It was in the last movement, principally, that this quality found expression yesterday. As a whole, we heard a Beethoven who was somewhat on his good manners. There is impoliteness in the Second symphony.

One might say that the whole era of the classic symphony was synthesized in the concert which began with Beethoven's Second and ended with the autumnal music which Brahms composed only a few months before his death, and which will endure as one of the supreme movements of the tonal art.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

NOV 19 1938

70

Music of the Day

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Boston Symphony at Academy of Music Includes Copeland's 'El Salon Mexico' In Notable Concert Under Koussevitzky

In the words of James G. MacDonald, president of Brooklyn Institute, the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last night was a great concert. It was. Never in better form, the Boston Symphony has excelled itself, and Koussevitzky deserves all the plaudits which he is now receiving and which have been somewhat overdue. Today the orchestra stands without a peer while its conductor challenges the greatest.

Besides expressing the gratitude for the privilege of hearing such a concert, Mr. MacDonald, in his short intermission speech, pointed out that through the interest and efforts of a few farseeing Brooklynites the Institute had made it possible to keep the annual visits of the Boston Symphony intact. With sold-out houses for the series as a start, he expressed the hope that the Institute at the Academy of Music would become a civic music center since there was need for a cultural center where a sense of creativeness in the community might find full expression. The concert sustained the interruption because the ideal outlined was similar to that which has made the Boston Symphony what it is.

The program opened with a performance of the Beethoven Second Symphony that was an inspiration. Perhaps the carefree nature of the music helped, but the beautifully balanced playing of the orchestra went far in conveying that feeling to the audience. Dr. Koussevitzky has grown in his interpretation of Beethoven to a point where his fastidious directing is recreating the composer's works for us in a most refreshing and vitalizing way.

Attention was focused on the first concert performance in the metropolitan area of "El Salon Mexico" by Aaron Copland, a native son of Brooklyn. It had been heard over the air last Spring. Something of a pot pourri of Spanish and Mexican rhythms and melodies, the work resolves itself into a colorful piece of instrumentation. In form, it is a rhapsodic rhythm build-up with a certain unity gained through repetition. In effect, it is as entertaining as Mexico must have been to Mr. Copland. True to his custom, Koussevitzky lavished on it all the necromancy that has made him an outstanding leader of contemporary music.

The concert closed with a vigorous and sonorous performance of the Dvorak Symphony "From the New World." It is needless to record with what acclaim it was received.

Maria Safonoff

A piano recital by Maria Safonoff was heard in Carnegie Hall last night by a good-sized and enthusiastic audience. The personable Russian artist, who is the daughter of Wassili Safonoff, one-time conductor of the Philharmonic, offered a varied if not imposing program including several works by compatriot composers.

Featured in the first half of the program was the B flat Sonata by Glazounov, while the closing group of pieces were by Scriabin, Liapounov, Tschaikovsky, Rubinstein and Moussorgsky. Three well moulded Chopin Etudes proved to be the artistic peak of the recital, for in them Miss Safonoff displayed a poetic feeling in proper accord with the romantic qualities of the music. In the Paganini-Liszt Theme and Variations the recitalist made effective use of a wide variety of dynamics from the airy wispiness of the penultimate variation to the powerful burst of vigor in the finale.

R. O. W.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

NOV 21 1938

WORDS AND MUSIC

Boston Symphony Draws Throng to Carnegie Hall

In the Evening, Toscanini's Performance at N. B. C. Elicits Cheers of Audience

By SAMUEL CHOTZINOFF

The Boston Symphony Orchestra again drew a capacity audience at Carnegie Hall for its Saturday matinee concert. The program consisted of Beethoven's Second and Brahms' Fourth symphonies, with Mr. Aaron Copland's "El Salon Mexico" sandwiched between. The latter had been first performed in New York in May of last year by Sir Adrian Boult and the N. B. C. Orchestra. Then, as on Saturday, it seemed a tuneful and adroitly colored piece. The composer himself disclaims any very serious intention of probing the Mexican soul in this music, hoping at best to reflect the Mexico of the tourist. This he presumably does.

Beethoven's D major symphony may contain no hint of the tragedy of his deafness, which overwhelmed him about the time he was writing the Second. Yet there is unmistakable evidence in the first movement that he was gravely troubled about something, if only about how to push through the Mozart-Haydn tradition to the proper expression of his own revolutionary ideas. Already the "Scherzo" of the Second is free from all influences, and the final Allegro hints at the unearthly humor of the Eighth Symphony. The D major symphony is a masterpiece, but it has a transitional quality not discernible in any of the other symphonies.

In this and in the Brahm's symphony, Dr. Koussevitzky's orchestra played like the magnificently tempered instrument that it is. For this reviewer, however, the Dr.'s musical account of the Brahms neglected the road outlines of the symphony, as well as its consolatory humanity. The audience, on the contrary, showed by the fervor of its applause that the Bostonians had exposed the Brahms thoroughly.

In the evening Mr. T[illegible] and the NBC Orchestra [illegible] ir current series of [illegible]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

NOV 21 1938

Music of the Week End

Concerts by Philharmonic, Boston and NBC Orchestras—Vogel in Recital.

The opera season might be said to have begun in Carnegie Hall, too, with yesterday afternoon's all-Wagner program by the Philharmonic-Symphony. All of the music presented was composed for the theater except "A Siegfried Idyl." And that, as every conscientious reader of annotations eventually comes to remember, contains themes from "Siegfried" and "Walkuere."

Apropos of a "Ring" cycle at Covent Garden, Sir Thomas Beecham was once referred to as "the Ringmaster." But aside from the quotations in the "Idyl," John Barbirolli had only the whinnying steeds of "The Ride of Valkyries" to put through their paces yesterday, so far as the "Ring" was concerned. Otherwise he was devoutly concerned with the prayer and the battle hymn of the "Rienzi" overture, the graces, satyrs and nymphs of the "Tannhaeuser" bacchanale, a series of excerpts from the last act of "Meistersinger" and the exaltations of the Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan und Isolde."

The playing was spirited and for the most part of a very high quality, the orchestra apparently sharing the conductor's enthusiasm for the task in hand. The "Idyl" was intrusted to a small group, mostly first-stand men, totaling eighteen. The effect, of course, was that of chamber music, and nearer, no doubt, than the ordinary symphonic performance to the results obtained by Wagner when he stationed a little orchestra on the stairs at Triebschen and greeted Cosima with this music on a Christmas morning sixty-eight years ago.

In the performance were exquisite details. But the balances were not always advantageous, the two horns being much weightier than the strings. And surely the clarinet was in something less than its best possible relation to its fellows of the miniature ensemble.

O. T.

Boston Symphony Matinee.

Aaron Copland's memento of a Mexican visit several years ago, "El Salon Mexico," which had its first New York performance at an NBC broadcast last spring, was brought into the concert hall for the first here at Saturday afternoon's concert by the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall. Since Mr. Copland, by his own confession, has attempted no deeper probing of the Mexican spirit than what might be called a tourist's impression, it is just to recognize this shrewdly designed, well-orchestrated piece as a thoroughly successful accomplishment of his purpose. If it has a conspicuous fault, it is that the work is too long for its substance. Copland has selected his tunes (from folk sources) with discrimination, and given them brilliant life in the orchestra. The performance was a dazzling one, with especial credit to the player of the E flat clarinet, who mimicked the characteristic Latin use of this instrument cleverly.

Otherwise the program conducted by Serge Koussevitzky was devoted to such staples of the repertory as the Second Symphony of Beethoven and the Fourth of Brahms. In both works the sumptuous orchestral tone, the exceptional definition of detail and the infinitely precise response of the players to the conductor's wishes were unendingly impressive. Thus a break by the solo horn in the Larghetto of the Beethoven symphony was a cause for wonder, though in another performance it would have not been noticed. Mr. Koussevitzky's treatment of this work was courteous and friendly, though it tended to smooth sharp contours and deny the rebellion in the first and last movements.

I. K.

Toscanini Pays a Tribute.

In memory of the late Clarence H. Mackay, Arturo Toscanini added the Prelude of the third act of Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" to Saturday night's concert by the NBC Symphony in Studio 8-H, Radio City. It was reverently and affectionately played. Schumann and Mendelssohn, warm friends of a happier day for artistic brotherhood, were the composers of the first part of the program, the "Manfred" Overture of the one and the "Reformation" Symphony of the other eliciting from the conductor and his ensemble performances of the most devoted care and enthusiasm. In the studio, some of the brass playing verged on the strident, but this was to be accepted as part of the acoustical complex, whereby the sound that is right for the air is not invariably right for those in the hall. Altogether fine-grained, however, was the ensemble tone in the love scene from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet." Virtuosity had its innings in the two dances from Rossini's "William Tell," with which the conductor chose to conclude the evening. Rhythmically they were irresistible but otherwise they were dubious material for a symphonic program.

O. T.

TOLEDO, O.
TIMES

NOV 23 1938

Mrs. Hollister Entertains Attractive Visitor

MRS. CORNELIA COLTON HOLLISTER had as her guest over the week end, Miss Dorothy Sedgwick of Martins Ferry, O.

Miss Sedgwick, who is a patron of the arts, has been Mrs. Hollister's guest at a number of our Symphony concerts at the Museum of Art.

She attended a dinner which Mrs. Hollister gave for Serge Koussevitzky when he was here with the Boston Symphony and has many friends here.

Miss Katherine Mennel, a student at Vassar college, will return today to spend the Thanksgiving holiday with her parents, Mr. and Louis A. Mennel.

Symphony Hall Show Of Aarons' Sculpture

B. Trans. Nov. 26/38

Sculptured figures, portraits and decorative pieces by George Aarons are on exhibition in the gallery at Symphony Hall during the Symphony Concerts. The exhibition contains a detail from Mr. Aarons' groups at the South Boston Housing Project, some familiar pieces, and several unexhibited figures.

M. Aarons, who was born in St. Petersburg in 1896, came to America at the age of ten. He manifested talent in his chosen medium at an early age, and attended the School of the Boston Museum of Fine Arts and the Beaux Arts Institute of Design in New York, where he completed his course with honor.

Mr. Aarons has taught modeling throughout New England, and his work has been exhibited at the Pennsylvania Academy, the Art Alliance in New York and in Philadelphia, the Germanic Museum in Cambridge, the Boston Architectural Club and the Boston Museum of Fine Arts.

The exhibition will close on December the 3rd. With Mr. Aarons' work may be seen a number of paintings by Gaston Bladet, flute player of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1923 until his death in 1938.

CAVALRY ESCORT

Troop E of the 110th cavalry, Massachusetts national guard, will ride 16 in front and 16 at the rear of the float.

Police are making preparations to handle the biggest crowd in the history of the Santason parades. Two central stations for the care of lost children will be established at the corner of Charles and Beacon streets and on Washington street near School street. These stations will be large heated buses. There will be a trained nurse in attendance at each.

As usual one of the main features of the four-mile parade will be the 23 huge helium-filled grotesque balloons. Seven of the balloons will be of gargantuan proportions bobbing and towering from 80 to 150 feet above the crowds.

The balloon that is expected to be the hit of the parade is "flatfoot Everett," the 80-foot comedy policeman. However, he is by no means the biggest of the balloons. The ferocious-looking dragon is 120 feet long. The Indian stands 65 feet in the air.

"The man on the flying trapeze"

Goosson Sees 'Faustus' Production Will Write Modern Opera on Legend

B. Herald — Nov. 26/38

Inspiration for a modern opera based on the Marlowe legend of Dr. Faustus, which was disrupted by the tense atmosphere of Europe during the late summer and early autumn, was revived here in Boston for Eugene Goosson, noted conductor and composer, he revealed last night.

Goosson, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra and guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this weekend, declared the local Federal Theater presentation of the Marlowe legend in the Copley Theater had revived his interest in the opera for which he has already written some music.

RECALLS WAR TENSION

That more of the music has not been written, he said, may be traced to the war tension of the early autumn in Paris. He went there, he said, to concentrate on music and to compose, but was startled to find that the house he and Mrs. Goosson had rented was between the home of Premier Daladier of France and the Italian embassy.

"Even if one pulled down the blinds, it was impossible to shut out the tension," he explained last night. "It was impossible to concentrate on musical composition whe hall over the city were weeping women seeing their sons or husbands off to war duty, when the concierge went around placing pails of sand outside the door, anticipating fire, when there were constant air raid practices to remind you that war was close."

He revealed his plan to write an experimental opera on the Faust legend, for which he hopes to compose psychological music which will reflect the moods and emotions of the protagonists. There were to be no set arias for prima donnas, he will have the orchestra carry the burden of the musical end of the opera, with the singers to project the English and to do the acting.

For some time he had been interested in writing a new Foust, but could not make up his mind whether to employ the Goethe or the Marlowe legends. Skillful use of the Marlowe version by the Federal Theater presentation, whic he and Mrs. Goosson attended, caused him to decide on that, he said.

INTERVIEWS ADAPTER

The simplicity and artistry of the local presentation, particularly utilization of lighting devices to effect changes of scenes and moods, he said, made so great an impression on him he invited the adapter and director, Eliot Duvey, to visit him in the Copley-Plaza yesterday afternoon so that he might congratulate him.

"Simple lighting effects might be used to great advantage in opera, if one had enterprise enough," he said. "Just imagine a new Foust on daring lines! Opera is so traditional, the public expects those traditions to be followed in every opera. It takes specail enterprise to be different."

The Goosson European vacation was not completely fruitless, however, for in addition to several sketches for the new Faust, he composed two of four movements for a new symphony.

"I am a late romantic—or perhaps I should say a near romantic," he said, referring to his musican taste, but women present raised eyebrows, for the youthful composer-conductor looks like Hollywood's conception of the romantic gentleman.

He is handsome, he speaks with a charming — and understandable — British accent, and he wears smartly-tailored Bond street clothes that emphasize not only the breadth of his shoulders and the slimness of his figure but also his modern, progressive outlook.

"I mean," Goosson went on, still explaining his musical preference. "I like the luxurious in music—that which isn't too modern. That is why, with this romantic attitude, I am interested in writing an opera on the legend of Dr. Faustus."

With the late Arnold Bennett, he wrote a one-act opera, "Judith," based onthe Biblical story, and a four-act opera, "Don Juan de Manara," both of which were presented in Covent Garden, London.

Cont. above

Second Section

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

Page Nine

BOSTON, FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 25, 1938 **

A Long Cold Wait—But Who Cares With Symphony Concert Ahead?

By a Staff Photographer

Catching Up on Homework

While waiting for the doors of Symphony Hall to open for the concert, this student decided to do a little studying.

Blankets and Sandwiches

The three young women in the foreground evidently do not mind the cold—they came prepared. The one in the background apparently did not take time for lunch, she is eating hers while she waits. Students and others may take any seat in the second balcony, with the exception of the front row, for 50 cents.

Keeping Up With the News

This concertgoer is unaware of the photographer as he waits for the doors to open so that he may "rush" upstairs to a choice seat.

Symphony Hall's Front Steps Reflect Appeal of Rehearsals

By Pearl Strachan

Staff Writer of The Christian Science Monitor

"Another twenty minutes?" The young woman with a shorthand manual under her arm stretches herself on tiptoe to get a view of the clock outside the bank. It wears a halo of snowflakes. Ten minutes after the hour. At exactly half-past the huge central door of Symphony Hall will be flung open, and the crowd which has been gathering on the steps since noon will suddenly tense its relaxed muscles and make a rush for the ticket office.

No blizzard can damp the ardor of 200 odd music lovers grouped along the Huntington Avenue sidewalk, and around the corner of Massachusetts Avenue and on the wet stone stairway which has been greying to Boston soot and weather since the turn of the century. Rush seats at 50 cents for the Friday afternoon concerts are a logical development of the original 25 cent seats which were available so long for the dress rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In its former Music Hall, in the downtown section of the city, built in 1852, "from which time forward it was unnecessary to ask a visiting Jenny Lind to sing in the Fitchburg Railroad Station," to quote M. A. DeWolfe Howe, historian of the Orchestra, an increasingly enthusiastic public had attended the Friday afternoon rehearsals. And they were definitely rehearsals, not finished performances. The players were drilled and made to repeat as the leader saw fit.

Many Years Ago

But that gave place many years ago to the concerts which draw this group of students and housewives and schoolteachers and other citizens now occupying the steps. He is a very earnest young man who shares his hard balls of candy, dulled by long acquaintance with keys and small change and stubs of pencil, in a trousers pocket, with a girl from the Conservatory, and declares that musical appreciation from his point of view must be subjective, while, he adds magnanimously, "from your point of view, with your knowledge of art, it is probably objective."

No such flights into comparative approaches to the aesthetic absorb the schoolgirls clustered on the front step who giggle mysteriously over some dilemma of another schoolgirl, not present. All that reaches the general public concerning that particular situation is a sibilant, "She said she wanted to go to college to take up Lat'n." The young man next to them is actually engaged in executing his "Lat'n" homework, sprawled in all directions, with copy-book open in front of him. His lending library copy of Thomas Mann's "The Magic Mountain" slithers onto the step below. He tosses a laconic answer now and then to a fluffy girl in a rabbit-skin coat who holds before her a copy of the Saturday Review of Literature but gazes at the windows of the cafeteria and haberdashery on the opposite side of the Avenue.

Pedestrians Smile

Pedestrians passing smile faintly, at the corners of their mouths, as if they understood. Automobilists, for the most part, stare with evident perplexity. As the time appointed draws near a young woman jumps to her feet, discovers that her light raincoat is striped with the accumulated grime of ages, performs a hurried and unsuccessful brushing, mutters a few exclamations of dismay and with a sigh of resignation joins the now solidifying queue.

At last the doors have opened. A gray-haired woman with a bulgy canvas bag steps from her niche beside the weighty lamp base and joins the swaying line on its way to the ticket office. The entire second balcony, with the exception of the first row, is at the disposal of the 50-centers. They may sit wherever they like, provided they get there first. What are they going to hear? Beethoven? Sibelius? They can be sure of one thing, they will have printed programs, and they will not experience a repetition of the occasion recorded of one public rehearsal of the eighteen-nineties when a certain piece alluded to as the "Railway Galop" (composer forgotten) was dramatized during the playing by a miniature steam engine which scooted about the floor, with black smoke, made from cotton wool, streaming out of the funnel.

Goossens's Bag of Novelties

23/38

Written for The Christian Science Monitor

Eugene Goossens is not an unfamiliar figure at the symphony concerts. He has twice before appeared as guest conductor of the Boston Orchestra, leading it in music by himself and other composers for a pair of concerts in 1926 and again in 1931.

Coming to Boston immediately from concerts in London and the provincial cities of England, he has assembled an engaging list of pieces for his programs of Friday and Saturday. Not one of the works of his choice may be labeled "standard"; rather are they all novelties. The Overture to the "Occasional" Oratorio of Handel will be heard for "first times at these concerts," as will the "Two Nature Poems" of the conductor's own composition. The orchestral version of Schumann's "Carnaval" will be given its first concert performances in the United States. Tchaikovsky's "Manfred" Symphony has not sounded in Boston since Monteux resurrected it in 1920.

* * *

Handel wrote his "Occasional" Oratorio in 1745, at one of the blackest moments in his career, when he was in bankruptcy. In that year London was afflicted with a wave of terror caused by rumor of revolution. Prince Charlie, the Pretender, had landed in Scotland with prospects of raising an army and descending upon London. Travelling like a brand of fire, the rumor sent much of fashionable London scurrying to the south of England. King George packed his valuables and prepared to flee to Hanover. A change in the raiders' tactics propped up the wavering Georgian confidence, however, and he sat firm in his capital. Following its king, London regained its courage; hysteria gave place to rejoicing: the safety of the land was assured.

Handel, an opportunist of the most princely order, felt this wave of courageous enthusiasm, wrote an oratorio to celebrate the occasion in fitting mood: It was an immediate success, serving to prove Handel's undying vitality as a composer and gain commissions for him to combat the taint of his second bankruptcy, all the subscribers to his unfulfilled series of concerts the previous season being sent complimentary tickets to three performances of the oratorio.

The work has enjoyed much popularity in England—that permanent paradise of choral music—and the overture has come in for a special share of the praise. It is remarkable for breadth and enthusiasm, for the sonorous opening and the martial paean of thanksgiving at the close. There are four brief parts, all in the key of D major. The introductory Largo maestoso is followed by an Allegro in which a short subject is treated in a broad Handelian polyphony; a diminutive Adagio for solo oboe and strings is almost a prayer for peace before the strident measures of the final march.

* * *

Considerable mystery surrounds the orchestration of Schumann's early piano suite, "Carnaval." Romola Nijinsky, wife of the dancer who made the part of Harlequin one of his most sensitive creations, has written clearly of its origin. The ballet version was prepared by Fokine and Bakst under the guiding hand of Diaghileff for a ball in St. Petersburg in 1909. Diaghileff asked Glazounoff to orchestrate Schumann's superbly pianistic pieces. "In spite of the fact that both Liadoff and Tchérepnin collaborated, the final effort was as harmonious as if it had been orchestrated by a single man."

Yet the Ballet Russe has always linked the name of Rimsky-Korsakoff to the collaborators, of whom Glazounoff is made to appear but one of several. The writer was told by Efrem Kurtz, present ballet conductor and musical director, and a pupil of Glazounoff, that Glazounoff never accepted even a major part of credit for the orchestration. Remembering that Rimsky-Korsakoff passed on in 1908, a hypothesis would be that Glazounoff assembled the ballet score from already orchestrated fragments by his colleagues, perhaps filling in more or less lengthy gaps with his own pen. Which of the gentlemen are responsible for which of the numbers we may never know, but we can credit them with an instrumentation of great charm and verve, notable for preserving the wit and whimsicality of Schumann's idiomatic piano music.

Mr. Goossens "Two Nature Poems for Orchestra" were originally conceived in orchestral idiom but were first published with an introductory piece, "Awakening," as piano sketches in 1919. "Pastorale" was scored on the Lafayette en route to New York in 1937, "Bacchanal" in Cincinnati during January and February of the present year. The composer has supplied his brilliantly impressionistic poems with the following descriptions, which he terms "prose-poems" in their own right:

"I. Pastorale. Languor of summer day in the heart of rich countryside; sunlit green of ancient trees and scent of hot grass; shimmering haze, enveloping distant hills and unfathomable blue of nearby lakes. Over all, a song which swells to ecstasy, and subsides again into wistful melancholy, and night.

"II. Bacchanal. Riot of leaves, sun-drenched grass and flowers; straining trees, white-flecked sea and the West Wind. Then a song of Autumn; yearning, insistent—against the stirring of restless woods. More powerful it rises; wilder it throbs; and soon all Nature succumbs to the frenzy of its mad rhythm."

G. H. L. S.

LOS ANGELES, CAL.
HERALD - EXPRESS

Nov. 18/38

NOTED COMPOSER OF EUROPE VISITS L. A.

Los Angeles musical circles played host today to a distinguished visitor—Daniele Amfiteaterof, Russian-Italian conductor and composer who arrived at the Beverly Hills Hotel for an extended visit while he turns his pen to a series of musical compositions.

He plans to write a violin concerto for Jascha Heifitz and a piano concerto for Arthur Rubenstein.

Only 36, Amfiteaterof already has established himself as composer for his work the "American Panorama," a symphonic sketch which he wrote last year in Europe. It describes in music the United States as an European who has never been here might imagine it. It achieved huge success in Paris.

Now that he has arrived here Amfiteaterof says the impressions of this country he conveyed in his composition have not changed.

He is associate conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra and guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BROADCASTING
WASHINGTON, D. C.

NOV 15 1938

CARVING EXPERT
Morton Blender, WCOP, Gets Wide Acclaim for Art

MORTON BLENDER, 25-year-old announcer of WCOP, Boston, has achieved a wide reputation for his wood carving and modeling of plastics. With a wood and plastic model of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra already on display in Massey Hall, Toronto, Mr. Blender has started the most ambitious project of his career—a scale model of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as it appears during a concert in Symphony Hall. Combining his close association with members of the organization in his work with WCOP and accurate photographs and drawings of the musicians, Mr. Blender plans "a faithful reproduction of the symphony in action, with each instrument and a life-like reproduction of each musician's face".

After completing the Boston Symphony model, Mr. Blender has been requested to do the new Edward Hatch memorial shell, in which Arthur Fiedler and his musicians will present future Summer Esplanade concerts. The shell model, as planned, also will show a concert in progress, with each musician "done" in detail.

71

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

BOSTON, FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 25, 1938

A Long Cold Wait—But Who Cares With Symphony Concert Ahead?

By a Staff Photographer

Catching Up on Homework

While waiting for the doors of Symphony Hall to open for the concert, the student decided to do a little studying.

Blankets and Sandwiches

The three young women in the foreground evidently do not mind the cold—they came prepared. The one in the background apparently did not take time for lunch, she is eating hers while she waits. Students and others may take any seat in the second balcony, with the exception of the front row, for 50 cents.

Keeping Up With the News

This concertgoer is unaware of the photographer as he waits for the doors to open so that he may "rush" upstairs to a choice seat.

Symphony Hall's Front Steps Reflect Appeal of Rehearsals

By Pearl Strachan

Staff Writer of The Christian Science Monitor

"Another twenty minutes?" The young woman with a shorthand manual under her arm stretches herself on tiptoe to get a view of the clock outside the bank. It wears a halo of snowflakes. Ten minutes after the hour. At exactly half-past the huge central door of Symphony Hall will be flung open, and the crowd which has been gathering on the steps since noon will suddenly tense its relaxed muscles and make a rush for the ticket office.

No blizzard can damp the ardor of 200 odd music lovers grouped along the Huntington Avenue sidewalk, and around the corner of Massachusetts Avenue and on the wet stone stairway which has been greying to Boston soot and weather since the turn of the century. Rush seats at 50 cents for the Friday afternoon concerts are a logical development of the original 25-cent seats which were available so long for the dress rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In its former Music Hall, in the downtown section of the city, built in 1852, "from which time forward it was unnecessary to ask a visiting Jenny Lind to sing in the Fitchburg Railroad Station," to quote M. A. DeWolfe Howe, historian of the Orchestra, an increasingly enthusiastic public had attended the Friday afternoon rehearsals. And they were definitely rehearsals, not finished performances. The players were drilled and made to repeat as the leader saw fit.

Many Years Ago

But that gave place many years ago to the concerts which draw this group of students and housewives and schoolteachers and other citizens now occupying the steps. He is a very earnest young man who shares his hard balls of candy, dulled by long acquaintance with keys and small change and stubs of pencil, in a trousers pocket, with a girl from the Conservatory, and declares that musical appreciation from his point of view must be subjective, while, he adds magnanimously, "from your point of view, with your knowledge of art, it is probably objective."

No such flights into comparative approaches to the aesthetic absorb the schoolgirls clustered on the front step who giggle mysteriously over some dilemma of another schoolgirl, not present. All that reaches the general public concerning that particular situation is a sibilant, "She said she wanted to go to college to take up Lat'n." The young man next to them is actually engaged in executing his "Lat'n" homework, sprawled in all directions, with copy-book open in front of him. His lending library copy of Thomas Mann's "The Magic Mountain" slithers onto the step below. He tosses a laconic answer now and then to a fluffy girl in a rabbit-skin coat who holds before her a copy of the Saturday Review of Literature but gazes at the windows of the cafeteria and haberdashery on the opposite side of the Avenue.

Pedestrians Smile

Pedestrians passing smile faintly, at the corners of their mouths, as if they understood. Automobilists, for the most part, stare with evident perplexity. As the time appointed draws near a young woman jumps to her feet, discovers that her light raincoat is striped with the accumulated grime of ages, performs a hurried and unsuccessful brushing, mutters a few exclamations of dismay and with a sigh of resignation joins the now solidifying queue.

At last the doors have opened. A gray-haired woman with a bulgy canvas bag steps from her niche beside the weighty lamp base and joins the swaying line on its way to the ticket office. The entire second balcony, with the exception of the first row, is at the disposal of the 50-centers. They may sit wherever they like, provided they get there first. What are they going to hear? Beethoven? Sibelius? They can be sure of one thing, they will have printed programs, and they will not experience a repetition of the occasion recorded of one public rehearsal of the eighteen-nineties when a certain piece alluded to as the "Railway Galop" (composer forgotten) was dramatized during the playing by a miniature steam engine which scooted about the floor, with black smoke, made from cotton wool, streaming out of the funnel.

Goossens's Bag of Novelties

Nov. 23/38

Written for The Christian Science Monitor

Eugene Goossens is not an unfamiliar figure at the symphony concerts. He has twice before appeared as guest conductor of the Boston Orchestra, leading it in music by himself and other composers for a pair of concerts in 1926 and again in 1931.

Coming to Boston immediately from concerts in London and the provincial cities of England, he has assembled an engaging list of pieces for his programs of Friday and Saturday. Not one of the works of his choice may be labeled "standard"; rather are they all novelties. The Overture to the "Occasional" Oratorio of Handel will be heard for "first times at these concerts," as will the "Two Nature Poems" of the conductor's own composition. The orchestral version of Schumann's "Carnaval" will be given its first concert performances in the United States. Tchaikovsky's "Manfred" Symphony has not sounded in Boston since Monteux resurrected it in 1920.

* * *

Handel wrote his "Occasional" Oratorio in 1745, at one of the blackest moments in his career, when he was in bankruptcy. In that year London was afflicted with a wave of terror caused by rumor of revolution. Prince Charlie, the Pretender, had landed in Scotland with prospects of raising an army and descending upon London. Travelling like a brand of fire, the rumor sent much of fashionable London scurrying to the south of England. King George packed his valuables and prepared to flee to Hanover. A change in the raiders' tactics propped up the wavering Georgian confidence, however, and he sat firm in his capital. Following its king, London regained its courage; hysteria gave place to rejoicing: the safety of the land was assured.

Handel, an opportunist of the most princely order, felt this wave of courageous enthusiasm, wrote an oratorio to celebrate the occasion in fitting mood. It was an immediate success, serving to prove Handel's undying vitality as a composer and gain commissions for him to combat the taint of his second bankruptcy, all the subscribers to his unfulfilled series of concerts the previous season being sent complimentary tickets to three performances of the oratorio.

The work has enjoyed much popularity in England—that permanent paradise of choral music—and the overture has come in for a special share of the praise. It is remarkable for breadth and enthusiasm, for the sonorous opening and the martial paean of thanksgiving at the close. There are four brief parts, all in the key of D major. The introductory Largo maestoso is followed by an Allegro in which a short subject is treated in a broad Handelian polyphony; a diminutive Adagio for solo oboe and strings is almost a prayer for peace before the strident measures of the final march.

* * *

Considerable mystery surrounds the orchestration of Schumann's early piano suite, "Carnaval." Romola Nijinsky, wife of the dancer who made the part of Harlequin one of his most sensitive creations, has written clearly of its origin. The ballet version was prepared by Fokine and Bakst under the guiding hand of Diaghileff for a ball in St. Petersburg in 1909. Diaghileff asked Glazounoff to orchestrate Schumann's superbly pianistic pieces. "In spite of the fact that both Liadoff and Tchérepnin collaborated, the final effort was as harmonious as if it had been orchestrated by a single man."

Yet the Ballet Russe has always linked the name of Rimsky-Korsakoff to the collaborators, of whom Glazounoff is made to appear but one of several. The writer was told by Efrem Kurtz, present ballet conductor and musical director, and a pupil of Glazounoff, that Glazounoff never accepted even a major part of credit for the orchestration. Remembering that Rimsky-Korsakoff passed on in 1908, a hypothesis would be that Glazounoff assembled the ballet score from already orchestrated fragments by his colleagues, perhaps filling in more or less lengthy gaps with his own pen. Which of the gentlemen are responsible for which of the numbers we may never know, but we can credit them with an instrumentation of great charm and verve, notable for preserving the wit and whimsicality of Schumann's idiomatic piano music.

Mr. Goossens "Two Nature Poems for Orchestra" were originally conceived in orchestral idiom but were first published with an introductory piece, "Awakening," as piano sketches in 1919. "Pastorale" was scored on the Lafayette en route to New York in 1937, "Bacchanal" in Cincinnati during January and February of the present year. The composer has supplied his brilliantly impressionistic poems with the following descriptions, which he terms "prose-poems" in their own right:

"I. Pastorale. Languor of summer day in the heart of rich countryside; sunlit green of ancient trees and scent of hot grass; shimmering haze, enveloping distant hills and unfathomable blue of nearby lakes. Over all, a song which swells to ecstasy, and subsides again into wistful melancholy, and night.

"II. Bacchanal. Riot of leaves, sun-drenched grass and flowers; straining trees, white-flecked sea and the West Wind. Then a song of Autumn; yearning, insistent—against the stirring of restless woods. More powerful it rises; wilder it throbs; and soon all Nature succumbs to the frenzy of its mad rhythm."

G. H. L. S.

LOS ANGELES, CAL.
HERALD - EXPRESS

Nov. 18/38

NOTED COMPOSER OF EUROPE VISITS L. A.

Los Angeles musical circles played host today to a distinguished visitor—Daniele Amfiteaterof, Russian-Italian conductor and composer who arrived at the Beverly Hills Hotel for an extended visit while he turns his pen to a series of musical compositions.

He plans to write a violin concerto for Jascha Heifitz and a piano concerto for Arthur Rubenstein.

Only 36, Amfiteaterof already has established himself as composer for his work the "American Panorama," a symphonic sketch which he wrote last year in Europe. It describes in music the United States as an European who has never been here might imagine it. It achieved huge success in Paris.

Now that he has arrived here Amfiteaterof says the impressions of this country he conveyed in his composition have not changed.

He is associate conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony Ochestra and guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BROADCASTING
WASHINGTON, D. C.

NOV 15 1938

CARVING EXPERT

Morton Blender, WCOP, Gets Wide Acclaim for Art

MORTON BLENDER, 25-year-old announcer of WCOP, Boston, has achieved a wide reputation for his wood carving and modeling of plastics. With a wood and plastic model of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra already on display in Massey Hall, Toronto, Mr. Blender has started the most ambitious project of his career—a scale model of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as it appears during a concert in Symphony Hall. Combining his close association with members of the organization in his work with WCOP and accurate photographs and drawings of the musicians, Mr. Blender plans "a faithful reproduction of the symphony in action, with each instrument and a life-like reproduction of each musician's face".

After completing the Boston Symphony model, Mr. Blender has been requested to do the new Edward Hatch memorial shell, in which Arthur Fiedler and his musicians will present future Summer Esplanade concerts. The shell model, as planned, also will show a concert in progress, with each musician "done" in detail.

B. Trans

MUSIC

Nov. 26/38

Symphony Concert

Mr. Goossens Sets Forth a Program Unfamiliar in One Way or Another

By MOSES SMITH

Having conducted concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra here in 1926 and again in 1930, Eugene Goossens, guest conductor during the current week returned almost as an old friend. As such he was greeted by the audience at yesterday's matinee concert, most of whom, very likely, did not know or forgot that the conductor had already conducted the concert, with a program similar to yesterday's, in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, on Thursday evening. But there was more than mere friendliness to the applause, as it gathered momentum during the afternoon. There was appreciation for the magnificent playing of a magnificent orchestra under strange hands. There was also apparently expression of favor toward the program Mr. Goossens had put together. If the final round of applause was a little weak, the reason was in all likelihood the excessive length of the program, requiring an even two hours in performance.

It was an encouraging thing that the audience behaved as it did for Mr. Goossens is neither a virtuoso nor sentimental conductor. He can hardly be called a warm conductor (though, because of the nature of the program, he displayed more animation than it seems he has in the past). He is a well-schooled, fine-grained musician, understanding, both as executor and creator, the problems inherent in making an orchestra speak. He obviously enjoys making music and supposedly wants the audience to enjoy it. To that end he does not evidently believe it is necessary to get excited. That is one way of making music. It is not the only way. But it is legitimate and it can yield enjoyment to those who have not made up their minds in advance.

* * *

The program, as has already been suggested, was made up of music hardly lacking in warmth. Handel's Overture to the "Occasional" Oratorio had the classical form but also the Handelian warmth and more than the customary brilliance. Schumann's "Carnaval," orchestrated by a disputed number of Russians, came, of course, from the very core of Romanticism. The conductor's own Two Nature Poems, heard here presumably for the first time, were of a different temperature. "Pastoral," as its title might have predicted, was coolly neo-impressionist, the poetic utterance always reserved. "Bacchanal" was exciting for its brightness and stridency, not because it generated heat in the listener. Finally the "Manfred" Symphony of Tchaikovsky was as moody and lachrymose as only Tchaikovsky at his best—and worst—could be.

Because of the prevailing temper, which the majority of our concert audiences prefers, the specific unfamiliarity of the music did not matter. Handel's Overture had never previously been played at these concerts. The co-operative transcription of "Carnaval," employing the art of Liadov, Glazounov, Tcherepnin and perhaps Rimsky-Korsakov, was marked "first concert performances in the United States," although some had heard it, in one way or another, in connection with Ballet Russe programs. And the Tchaikovsky Symphony had not been played here since 1920.

* * *

The lapse of time has not helped the work. It must have seemed old-fashioned then. Now, with such things as the Fascist march on Rome, the Lindbergh New York-to-Paris flight, the Depression and the New Deal behind us (or, if you prefer, with us), the case seems hopeless. Maybe people used to believe in Manfred or the Tchaikovskian translation of it into tone. Maybe some still do. As for me, the music left me absolutely cold—and I am not attempting to employ the familiar racy idiom. The subject-matter need not have rendered the Tchaikovskian effort futile. Many an absurdity, in which a first-class artist believes and which he treats at the summit of his powers, becomes for the moment plausible and even exciting. But here, for the most part, Tchaikovsky was not first-class. Even the best pages suffer by comparison, because the composer had already said or was about to say the same thing much more excitingly in works with which we are familiar — the last three Symphonies, "Romeo and Juliet" and even the unspeakable "1812" Overture. Thus, for example, the fugato near the end of the last movement, appeared as an old acquaintance, much the worse for wear. The expression of Manfred's despair seemed like the wailing of an infant beside the abysmal grief of the last movement of the "Pathetic" Symphony.

* * *

The Schumann music is in another category. It is music of a first-class composer. It happens to have been conceived in terms of the piano. That fact alone should not necessarily prejudice us against an orchestral transcription — even a transcription by several hands. At least, it does not prejudice me. But what we have a right to expect from the transcriber who is not, like the veriest hack, providing for a background to conversation at dinner, is that he shall add something of his own. The transcription in question was naturally competent, sometimes brilliant; and on occasion (especially at the very beginning) it actually contributed something new to the discussion. But most of the time it sounded simply like an arranged piano piece, much as if one were to transpose "Carnaval" at the piano from A-flat major to A major. The difference is striking enough at the start. But you soon get used to it.

Mr. Goossens was a little fussier in the case of his own pieces. They had, he says, originally been conceived in terms of the orchestra. At the urgence of a friendly publisher, they were changed to piano pieces, a third being added at the same time. Last year he decided to return to his original idea. But he took the precaution to reject the third "as being too pianistic and consequently unsuitable for instrumentation." The same may reasonably be said of most of the "Carnaval," until a first-rate transcription shall cause us to change our mind.

Although the two Goossens pieces were not models of consonance according to the text books (the authors of which never forget what they have learned), they presented no ponderous problems for the audience to solve. I enjoyed the "Pastoral" for its freshness. The "Bacchanal" seemed to me not to justify the commotion it aroused. Perhaps I should see the point were I as devout a Nature-lover as is Mr. Goossens. But the music ought to suffice alone. . . .

GOOSSENS CONDUCTS SYMPHONY

Plays Own Nature Poems to Delight of Audience

B. Post Nov. 26/38

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Save for the orchestral version of Schumann's "Carnaval," prepared for the Russian Ballet by Glazounov and others, the programme of yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert, led by Eugene Goossens as guest, ran to unfamiliar music. Even the 'Carnaval" was receiving its first concert performance in the United States. Handel's Overture to the "Occasional Oratorio" and the conductor's own Nature Poems, "Pastoral" and "Bacchanal," were new to Symphony Hall, and the "Manfred" Symphony of Tchaikovsky, with which the concert concluded, was last played here in 1920.

TCHAIKOVSKY'S "MANFRED"

This is the third time that Mr. Goossens, now the regular conductor of the Cincinnati Orchestra, has taken over the Boston Symphony for a pair of concerts, but the only time that, in so doing, he has avoided well-known music. In appraising his conducting yesterday, then, the question of interpretation does not become a dominant issue. Through some stroke of good fortune your correspondent had not even heard the "Manfred" Symphony, though the performance above referred to and its predecessor of 1911 had both come within the period of his concert-going.

As may readily be inferred from this unkind observation, the "Manfred" Symphony, which Tchaikovsky wrote in 1885 (to his subsequent regret), is pretty much of a bore. Only the instrumentation, often remarkable even for Tchaikovsky, is consistently interesting. The first movement, which the composer later considered preserving as an independent tone-poem, and character-study of Byron's hero, is much the best. The third division, entitled "Pastorale," is the dullest. Some attractive tone-painting distinguishes the over-long second movement, "The Witch of the Alps." And in the finale Tchaikovsky saves himself only by quoting Wagner ("Lohengrin," Act 2, Scene 1) and imitating Liszt (the "Dante" Symphony). How the composer of the Fourth, Fifth and Sixth Symphonies contrived to put so little melodic interest into so long a work as this "Manfred" is a mystery. At least Mr. Goossens and the Orchestra, so far as could be seen, did for the music all that might be done. If it goes another 18, or even 180 years, without a Boston performance, this reviewer will not complain.

Handel's Overture

Orchestral Handel, outside the Concerti Grossi, is not often encountered hereabouts. In the solid, satisfying Overture of yesterday, composed, with the Oratorio which follows it, in 1745 to mark London's escape from an invasion by Charles Edward the Pretender, Handel is more British than the British. No wonder England took him to its heart. The performance was as sound as the music.

As one-time conductor of the Diaghilev Ballet Mr. Goossens may have felt that the expert orchestration of the "Carnaval," by Glazounov, with the assistance of Liadov and Tcherepnin after sketches by Rimsky-Korsakov, deserved a concert performance. On this there may be two opinions. What was heard yesterday was ballet-music sorely in need of a ballet. Moreover, the "Carnaval" intrinsically sounds better just as Schumann wrote it—for the pianoforte. Orchestration is not always a help to piano music.

Conductors Own Music

To be sure, Mr. Goossens' Nature Poems appeared in 1919 as piano pieces, but we have the composer's word for it that he originally intended them for orchestra, although the instrumentation was completed only a short time ago.

The music itself may be described as romantic impressionism, very pleasant to hear, particularly the Pastoral; and the orchestra dress is sumptuous and brilliant to a degree. This dual number, and quite understandably, evoked the warmest applause of the afternoon.

Goossens Leads Symphony

Monitor - Nov. 26/38

The Arts in Boston

Eugene Goossens, director of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, is guest conductor this week of the Boston Orchestra. For this seventh program of the season he chose the following works: Handel, Overture to the "Occasional" Oratorio; Schumann, "Carnaval," orchestrated by Rimsky-Korsakoff, Liadoff, Glazounoff, and Tchérepnin; Goossens, "Two Nature Poems"; Tchaikovsky, "Manfred Symphony, op. 58.

Mr. Goossens has stood on the Symphony Hall dais before, but his last appearance there was nearly nine years ago; hence we looked forward to his return. He occupies a distinguished place in the musical world, as composer and more particularly as conductor. As conductor he is businesslike, authoritative, there is no nonsense about him. His sparing use of the left hand is perhaps symbolic of his straightforward interpretations, as well as of his careful work in rehearsal.

As a program maker Mr. Goossens has odd fancies. Witness the strangely contrived list he submitted yesterday. The Handel and the Goossens items were listed as first performances "at these concerts," the Schumann orchestration as a first time in the United States. It is laudable to offer novelties to an experienced audience, but novelty in itself does not justify the inclusion of a composition. It may have been thought that the Handel Oratorio celebrating an escape from war or revolution was especially timely; unfortunately, the overture has all the features of the kind of music its title confesses it to be. The Adagio for oboe has a nostalgic charm, but the first two sections and the final march are commonplace.

Schumann's "Carnaval" was orchestrated for the use of the Diaghileff Ballet. (This is not the orchestration used by the present Monte Carlo Ballet Russe.) No doubt it was effective for its purpose. But why play this version in a concert hall? It sounds merely like piano music orchestrated. The instrumentation detracts from rather than adds to its beauties; it even emphasizes the fact that they are fading. Mr. Goossens's own Poems, "Pastoral" and "Bacchanal," are good examples of neo-Impressionist-Celtic Twilight music.

To cap all this with the "Manfred" Symphony seemed in advance the acme of recklessness in program making. But after what had gone before, the "Manfred" Symphony, with all its obvious faults, was very welcome. Byron's poem is one of the ultimate absurdities of the Romantic movement. Schumann succeeded in bringing out the worst in it. But Tchaikovsky was a great symphonic composer. He took the poem as a departing point, but he spoke with the voice of Tchaikovsky, not of Byron. Even the faults of the "symphony" are his, not Byron's. There is much of "1812" in it, something of the Fourth Symphony, a little forecasting of the Sixth, even something of "Swan Lake." You may laugh at the theme of Manfred wandering in despair, and at the theatricalities of the Finale. But forget the poem and listen to the music. You will be fascinated with the composition of the first movement, with the rhythmic variety of the Scherzo, with the sustained lyricism of the Pastorale.

The performance of the entire program was brilliant. Mr. Goossens clearly had the co-operation of the players, who made his task easy.

L. A. S.

QUINCY, MASS.
PATRIOT LEDGER

NOV 22 1938

Pops Concert Tonight By Church Groups

The Hingham Armory on Central street will be the scene this evening of the pops concert given by the High Pines Symphony orchestra under the sponsorship of the Monday guild of the Congregational church and the Methodist Episcopal church.

The orchestra of 40 pieces is under the direction of Carlos E. Pinfield of the Boston Symphony orchestra and will present a varied and interesting program.

The armory will be attractively decorated, and guests will sit at tables for four or more during the program. Refreshments of ice cream and soft drinks will be served by a large corp of waitresses throughout the evening.

A large committee of members of both organizations has been working for several weeks past for the success of the affair.

Globe Nov. 26/38

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony concerts this week are conducted by Eugene Goossens—the first of the three men who will this season be guest conductors. Mr. Goossens is no stranger here, however, for he has twice before appeared in Symphony Hall in the same capacity, in 1926 and 1930. In those days Mr. Goossens had been in the United States only a few years and was leader of the Rochester, N. Y., Philharmonic Orchestra. Since 1931, he has been conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony. His present visit includes not only the concerts of yesterday afternoon and tonight at Symphony Hall, but that of last Thursday evening in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

For all three, he chose a novel if somewhat curious program that begins with the Overture to Handel's "Occasional Oratorio," includes two of Mr. Goossens' own compositions, "Pastoral" and "Bacchanale," the piano suite "Carnaval" of Robert Schumann as orchestrated by four Russians — Rimsky-Korsakoff, Liadoff, Glazunoff and Tcherepnin—and which ends with the "Manfred" Symphony by Tchaikovsky.

To judge by his conducting yesterday, the composer and the conductor are closely identified in Mr. Goossens. That is to say, he has evident warmth for music whose dominant characteristic is color. His own pieces, a brace of tone paintings of Nature, are crammed with the kaleidoscopic tints obtainable from the modern orchestra.

The "Pastoral" and "Bacchanale" were sketched as orchestral pieces nearly 20 years ago. On the advice of his publisher, Mr. Goossens turned them into piano music, to which a third composition was added, and in that form they were published. Only a year ago last September did the composer begin to re-cast the first two in the form for which they were originally intended. Not original in style, they represent through assimilation of the general devices of tonal Impressionism, notably of the French school, by one who has mastered the complex art of modern orchestration.

Handel's Overture had not before been played at the Boston Symphony concerts. The reason is perhaps plain enough. Apart from the proverbial Handelian solidity, this fragment of a work evidently created to ease one of Handel's recurring financial problems bears no traces of real inspiration. It is, rather, music written out of necessity with all that the term implies.

Just how much was contributed by each of the four Russians to the orchestral form of the Schumann piano suite cannot be said. At any rate, the music in this form is little known, and the present concert performances are said to be the first in the United States. As the background for a ballet, to which use the transcription was put upon commission of Sergei Diaghilev and later by the Monte Carlo Russian Ballet, it served well enough. But Schumann's piano style is too distinctive to bear transcribing without loss of the inimitable Schumann flavor.

Symphony that it was ". . . a repulsive work, and I hate it heartily, all except the first movement."

Mr. Goossens conducted Handel, Schumann and Tchaikovsky in a capable forthright manner, but without fine nuances or the emotional feeling that bring distinction and individuality. He was received cordially by the Friday audience.

C. W. D.

SOLOISTS NAMED FOR MON.-TUES. SERIES

Dec. 4/38

A succession of distinguished visiting artists lend special interest to the remaining five concerts of the Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall. At the first of these, Anja Ignatius, the young violinist of Finland who is about to make her first tour of this country, will be heard in the Concerto of Sibelius. The pianists Myra Hess and Frank Glazer are listed for later concerts. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct three pairs. There will be two distinguished guest conductors—Georges Enesco and Igor Stravinsky. Subscriptions are still obtainable for the five concerts of either series on a proportionate basis.

B. Trans MUSIC Nov. 26/38

Symphony Concert

Mr. Goossens Sets Forth a Program Unfamiliar in One Way or Another

By MOSES SMITH

Having conducted concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra here in 1926 and again in 1930, Eugene Goossens, guest conductor during the current week returned almost as an old friend. As such he was greeted by the audience at yesterday's matinee concert, most of whom, very likely, did not know or forgot that the conductor had already conducted the concert, with a program similar to yesterday's, in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, on Thursday evening. But there was more than mere friendliness to the applause, as it gathered momentum during the afternoon. There was appreciation for the magnificent playing of a magnificent orchestra under strange hands. There was also apparently expression of favor toward the program Mr. Goossens had put together. If the final round of applause was a little weak, the reason was in all likelihood the excessive length of the program, requiring an even two hours in performance.

It was an encouraging thing that the audience behaved as it did for Mr. Goossens is neither a virtuoso nor sentimental conductor. He can hardly be called a warm conductor (though, because of the nature of the program, he displayed more animation than it seems he has in the past). He is a well-schooled, fine-grained musician, understanding, both as executor and creator, the problems inherent in making an orchestra speak. He obviously enjoys making music and supposedly wants the audience to enjoy it. To that end he does not evidently believe it is necessary to get excited. That is one way of making music. It is not the only way. But it is legitimate and it can yield enjoyment to those who have not made up their minds in advance.

* * *

The program, as has already been suggested, was made up of music hardly lacking in warmth. Handel's Overture to the "Occasional" Oratorio had the classical form but also the Handelian warmth and more than the customary brilliance. Schumann's "Carnaval," orchestrated by a disputed number of Russians, came, of course, from the very core of Romanticism. The conductor's own Two Nature Poems, heard here presumably for the first time, were of a different temperature. "Pastoral," as its title might have predicted, was coolly neo-impressionist, the poetic utterance always reserved. "Bacchanal" was exciting for its brightness and stridency, not because it generated heat in the listener. Finally the "Manfred" Symphony of Tchaikovsky was as moody and lachrymose as only Tchaikovsky at his best—and worst—could be.

Because of the prevailing temper, which the majority of our concert audiences prefers, the specific unfamiliarity of the music did not matter. Handel's Overture had never previously been played at these concerts. The co-operative transcription of "Carnaval," employing the art of Liadov, Glazounov, Tcherepnin and perhaps Rimsky-Korsakov, was marked "first concert performances in the United States," although some had heard it, in one way or another, in connection with Ballet Russe programs. And the Tchaikovsky Symphony had not been played here since 1920.

* * *

The lapse of time has not helped the work. It must have seemed old-fashioned then. Now, with such things as the Fascist march on Rome, the Lindbergh New York-to-Paris flight, the Depression and the New Deal behind us (or, if you prefer, with us), the case seems hopeless. Maybe people used to believe in Manfred or the Tchaikovskian translation of it into tone. Maybe some still do. As for me, the music left me absolutely cold—and I am not attempting to employ the familiar racy idiom.

The subject-matter need not have rendered the Tchaikovskian effort futile. Many an absurdity, in which a first-class artist believes and which he treats at the summit of his powers, becomes for the moment plausible and even exciting. But here, for the most part, Tchaikovsky was not first-class. Even the best pages suffer by comparison, because the composer had already said or was about to say the same thing much more excitingly in works with which we are familiar — the last three Symphonies, "Romeo and Juliet" and even the unspeakable "1812" Overture. Thus, for example, the fugato near the end of the last movement, appeared as an old acquaintance, much the worse for wear. The expression of Manfred's despair seemed like the wailing of an infant beside the abysmal grief of the last movement of the "Pathetic" Symphony.

* * *

The Schumann music is in another category. It is music of a first-class composer. It happens to have been conceived in terms of the piano. That fact alone should not necessarily prejudice us against an orchestral transcription — even a transcription by several hands. At least, it does not prejudice me. But what we have a right to expect from the transcriber who is not, like the veriest hack, providing for a background to conversation at dinner, is that he shall add something of his own. The transcription in question was naturally competent, sometimes brilliant; and on occasion (especially at the very beginning) it actually contributed something new to the discussion. But most of the time it sounded simply like an arranged piano piece, much as if one were to transpose "Carnaval" at the piano from A-flat major to A major. The difference is striking enough at the start. But you soon get used to it.

Mr. Goossens was a little fussier in the case of his own pieces. They had, he says, originally been conceived in terms of the orchestra. At the urgence of a friendly publisher, they were changed to piano pieces, a third being added at the same time. Last year he decided to return to his original idea. But he took the precaution to reject the third "as being too pianistic and consequently unsuitable for instrumentation." The same may reasonably be said of most of the "Carnaval," until a first-rate transcription shall cause us to change our mind.

Although the two Goossens pieces were not models of consonance according to the text books (the authors of which never forget what they have learned), they presented no ponderous problems for the audience to solve. I enjoyed the "Pastoral" for its freshness. The "Bacchanal" seemed to me not to justify the commotion it aroused. Perhaps I should see the point were I as devout a Nature-lover as is Mr. Goossens. But the music ought to suffice alone. . . .

GOOSSENS CONDUCTS SYMPHONY

Plays Own Nature Poems to Delight of Audience

B. Post Nov. 26/38

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Save for the orchestral version of Schumann's "Carnaval," prepared for the Russian Ballet by Glazounov and others, the programme of yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert, led by Eugene Goossens as guest, ran to unfamiliar music. Even the 'Carnaval" was receiving its first concert performance in the United States. Handel's Overture to the "Occasional Oratorio" and the conductor's own Nature Poems, "Pastoral" and "Bacchanal," were new to Symphony Hall, and the "Manfred" Symphony of Tchaikovsky, with which the concert concluded, was last played here in 1920.

TCHAIKOVSKY'S "MANFRED"

This is the third time that Mr. Goossens, now the regular conductor of the Cincinnati Orchestra, has taken over the Boston Symphony for a pair of concerts, but the only time that, in so doing, he has avoided well-known music. In appraising his conducting yesterday, then, the question of interpretation does not become a dominant issue. Through some stroke of good fortune your correspondent had not even heard the "Manfred" Symphony, though the performance above referred to and its predecessor of 1911 had both come within the period of his concert-going.

As may readily be inferred from this unkind observation, the "Manfred" Symphony, which Tchaikovsky wrote in 1885 (to his subsequent regret), is pretty much of a bore. Only the instrumentation, often remarkable even for Tchaikovsky, is consistently interesting. The first movement, which the composer later considered preserving as an independent tone-poem, and character-study of Byron's hero, is much the best. The third division, entitled "Pastorale," is the dullest. Some attractive tone-painting distinguishes the over-long second movement, "The Witch of the Alps." And in the finale Tchaikovsky saves himself only by quoting Wagner ("Lohengrin," Act 2, Scene 1) and imitating Liszt (the "Dante" Symphony). How the composer of the Fourth, Fifth and Sixth Symphonies contrived to put so little melodic interest into so lona a work as this "Manfred" is a mystery. At least Mr. Goossens and the Orchestra, so far as could be seen, did for the music all that might be done. If it goes another 18, or even 180 years, without a Boston performance, this reviewer will not complain.

Handel's Overture

Orchestral Handel, outside the Concerti Grossi, is not often encountered hereabouts. In the solid, satisfying Overture of yesterday, composed, with the Oratorio which follows it, in 1745 to mark London's escape from an invasion by Charles Edward the Pretender, Handel is more British than the British. No wonder England took him to its heart. The performance was as sound as the music.

As one-time conductor of the Diaghilev Ballet Mr. Goossens may have felt that the expert orchestration of the "Carnaval," by Glazounov, with the assistance of Liadov and Tcherepnin after sketches by Rimsky-Korsakov, deserved a concert performance. On this there may be two opinions. What was heard yesterday was ballet-music sorely in need of a ballet. Moreover, the "Carnaval" intrinsically sounds better just as Schumann wrote it—for the pianoforte. Orchestration is not always a help to piano music.

Conductors Own Music

To be sure, Mr. Goossens' Nature Poems appeared in 1919 as piano pieces, but we have the composer's word for it that he originally intended them for orchestra, although the instrumentation was completed only a short time ago.

The music itself may be described as romantic impressionism, very pleasant to hear, particularly the Pastoral; and the orchestra dress is sumptuous and brilliant to a degree. This dual number, and quite understandably, evoked the warmest applause of the afternoon.

Goossens Leads Symphony

[illegible] Nov. 26/38

The Arts in Boston

Eugene Goossens, director of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, is guest conductor this week of the Boston Orchestra. For this seventh program of the season he chose the following works: Handel, Overture to the "Occasional" Oratorio; Schumann, "Carnaval," orchestrated by Rimsky-Korsakoff, Liadoff, Glazounoff, and Tchérepnin; Goossens, "Two Nature Poems"; Tchaikovsky, "Manfred Symphony, op. 58.

Mr. Goossens has stood on the Symphony Hall dais before, but his last appearance there was nearly nine years ago; hence we looked forward to his return. He occupies a distinguished place in the musical world, as composer and more particularly as conductor. As conductor he is businesslike, authoritative, there is no nonsense about him. His sparing use of the left hand is perhaps symbolic of his straightforward interpretations, as well as of his careful work in rehearsal.

As a program maker Mr. Goossens has odd fancies. Witness the strangely contrived list he submitted yesterday. The Handel and the Goossens items were listed as first performances "at these concerts," the Schumann orchestration as a first time in the United States. It is laudable to offer novelties to an experienced audience, but novelty in itself does not justify the inclusion of a composition. It may have been thought that the Handel Oratorio celebrating an escape from war or revolution was especially timely; unfortunately, the overture has all the features of the kind of music its title confesses it to be. The Adagio for oboe has a nostalgic charm, but the first two sections and the final march are commonplace.

Schumann's "Carnaval" was orchestrated for the use of the Diaghileff Ballet. (This is not the orchestration used by the present Monte Carlo Ballet Russe.) No doubt it was effective for its purpose. But why play this version in a concert hall? It sounds merely like piano music orchestrated. The instrumentation detracts from rather than adds to its beauties; it even emphasizes the fact that they are fading. Mr. Goossens's own Poems, "Pastoral" and "Bacchanal," are good examples of neo-Impressionist-Celtic Twilight music.

To cap all this with the "Manfred" Symphony seemed in advance the acme of recklessness in program making. But after what had gone before, the "Manfred" Symphony, with all its obvious faults, was very welcome. Byron's poem is one of the ultimate absurdities of the Romantic movement. Schumann succeeded in bringing out the worst in it. But Tchaikovsky was a great symphonic composer. He took the poem as a departing point, but he spoke with the voice of Tchaikovsky, not of Byron. Even the faults of the "symphony" are his, not Byron's. There is much of "1812" in it, something of the Fourth Symphony, a little forecasting of the Sixth, even something of "Swan Lake." You may laugh at the theme of Manfred wandering in despair, and at the theatricalities of the Finale. But forget the poem and listen to the music. You will be fascinated with the composition of the first movement, with the rhythmic variety of the Scherzo, with the sustained lyricism of the Pastorale.

The performance of the entire program was brilliant. Mr. Goossens clearly had the co-operation of the players, who made his task easy.

L. A. S.

QUINCY, MASS.
PATRIOT LEDGER

NOV 22 1938

Pops C
By

ger

The Hing street will ning of th
the High tra under Monday gu church and church.

tered as second class matter at the st Office under the Act of March

The orchestra of 40 pieces is under the direction of Carlos E. Pinfield of the Boston Symphony

---

[illegible] MUSIC Nov. 26/38

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony concerts this week are conducted by Eugene Goossens—the first of the three men who will this season be guest conductors. Mr. Goossens is no stranger here, however, for he has twice before appeared in Symphony Hall in the same capacity, in 1926 and 1930. In those days Mr. Goossens had been in the United States only a few years and was leader of the Rochester, N. Y., Philharmonic Orchestra. Since 1931, he has been conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony. His present visit includes not only the concerts of yesterday afternoon and tonight at Symphony Hall, but that of last Thursday evening in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

For all three, he chose a novel if somewhat curious program that begins with the Overture to Handel's "Occasional Oratorio," includes two of Mr. Goossens' own compositions, "Pastoral" and "Bacchanale," the piano suite "Carnaval" of Robert Schumann as orchestrated by four Russians — Rimsky-Korsakoff, Liadoff, Glazunoff and Tcherepnin—and which ends with the "Manfred" Symphony by Tchaikovsky.

To judge by his conducting yesterday, the composer and the conductor are closely identified in Mr. Goossens. That is to say, he has evident warmth for music whose dominant characteristic is color. His own pieces, a brace of tone paintings of Nature, are crammed with the kaleidoscopic tints obtainable from the modern orchestra.

The "Pastoral" and "Bacchanale" were sketched as orchestral pieces nearly 20 years ago. On the advice of his publisher, Mr. Goossens turned them into piano music, to which a third composition was added, and in that form they were published. Only a year ago last September did the composer begin to re-cast the first two in the form for which they were originally intended. Not original in style, they represent through assimilation of the general devices of tonal Impressionism, notably of the French school, by one who has mastered the complex art of modern orchestration.

Handel's Overture had not before been played at the Boston Symphony concerts. The reason is perhaps plain enough. Apart from the proverbial Handelian solidity, this fragment of a work evidently created to ease one of Handel's recurring financial problems bears no traces of real inspiration. It is, rather, music written out of necessity with all that the term implies.

Just how much was contributed by each of the four Russians to the orchestral form of the Schumann piano suite cannot be said. At any rate, the music in this form is little known, and the present concert performances are said to be the first in the United States. As the background for a ballet, to which use the transcription was put upon commission of Sergei Diaghilev and later by the Monte Carlo Russian Ballet, it served well enough. But Schumann's piano style is too distinctive to bear transcribing without loss of the inimitable Schumann flavor.

On one sense, Mr. Goossens' enterprise in offering the "Manfred" Symphony was laudable, because it is seldom heard. The Symphony itself does not bear scrutiny. How, indeed, could the Tchaikovsky who had written the F minor Symphony [illegible] years before have set on paper the hollow, trivial echoes of early 19th Century Romanticism that permeate the "Manfred" music? For once it is possible to condemn a work and thereby share the composer's own opinion. Only three years after he had finished it, Tchaikovsky wrote of the "Manfred" Symphony that it was ". . . a repulsive work, and I hate it heartily, all except the first movement."

Mr. Goossens conducted Handel, Schumann and Tchaikovsky in a capable forthright manner, but without fine nuances or the emotional feeling that bring distinction and individuality. He was received cordially by the Friday audience.

C. W. D.

SOLOISTS NAMED FOR MON.-TUES. SERIES

[illegible]

A succession of distinguished visiting artists lend special interest to the remaining five concerts of the Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall. At the first of these, Anja Ignatius, the young violinist of Finland who is about to make her first tour of this country, will be heard in the Concerto of Sibelius. The pianists Myra Hess and Frank Glazer are listed for later concerts. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct three pairs. There will be two distinguished guest conductors—Georges Enesco and Igor Stravinsky. Subscriptions are still obtainable for the five concerts of either series on a proportionate basis.

73

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The seventh regular concert by the Boston symphony orchestra, Eugene Goossens, guest conductor, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows:

Handel
  Overture to the "Occasional Oratorio"
Schumann
  "Carnaval" (orchestrated by Rimsky-Korsakov, Liadov, Glazounov and Tcherepnin)
Goossens
  Two Nature Poems, Pastoral and Bacchanal
Tchaikovsky
  "Manfred," symphony Op. 58, after Byron

Mr. Goossens was a welcome visitor to Boston yesterday, for his integrity and vitality as conductor and the charm of his own compositions on the program are not to be gainsaid. Furthermore he did not choose a collection of familiar war-horses on which to ride to an easy success. On the contrary he proceeded to show us unfamiliar things in the symphonic repertoire, the enlargement of which in these days of many and great orchestras is one of the most important duties of the conductor. Cincinnati is lucky to have a musician of Mr. Goossens' ability and active intelligence to direct its musical season.

The program was a curious one, more interesting in the first half than in the second. Tchaikovsky's Manfred symphony has fallen into neglect today, doubtless by reason of its tedious finale. About the turn of the century it enjoyed such popularity that it once received far and away the most votes for a request program by the Chicago orchestra. That seems inconceivable now. Its romantic element—and Byron's poem is romanticism personified—seems feverish, the hot-house variety as compared with the freshness of Schumann's music.

Undoubtedly the Manfred symphony has many pages of real value; it could hardly be entirely barren, coming as it did in the full tide of Tchaikovsky's career. The scherzo, with its passage work for the woodwinds, parts of the Pastorale and the first movement should keep it alive.

It was an odd coincidence—or was it so designed?—that we should have had yesterday two pastorales and two bacchanals, possibly three of the latter if you count the Schumann in that mood. Mr. Goossens has written genre pieces of undeniable charm. They are not intellectually pretentious, nor do they seek at all costs for originality. They set out to be just what they are described in the program, "Nature Poems," and they very effectively succeed in their aims. Mr. Goossens has done his work of orchestration so well that one would never have guessed their origin as piano pieces.

Schumann's "Carnaval," on the other hand, is so well known at piano recitals that it is not so easy to turn over a new leaf in listening to it. Nevertheless these enchanting pieces are fascinating in the orchestral dress that the Russians have given them. The point has always been labored that Schumann wrote for the orchestra pianistically, and it is unbelievable that he would ever have orchestrated his piano music with the brilliance and sparkle, of which these Russian composers have not stinted themselves.

For this reason there may be some who will feel that the "echt-Schumann" is not to be found in the orchestral "Carnaval." What is there, though, is a singularly delightful orchestral suite. Schumann's melodies and rhythms, his sudden changes in harmony, make tempting material for the bright coloring of instrumentation. And how well the process, like redecorating an old room, has come out! All the dance movements are helped and one or two of the others, particularly the "Chopin" movement, emerge with a surprisingly new loveliness.

It is rather shocking that Handel's fine overture to the "Occasional Oratorio" has never been played at a Boston symphony concert before, and it only bears out the contenttion that Handel is the most neglected and misunderstood of all the great masters. The chief thing to remember in these instrumental pieces is to get a good body of wind tone to balance the thunder and surge of our modern string band. Mr. Goossens might have allowed himself more leeway than he did in this matter, but even so he secured a just and vigorous performance. Throughout the concert he seemed to get the interpretations that he desired. He was cordially received at the end of the first half of the program, the longueurs of the Manfred symphony doubtless accounting for the audience's not lingering in the hall to applaud at the end.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Dr. Koussevitzky will repeat Beethoven's Missa Solemnis, heard at a pension fund concert last season.

Symphony Back From New York

By Ruth Marsters
Music Editor

B. Adv. Nov. 27/38

FRESH from brilliant and much talked of doings in New York, the Boston Symphony Orchestra returned to its native terrain to be conducted by adroit composer-conductor Eugene Goosens in three concerts this week-end.

The program presented by the distinguished guest in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, on Thursday evening, and in Symphony Hall on Friday and Saturday was composed largely of works new to Boston.

Most interesting perhaps were Two Nature Poems, "Pastoral" and "Bacchanal" of the conductor's own devising. The orchestral transcription of Schumann's piano suite "Carnival," proved a diverting interlude, however, and Handel's "Occasional Oratorio" well worth the hearing. The program was rounded off by Tschaikovsky's Symphony on Byron's "Manfred."

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct two performances of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" at the regular pair of concerts this week-end. The orchestra will be assisted by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. Soloists: Jeannette Vreeland, Anna Kaskas, John Priebe, and Norman Cordon.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL - COURIER
Nov. 16/38

Musical Moments

Boston Program: Koussevitzky Speaks

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear in Woolsey Hall this evening, the occasion marking the second offering of the Woolsey Hall Concert Series for 1938-39. There will be two symphonies by the masters Beethoven and Brahms. The Second Symphony of Beethoven, in D major, will open the program, and the Fourth of Brahms in E minor will be the concluding number. Aaron Copland's "El Salon Mexico" will be the other selection to be performed, this being a Rhapsody written by the American composer as the result of a visit to Mexico several years ago. It is a brilliant setting for large modern orchestra of popular tunes which are to be heard in the dance hall in Mexico City which gives the piece its title. "El Salon Mexico" represented American music at the Festival of the International Society of Contemporary Composers in London last summer. Dr. Koussevitzky gave the work its first public performance last month in Boston and will present it for the first time in New York this week end.

When the Boston Symphony opened its fifteenth season under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky in Symphony Hall, Boston, on October 7, a standing audience gave the conductor a tumultuous welcome, which he acknowledged in the following words:

"Ladies and Gentlemen: As you know, I do not like to speak from the stage. But in fifteen years once you will permit me to say a few words to you. Your orchestra is now one of the greatest orchestras in the world—if not the greatest, as the whole musical world recognizes it today. If we have realized this, it is not only because we work hard and we have your material support, but also because we have your moral support, your profound understanding, your deep feeling of the importance and necessity of musical art. That is our greatest stimulated. And today, we express to you our gratitude."

THE HARTFORD TIMES, TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 29, 1938.

Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Impresssive List of Symphonies Played By Bostonians

One of a series of articles on the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

II

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

Every conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has appeared in Hartford except Artur Nikisch and Henri Rabaud, although the former was heard here in 1912 as leader of the London Symphony Orchestra on tour, and he once played the piano part of Schumann's Quintette in a concert with the Memnon Club.

Wilhelm Gericke, Emil Paur, Karl Muck, Max Fiedler, Pierre Monteaux and, for more concerts than any other, Serge Koussevitzky have all wielded the baton for the Boston Symphony here. These concerts have been held in various places. After Roberts' Opera House, there were programs in Allyn Hall, later at the Coliseum, where the Palace Theater is now located, at Foot Guard Hall where it performed at the "grand opening" of the Armory Nov. 20, 1888, at Parsons' Theater between the years 1910-15 and at the Capitol Theater. The Bushnell concerts are of the present period.

Some of the soloists who have appeared here with the Bostonians were: Franz Kneisel, Cesar Thomson, Fritz Kreisler, Harold Bauer, Louise Homer, Adele Aus der Ohe, Olga Samaroff, Heinrich Gebhard, Willy Hess, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Sergei Rachmaninoff, Mischa Elman, Ferrucio Busoni, Kathleen Parlow, Winifred Christie, Leo Ornstein and many others.

Prior to the Bushnell era the Boston Orchestra had performed in Hartford all the symphonies of Brahms, the second one three times; all four of Schumann's; the fourth, fifth and sixth of Tschaikowsky, the latter four times; Franck's D minor four times; Mendelssohn's Scotch symphony; Schubert's Unfinished and the C major; the first Symphony of Sibelius twice, the first time in 1913; Dvorak's "From the New World" in 1904.

Beethoven performances led all the rest. The Seventh symphony was done six times, the Fifth five times and the Third three. The Sixth and Eighth had also been played, leaving the First, Second, Fourth and Ninth. Taking account of Bushnell programs, of course, alters the whole record.

The point is that the process of education—and musical growth is just that—has been from an early date at the hands of the Boston Orchestra. This is not to derogate the heroic struggle of the local Philharmonic and the tremendous incentive it provided for music lovers and students. The building of taste has been a gradual process, from the cool puzzled reception of Schumann's A minor Concerto in 1885 to the acceptance of Stravinsky and Prokofieff.

It took sincere support to continue these concerts year after year by a visiting orchestra. During only one brief period did interest lag. Frances Hall Johnson in her book, "Musical Memories of Hartford" says: "There was no concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Artur Nikisch's direction who followed Gericke's first term as conductor. This third conductor of Hungarian birth, who infused so much warmth and passion into the playing of the orchestra, did not visit Hartford as the receipts had been too small in the past. 'Hartford was checked off as a city not important enough for the orchestra which was recognized as probably without peer.' After five years elapsed the supposition was that in the interval the city had increased in population as well as in musical activities and the management made another attempt." Emil Paur was then the leader.

Except for this comparatively brief hiatus the visits of the Boston Orchestra have been consistent. From 1902 onward there were

All Conductors Except Nikisch and Rabaud Here

14 seasons during which the Boston Symphony played here three times each season.

The only inference to be drawn is that Hartford has always needed this orchestra. Whether there have been local attractions or brilliant competitive ones from the outside, the Bostonians have always been in the picture. Besides the fact of the matchless quality of this organization, there has always been a musical affinity between Hartford and Boston, just as there have been spiritual ties.

The orchestra has many friends in this city. The ticket buyers have always been friends in that besides nurturing their own cultural needs, they have helped to sustain a musical body which for more than half a century has been one of the wonders of the orchestral world. There have been other friends, too, and these have been quietly making contributions toward the support of the organization and have received, therefore, the significant title, Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Their number is growing.

(Another article will appear tomorrow).

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 29, 1938 C

B. Trans

MUSIC

Recent Phonograph Records

Bloch Sonata and Other Music for Violin; Works by Bach and Beethoven Well Played

By MOSES SMITH

It is a pity that the Victor Company, which has been lamentably gingerly in handling the more rugged, less ingratiating products of contemporary composition, should alight on a significant work like Ernest Bloch's Sonata for piano and violin. Not that the piece is not worth recording, or that one does not salute the enterprise (if a little belated) of the company in publishing on shellaced discs a composition that has almost no immediate popular appeal. But it is only a few months since the Gamut Company issued a thoroughly satisfactory set devoted to the Sonata. It is all very well (or is it?) to have half a dozen "interpretations" of a Brahms symphony from which to choose. But contemporary music worthy the name has still had too little encouragement, especially from Victor, to justify such rapid duplication as in the present instance. The unexplored field is still far too wide.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 27 1938

Boston Chamber Season Planned

The Boston Chamber Orchestra composed of 28 Boston Symphony Orchestra players and conducted by Bernard Zighera, will open its third season Wednesday night in Jordan Hall, Boston. Jan Smeterlin, pianist, will be the soloist and the program will include Haydn's Symphony No. 49 in F-minor, "La Passione;" Suite de Pulcinella for small orchestra (after Pergolesi), Stravinsky; Concerto in E-minor, Opus 11 for piano and orchestra, Chopin, and the first American performance of "Giration," by Pierne.

Zighera, first harpist of the Boston Symphony, has been studying conducting with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky for the last eight seasons. It was due to Dr. Koussevitzky's suggestion two years ago that Zighera's orchestra was formed and the chamber series inaugurated.

Two other concerts are scheduled for this season on Jan. 18 and March at which the soloists will be, respectively, Cleora Wood, soprano and Ampara Iturbi, pianist and sister of Jose Iturbi.

A NEW WORK BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Promise 'Dedicaces' by Dukelsky for Holidays

B. Post Dec. 4/38

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

THIS week the Symphony Orchestra will give concerts in certain Western cities. On their return to Symphony Hall, which is to say at the concerts of Dec. 16 and 17, Dr. Koussevitzky and his men will make known to us a work entitled "Dedicaces," for piano and orchestra, with soprano obligato by Vladimir Dukelsky, who writes music of the more popular sort under the name of Vernon Duke. Jesus Maria Sanroma will be the pianist. Haydn's Symphony in B-flat major, No. 102, and Sibelius' Second Symphony complete the programme.

D' YE KEN?

B. Post - Dec. 4/38

Presenting Highland Piper Yehudi Menuhin, who is a famous violinist between pibrochs. He will fiddle at Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Dec. 11.

74

Second Section

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 28, 1938.

The Hartford Times.

Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

First Concert Here At Roberts Opera House in 1885

One of a series of articles on the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

I

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

On an October evening 53 years ago the wealth and fashion of Hartford, together with numbers of the curious and some folk who were of a more earnest bent than either of the other contingents, gathered at Roberts' Opera House. There was a gala air but not entirely unrestrained, because the event which drew the crowd was a new venture and none could be certain of its complete success.

It was an orchestral concert, a sufficient rarity in that day, but Hartford took its culture in stride. There was nothing really new under the sun. When it came to symphony concerts, had not Theodore Thomas' Orchestra, famed from coast to coast played often in Hartford, and had not a pretty steady procession of musical celebrities like Jenny Lind, Mme. Calve Gottschalk, Ole Bull, Rubinstein, Wieniawski and Hans von Buelow made local appearances? Had not the Strakosch Grand Italian Opera Company given Aida and later the Strakosch Grand Kellogg-Cary Operatic Concert Company regaled music lovers with an unparallelled program? To say nothing of Carmen which had been given in costume a short six years before!

A New Organization

This new orchestra was an organization from Boston, assembled three years previously by a visionary capitalist, a blue-blood with a valorous Civil War record, who had made a lot of money for apparently no other purpose than to spend it again as quickly as possible. Col. Henry Lee Higginson appeared to think that a symphony orchestra was the best way to get rid of his fortune in a hurry. Besides, the establishment of an orchestra was the ambition of a lifetime with Col. Higginson.

Roberts' Opera House was pretty well filled, the dress and parquette circles entirely so and "the parquette in large measure." The reserved seat tickets at $1 and $1.50 had been sold at Gallup & Metzger's. There had been a small advertisement in Monday's Hartford Times, which in a nearby column had carried a paid testimonial by Theodore Thomas in behalf of cabinet organs. As an indication that this Boston crowd was not cock-o'-the-walk there was this line: "If any selection is made for the concert to be given soon in this city requiring the use of the organ, Mr. Thomas will use a Mason & Hamlin."

Young and Artistic

The audience at the Opera House watched the minutes pass. "Precisely at 5 minutes to eight, the orchestra drifted, not at once, but gradually upon the stage, a number of very fine-looking men, many young and with an artistic look. At 8 Herr Gericke, a man with a splendid head and the ideal beard and moustache appeared and was received with applause."

We quote from The Times reviewer who, in Wednesday's paper was entranced by the Oberon Overture of von Weber and elaborated upon the "fairy horns and magic calls, soft, tender, as if from the distance and out of the greenwood." The next number was Schumann's piano Concerto played by Carl Faelton "taking the place of the celebrated Baermann, who was prevented by indisposition. It was long and there were beautiful parts in it, but it is doubtful whether any but professional musicians really grasped the composition," because it was "too heavy and involved for the general public to 'get on to' at first hearing."

A Raff Symphony

Some ballet music by Rubinstein was little short of tremendous, but "the great number of the evening was the Raff Symphony, a landscape and sentiment picture of the most finished art and of the most poetic and dramatic coloring. It is divided into parts, which is a good plan as it takes from the average audience to puzzle the composer's meaning."

The sub-divisions of the symphony, "In the Woods," for the benefit of those who have forgotten their Raff were marked: "In the day time. Impressions and feelings. In the twilight. Reverie. Dance of the Dryads. Night. Silent breath of night in the Forest. Entrance and departure of the wild hunt with Frau Holle and Wotan. Break of Day."

The reviewer found the program "not so skillful as those of Thomas. It may suit a Boston audience better, but would hardly hit so well the average taste of the American audience. The air of the opera house was insufferably close and ventilation had evidently been neglected. But perhaps it was thought that so many 'airs' inside would suffice."

Many Since Then

That was the first concert in Hartford by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There have been many since that historic date. Through the years it has been an organization to cultivate taste and sustain it. Seasons when there was no other form of musical sustenance there was always the Boston Orchestra. It plays here twice each season now. It used to play here three times each season. By 1916 the 48th concert had been played. A rough and ready count of appearances since that year indicates that the present season will bring the count to nearly 75.

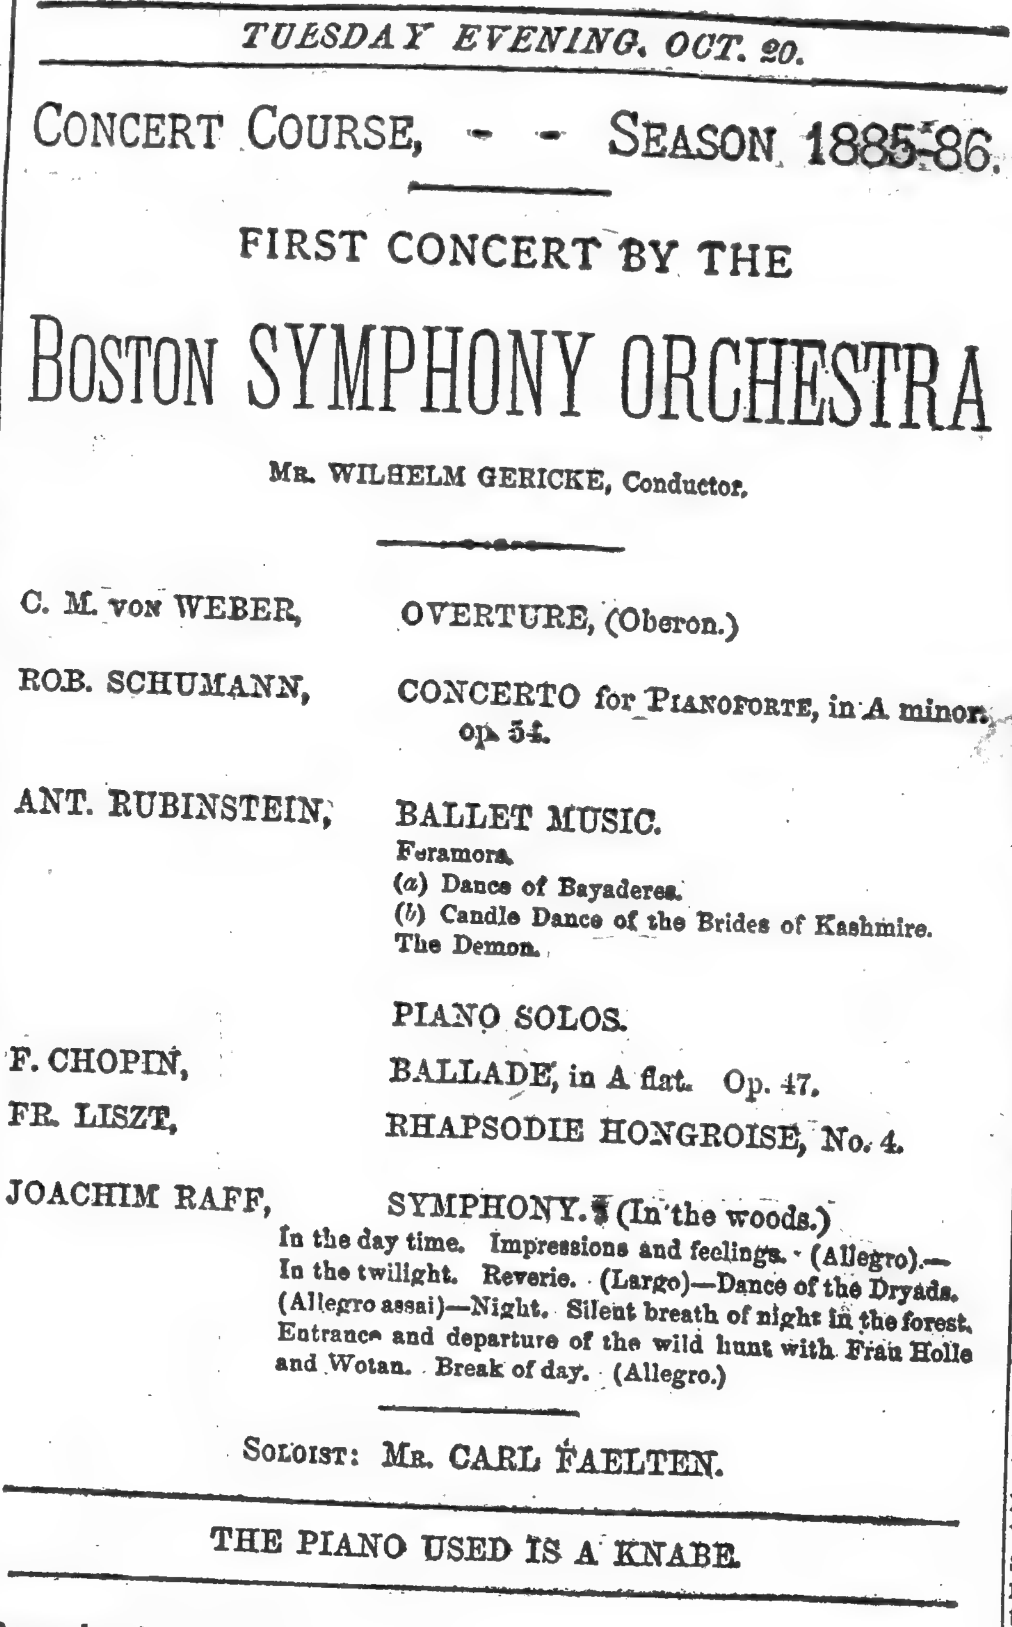
This total is also higher than the number of concerts played by the Hartford Philharmonic during the 20 years of its existence. When thought is taken of the tremendous power for cultural good which the local orchestra exerted, some idea may be had of the significance of the Boston Orchestra's concerts over the period of 1885 to the present.

The orchestra, it will be seen, has been ours nearly as long as it has been Boston's, for it was founded in 1881 with Boston players and it was yet another year or two before it emerged from the fledgling state, by means of a large importation of European musicians.

The audience left Roberts' Opera House that Tuesday night in 1885 as friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but the appelation can be handily reversed for the orchestra from the beginning has been a friend of Hartford.

—

(The second article of this series will appear tomorrow).



TUESDAY EVENING, OCT. 20.

CONCERT COURSE, - - SEASON 1885-86.

FIRST CONCERT BY THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

C. M. VON WEBER,	OVERTURE, (Oberon.)
ROB. SCHUMANN,	CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, in A minor. op. 54.
ANT. RUBINSTEIN,	BALLET MUSIC. Feramora. (a) Dance of Bayaderes. (b) Candle Dance of the Brides of Kashmire. The Demon.
	PIANO SOLOS.
F. CHOPIN,	BALLADE, in A flat. Op. 47.
FR. LISZT,	RHAPSODIE HONGROISE, No. 4.
JOACHIM RAFF,	SYMPHONY. 3 (In the woods.) In the day time. Impressions and feelings. (Allegro).—In the twilight. Reverie. (Largo)—Dance of the Dryads. (Allegro assai)—Night. Silent breath of night in the forest. Entrance and departure of the wild hunt with Frau Holle and Wotan. Break of day. (Allegro.)

SOLOIST: MR. CARL FAELTEN.

THE PIANO USED IS A KNABE.

Reproduction of the first program given in Hartford by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

TIMES

Bedford, O

NOV 18 1938

Reviewing Records

By

NORMAN NADEL

SWING drops to the lower half of the column this week to make way for a hit-of-the-week, or month, that will still be great music when the high gods of the jitterbugs with their best recordings will be outmoded as bustles and remembered only by historical societies as "typical of the 1930's."

Jan Sibelius, the Finnish composer best known, perhaps, for his tone poem, "Finlandia," created one of the most beautiful of modern musical structures in his symphony number 5 in E flat major, recorded this month for Victor by the Boston symphony orchestra under Serge Koussevitsky. The fifth is rich and filling. Its architecture is clean-cut and trim. It is neither ornate nor stark and severe. He has, in short, combined the grace of a Debussy poem with the economy of decorative orchestration of his own second symphony.

Little need be said about the quality of the recording or of the orchestra's performance, for both are superb. To be especially noted are the strange, moving quality of the strings in the mysterioso passage of the first movement, and the lovely and amazingly simple horn theme in the third.

Completing this set of five records, listed Victor M-474, is "Pohjola's Daughter," also by Sibelius, a more descriptive work based on an old Norse myth.

PHOENIX, ARIZ.
ARIZONA REPUBLIC

NOV 12 1938

Music To Tune Of $4,750,000 Is Planned For U. S. Communities

NEW YORK, Nov. 11—(AP)—The 16 leading symphony orchestras of the country are getting ready to spend more than $4,750,000 to give the communities the music they want.

This figure does not include the budgets of the many excellent secondary orchestras. Thanks to music project efforts, there now is no city of the United States of 50,000 or better without some sort of orchestra. Many smaller cities also have them.

It does not touch the money spent on hundreds of college orchestras, nor the cost of the high school orchestras which now number in the thousands.

Communities Like It

The total spent for symphonic music in America has been estimated as high as $40,000,000. Whatever it is, the record shows the communities like it.

Only one American city, Seattle, is reducing its symphony budget—and that is because of a peculiar local situation which may be changed with the advent of the new Seattle conductor, Dr. Nikolai Sokoloff.

Most budgets remain the same, although four cities will spend a little more this winter—Washington, Pittsburgh, Indianapolis and Rochester, which will spend more money on soloists.

Eleven of the 16 key cities report better ticket sales than last season, when most found attendance had improved over the preceding winter.

Cleveland, where a new women's organization has got into the field, reports the largest advance sale in the orchestra's history, and even Boston, where big audiences have been the rule more than 50 years, is five per cent ahead.

Only Philadelphia reports a decrease, and that is "slight, and not alarming," according to Alfred Reginald Allen, manager. Philadelphia is one of three cities reporting changes in the status of its conductor. Eugene Ormandy now is "musical director," which means that he controls absolutely the personnel and the programs; Stokowski will appear as guest only, next spring.

In Pittsburgh, Fritz Reiner becomes permanent conductor, his first similar berth since his days with the Cincinnati Symphony. In Seattle, Dr. Sokoloff replaces Dr. Basil Cameron, and although Eugene Goosens remains permanent conductor in Cincinnati, he will be late arriving, and Jose Iturbi, conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic, will take the first three pairs of the 20 comprising the season. Longest tenure among practising conductors goes to Fredrick Stock, now beginning his 34th season in Chicago.

Longest Season

Philadelphia will have the longest season—30 weeks, of which four will be spent on tour. Seattle has the shortest, 12 concerts. Kansas City, where Karl Krueger has built an excellent orchestra singe 1933, adds 10 concerts to its season; Pittsburgh adds three weeks.

The only major departure from standard symphony practice is at Rochester, where the 50 men of the well-known "civic" orchestra are engaged for a 28-week season, and are augmented by 35 more players for a concentrated symphony season of 12 weeks.

Twenty men have been added to four orchestras—fewest additions being at Boston, where one more double bass will be found; most in Washington, where Hans Kindler will have 10 new men. Only one orchestra has reduced personnel. This is St. Louis, where three men have resigned, and have not been replaced as yet.

Philadelphia will play the most concerts, 118. Seattle plans fewest, only 13. But Boston, where the symphony not only has its regular season, but a spring popular season and several weeks of free concerts out of doors, as well as a festival in the Berkshires, will do all told more than 200 concerts, an unusual record in American music. More than half will be directed by the permanent conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

The 16 orchestras plan 1,315 concerts in their regular seasons. The budget total is $4,782,605. This is exactly $3,636.96 a concert. Approximately a quarter of this is returned through ticket sales; some orchestras are lucky, and have fairly extensive endowments, or (as in Detroit) fat radio contracts.

For most orchestras, however, October is the beginning of a battle. On one side is symphonic music, which the nation demands in larger and larger quantities. On the other is the big bad wolf—the deficit.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST - GAZETTE

NOV 24 1938

Koussevitzky Due On December 10

The annual Pittsburgh visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 110 players under Serge Koussevitsky, will take place at the Syria Mosque with concerts Saturday night, December 10, and Sunday afternoon, December 11.

Evening.

Symphony No. 2 in D Major, Op. 36 .... Beethoven
Concerto for Piano and Orchestra ...Ravel
Jesus Maria Sanroma, Pianist
Symphony No. 4 in E Minor, Op. 98. .... Brahms

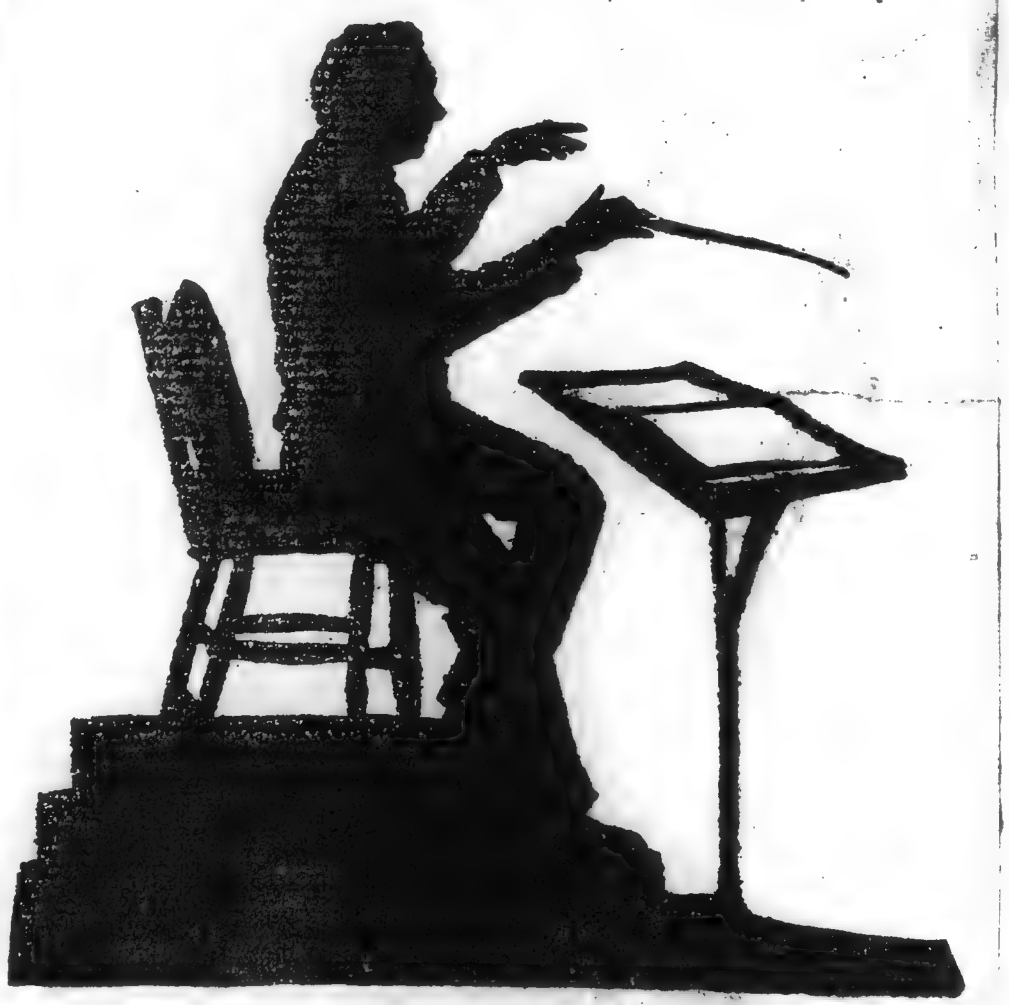
Afternoon.

Symphony in B Flat, No. 102......Haydn
"La Mer," Trois Esquisses Symphoniques .... Debussy
Symphony No. 4 in D Minor, Opus 36 .... Tschaikowsky

25

THE HARTFORD TIMES, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 1938.

Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY IN REHEARSAL

Silhouette by the Baroness Eveline von Maydell

Gifts of Music Lovers Are Called Keystone of Triumphant Cultural Arch

The last article of a series

III

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

Previous articles have taken some account of the circle of friendship built up in Hartford by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Actually the Friends of the Orchestra is a title conferred upon an organization which is New England-wide and counts several members in Hartford.

On November 2 when Edward A. Taft, chairman of the Friends of the Boston Symphony, addressed a meeting of the group in Symphony Hall, the enrollment was 1319, as against 1281 the previous year.

There was a time when it took the gift of $100 to become a member of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In recent years, any contribution however small is sufficient to confer the significant title. Twenty-nine musicians in the orchestra are enrolled, of whom 25 became members this year. Besides the large Boston enrollment, there are members in Washington, New Mexico, New Jersey, New York, Rhode Island, Hartford and Paris.

Vitally Necessary

The importance of this organization is not to be under-estimated. It is vitally nevessary to the existence of the orchestra. It was the life-long ambition of Col. Henry Lee Higginson to set up a million dollar fund to guarantee the perpetuation of the great Boston orchestra, but he never achieved it. A man who set out to build a fortune for the express purpose of making such an endowment fell short of his goal only because of the constant drain upon his purse which the symphony entailed year after year. Although it was not generally known, Colonel Higginson's finances were in a precarious condition during the early war years. He carried on the struggle nevertheless at extreme sacrifice and was able to recoup, although never to the extent he had hoped. This dramatic story is told in Bliss Perry's "Life and Letters of Henry Lee Higginson," of which those interested in the orchestra should avail themselves, since space does not permit even an outline here.

Said Mr. Taft in addressing the Friends: "It costs over $600,000 to run a great orchestra like ours. We are fortunate that all but 15 percent of this vast sum comes back to us in operating revenues. No other major orchestra is so fortunate.

"Present indications are that last year's high level in seat sales is being maintained for the current season.

Orchestra Stands High

"The orchestra under our great conductor stands in higher regard both here and abroad than ever before in its history.

"As you know, the orchestra in the course of the years has broadened the field of its activities so that now in a single season more than 200,000 individuals attend one or more of the concerts that we sponsor. This means that there are now as many as 200,000 potential friends of the orchestra."

Bentley W. Warren, who was for six years president of the Board of Trustees of the orchestra, compared the contributions of the Friends to the keystone of an arch. "To me," he said, "the whole picture is like an arch. The faithful purchase of tickets, year in and year out, are the stones of the arch . . . That 15 percent which the Friends raise each year is the keystone which makes the perfect whole.

"The orchestra has expanded its activities a good deal in recent years. This year we have taken over the management and responsibility of the Esplanade concerts. These concerts cost about $14,000. And $5,000, fellow-members, was contributed by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. That, I think, is recognition of the importance of this orchestra.

"Another activity is the Berkshire Festival . . . This last August there were 36,000 people who attended the concerts. These people came from all over the country."

That is the significant thing, large number from Hartford. These people feel that the orchestra belongs to them, and indeed it does.

Officials of the Boston Symphony, like George E. Judd, the manager, and Mr. Taft and Mr. Warren recognize that the orchestra has grown beyond the confines of Boston and of Massachusetts. It is a New England institution.

Hartford has had a possessive feeling about it from the time of that first concert back in 1885 and each one of the seventy-odd concerts played here has deepened that feeling. There has been generous ticket-buying support and the city is not unmindful of that all important keystone of the arch, for in Hartford the friends of the orchestra are becoming Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

HYANNIS, MASS.
Weekly Barnstable Patriot

NOV 17 1938

Here & There

By Samuel T. Stewart

The Cape is to be congratulated on the series of concerts it is to have this winter with such an artist as Albert Spaulding the first one. The financial success is apparently assured with the list of patrons over subscribed. Not only are such concerts a success from a musical standpoint, they unite the Cape more and more as a single unit.

* * * * * *

For historical parallel we can go back fifty years to Cleveland, Ohio where the lead was taken by the then Professor of Music in the Public schools. There was big barn of an auditorium called Doan's Music Hall, but it did hold five thousand people. What was called the "Star Course" was started and ran for a number of years. Ten entertainments for a dollar, general admission, reserved seats up to two dollars extra. Such people as John D. Rockefeller, Myron T. Herrick, Charles F. Brush (the original Arc Light Manufacturer), and a host of other people, acted as patrons and guaranteed the first financing. The concerts were the finest to be had with such organizations and artists as The Boston Symphony Orchestra, P. ~~S.~~ Gilmore's band, Adelina Patti, Victor Herbert, Paderewski. Cleveland became music conscious and owes its present Symphony orchestra to this beginning and to the fact that every child in the public schools was taught to read and sing music of a high grade. Who can tell what may come to the Cape from this beginning?

THE SECRET IS OUT!

Here's What Symphony Conductors Do Between Seasons

B. Globe Dec. 4/38

John Barbirolli conductor of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra's Sunday Columbia network concerts, told a lecture audience recently that five months' preparation was necessary for the seven months of concerts in the orchestra's present season. It is scarcely a problem in arithmetic; a conductor's year consists of 12 uninterrupted months and John Barbirolli's "Summer in Sussex" amounts to a nice-sounding phrase for "work."

"The work the public sees the conductor do," he told members of the Philharmonic-Symphony League in the first of a series of lectures under league auspices "is the least of his job. I am not even referring to the continual rehearsals during the season, but to all the work of annotating parts, editing, the 101 points of technical elucidation of scores which has to go on always.

"Of course, one of the most formidable tasks that face the conductor is to make programs, programs that must have as a basis the great classical masterpiece, what we might call a representative selection of modern classics, and such contemporary music as might interest the public to hear—not forgetting the encouragement the Philharmonic-Symphony Society must extend to native composers of worth.

"I have sometimes spent weeks reading scores of which more than 90 percent must finally be rejected, not because they are all unworthy of performance, but because I have never believed, nor will I ever believe, that the Philharmonic-Symphony concerts should become experimental forums.

"When the program material is all gathered together, I must try to obviate duplication and, to insure the retention of some degree of sanity for myself, no attempt must be made to please everybody.

"Has it often been thought that one can asemble four of the best pieces of music and make an abominable program? Also, in a well-balanced program, that the substitution of one piece can completely ruin it?

"I can say without exaggeration that it has taken me five months to compile programs for this season, and obviously with the compilation of these programs there must be constant study.

JOHN BARBIROLLI
Distinguished Young Conductor of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony.

"So you can see that the conductor's so-called holiday can hardly be called a rest cure. I find that after month's spent in research and study the actual period of conducting comes as a kind of blessed release, musical thoughts that have been singing inside one for months at least can be given rein at last."

Barbirolli touched also on "the psychological aspect of dealing with the musicians in his charge and "making them do their 100 percent best for you and the music."

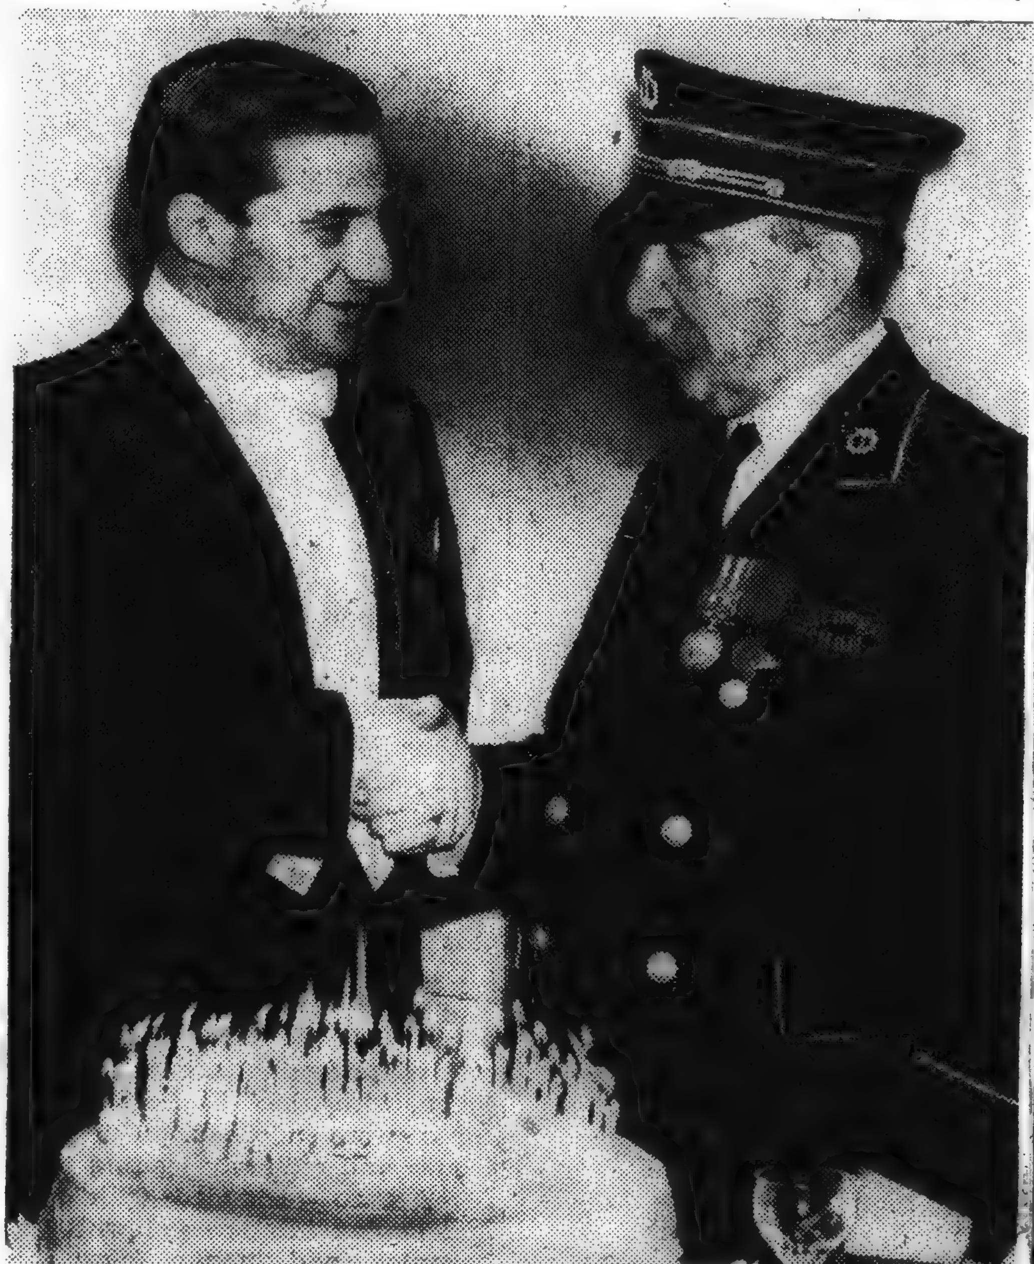
"It is dangerous," he said, "to worry a very sensitive player too much; on the contrary, during an important and difficult solo the conductor should provide him with a background of sympathy, trust and help.

"I have sometimes been approached to explain various interpretations of the same piece, owing supposedly to 'moods' of mine. But the explanation was that moods of one or more of my players were responsible. This freedom, however, must not extend so as to permit departures in phrasing and no 'selfish' player, however good, should ever be tolerated in a first-class orchestra."

Dec. 3/38 THE NEW YORK TIMES, SA

[From Final Edition of Yesterday's Times.]

Barbirolli, 39, Shares Birthday Honors With Carnegie Hall Doorman, 83, at Party



Times Wide World

Conductor John Barbirolli, 39, and Doorman Gus Wade, 83, exchanging birthday greetings in front of their 122-candle cake at Carnegie Hall.

Two natives of London who are connected with Carnegie Hall let it be known yesterday that they both celebrate their birthdays today, thus earning a mutual birthday party from the management. They are John Barbirolli, conductor of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, and Gus Wade, veteran doorman of the hall.

Mr. Barbirolli will be 39 years old today, while Mr. Wade, who is a walking encyclopedia of Carnegie Hall musical lore, will be 83. Accordingly, a large yellow cake, decorated with 122 candles—the total of their ages—was brought up to Mr. Barbirolli's dressing room before the concert last night, and he and Mr. Wade made a joint effort to blow out the candles. An official count was not taken, but it was believed that Mr. Wade extinguished his eighty-three, while Mr. Barbirolli missed about twenty of his.

As the pair stood behind the birthday cake, posing for photographers, Mr. Barbirolli solemnly observed:

"The title of this picture shall be: 'The Empire Still Stands!' "

Mr. Wade began work at Carnegie Hall on Jan. 10, 1893, nearly forty-six years ago. He is in charge at the Fifty-sixth Street entrance, through which the conductors, musicians and some of the oldest subscribers pass. He has known personally all the famous conductors and artists, from Victor Herbert through Arturo Toscanini, and he has a store of anecdotes concerning them.

"But they are not hard to get along with," he said. "Temperament or no temperament, if you treat them nice they will treat you nice."

Before coming to the United States, Mr. Wade was a flutist with the Grenadier Guards. During the Egyptian War, from 1882 to 1885, he was his regimental bugler and he received two medals, one presented by the Egyptian Khedive. In honor of the celebration last night, Mr. Wade, an erect figure with a sweeping gray mustache, wore both his medals.

After the concert Mr. Barbirolli entertained his musicians with a party at the Hotel Astor, to which Mr. Wade was invited. At midnight the men presented him with a gold watch and chain.

Both of the Englishmen plan to observe their actual birthdays today by working—Mr. Barbirolli on the podium, conducting a matinee concert, and Mr. Wade at his post at the Fifty-sixth Street entrance.

410

THE BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1938

Boston Symphony Gives Beethoven's 'Missa Solemnis'

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The eighth regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The concert was devoted to a performance of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis in D major, Op. 123. The chorus was that of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor. The soloists were Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Anna Kaskas, contralto; John Priebe, tenor; Norman Cordon, bass. E. Power Biggs assisted at the organ.

Beethoven's Missa Solemnis is one of those masterpieces of music which requires some study in order that its merits be appreciated and its peculiarities understood. Unfortunately, an audience predisposed in the first place in favor of non-choral, symphonic music, is apt to be impatient with a long choral work. This is undoubtedly the situation today in Boston; and, however it has arisen, the result is that a good many people willfully neglect a lot of remarkable music.

This is not the place to investigate the causes for the unpopularity of choral music in this city today, but in the case of the Beethoven Mass it may be said that the high esteem in which Bach's B minor Mass and St. Matthew Passion are held is bad preparation for the choral art of Beethoven. Scholars have found similarity in the writing of each for chorus, but the fact remains that the differences, both emotional and intellectual, are far more striking.

It is possible to argue that there are cycles of taste, and that our age leans toward Bach. If you asked each person in Symphony hall yesterday whether he preferred the Bach Mass to the Beethoven, it is our guess that the former would win the most votes, in spite of the fact that it is longer. This would not matter ultimately, since we are told by all authorities that both are equally great works of art. But it would account for a certain indifference obviously abroad in the audience yesterday.

The Credo is unquestionably the most extraordinary music of the whole mass. The genius with which Beethoven has set the difficult text is not to be denied. Yet doubtless the audience was upset by the strange staccato emphasis on the conjunction "et." It is also possible that the fashion for terse and precise endings accounts for the feeling of tedium that we experience with Beethoven's long-drawn-out cadences.

Whatever the attitude of the quiescent public, the Missa Solemnis provides exciting and hair-raising problems for the singers. The Harvard and Radcliffe chorus was cut down from the full body used last spring on the enlarged stage. It sang, thanks to Mr. Woodworth's training, extremely well. It was amazing how well on the whole the sustained high notes, the often unheard lower voices and the rhythmic accents came off yesterday. Of course, there were varying degrees of success, but the whole was a splendid piece of work.

The soloists, two of whom, Miss Kaskas and Mr. Cordon, were not the same as in the performance last April, were better matched than last season and offered at all times excellent singing. Miss Vreeland is always a tower of strength in this difficult music, and she was most ably seconded by Miss Kaskas. Both Mr. Priebe and Mr. Cordon also sang well. Dr. Koussevitzky had evidently taken up the matter of the discrepancy in Latin pronunciation, so odd a feature of the April performance; and the soloists followed the lead of the chorus in a non-Italian enunciation.

So difficult a work as the Missa Solemnis, one that requires so much preparation, certainly merited more than one performance, for in all likelihood the second would be a better one. Dr. Koussevitzky was, therefore, right in giving it in the regular series. The public did not show much curiosity to hear it at the extra pension fund concert, so that Dr. Koussevitzky's only course was to shrug his shoulders and do as he now has done. Owing to the fact that the performance was being recorded, it was inexcusably thoughtless of a few in the audience to leave before the Agnus Dei. There was the second intermission for that purpose.

BEETHOVEN'S BIG WORK BY SYMPHONY

Harvard and Radcliffe Singers Do Chorus Parts

B. Post — Dec. 3/38

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Beethoven's Missa Solemnis fills the Symphony Concerts of this week. This remarkable work, coeval with the Ninth Symphony, was revived here by Dr. Koussevitzky for the Beethoven Centenary Festival of 1927 and repeated by him at a pension fund concert last spring. An unsuccessful attempt was made to record this last performance and yesterday afternoon another and presumably successful try was made. Certainly, the performance went off with no discernable hitch and the R. C. A. Victor Company might wait long and search far and wide to find a better one.

HARVARD AND RADCLIFFE

Yesterday, as before, under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction, the chorus was drawn from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society and had been prepared for its exacting task by G. Wallace Woodworth. Of yesterday's solo singers two, Jeannette Vreeland, the soprano, and John Priebe, the tenor, participated in the performance of last April. The other members of the quartet, Anna Kaskas, the contralto, and Norman Cordon, the bass, were new to their roles, as far as Boston is concerned. The organist was E. Power Biggs and Mr. Burgin, as was to be expected, provided the important violin solo in the Benedictus.

Not Equal of Bach

There are compositions, such as the B minor Mass of Bach, the G minor Symphony of Mozart and Beethoven's own "Eroica," which have won what amounts to universal acceptance. Neither the Ninth Symphony, with its choral Finale, of which some critics do not approve, nor this Mass in D major can be placed in that fortunate company. Regarding these, disputes still wage and are likely to wage for some time to come.

Among those who accept the Mass wholeheartedly and unreservedly are such pietists as the late Vincent d'Indy, who find it to be Beethoven's complete confession of faith, and those critics, among them Ernest Newman, who believably let their interests in the circumstances of the music's composition influence their judgment on the music itself. In both cases, the more sceptical can descry a sort of critical, wishful thinking.

Distinctly Uneven

As one who speaks for the opposition this reviewer will once more set himself on record as finding the Mass a distinctly uneven and hence not altogether satisfactory achievement. If all of it were as impressive as some of it undeniably is we would have a masterpiece ranking not too far below the B minor Mass of Bach and this is very high praise, indeed. On the other hand, your humble servant avers that if all of the Mass were as unconvincing as are many of its pages, even its exalted authorship would not have kept it alive.

We are told that certain portions of the Mass were the result of an almost superhuman effort on Beethoven's part and we are supposed, therefore, to think the more highly of them. And yet we can easily imagine Bach accomplishing the far greater contrapuntal feats of the Mass in B minor, with no untoward expenditure of energy and effort. The polyphonic terms in which the Cantor of Leipzig thought so readily were for Beethoven a problem to be wrestled with, and even then he attains but rarely to what was the equivalent of his predecessor's natural speech.

Ungrateful for Voices

Save for the beginning of the Gloria and the end of the Credo the fugal portions of the Mass are not the most rewarding. In the end, it is the homophonic Beethoven who prevails.

And always there is the matter of the ungrateful, yes, unskillful, writing for voices. The singers of yesterday deserved the utmost credit for so bravely acquitting themselves in tasks that rightly should never have been set them.

MUSIC

B. Globe Dec. 3/38

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

This week, for the first time in the history of the Boston Symphony, subscribers to the Friday and Saturday concerts are privileged to hear Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis." Until now this giant among choral masterpieces had been given by the orchestra on but four special occasions—the opening of Symphony Hall in 1900, twice during the Beethoven Centenary festival in 1927, and just last April at a concert for the benefit of the Boston Symphony pension fund.

The performances yesterday afternoon and tonight, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, are being recorded. The assisting choruses are the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Harvard Glee Club, trained by G. Wallace Woodworth. The soloists are Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Anna Kaskas, contralto; John Priebe, tenor, and Norman Cordon, bass. The part for organ is taken by E. Power Biggs.

Beethoven began his score in 1818, intending it for performance at the installation as Archbishop of Almuetz, of his benefactor, pupil and friend, the Archduke Rudolph. But as was the case with other of his scores, the work grew in magnitude while he was writing it; he refused to be hurried, and it was not until nearly five years afterward—three years too late for the elevation of Rudolph—that the "Missa Solemnis" was completed.

Both ironic and a revelation of the way of genius is the fact that this work, a setting of church liturgy, turned out a vast, dramatic and intensely presonal expression of man's address to God. So great and commanding a genius was Beethoven that he could not have been limited by the technical conventions of the Mass, from some of which he freely departed. In the Ninth Symphony and the "Missa Solemnis" Beethoven sang from his heart for all mankind. Nor is this the sole resemblance between those two incredible masterpieces. A likeness of orchestral and vocal style characterizes both, together with the indefinable quality of mystic vision also found in Beethoven's last string quartets.

Deaf and withdrawn in upon himself, Beethoven at that point in his life must have lived in a spiritual realm access to which is denied ordinary men pre occupied with mundane affairs of existence. To this reason, beyond all doubt, may be ascribed the unique style of these compositions, and the cruel technical difficulties, especially for the singers, that stand in the way of frequent performance of the Mass.

Yesterday's performance, as that last April had done, left one listener overwhelmed by its emotional force. Once again the exaltation of Dr. Koussevitzky's conducting carried all before it.

There are perhaps, in presenting so huge and complex a score, bound to be minor shortcomings on the part of chorus and soloists. Let them be overlooked, for they were as nothing in the cumulative effect of the whole. It may be observed in passing that Mr. Priebe's voice has gained depth and richness since he first sang here two seasons ago; that Miss Vreeland and Miss Kaskas, apart from occasional and unavoidable hardness of tone due to the terrific range of their parts, sang very well indeed and that Mr. Cordon with his sonorous voice sustained his part commendably.

All concerned, notably including Mr. G. Wallace Woodworth, whose zealous training resulted in the prevailing excellence of the Radcliffe and Harvard singers, may rest assured that their achievement is of major importance.

C. W. D.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
NOV 26 1938

Mrs. Cornelia Colton Hollister summer resident of Lenox for many years, will entertain Dec. 8, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays in her home city, Toledo Ohio. Last year after the concert she gave a dinner for Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor at the Park Lane Hotel where she makes her home. Mrs. Hollister expects to spend Christmas and most of January at the Washington Hotel, Washington D. C.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
NOV 18 1938

Music of the Day

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Boston Symphony Attracts Capacity Audience To Carnegie Hall in Opening Concert With Koussevitzky Marking 15th Year as Conductor

There's cause for rejoicing since the Boston Symphony Orchestra is again in town. Its reappearance was sufficient to snarl up traffic badly in the vicinity of Carnegie Hall last night, for every one who could get into the auditorium was there to fill it to capacity. The attraction undoubtedly was the Boston Symphony, but its leader, Serge Koussevitzky, checked off the beginning of his 15th season in New York and that is a record without precedent in the 53 years that the orchestra has been making its annual visits. Also, Koussevitzky and the orchestra have become so much a single unit in these years that the name of one is synonymous with the other. There could be no finer tribute when the unchallenged superiority of the orchestra is considered.

In line with the conductor's championship of contemporary music, the first part of the program listed Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin" Suite and Sibelius Fifth Symphony. This was balanced with Beethoven's Fifth in the second half. The juxtaposition of the two Fifths offered an interesting comparison of the respective composers in musical expression of heroic proportions. Both resorted to the elemental statement of themes; both strove for simplicity; both found a vital rhythmic impulse necessary to their creation. They stand side by side, composers and works, in provocative balance.

Performances of fine texture, nice proportions and finesse were the order of the evening. The Ravel was a model of orchestral playing in which the strings excelled as usual. The Sibelius and Beethoven made the brass and winds assert themselves more forcibly with similar success though there was an occasional roughness here and there in their execution. In matters of interpretation, both symphonies were masterful creations in a sweep of orchestral sonorities heightened by good climaxing and expert playing. It was particularly absorbing to hear the Sibelius grow tonally "in the process of development" in such a transparent performance.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
EVE. NEWS
NOV 22 1938

Goossens' Daughter in Radio Bow

Conductor Eugene Goossens' six-year-old daughter, Sidonie, today had made her debut in both radio and music.

From Sagamore Hotel studios of WHAM last night, Sidonie sang her two favorite songs, "Tick, Tock" and "My Favorite Doll," written by Mrs. Marie Whitbeck Clark, whose "guest star" Sidonie was during the program.

Mr. and Mrs. Goossens, in Boston where Goossens is conductor for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, telegraphed congratulations. Sidonie is visiting her grandparents, Mr. and Mrs. Leon D. Lewis of Vick Park B, while her parents are on tour.

AUGUSTA, GA.
HERALD
NOV 18 1938

GOSSIP

By VIRGINIA FLEMING
(Society Editor of The Herald)

WEEK-END ACTIVITIES ARE ON THE UP AND UP for members of the younger set who will start the ball rolling tonight by attending the DeMolay dance at the Hotel Richmond. Instead of rushing downtown to take part in a possible "shirt-tail" parade, the boys and girls will hasten home after the football game between Richmond Academy and Marist to change into their more formal evening clothes for the dance which will begin shortly after the game ends. The dance will begin at 10 o'clock and last until 2 o'clock, the late hours being just because tomorrow's Saturday and the party guests can sleep a little later than on school mornings. Hugh Barton and his orchestra will furnish the swing tunes for dancing.

ANNA MONTGOMERY HAS JUST returned from an orgy of playgoing and parties in New York, Boston and Cambridge which consumed all of ten days crowded to the full with excitement and fun. Anna has come back telling us about the grand plays on Broadway which include "Abe Lincoln in Illinois", "Shadow and Substance", "I Married an Angel", and many other attractions which for her included the Ballet Russe. Of course, with her musical talents Anna probably enjoyed hearing Kousevitsky direct the Boston Symphony orchestra more than anything else. While in Boston she was a house guest of Mrs. Richard Hall and in New York was at the hotel with a friend of the William Montgomery McGoverns who charmed Anna with her command of the Japanese and Chinese languages.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER - CITIZEN
NOV 23 1938

Aaron Copeland's novelty, "El Salon Mexico," heard in Boston recently, was presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra on the occasion of its first visit of the season to New York last week. Mr. Downes of the New York Times rated it as "a brilliant adventure in a certain idiom." It was well received, as was the composer. The orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky was praised for a "ravishing" performance of the Second Symphony of Sibelius.

COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH

NOV 20 1938

ymphony Conductor Returns

Eugene Gossens, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony orchestra, and his wife, are shown as they returned to New York, from a month abroad. Mr. Gossens will be in Boston for a week as guest conductor of the Symphony orchestra.

Goosson Sees 'Faustus' Production Will Write Modern Opera on Legend

B. Post —

Inspiration for a modern opera based on the Marlowe legend of Dr. Faustus, which was disrupted by the tense atmosphere of Europe during the late summer and early autumn, was revived here in Boston for Eugene Goosson, noted conductor and composer, he revealed last night.

Goosson, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra and guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this weekend, declared the local Federal Theater presentation of the Marlowe legend in the Copley Theater had revived his interest in the opera for which he has already written some music.

RECALLS WAR TENSION

That more of the music has not been written, he said, may be traced to the war tension of the early autumn in Paris. He went there, he said, to concentrate on music and to compose, but was startled to find that the house he and Mrs. Goosson had rented was between the home of Premier Daladier of France and the Italian embassy.

"Even if one pulled down the blinds, it was impossible to shut out the tension," he explained last night. "It was impossible to concentrate on musical composition whe nall over the city were weeping women seeing their sons or husbands off to war duty, when the concierge went around placing pails of sand outside the door, anticipating fire, when there were constant air raid practices to remind you that war was close."

He revealed his plan to write an experimental opera on the Faust legend, for which he hopes to compose psychological music which will reflect the moods and emotions of the protagonists. There were to be no set arias for prima donnas, he will have the orchestra carry the burden of the musical end of the opera, with the singers to project the English and to do the acting.

For some time he had been interested in writing a new Foust, but could not make up his mind whether to employ the Goethe or the Marlowe legends. Skillful use of the Marlowe version by the Federal Theater presentation, whic he and Mrs. Goosson attended, caused him to decide on that, he said.

INTERVIEWS ADAPTER

The simplicity and artistry of the local presentation, particularly utilization of lighting devices to effect changes of scenes and moods, he said, made so great an impression on him he invited the adapter and director, Eliot Duvey, to visit him in the Copley-Plaza yesterday afternoon so that he might congratulate him.

"Simple lighting effects might be used to great advantage in opera, if one had enterprise enough," he said. "Just imagine a new Foust on daring lines! Opera is so traditional, the public expects those traditions to be followed in every opera. It takes specail enterprise to be different."

The Goosson European vacation was not completely fruitless, however, for in addition to several sketches for the new Faust, he composed two of four movements for a new symphony.

"I am a late romantic—or perhaps I should say a near romantic," he said, referring to his musican taste, but women present raised eyebrows, for the youthful composer-conductor looks like Hollywood's conception of the romantic gentleman.

He is handsome, he speaks with a charming — and understandable — British accent, and he wears smartly-tailored Bond street clothes that emphasize not only the breadth of his shoulders and the slimness of his figure but also his modern, progressive outlook.

"I mean," Goosson went on, still explaining his musical preference, "I like the luxurious in music—that which isn't too modern. That is why, with this romantic attitude, I am interested in writing an opera on the legend of Dr. Faustus."

With the late Arnold Bennett, he wrote a one-act opera, "Judith," based onthe Biblical story, and a four-act opera, "Don Juan de Manara," both of which were presented in Covent Garden, London.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM
NOV 20 1938

EUGENE GOOSSENS SYMPHONY GUEST

The Boston Symphony orchestra will have a guest of distinction as its conductor for the week to come—Eugene Goossens. Mr. Goossens, who has just returned from Europe, will lead the Symphony concerts on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, and at Sanders theatre, Cambridge, on the previous Thursday evening. He will then go to Cincinnati to resume his post as the regular conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony orchestra. Mr. Goossens has conducted the Boston Symphony orchestra as guest on two previous occasions, in 1926 and 1930. An Englishman of Belgian ancestry, Eugene Goossens comes of a musical family. Mr. Goossens has had an active and successful career as conductor. As leader, he conducted Symphony concerts, opera and ballet in London, before coming to the United States in 1923 to head the Rochester Philharmonic orchestra. He became the regular conductor of the Cincinnati orchestra in 1931. He has composed many works in large and small forms.

Mr. Goossens announces a programme of unusual interest for his three concerts here. The three numbers in the first portion will each have their first hearing at these concerts. The first will be the Overture to Handel's "Occasional Oratorio." There will follow an orchestration of Robert Schumann's Piano Suite "Carnaval." The orchestration was made by four Russian composers—Rimsky-Korsakov, Liadov, Glazounov, and Tchrepnin. The third number will consist of Two Nature Poems of Goossens, "Pastoral" and "Bacchanal." The final number will be Tchaikovsky's Symphony on Byron's "Manfred." The first movement depicts Manfred wandering in the Alps, seeking forgetfulness by his power over nature. The second, in the nature of a scherzo, is the apparition of the Fairy of the Alps. The slow movement is a pastoral. The finale describes the underground palace of Arimanes, the evocation of Astarte, and Manfred's death.

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

NOV 20 1938

Ovation Awaits Mr. Goossens

After Triumphant Concert Tour Of England, Director Of Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra Will Assume Duties Here December 2.

THE ARRIVAL of Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Goossens in New York this past week, en route to Cincinnati by way of Boston, where this highly acclaimed musical director of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra will be heard next week end as the guest conductor of the far-famed Boston Symphony Orchestra, centers the attention of all musical Cincinnati in the next pair of concerts at Music Hall, to be presented on Friday afternoon and evening, December 2 and 3.

On these greatly anticipated occasions Mr. Goossens will be welcomed with acclaim to his familiar place on the podium at Music Hall, an event that is attracting such widespread interest that the "S. R. O." signs will doubtless be very much in evidence long before the familiar gong at Music Hall summons to their places in the auditorium those who have lingered in the spacious foyer greeting friends and fellow music lovers.

PLAUDITS OF ENGLAND.

For Mr. Goossens is returning to Cincinnati with the plaudits of all England ringing in his ears, and the encomia of the British press attesting to his greatness as a man and to his ability and success as the conductor of a number of England's most noted musical organizations.

It was because of insistent demands from his native land that he appear again before them as a conductor, that the Board of Trustees of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra granted to Mr. Goossens a short leave of absence from his duties as musical director and permanent conductor here. This enabled Mr. Goossens to accept some of his many invitations to appear as a guest conductor abroad; invitations that in their fulfillment have brought greater prestige not only to Cincinnati's own conductor but to its orchestra as well.

Continued From Preceding Page.

Indeed, the glowing reviews that have appeared in the British press redounded to the astuteness of the Cincinnati Symphony Board in its selection of one of the outstanding musical directors of the world as the permanent conductor of this city's Symphony Orchestra.

TRIUMPHANT RETURN.

Mr. Goossens's return in time for the next pair of Symphony Concerts will be a triumphant one and will be fraught with musical and social significance, since Cincinnati music lovers are always eager to pay homage where homage is due.

Another factor that lends added interests to Mr. Goossens' first appearance with the orchestra this season will be the presentation of Jascha Heifetz, one of the greatest violin virtuosi in the world today, and an artist whose friends, made on oft-recalled previous visits to Cincinnati, are legion.

Certainly this combination of events assures an occasion that will not be forgotten in the annals of the artistic life of this "musical community," a title which it has long held. Indeed, December 2 and 3 promises also to assemble the large and impressive Symphony subscription list in full regalia at Music Hall. For this exciting incident of Mr. and Mrs. Goossens's return to their adopted city—which is Cincinnati—will not only greet these returning travelers most eloquently, but will afford an opportunity for many Saturday night supper parties following this evening de gala.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

NOV 25 1938

* * *

Eugene Goossens, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony orchestra, commented on his return from Europe that the present disturbed condition of the world has hampered musical composition. He complained that few works are being written which deserve to be ranked as masterpieces.

Goossens said that while great upheavals tend to produce great music when they have died down and artists are able to retire into a calm, creative atmosphere, the present upheaval is a continuing process that gives no interlude for contemplation.

* * *

Goossens praised the quality of contemporary English composition, which he feels has been unduly neglected. One of the new works which he has brought back is a "Variation on the theme of Frank Bridges," by Benjamin Bridges, young English composer.

After conducting the Boston Symphony in New York this week, Goossen returns to Cincinnati for his regular season.

COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH

NOV 20 1938

ymphony Conductor Returns

Eugene Gossens, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony orchestra, and his wife, are shown as they returned to New York, from a month abroad. Mr. Gossens will be in Boston for a week as guest conductor of the Symphony orchestra.

Goosson Sees 'Faustus' Production Will Write Modern Opera on Legend

B. Post—

Inspiration for a modern opera based on the Marlowe legend of Dr. Faustus, which was disrupted by the tense atmosphere of Europe during the late summer and early autumn, was revived here in Boston for Eugene Goosson, noted conductor and composer, he revealed last night.

Goosson, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra and guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this weekend, declared the local Federal Theater presentation of the Marlowe legend in the Copley Theater had revived his interest in the opera for which he has already written some music.

RECALLS WAR TENSION

That more of the music has not been written, he said, may be traced to the war tension of the early autumn in Paris. He went there, he said, to concentrate on music and to compose, but was startled to find that the house he and Mrs. Goosson had rented was between the home of Premier Daladier of France and the Italian embassy.

"Even if one pulled down the blinds, it was impossible to shut out the tension," he explained last night. "It was impossible to concentrate on musical composition whe nall over the city were weeping women seeing their sons or husbands off to war duty, when the concierge went around placing pails of sand outside the door, anticipating fire, when there were constant air raid practices to remind you that war was close."

He revealed his plan to write an experimental opera on the Faust legend, for which he hopes to compose psychological music which will reflect the moods and emotions of the protagonists. There were to be no set arias for prima donnas, he will have the orchestra carry the burden of the musical end of the opera, with the singers to project the English and to do the acting.

For some time he had been interested in writing a new Foust, but could not make up his mind whether to employ the Goethe or the Marlowe legends. Skillful use of the Marlowe version by the Federal Theater presentation, whic he and Mrs. Goosson attended, caused him to decide on that, he said.

INTERVIEWS ADAPTER

The simplicity and artistry of the local presentation, particularly utilization of lighting devices to effect changes of scenes and moods, he said, made so great an impression on him he invited the adapter and director, Eliot Duvey, to visit him in the Copley-Plaza yesterday afternoon so that he might congratulate him.

"Simple lighting effects might be used to great advantage in opera, if one had enterprise enough," he said. "Just imagine a new Foust on daring lines! Opera is so traditional, the public expects those traditions to be followed in every opera. It takes specail enterprise to be different."

The Goosson European vacation was not completely fruitless, however, for in addition to several sketches for the new Faust, he composed two of four movements for a new symphony.

"I am a late romantic—or perhaps I should say a near romantic," he said, referring to his musican taste, but women present raised eyebrows, for the youthful composer-conductor looks like Hollywood's conception of the romantic gentleman.

He is handsome, he speaks with a charming — and understandable — British accent, and he wears smartly-tailored Bond street clothes that emphasize not only the breadth of his shoulders and the slimness of his figure but also his modern, progressive outlook.

"I mean," Goosson went on, still explaining his musical preference, "I like the luxurious in music—that which isn't too modern. That is why, with this romantic attitude, I am interested in writing an opera on the legend of Dr. Faustus."

With the late Arnold Bennett, he wrote a one-act opera, "Judith," based onthe Biblical stor., and a four-act opera, "Don Juan de Manara," both of which were presented in Covent Garden, London.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM
NOV 20 1938

EUGENE GOOSSENS SYMPHONY GUEST

The Boston Symphony orchestra will have a guest of distinction as its conductor for the week to come—Eugene Goossens. Mr. Goossens, who has just returned from Europe, will lead the Symphony concerts on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, and at Sanders theatre, Cambridge, on the previous Thursday evening. He will then go to Cincinnati to resume his post as the regular conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony orchestra. Mr. Goossens has conducted the Boston Symphony orchestra as guest on two previous occasions, in 1926 and 1930. An Englishman of Belgian ancestry, Eugene Goossens comes of a musical family. Mr. Goossens has had an active and successful career as conductor. As leader, he conducted Symphony concerts, opera and ballet in London, before coming to the United States in 1923 to head the Rochester Philharmonic orchestra. He became the regular conductor of the Cincinnati orchestra in 1931. He has composed many works in large and small forms.

Mr. Goossens announces a programme of unusual interest for his three concerts here. The three numbers in the first portion will each have their first hearing at these concerts. The first will be the Overture to Handel's "Occasional Oratorio." There will follow an orchestration of Robert Schumann's Piano Suite "Carnaval." The orchestration was made by four Russian composers—Rimsky-Korsakov, Liadov, Glasounov, and Tchrepnin. The third number will consist of Two Nature Poems of Goossens, "Pastoral" and "Bacchanal." The final number will be Tchaikovsky's Symphony on Byron's "Manfred." The first movement depicts Manfred wandering in the Alps, seeking forgetfulness by his power over nature. The second, in the nature of a scherzo, is the apparition of the Fairy of the Alps. The slow movement is a pastoral. The finale describes the underground palace of Arimanes, the evocation of Astarte, and Manfred's death.

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

NOV 20 1938

Ovation Awaits Mr. Goossens

After Triumphant Concert Tour Of England, Director Of Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra Will Assume Duties Here December 2.

THE ARRIVAL of Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Goossens in New York this past week, en route to Cincinnati by way of Boston, where this highly acclaimed musical director of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra will be heard next week and as the guest conductor of the far-famed Boston Symphony Orchestra, centers the attention of all musical Cincinnati in the next pair of concerts at Music Hall, to be presented on Friday afternoon and evening, December 2 and 3.

On these greatly anticipated occasions Mr. Goossens will be welcomed with acclaim to his familiar place on the podium at Music Hall, an event that is attracting such widespread interest that the "S. R. O." signs will doubtless be very much in evidence long before the familiar gong at Music Hall summons to their places in the auditorium those who have lingered in the spacious foyer greeting friends and fellow music lovers.

PLAUDITS OF ENGLAND.

For Mr. Goossens is returning to Cincinnati with the plaudits of all England ringing in his ears, and the encomia of the British press attesting to his greatness as a man and to his ability and success as the conductor of a number of England's most noted musical organizations.

It was because of insistent demands from his native land that he appear again before them as a conductor, that the Board of Trustees, of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra granted to Mr. Goossens a short leave of absence from his duties as musical director and permanent conductor here. This enabled Mr. Goossens to accept some of his many invitations to appear as a guest conductor abroad; invitations that in their fulfillment have brought greater prestige not only to Cincinnati's own conductor but to its orchestra as well.

Continued From Preceding Page.

Indeed, the glowing reviews that have appeared in the British press redounded to the astuteness of the Cincinnati Symphony Board in its selection of one of the outstanding musical directors of the world as the permanent conductor of this city's Symphony Orchestra.

TRIUMPHANT RETURN.

Mr. Goossens's return in time for the next pair of Symphony Concerts will be a triumphant one and will be fraught with musical and social significance, since Cincinnati music lovers are always eager to pay homage where homage is due.

Another factor that lends added interests to Mr. Goossens' first appearance with the orchestra this season will be the presentation of Jascha Heifetz, one of the greatest violin virtuosi in the world today, and an artist whose friends, made on oft-recalled previous visits to Cincinnati, are legion.

Certainly this combination of events assures an occasion that will not be forgotten in the annals of the artistic life of this "musical community," a title which it has long held. Indeed, December 2 and 3 promises also to assemble the large and impressive Symphony subscription list in full regalia at Music Hall. For this exciting incident of Mr. and Mrs. Goossens's return to their adopted city—which is Cincinnati—will not only greet these returning travelers most eloquently, but will afford an opportunity for many Saturday night supper parties following this evening de gala.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

NOV 25 1938

* * *

Eugene Goossens, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony orchestra, commented on his return from Europe that the present disturbed condition of the world has hampered musical composition. He complained that few works are being written which deserve to be ranked as masterpieces.

Goossens said that while great upheavals tend to produce great music when they have died down and artists are able to retire into a calm, creative atmosphere, the present upheaval is a continuing process that gives no interlude for contemplation.

* * *

Goossens praised the quality of contemporary English composition, which he feels has been unduly neglected. One of the new works which he has brought back is a "Variation on the theme of Frank Bridges," by Benjamin Bridges, young English composer.

After conducting the Boston Symphony in New York this week, Goossen returns to Cincinnati for his regular season.

New England and Boston News

Second Section

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

Page Nine

BOSTON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1938

☆☆ R

Closing Stocks
Pages 14-15
Bonds — Curb

2

When Koussevitzky Swings the Baton at a Symphony Rehearsal

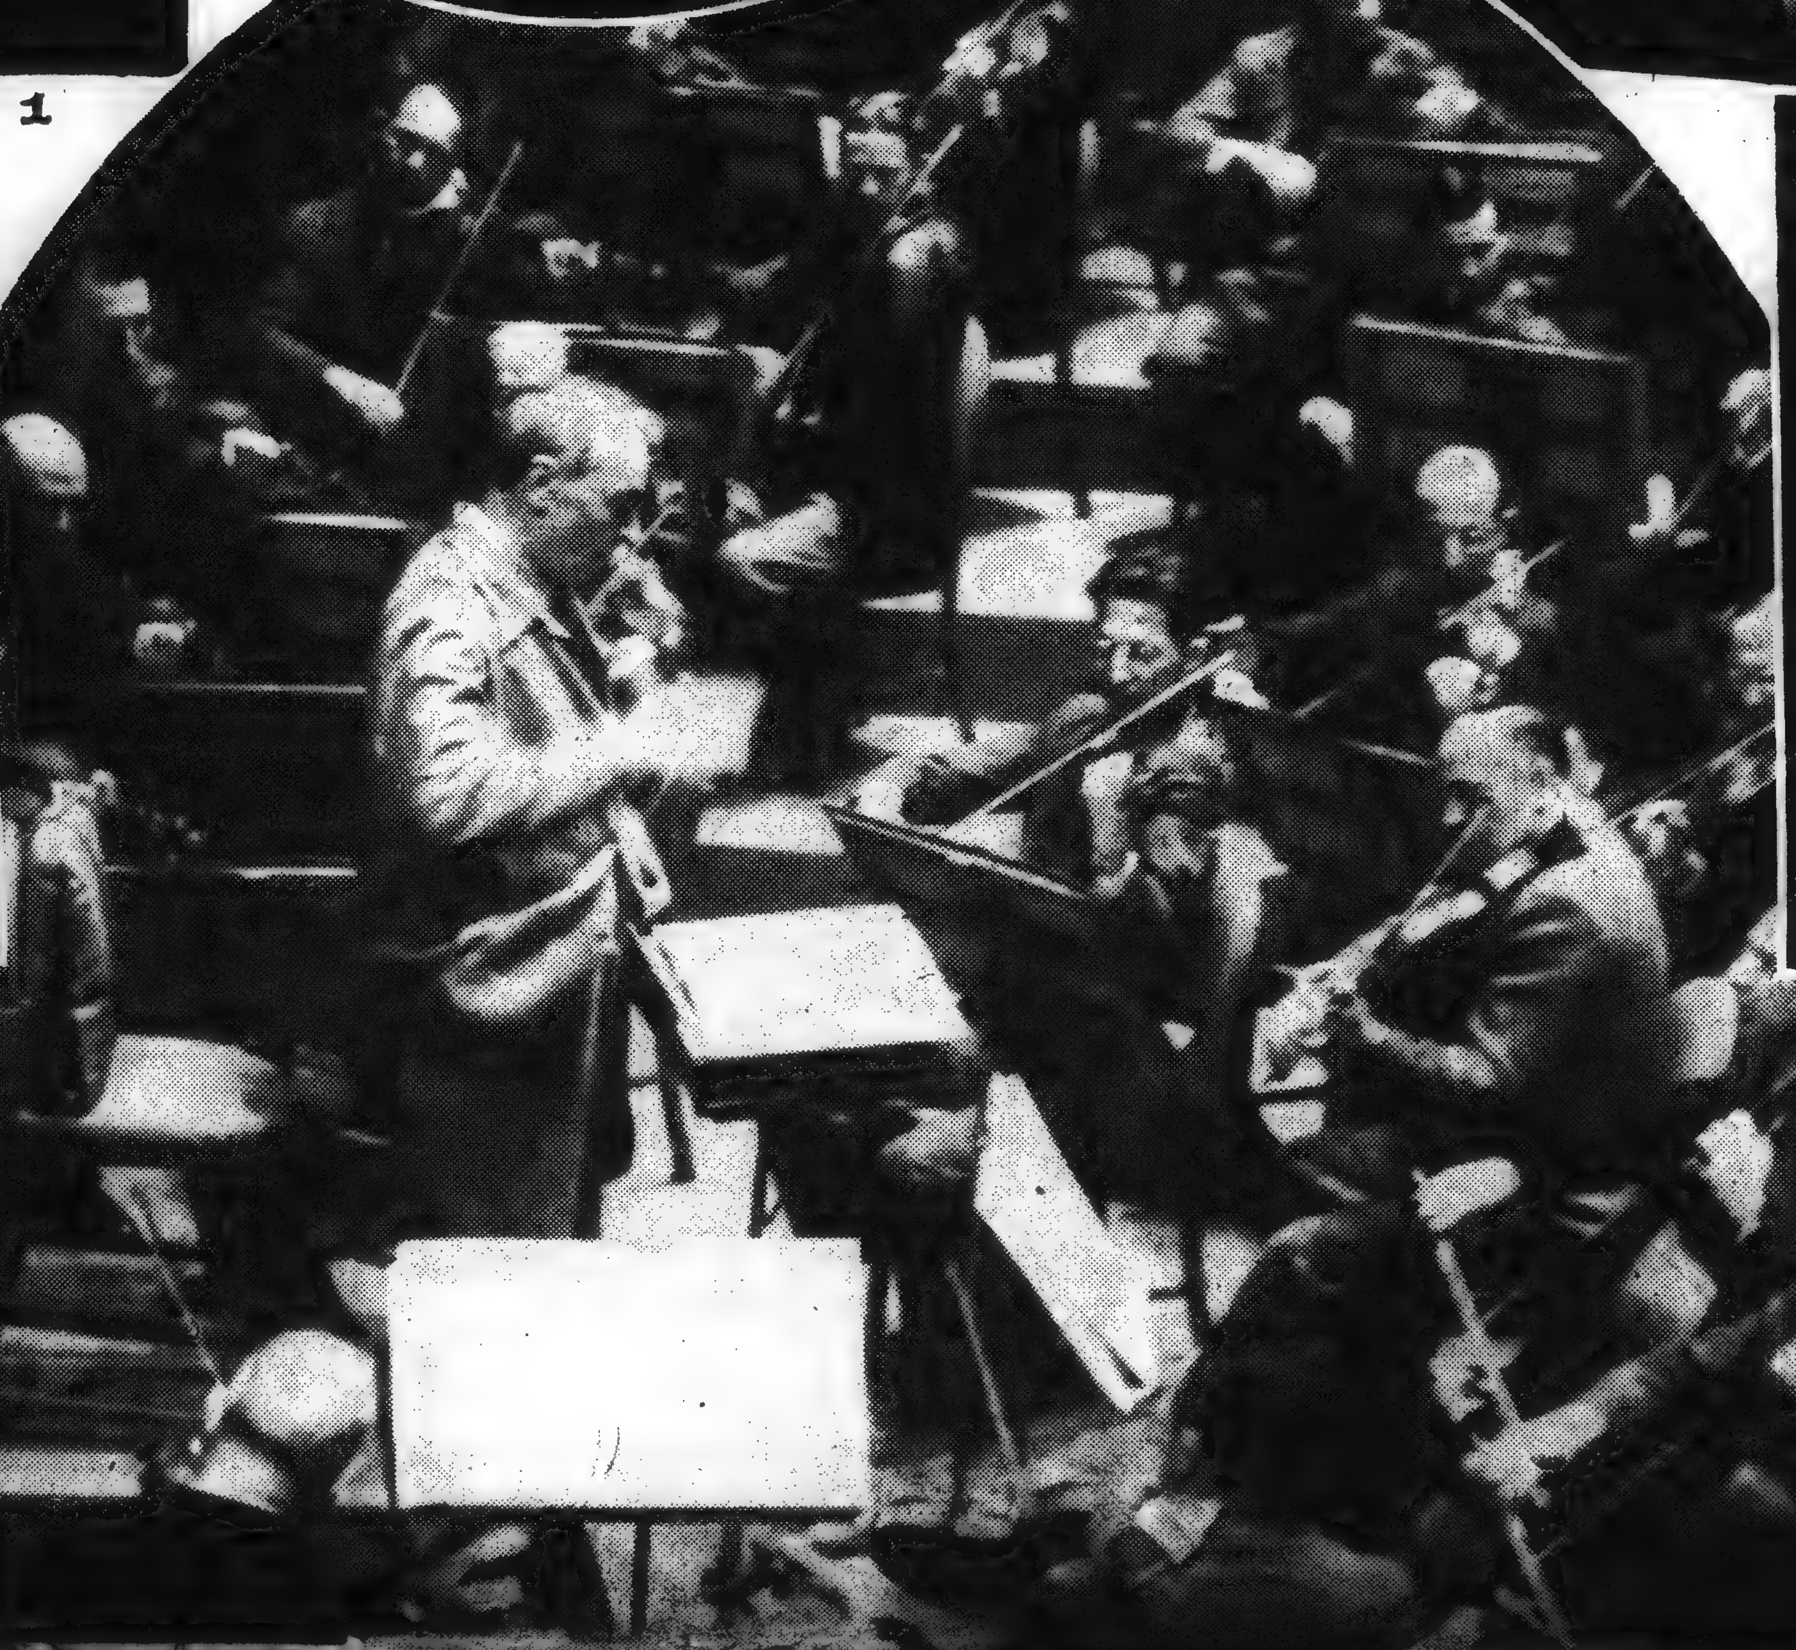
1

2

3

4

5



6

7

8

9

10

Descriptions for each picture on opposite page →

Courtesy Symphony Hall; Richard Tucker; By a Staff Photographer

Scenes at Symphony Hall in Boston

1. Instead of rapping with the baton on his music stand, Dr. Koussevitzky raises his arm quietly to signal the musicians to attention. 2. "Dolce. . . ." 3. "Stac-catto! ! ! !" 4. "Singen. . . Let it sing . . ." 5. "Più piano possibile. . . ." 6. The conductor's hand is quicker than the camera's eye. Although his face is calm, Dr. Koussevitzky's hands move with lightning speed and drive. An exciting moment in Beethoven's "Fifth." 7. "More tone, violas. . . ." 8. Compiler of the Symphony's current newspaper history shows the contrast between old and new styles of keeping records. A whole page of scrapbook can be reduced to a picture about the size of a special delivery stamp. 9. Studying history in a peep show. The projection machine in which transparent positives are shown. 10. Enlarged images are projected from the spool of film above onto the screen below.

29

Film Records Koussevitzky's Boston Career

By John D. Beaufort

Staff Writer of
The Christian Science Monitor

Behind one of those mysteriously noncommittal doors that run along the first balcony corridors of Symphony Hall, a glamorous 15 years of musical history is being prepared for recording on film. The history was written by Serge Koussevitzky with the pen point of an eloquent baton. It was recorded by dozens of industrious newspaper critics and reporters. And now, its events are being reduced to the size of postage stamps for preservation and for posterity.

Symphony officials say that this is the first time that the new film recording device has been used to perpetuate the historic highlights of a symphony orchestra. The plan is to take outstanding pages from the ponderous Symphony Hall scrapbooks and photograph them in micro-film. Later, positive prints on transparent celluloid can be projected and enlarged in a hooded machine which looks like a cross between a peep show and a miniature of Edison's "Black Maria." Thus, 15 years of Koussevitzky history—reported in 7,500 columns of newspaper comment—can be reduced to 400 feet of film. The great advantage of this "boiling down," besides portability, is that the records are saved from the onslaughts of time, dust, and heat—to which the most impregnable scrap books are not impervious.

Can Be "Blown Up"

Besides being printed on transparent positives, the miniature film negatives can also be "blown up" into enlarged prints for reading or even for future newspaper reproduction.

Armed with a number of these enlargements, a Symphony Hall envoy and the writer plowed through the snowdrifts on a recent afternoon to Dr. Koussevitzky's home in Brookline with the purpose of finding out what the conductor might say about them.

The old clippings showed that even before Dr. Koussevitzky had arrived for his first Boston concert on Oct. 10, 1924, advance reports had stirred the imaginations of American editors. For one thing, he was the world's only Russian conductor. For another, he had encouraged the moderns, even the "demons of dissonance," as Philip Hale called them. Furthermore, Dr. Koussevitzky had said a kind word for jazz. This was picked up, quoted—and misquoted—far and wide until some readers must have gained the impression that the newcomer would conduct with a saxophone clinging to his neck. He was described as "the lightning conductor," the conductor of "volcanic temperament. . . ."

"The Russian invasion begins!" shouted one prankish headline.

Wide Range of Interests

Philip Hale, going over the conductor's Paris concerts from 1921-23, found, however, that they revealed a catholicity of taste rather than a complete devotion to any one "school." Here, side by side, were Scriabin, Bach, Moussorgsky, Haydn, Prokofieff, Brahms, Stravinsky, Debussy, Honneger, Beethoven, Borodin, and Weber. It is a curious reflection upon Parisian taste that Dr. Koussevitzky introduced to the audiences of that highly intellectual city the Brahms Fourth Symphony—and this was scarcely more than 10 years ago!

But perhaps it is not too difficult to see why the women of the Friday afternoon series awaited Dr. Koussevitzky's first program with anticipation, perhaps some trepidation—a little fiddling with gloves and patting of bonnets. Even Symphony Hall felt it necessary to issue a statement of his good intent to calm Bostonian apprehension.

Their concern was to a large degree unfounded. The orchestra played Vivaldi's Concerto for Organ and Orchestra; Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" Overture; Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydn; Honneger's "Pacific 231" and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy." It was typical of Koussevitzky's catholicity in program making.

Conductor Looks Back

Dr. Koussevitzky, seated in a dull red rocking chair hard by a table on which stood a beautiful 16th century Russian ikon, smiled at the reminders of his "invasion."

"I was considered ultra-modern," he said, "because I gave the first performances in Paris of certain modern composers' works. So they said: 'Ah, Koussevitzky is an apostle of this modern school.' But I have continued to be interested in the new composers. And those composers who were once revolutionary have changed. Stravinsky, for instance. His latest concerto is in Bach's style—but in Stravinsky's own language."

Dr. Koussevitzky was asked why the Brahms Fourth had never been played in Paris before his arrival.

"The French like the original, not the emotional," he said. "When you read a Brahms score, you find the score itself not original. Brahms's music is the interpretation of the great music of Bach, Beethoven, even of Mozart. What is original in Brahms is the emotion. When a conductor understands and interprets Brahms, the public will not realize that the music itself is unoriginal. The French like Schumann, but not Brahms. And that may account for some critics, too," he added with a smile.

Musicians Persuaded

Even some of his musicians did not like Brahms when they first played his music.

"But now they adore him," said the conductor, raising his hands and his eyes.

Dr. Koussevitzky's eyes are the most remarkable feature of his face. They shine always with enthusiasm and when he becomes particularly moved or excited, they widen. His hands, which he uses a good deal when speaking, move with strong, easy grace. He is a slight man, smaller than one would expect from seeing him on the platform. He talks slowly, deliberately for the most part, so that his accent is not confusing if one listens intently. Occasionally, he hesitates for a word. Once during the interview he asked for help from his secretary. But usually, he finds his own expression.

Dr. Koussevitzky, who has conducted in Russia (at the age of 12), France, Germany, Austria, England, Spain and other countries, considered the question of musical taste here and abroad.

American Advantage

"America has not the tradition which one finds in Europe," he said. "That is why America can grow more quickly. For example, Germany traditionally hates new music: It takes an extraordinary time and work to play new music in Germany. In 1912, I attended a Brahms festival at Wiesbaden. The public was completely divided. Even today, the war in Germany between Brahms's admirers and Wagner's admirers is still going on. Germany took 50 years to accept Wagner. America accepted Wagner right away. The Germans think that German music is the highest and the best. They don't want to hear any other. Sibelius is unknown in Germany. In France there is a highly cultivated musical minority, which is extremely open-minded, but musical culture is not a thing of the masses."

Dr. Koussevitzky told about "one of the greatest German conductors" whom he visited backstage not long ago after a concert in Paris. The conductor said he had been asked to play a Sibelius symphony and as he did not know any of them, would Dr. Koussevitzky suggest one that would be "interesting?"

"I told him that all seven were "interesting," said Dr. Koussevitzky.

Masses Better Educated

"The masses in America are musically much better educated than the masses in any other country—

(Continued on Page 11, Column 3)

Koussevitzky Ca

(Continued from Page 9)

even Germany," he continued. "Most people in American audiences desire new music. What a change in the last 10 years! New York I find more conservative in its tastes than Boston, but perhaps that is because the tradition among Boston Symphony conductors has always been to introduce new music. The Boston audience is the best audience in the world even when, sometimes, it rubs its palms together and thinks it is giving you an ovation."

Speaking of the old and the new reminded the conductor of Bach, whom he considers one of the most "modern" composers who has ever written. Bach was writing dissonances long before the moderns had ever discovered the word.

"But Bach wrote dissonances because he must pursue a certain melodic line. If the pursuance of that line required a G flat to be played beside a G, that would not stop Bach. And, always, the resolution of harmonies was right.

"Wagner borrowed from Bach. The whole of 'Parsifal' is based on two measures found in the Matthew Passion. And Bach, himself, borrowed from such composers as Schütz, who was writing fine religious music a hundred years before Bach's time."

Festival Programs

Besides pioneering in modern fields during his 15 years' incumbency, Dr. Koussevitzky has paid due respect to the older composers with special festival programs dedicated to Brahms, Tchaikovsky, Bach, Beethoven, Schubert and Haydn.

This year, he will increase the amount of Beethoven and Sibelius on his programs.

"As for new music," he said, "I am going to introduce the youngest generation of American composers. We will play pieces by William Schuman, Robert McBride, David Diamond, and Charles Naginski. I will also play Hill, Berezovsky, Copland, Piston, Hindemith, Stravinsky, Prokofieff, Harris, and others."

Dr. Koussevitzky feels that music today is moving away from the complexity which characterized it from the time of Wagner, Berlioz, and Liszt up to the period of Strauss and the early Scriabin. He considers the music of Debussy a reaction to this complexity, because "Debussy, in orchestration, returned to simplicity."

Scriabin's Status

The conductor, who has been called the greatest interpreter of Scriabin and who once fought valiantly for the recognition of that composer's music, was asked about Scriabin's decline in popularity.

"Scriabin is still a very fine composer," he said, after a moment's pause. "People forget a little but I am sure Scriabin's time will come again. Now, I must say, I lose something. I have not the same contact with his music. I have satisfaction more from other music. I probably played too much Scriabin when I was younger."

Dr. Koussevitzky regards Stravinsky as "already a classic." Hindemith and Prokofieff he calls "the most interesting writers today."

Tomorrow evening, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra entrain for the annual "western" tour. They will visit Rochester, Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Toledo, Cleveland, and Pittsburgh. It seemed opportune to ask him of the relationship of music to democracy.

"Ah, that is a very deep question," he said. "So far, democracy has failed the arts — in France, in England, even in America. As strongly as I am opposed to all forms of autocracy, I must say that it is the kings and courts who have endowed music. But in democracy, there might be the greatest hope for the future."

CLEVELAND, O.
NEWS

NOV 22 1938

Encores at Severance

MANY Cleveland symphony lovers are buzzing over the two encores the pianist, Jan Smeterlin gave at his concert last week, since encores at a symphony recital are outside the classic tradition.

In meticulous and musical Boston, for instance, it is tradition that no soloist with the Boston Symphony gives encores except Paderewski. Frederick Stock got raised eyebrows in Chicago by experimenting with liberal encores. The theory of the symphony lover is that a balanced program for an orchestra's evening recital has the same valence as the correct recipe for a good cake; add ingredients impulsively and ruin the cake.

Artur Rodzinski has given quite a number of symphony encores on occasions when he felt the program could stand it. He would be classed as a liberal on the issue, hardly a radical. The fact is that before last week's concerts Dr. Rodzinski told Mr. Smeterlin that an encore would be all right if the audience seemed in the mood (which it was, for Mr. Smeterlin can play Chopin!).

WILLIMANTIC, CONN.
CHRONICLE

NOV 26 1938

* * *

Eugene Goossens, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, commented on his return from Europe that the present disturbed condition of the world has hampered musical composition. He complained that few works are being written which deserve to be ranked as masterpieces.

Goossens said that while great upheavals tend to produce great music when they have died down and artists are able to retire into a calm, creative atmosphere, the present upheaval is a continuing process that gives no interlude for contemplation.

Goossens praised the quality of contemporary English composition, which he feels has been unduly neglected. One of the new works which he has brought back is a "Variation on the Theme of Frank Bridges," by Benjamin Bridges, young English composer.

After conducting the Boston Symphony in New York this week, Goossen returns to Cincinnati for his regular season.

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

NOV 25 1938

Goossens Selects Legend Of Marlowe For His Faust; Interest Revived In Boston

SPECIAL DISPATCH TO THE ENQUIRER.

Boston, Mass., November 24—Inspiration for a modern opera based on the Marlowe legend of Dr. Faustus, which was disrupted by the tense atmosphere of Europe during the late summer and early autumn, was revived here in Boston for Eugene Goossens, noted conductor and composer, he revealed tonight.

Goossens, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra and guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week end, declared the Boston Federal Theater presentation of the Marlowe legend in the Copley Theater had revived his interest in the opera for which he already has written part of the music.

That more of the music has not been written, he said, may be traced to the war tension of the early autumn in Paris. He went there he said, to concentrate on music and to compose, but was startled to find that the house he and Mrs. Goossens had rented was between the home of Premier Daladier of France and the Italian embassy.

"Even if one pulled down the blinds, it was impossible to shut out the tension," he explained. "It was impossible to concentrate on musical composition when all over the city were weeping women seeing their sons or husbands off to war duty."

Goossens revealed his plan to write an experimental opera on the Faust legend, for which he hopes to compose psychological music which will reflect the moods and emotions of the protagonists. There were no set arias for prima donnas, for Goossens said he will have the orchestra carry the burden of the musical end of the opera, with the singers to project the English and to do the acting.

For some time, the composer indicated he had been interested in writing a new Faust, but could not make up his mind whether to employ the Goethe or the Marlowe legends.

Skillful use of the Marlowe version by the Federal Theater presentation, which he and Mrs. Goossens attended, caused him to decide on that, he said.

The simplicity and artistry of the local presentation, particularly utilization of lighting devices to effect changes of scenes and moods, he said, made so great an impression on him he invited the adapter and director, Eliot Duvey, to visit him in the Copley-Plaza today so he might congratulate him.

"Simple lighting effects might be used to great advantage in opera, if one had enterprise enough," he said. "Just imagine a new Faust on daring lines."

The Goossens European vacation was not completely fruitless, however, for in addition to several sketches for the new Faust, he composed two of four movements for a new symphony.

"I am a late romantic—or perhaps I should say a near romantic," he said, referring to his musical taste, but women present raised eyebrows, for the youthful composer-conductor looks like Hollywood's conception of the romantic gentleman.

Goossens is handsome, speaks with a British accent, and wears smartly-tailored Bond Street clothes.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
POST - STANDARD

NOV 20 1938

New Phonograph Recordings

BY WILLIAM HENRY TUCKLEY

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY is one of the ~~most~~ enthusiastic exponents of the music of Jean Sibelius and many of the Finnish composer's works have had their first American performance under the direction of the Boston conductor.

It was, therefore, quite fitting that the Victor company should entrust the recording of the Sibelius Fifth Symphony to Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra. The task could not have been in more capable or sympathetic hands.

The Symphony was written and first performed abroad in 1915, during the world war, but it was re-written and condensed, the final revision being completed in 1919. Its American premier occurred in Philadelphia under Stokowski two years later, and Mr. Koussevitzky played it the same season.

Like much of the Sibelius music, the Symphony is vital and arresting thematically and there is decided vigor in the rhythmic patterns. The second movement is agreeably placid and the intensity of the other sections is modified occasionally by an atmosphere of mysticism provided by strings in the higher register.

The same Album, M 474, also contains another Sibelius score, "Pohjolas Daughter," a more descriptive work inspired by two cantos from the great Finnish epic "Kalevala." It was written about 1906 when the composer was interested in "program" music, but it is colorful and impressive even without the story.

Courtesy Symphony Hall; Richard Tucker; By a Staff Photographer

Scenes at Symphony Hall in Boston

1. Instead of rapping with the baton on his music stand, Dr. Koussevitzky raises his arm quietly to signal the musicians to attention. 2. "Dolce. . . ." 3. "Stac-catto! ! ! !" 4. "Singen . . . Let it sing . . ." 5. "Più piano possibile. . . ." 6. The conductor's hand is quicker than the camera's eye. Although his face is calm, Dr. Koussevitzky's hands move with lightning speed and drive. An exciting moment in Beethoven's "Fifth." 7. "More tone, violas. . . ." 8. Compiler of the Symphony's current newspaper history shows the contrast between old and new styles of keeping records. A whole page of scrapbook can be reduced to a picture about the size of a special delivery stamp. 9. Studying history in a peep show. The projection machine in which transparent positives are shown. 10. Enlarged images are projected from the spool of film above onto the screen below.

Film Records Koussevitzky's Boston Career

By John D. Beaufort

Staff Writer of The Christian Science Monitor

Behind one of those mysteriously noncommittal doors that run along the first balcony corridors of Symphony Hall, a glamorous 15 years of musical history is being prepared for recording on film. The history was written by Serge Koussevitzky with the pen point of an eloquent baton. It was recorded by dozens of industrious newspaper critics and reporters. And now, its events are being reduced to the size of postage stamps for preservation and for posterity.

Symphony officials say that this is the first time that the new film recording device has been used to perpetuate the historic highlights of a symphony orchestra. The plan is to take outstanding pages from the ponderous Symphony Hall scrapbooks and photograph them in micro-film. Later, positive prints on transparent celluloid can be projected and enlarged in a hooded machine which looks like a cross between a peep show and a miniature of Edison's "Black Maria." Thus, 15 years of Koussevitzky history—reported in 7,500 columns of newspaper comment—can be reduced to 400 feet of film. The great advantage of this "boiling down," besides portability, is that the records are saved from the onslaughts of time, dust, and heat—to which the most impregnable scrap books are not impervious.

Can Be "Blown Up"

Besides being printed on transparent positives, the miniature film negatives can also be "blown up" into enlarged prints for reading or even for future newspaper reproduction.

Armed with a number of these enlargements, a Symphony Hall envoy and the writer plowed through the snowdrifts on a recent afternoon to Dr. Koussevitzky's home in Brookline with the purpose of finding out what the conductor might say about them.

The old clippings showed that even before Dr. Koussevitzky had arrived for his first Boston concert on Oct. 10, 1924, advance reports had stirred the imaginations of American editors. For one thing, he was the world's only Russian conductor. For another, he had encouraged the moderns, even the "demons of dissonance," as Philip Hale called them. Furthermore, Dr. Koussevitzky had said a kind word for jazz. This was picked up, quoted—and misquoted—far and wide until some readers must have gained the impression that the newcomer would conduct with a saxophone clinging to his neck. He was described as "the lightning conductor," the conductor of "volcanic temperament. . . ."

"The Russian invasion begins!" shouted one prankish headline.

Wide Range of Interests

Philip Hale, going over the conductor's Paris concerts from 1921-23, found, however, that they revealed a catholicity of taste rather than a complete devotion to any one "school." Here, side by side, were Scriabin, Bach, Moussorgsky, Haydn, Prokofieff, Brahms, Stravinsky, Debussy, Honneger, Beethoven, Borodin, and Weber. It is a curious reflection upon Parisian taste that Dr. Koussevitzky introduced to the audiences of that highly intellectual city the Brahms Fourth Symphony—and this was scarcely more than 10 years ago!

But perhaps it is not too difficult to see why the women of the Friday afternoon series awaited Dr. Koussevitzky's first program with anticipation, perhaps some trepidation—a little fiddling with gloves and patting of bonnets. Even Symphony Hall felt it necessary to issue a statement of his good intent to calm Bostonian apprehension.

Their concern was to a large degree unfounded. The orchestra played Vivaldi's Concerto for Organ and Orchestra; Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" Overture; Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydn; Honneger's "Pacific 231" and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy." It was typical of Koussevitzky's catholicity in program making.

Conductor Looks Back

Dr. Koussevitzky, seated in a dull red rocking chair hard by a table on which stood a beautiful 16th century Russian ikon, smiled at the reminders of his "invasion."

"I was considered ultra-modern," he said, "because I gave the first performances in Paris of certain modern composers' works. So they said: 'Ah, Koussevitzky is an apostle of this modern school.' But I have continued to be interested in the new composers. And those composers who were once revolutionary have changed. Stravinsky, for instance. His latest concerto is in Bach's style—but in Stravinsky's own language."

Dr. Koussevitzky was asked why the Brahms Fourth had never been played in Paris before his arrival.

"The French like the original, not the emotional," he said. "When you read a Brahms score, you find the score itself not original. Brahms's music is the interpretation of the great music of Bach, Beethoven, even of Mozart. What is original in Brahms is the emotion. When a conductor understands and interprets Brahms, the public will not realize that the music itself is unoriginal. The French like Schumann, but not Brahms. And that may account for some critics, too," he added with a smile.

Musicians Persuaded

Even some of his musicians did not like Brahms when they first played his music.

"But now they adore him," said the conductor, raising his hands and his eyes.

Dr. Koussevitzky's eyes are the most remarkable feature of his face. They shine always with enthusiasm and when he becomes particularly moved or excited, they widen. His hands, which he uses a good deal when speaking, move with strong, easy grace. He is a slight man, smaller than one would expect from seeing him on the platform. He talks slowly, deliberately for the most part, so that his accent is not confusing if one listens intently. Occasionally, he hesitates for a word. Once during the interview he asked for help from his secretary. But usually, he finds his own expression.

Dr. Koussevitzky, who has conducted in Russia (at the age of 12), France, Germany, Austria, England, Spain and other countries, considered the question of musical taste here and abroad.

American Advantage

"America has not the tradition which one finds in Europe," he said. "That is why America can grow more quickly. For example, Germany traditionally hates new music. It takes an extraordinary time and work to play new music in Germany. In 1912, I attended a Brahms festival at Wiesbaden. The public was completely divided. Even today, the war in Germany between Brahms's admirers and Wagner's admirers is still going on. Germany took 50 years to accept Wagner. America accepted Wagner right away. The Germans think that German music is the highest and the best. They don't want to hear any other. Sibelius is unknown in Germany. In France there is a highly cultivated musical minority, which is extremely open-minded, but musical culture is not a thing of the masses."

Dr. Koussevitzky told about "one of the greatest German conductors" whom he visited backstage not long ago after a concert in Paris. The conductor said he had been asked to play a Sibelius symphony and as he did not know any of them, would Dr. Koussevitzky suggest one that would be "interesting?"

"I told him that all seven were "interesting," said Dr. Koussevitzky.

Masses Better Educated

"The masses in America are musically much better educated than the masses in any other country—

(Continued on Page 11, Column 3)

Koussevitzky Career Filmed

(Continued from Page 9)

even Germany," he continued. "Most people in American audiences desire new music. What a change in the last 10 years! New York I find more conservative in its tastes than Boston, but perhaps that is because the tradition among Boston Symphony conductors has always been to introduce new music. The Boston audience is the best audience in the world even when, sometimes, it rubs its palms together and thinks it is giving you an ovation."

Speaking of the old and the new reminded the conductor of Bach, whom he considers one of the most "modern" composers who has ever written. Bach was writing dissonances long before the moderns had ever discovered the word.

"But Bach wrote dissonances because he must pursue a certain melodic line. If the pursuance of that line required a G flat to be played beside a G, that would not stop Bach. And, always, the resolution of harmonies was right.

"Wagner borrowed from Bach. The whole of 'Parsifal' is based on two measures found in the Matthew Passion. And Bach, himself, borrowed from such composers as Schütz, who was writing fine religious music a hundred years before Bach's time."

Festival Programs

Besides pioneering in modern fields during his 15 years' incumbency, Dr. Koussevitzky has paid due respect to the older composers with special festival programs dedicated to Brahms, Tchaikovsky, Bach, Beethoven, Schubert and Haydn.

This year, he will increase the amount of Beethoven and Sibelius on his programs.

"As for new music," he said, "I am going to introduce the youngest generation of American composers. We will play pieces by William Schuman, Robert McBride, David Diamond, and Charles Naginski. I will also play Hill, Berezovsky, Copland, Piston, Hindemith, Stravinsky, Prokofieff, Harris, and others."

Dr. Koussevitzky feels that music today is moving away from the complexity which characterized it from the time of Wagner, Berlioz, and Liszt up to the period of Strauss and the early Scriabin. He considers the music of Debussy a reaction to this complexity, because "Debussy, in orchestration, returned to simplicity."

Scriabin's Status

The conductor, who has been called the greatest interpreter of Scriabin and who once fought valiantly for the recognition of that composer's music, was asked about Scriabin's decline in popularity.

"Scriabin is still a very fine composer," he said, after a moment's pause. "People forget a little but I am sure Scriabin's time will come again. Now, I must say, I lose something. I have not the same contact with his music. I have satisfaction more from other music. I probably played too much Scriabin when I was younger."

Dr. Koussevitzky regards Stravinsky as "already a classic." Hindemith and Prokofieff he calls "the most interesting writers today."

Tomorrow evening, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra entrain for the annual "western" tour. They will visit Rochester, Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Toledo, Cleveland, and Pittsburgh. It seemed opportune to ask him of the relationship of music to democracy.

"Ah, that is a very deep question," he said. "So far, democracy has failed the arts — in France, in England, even in America. As strongly as I am opposed to all forms of autocracy, I must say that it is the kings and courts who have endowed music. But in democracy, there might be the greatest hope for the future."

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
POST - STANDARD

NOV 20 1938

New Phonograph Recordings

BY WILLIAM HENRY TUCKLEY

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY is one of the ~~most~~ enthusiastic exponents of the music of Jean Sibelius and many of the Finnish composer's works have had their first American performance under the direction of the Boston conductor.

It was, therefore, quite fitting that the Victor company should entrust the recording of the Sibelius Fifth Symphony to Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra. The task could not have been in more capable or sympathetic hands.

The Symphony was written and first performed abroad in 1915, during the world war, but it was re-written and condensed, the final revision being completed in 1919. Its American premier occurred in Philadelphia under Stokowski two years later, and Mr. Koussevitzky played it the same season.

Like much of the Sibelius music, the Symphony is vital and arresting thematically and there is decided vigor in the rhythmic patterns. The second movement is agreeably placid and the intensity of the other sections is modified occasionally by an atmosphere of mysticism provided by strings in the higher register.

The same Album, M 474, also contains another Sibelius score, "Pohjolas Daughter," a more descriptive work inspired by two cantos from the great Finnish epic "Kalevala." It was written about 1906 when the composer was interested in "program" music, but it is colorful and impressive even without the story.

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

NOV 25 1938

Goossens Selects Legend Of Marlowe For His Faust; Interest Revived In Boston

SPECIAL DISPATCH TO THE ENQUIRER.

Boston, Mass., November 24—Inspiration for a modern opera based on the Marlowe legend of Dr. Faustus, which was disrupted by the tense atmosphere of Europe during the late summer and early autumn, was revived here in Boston for Eugene Goossens, noted conductor and composer, he revealed tonight.

Goossens, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra and guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week end, declared the Boston Federal Theater presentation of the Marlowe legend in the Copley Theater had revived his interest in the opera for which he already has written part of the music.

That more of the music has not been written, he said, may be traced to the war tension of the early autumn in Paris. He went there he said, to concentrate on music and to compose, but was startled to find that the house he and Mrs. Goossens had rented was between the home of Premier Daladier of France and the Italian embassy.

"Even if one pulled down the blinds, it was impossible to shut out the tension," he explained. "It was impossible to concentrate on musical composition when all over the city were weeping women seeing their sons or husbands off to war duty."

Goossens revealed his plan to write an experimental opera on the Faust legend, for which he hopes to compose psychological music which will reflect the moods and emotions of the protagonists. There were no set arias for prima donnas, for Goossens said he will have the orchestra carry the burden of the musical end of the opera, with the singers to project the English and to do the acting.

For some time, the composer indicated he had been interested in writing a new Faust, but could not make up his mind whether to employ the Goethe or the Marlowe legends.

Skillful use of the Marlowe version by the Federal Theater presentation, which he and Mrs. Goossens attended, caused him to decide on that, he said.

The simplicity and artistry of the local presentation, particularly utilization of lighting devices to effect changes of scenes and moods, he said, made so great an impression on him he invited the adapter and director, Eliot Duvey, to visit him in the Copley-Plaza today so he might congratulate him.

"Simple lighting effects might be used to great advantage in opera, if one had enterprise enough," he said. "Just imagine a new Faust on daring lines."

The Goossens European vacation was not completely fruitless, however, for in addition to several sketches for the new Faust, he composed two of four movements for a new symphony.

"I am a late romantic—or perhaps I should say a near romantic," he said, referring to his musical taste, but women present raised eyebrows, for the youthful composer-conductor looks like Hollywood's conception of the romantic gentleman.

Goossens is handsome, speaks with a British accent, and wears smartly-tailored Bond Street clothes.

CLEVELAND, O.
NEWS

NOV 22 1938

Encores at Severance

MANY Cleveland symphony lovers are buzzing over the two encores the pianist, Jan Smeterlin gave at his concert last week, since encores at a symphony recital are outside the classic tradition.

In meticulous and musical Boston, for instance, it is tradition that no soloist with the Boston Symphony gives encores except Paderewski. Frederick Stock got raised eyebrows in Chicago by experimenting with liberal encores. The theory of the symphony lover is that a balanced program for an orchestra's evening recital has the same valence as the correct recipe for a good cake; add ingredients impulsively and ruin the cake.

Artur Rodzinski has given quite a number of symphony encores on occasions when he felt the program could stand it. He would be classed as a liberal on the issue, hardly a radical. The fact is that before last week's concerts Dr. Rodzinski told Mr. Smeterlin that an encore would be all right if the audience seemed in the mood (which it was, for Mr. Smeterlin can play Chopin!).

WILLIMANTIC, CONN.
CHRONICLE

NOV 26 1938

* * *

Eugene Goossens, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, commented on his return from Europe that the present disturbed condition of the world has hampered musical composition. He complained that few works are being written which deserve to be ranked as masterpieces.

Goossens said that while great upheavals tend to produce great music when they have died down and artists are able to retire into a calm, creative atmosphere, the present upheaval is a continuing process that gives no interlude for contemplation.

Goossens praised the quality of contemporary English composition, which he feels has been unduly neglected. One of the new works which he has brought back is a and Mrs. Lolie Crosby of New Lon-

DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS

NOV 20 1938

Modern Music Included on Symphony's Program

Offering a program of old and new music, the Detroit Symphony Orchestra will play the third subscription concert of its current silver jubilee season Thursday evening in Orchestra Hall.

Franco Ghione, conductor, has selected Schumann's Overture to "Manfred," Op. 155; Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, in A Major, Op. 92; Barbara Giuranna's Toccata (first performance in America) and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exposition," piano pieces arranged for orchestra by Maurice Ravel. Although the orchestra has played Leo Funtek's orchestration of this work, Ravel's version of it will be heard for the first time at these concerts.

Miss Giuranna, one of Italy's foremost women composers, is a faculty member of the Rome Conservatory. She has written numerous compositions, among them several prize winners. Last year the orchestra, under Ghione, performed her Symphonic Poem, "X. Legio."

The Toccata was written in 1937 and given its world premiere last April under Ghione's baton at the Augusteo in Rome. It is a seven-minute work employing modern instrumentation. It possesses a sharp sense of dynamics, excellent thematic material and a fine development. The performance here will be its second anywhere.

Pictures at an Exposition, written in 1874, and inspired by a posthumous exhibition of drawings and water colors by Moussorgsky's intimate friend, Victor Hartmann, is made up of 10 sections and an introduction, each a direct effort on the part of the composer to depict a work in the showing. As program music, Pictures at an Exposition ranks with the best of recent orchestral literature and is included in the repertory of nearly all orchestras. Ravel orchestrated the piano pieces some 15 years ago at the request of Serge Koussevitzky in Paris.

Beethoven's Seventh Symphony has been called the "Ideal Symphony." Without any title, it is purely musical expression of the composer's dominant mood. The work has sometimes been called "Romantic Symphony." It also has been characterized as a "Pastoral" and as another "Eroica."

"Manfred" is based on Byron's work of the same name and was composed in 1848, at a time when Schumann was extremely moved by the poem.

WHEELING, W. VA.
NEWS

NOV 20 1938

Current World Unrest Detrimental To Present Music, Conductor Says

EUGENE GOOSSENS, RETURNING FROM TRIP ABROAD, SEES DECLINE

New York, Nov. 19.—(UP)—Eugene Goossens, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony orchestra, said today that world unrest was restricting the flow of musical creation.

Goossens returned on the Queen Mary yesterday from a leave of absence abroad during which he acquired a number of new compositions by continental and English composers.

"With the recent widespread turbulence," he said, "I am afraid music will suffer a great deal, at least temporarily, and we will be deprived of possible great works that we might otherwise have enjoyed."

"The decline in the quality of musical compositions has been marked," he said, "and one encounters masterpieces less frequently than 10 years ago."

Goossens said, "these are not congenial times for composition," and pointed out that though "great upheavals bring musical creation," the composer must leave the center of unrest and work in "an atmosphere of mental and physical tranquility."

The conductor said he found England, contrary to the belief of many, was producing "more music of the creative sphere" than any other nation.

Goossens will direct the Boston Symphony next week and then go to Cincinnati to present several compositions during the remainder of the season.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat-Chronicle

NOV 20 1938

The World of Music

By The United Press

Memberships for the Berkshire Symphonic Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitsky at the new Tanglewood shed next year have been received from 13 states and Canada. Memberships have come from such distant states as Arkansas, California and Florida.

PORTCHESTER, N. Y.
ITEM

NOV 22 1938

Brahms' Composition Heard For 1st Time At Musicale In Rye

Arthur M. Abell Gives Lecture At Session Of Woman's Club Unit

Browsing among old music in Europe during the past Summer, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur M. Abell, of Hastings, found Brahms' Variations on the theme of Robert Schumann's "Ghost Concerta," and the playing of it yesterday at a meeting of the Music Section of the Woman's Club of Rye is thought to be the first in America. The music was played on the piano as a four-hand arrangement by Mrs. Abell and Mrs. Nelson M. Wells, augmenting a lecture on "Musical Experiences" delivered by Mr. Abell. The program was presented at the home of Mrs. Max S. Eckhardt, of Sterling Ridge, Harrison.

The music of the Variations was written in 1859, six years after Schumann had composed the concerto dedicated it to Joachim, the greatest violinist of the age. "The Ghose Concerto" itself was never performed here until last year, after, so the story goes, Joachim's niece had been told by a medium the hiding place of the concerto and had found it there.

Mr. Abell, who has had wide experiences in music as a critic and conductor to musical journals, considers, having heard Rubenstein play the piano his greatest musical impression. He spoke of the excellent tone of the playing, of the chords—"like a symphony orchestra" but never hard.

The only other pianist who has approached Rubenstein, in Mr. Abell's opinion, is Theodore Leschetizky, instructor of Paderewski, who attributed his famous pupil's success more to his great personality and will power than to his genius.

Telling of the long time it took to obtain recognition for Brahms, the speaker declared that the Hungarian Dances written in 1869 first attracted attention. Mrs. Abell and Mrs. Wells played "Hungarian Dance No. 8 in A Minor" for the audience yesterday.

Koussevitsky has made Boston Symphony Orchestra the finest in the world at the present time, Mr. Abel stated. He gave a brief outline of the conductor's life and told of the delightful experience he and Koussevitsky had shared in 1914 when in a chartered steamer they went along the Volga River, stopping off at communities of all sizes with the orchestra.

Richard Straus, who in Mr. Abell's opinion, is the most famous living composer, invited him to play in his orchestra, which he did for several months in Weimar, Germany. The program yesterday concluded with the play of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" by Mrs. Abell and Mrs. Wells.

At the tea which followed, Mrs. John R. Ferguson and Mrs. Julian B. Beaty poured.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
EXAMINER

NOV 20 1938

Boston Orchestra Plays Sibelius' Fifth Symphony

Orchestra programs indicate that this is to be a Sibelius year. And the Finnish master figures brilliantly on the new record lists, too.

In superb performances by Koussevitzky's great Boston Symphony, Victor issues Sibelius' Fifth Symphony and "Pohjola's Daughter." The Fifth is Sibelius at his best—grand, sweeping, somber, dramatic. Likewise a tempestuous legendary quality is vivid in the latter tone poem.

Among other recent discs:

Beethoven of the deeply forceful and human middle period is represented (Columbia) in his little-known Triple Concerto Opus 56. It is ably played by European artists: Violinist Odnoposoff, Cellist Auber and Pianist Angelica Morales with the Vienna Philharmonic under Weingartner.

Incisive colorful performance of three dances of DeFalla's "Three-Cornered Hat" features Arthur Fiedler's Boston "Pops" Orchestra (Victor).

Contralto Bruna Castagna, known here in opera, selects from "Carmen" (Victor) the carefree "Seguidilla" and the fateful "Card Song."

LOS ANGELES, CAL.
MORNING NEWS

NOV 22 1938

MUSIC

By

Dr. BRUNO DAVID USSHER

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, one of the foremost Sibelius conductors, has just made a new recording of this fifth symphony. One is genuinely beholden to him and the Boston Symphony for a performance of such caliber as the present.

From a standpoint of phonographic sound engineering this RCA Victor album M-474 likewise is outstanding. Victor has not always been lucky. But the gods of ancient Finland must have hovered around the mike and kept the wax especially even for the symphony as well as for that superbly imaginative tone poem "Pohjola's Daughter," forming part of this issue of discs.

* * *

VICTOR has supplemented the recording with exceptionally complete historic and descriptive annotations. Those on "Pohjola's Daughter" are the most complete I have ever seen. They show that this prehistoric daughter of the north was really a quite emancipated damsel.

She refuses the hand of one of the greatest heroes in the "Kalevala," replying archly to his wooing that a maiden at home is happier than a matron in a husband's house. There her state would be like that of "a house dog tightly fettered." She adds: "To a slave comes rarely pleasure, to wedded damsel never."

These few references may indicate the emotional compass of these composition. There will be more occasion for quoting Sibelius who admits "that it is impossible to define a religion —least of all in words. But perhaps music is a mirror." Not that either this E-flat major symphony or the tone poem are solemn or religious. Perhaps, as Sibelius stated himself, one should not label his symphonies. They are of today and for today, but they are rooted, like Undset's novels, in the gray beginnings of the north.

RADIO WEEKLY
NEW YORK, N. Y.

NOV 23 1938

Yorkville Record Store Finds Growing Demand For Classical Discs

The music of Wagner and Tschaikowsky are popular favorites with the Mielke clientele. Individual recording artists—Flagstad and Bjoerling among the singers, Horowitz, Gieseking, Hoffman and Rachmaninoff among the pianists, Menuhin and Heifetz among the violinists, and orchestra leaders such as Toscanini, Stokowski, Koussevitzki, Ormandy and Fiedler among the symphonic maestros — are consistent sellers.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

NOV 22 1938

OLD MASTERS AND MEXICANS HEARD IN DAY

Organist Howes in Recital; Chamber Society Program; Mercado Artists Perform

By GLENN DILLARD GUNN

Great organ works of Bach and some lesser masters, the most romantic of the Schubert chamber works, and a novelty and variety program by the Tipa Orchestra, of Mexiso, made a busy Monday for the critic.

Since Stokowski, Stock, Kindler and Koussevitzky began to add arrangements of the larger Bach organ compositions to the symphonic repertoire, opportunities to hear them in their original form have become rare; wherefore the community owes a debt of gratitude to Arthur Howes, F. A. G. O., organist of St. John's, for reviving such masterpieces as the "St. Anne" fugue, the allegro from the fifth sonata, two famous choral preludes and the G major fuge, at his recital last night.

Real Technique Heard

The beautiful Georgian church was filled with lovers of this music, many of them, I judged, Mr. Howe's colleagues. They heard a real technique of the organ, its manuals, pedals and the acoustic magic of its varied choirs. Not that the performer expended much of the latter resource on his Bach, which was presented in the original registration, or nearly so.

It was played with certain musical and mechanical advantages that Bach did not possess, however; such as the suave and true legato, the rhythmic accent, which no German organist had mastered, even in the late Nineteenth century, the facile contrasts of touch made available by the modern action. It was played, too, with restrained but sincere musical feeling and with that air of dignity fitting to the ecclesiastical setting.

Other items on this program included an attractive Psalm prelude by Howells, the brilliant finale from Vierne's first symphony and some lighter numbers by Karg-Elert.

The Schubert quintet for strings was the final number on the first program of the Washington Chamber Music Society's series in the Phillips Memorial Gallery, the city's most beautiful and intimate concert room. The performers engaged were Messrs. Schwartz and Sevely, violins; Hersh, viola, and Brennand and Feher, cellos. It is labeled Opus 163, which seems to indicate that Schubert wasted few of his 31 years.

It was played with great taste and with quite faultless ensemble, better, insofar as the latter asset was concerned, than on the occasion when I last heard it. Because of the distinction of the performers then engaged, I give their names: Nathan Milstein and Jacques Gordon, violins; Frederick Stock, viola, and Gregor Pitigorsky and Daniel Seidenberg, cellos. The guests of honor were Vladimir Horowitz and his bride, the daughter of Arturo Toscanini.

The ever-welcome Mexicans were Angell J. Mercado's popular specialists in South American and Spanish music. Their admirers filled Continental Hall, and the scholarship fund of Mt. Holyoke College Club benefitted. The Tipa Orchestra, no larger than some of our swing bands but gratefully different, employs many strange instruments, is satisfied with pleasant sounds and delicate rhythms, and tunes that go no deeper than obvious sentiment.

The program featured such composers as Mowrrey, Delgado, Lara, Lecuona, Tucci, Albenis, Merxado and Delfin, and ranged, geographically, from Argentina on the South to Mexico on the North, with a side journey or two to Spain. There were some gay and amusing dances by Josefina and Luis Ojeda, some brilliant songs by Lolita Valdez and Arturo Cortes, and an exciting solo on the saltero by Senorita Sarita. The audience was cordial.

DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS

8

NOV 20 1938

Modern Music Included on Symphony's Program

Offering a program of old and new music, the Detroit Symphony Orchestra will play the third subscription concert of its current silver jubilee season Thursday evening in Orchestra Hall.

Franco Ghione, conductor, has selected Schumann's Overture to "Manfred," Op. 155; Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, in A Major, Op. [illegible] Barbara Giuranna's Toccata (first performance in America) and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exposition," piano pieces arranged for orchestra by Maurice Ravel. Although the orchestra has played [illegible] Funtek's orchestration of this work, Ravel's version of it will be heard for the first time at these concerts.

Miss Giuranna, one of Italy's foremost women composers, is a faculty member of the Rome Conservatory. She has written numerous compositions, among them several prize winners. Last year the orchestra, under Ghione, performed her Symphonic Poem, "X. Legio."

The Toccata was written in 1937 and given its world premiere last April under Ghione's baton at the Augusteo in Rome. It is a seven-minute work employing modern instrumentation. It possesses a sharp sense of dynamics, excellent thematic material and a fine development. The performance here will be its second anywhere.

Pictures at an Exposition, written in 1874, and inspired by a posthumous exhibition of drawings and water colors by Moussorgsky's intimate friend, Victor Hartmann, is made up of 10 sections and an introduction, each a direct effort on the part of the composer to depict a work in the showing. As program music, Pictures at an Exposition ranks with the best of recent orchestral literature and is included in the repertory of nearly all orchestras. Ravel orchestrated the piano pieces some 15 years ago at the request of Serge Koussevitzky in Paris.

Beethoven's Seventh Symphony has been called the "Ideal Symphony." Without any title, it is purely musical expression of the composer's dominant mood. The work has sometimes been called "Romantic Symphony." It also has been characterized as a "Pastoral" and as another "Eroica."

"Manfred" is based on Byron's work of the same name and was composed in 1848, at a time when Schumann was extremely moved by the poem.

WHEELING, W. VA.
NEWS

NOV 20 1938

Current World Unrest Detrimental To Present Music, Conductor Says

EUGENE GOOSSENS, RETURNING FROM TRIP ABROAD, SEES DECLINE

New York, Nov. 1[illegible]—(UP)—Eugene Goossens, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony orchestra, said today that world unrest was restricting the flow of musical creation.

Goossens returned on the Queen Mary yesterday from a leave of absence abroad during which he acquired a number of new compositions by continental and English composers.

"With the recent widespread turbulence," he said, "I am afraid music will suffer a great deal, at least temporarily, and we will be deprived of possible great works that we might otherwise have enjoyed."

"The decline in the quality of musical compositions has been marked," he said, "and one encounters masterpieces less frequently than 10 years ago."

Goossens said, "these are not congenial times for composition," and pointed out that though "great upheavals bring musical creation," the composer must leave the center of unrest and work in "an atmosphere of mental and physical tranquility."

The conductor said he found England, contrary to the belief of many, was producing "more music of the creative sphere" than any other nation.

Goossens will direct the Boston Symphony next week and then go to Cincinnati to present several compositions during the remainder of the season.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat-Chronicle

NOV 20 1938

The World of Music

By The United Press

Memberships for the Berkshire Symphonic Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitsky at the new Tanglewood shed next year have been received from 12 states and Canada. Memberships have come from such distant states as Arkansas, California and Florida.

PORTCHESTER, N. Y.
ITEM

NOV 22 1938

Brahms Composition Heard For 1st Time At Musicale In Rye

Arthur M. Abell Gives Lecture At Session Of Woman's Club Unit

Browsing among old music in Europe during the past Summer, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur M. Abell, of Hastings, found Brahms' Variations on the theme of Robert Schumann's "Ghost Concerto," and the playing of it yesterday at a meeting of the Music Section of the Woman's Club of Rye is thought to be the first in America. The music was played on the piano as a four-hand arrangement by Mrs. Abell and Mrs. Nelson M. Wells, augmenting a lecture on "Musical Experiences" delivered by Mr. Abell. The program was presented at the home of Mrs. Max S. Eckhardt, of Starling Ridge, Harrison.

The music of the Variations was written in 1859, six years after Schumann had composed the concerto dedicated it to Joachim, the greatest violinist of the age. "The Ghost Concerto" itself was never performed here until last year, after, so the story goes, Joachim's niece had been told by a medium the hiding place of the concerto and had found it there.

Mr. Abell, who has had wide experiences in music as a critic and conductor to musical journals, considers, having heard Rubenstein play the piano his greatest musical impression. He spoke of the excellent tone of the playing of the chords—"like a symphony orchestra" but never hard.

The only other pianist who has approached Rubenstein, in Mr. Abell's opinion, is Theodore Leschetizky, instructor of Paderewski, who attributed his famous pupil's success more to his great personality and will power than to his genius.

Telling of the long time it took to obtain recognition for Brahms, the speaker declared that the Hungarian Dances written in 1869 first attracted attention. Mrs. Abell and Mrs. Wells played "Hungarian Dance No. 8 in A Minor" for the audience yesterday.

Koussevitsky has made Boston Symphony Orchestra the finest in the world at the present time, Mr. Abel stated. He gave a brief outline of the conductor's life and told of the delightful experience he and Koussevitsky had shared in 1914 when in a chartered steamer they went along the Volga River, stopping off at communities of all sizes with the orchestra.

Richard Straus, who in Mr. Abell's opinion, is the most famous living composer, invited him to play in his orchestra, which he did for several months in Weimar, Germany. The program yesterday concluded with the play of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" by Mrs. Abell and Mrs. Wells.

At the tea which followed, Mrs. John R. Ferguson and Mrs. Julian B. Beaty poured.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
EXAMINER

NOV 20 1938

Boston Orchestra Plays Sibelius' Fifth Symphony

Orchestra programs indicate that this is to be a Sibelius year. And the Finnish master figures brilliantly on the new record lists, too.

In superb performances by Koussevitzky's great Boston Symphony, Victor issues Sibelius' Fifth Symphony and "Pohjola's Daughter." The Fifth is Sibelius at his best—grand, sweeping, somber, dramatic. Likewise a tempestuous legendary quality is vivid in the latter tone poem.

Among other recent discs:

Beethoven of the deeply forceful and human middle period is represented (Columbia) in his little-known Triple Concerto, Opus 56. [illegible] artists: Violinist Odnoposoff, Cellist Auber and Pianist Angelica Morales with the Vienna Philharmonic under Weingartner.

Incisive colorful performance of three dances of DeFalla's "Three-Cornered Hat" features Arthur Fiedler's Boston "Pops" Orchestra (Victor).

Contralto Bruna Castagna, known here in opera, selects from "Carmen" (Victor) the carefree "Seguidilla" and the fateful "Card Song."

LOS ANGELES, CAL.
MORNING NEWS

NOV 22 1938

MUSIC

By

Dr. BRUNO DAVID USSHER

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, one of the foremost Sibelius conductors, has just made a new recording of this fifth symphony. One is genuinely beholden to him and the Boston Symphony for a performance of such caliber as the present.

From a standpoint of phonographic sound engineering this RCA Victor album M-474 likewise is outstanding. Victor has not always been lucky. But the gods of ancient Finland must have hovered around the mike and kept the wax especially even for the symphony as well as for that superbly imaginative tone poem "Pohjola's Daughter," forming part of this issue of discs.

* * *

VICTOR has supplemented the recording with exceptionally complete historic and descriptive annotations. Those on "Pohjola's Daughter" are the most complete I have ever seen. They show that this prehistoric daughter of the north was really a quite emancipated damsel.

She refuses the hand of one of the greatest heroes in the "Kalevala," replying archly to his wooing that a maiden at home is happier than a matron in a husband's house. There her state would be like that of "a house dog tightly fettered." She adds: "To a slave comes rarely pleasure, to wedded damsel never."

These few references may indicate the emotional compass of these composition. There will be more occasion for quoting Sibelius who admits "that it is impossible to define a religion—least of all in words. But perhaps music is a mirror." Not that either this E-flat major symphony or the tone poem are solemn or religious. Perhaps, as Sibelius stated himself, one should not label his symphonies. They are of today and for today, but they are rooted, like Undset's novels, in the gray beginnings of the north.

RADIO WEEKLY
NEW YORK, N. Y.

NOV 23 1938

Yorkville Record Store Finds Growing Demand For Classical Discs

The music of Wagner and Tschaikowsky are popular favorites with the Mielke clientele. Individual recording artists—Flagstad and Bjoerling among the singers, Horowitz, Gieseking, Hoffman and Rachmaninoff among the pianists, Menuhin and Heifetz among the violinists, and orchestra leaders such as Toscanini, Stokowski, Koussevitzki, Ormandy and Fiedler among the symphonic maestros—are consistent sellers.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

NOV 22 1938

OLD MASTERS AND MEXICANS HEARD IN DAY

Organist Howes in Recital; Chamber Society Program; Mercado Artists Perform

By GLENN DILLARD GUNN

Great organ works of Bach and some lesser masters, the most romantic of the Schubert chamber works, and a novelty and variety program by the Tipa Orchestra, of Mexiso, made a busy Monday for the critic.

Since Stokowski, Stock, Kindler and Koussevitzky began to add arrangements of the larger Bach organ compositions to the symphonic repertoire, opportunities to hear them in their original form have become rare; wherefore the community owes a debt of gratitude to Arthur Howes, F. A. G. O., organist of St. John's, for reviving such masterpieces as the "St. Anne" fugue, the allegro from the fifth sonata, two famous choral preludes and the G major fuge, at his recital last night.

Real Technique Heard

The beautiful Georgian church was filled with lovers of this music, many of them, I judged, Mr. Howe's colleagues. They heard a real technique of the organ, its manuals, pedals and the acoustic magic of its varied choirs. Not that the performer expended much of the latter resource on his Bach, which was presented in the original registration, or nearly so.

It was played with certain musical and mechanical advantages that Bach did not possess, however; such as the suave and true legato, the rhythmic accent, which no German organist had mastered, even in the late Nineteenth century, the facile contrasts of touch made available by the modern action. It was played, too, with restrained but sincere musical feeling and with that air of dignity fitting to the ecclesiastical setting.

Other items on this program included an attractive Psalm prelude by Howells, the brilliant finale from Vierne's first symphony and some lighter numbers by Karg-Elert.

The Schubert quintet for strings was the final number on the first program of the Washington Chamber Music Society's series in the Phillips Memorial Gallery, the city's most beautiful and intimate concert room. The performers engaged were Messrs. Schwartz and Sevely, violins; Hersh, viola, and Brennand and Feher, cellos. It is labeled Opus 163, which seems to indicate that Schubert wasted few of his 31 years.

It was played with great taste and with quite faultless ensemble, better, insofar as the latter asset was concerned, than on the occasion when I last heard it. Because of the distinction of the performers then engaged, I give their names: Nathan Milstein and Jacques Gordon, violins; Frederick Stock, viola, and Gregor Pitigorsky and Daniel Seidenberg, cellos. The guests of honor were Vladimir Horowitz and his bride, the daughter of Arturo Toscanini.

The ever-welcome Mexicans were Angell J. Mercado's popular specialists in South American and Spanish music. Their admirers filled Continental Hall, and the scholarship fund of Mt. Holyoke College Club benefitted. The Tipa Orchestra, no larger than some of our swing bands but gratefully different, employs many strange instruments, is satisfied with pleasant sounds and delicate rhythms, and tunes that go no deeper than obvious sentiment.

The program featured such composers as Mowrrey, Delgado, Lara, Lecuona, Tucci, Albenis, Merxado and Delfin, and ranged, geographically, from Argentina on the South to Mexico on the North, with a side journey or two to Spain. There were some gay and amusing dances by Josefina and Luis Ojeda, some brilliant songs by Lolita Valdez and Arturo Cortes, and an exciting solo on the saltero by Senorita Sarita. The audience was cordial.

CINCINNATI, O.
POST

NOV 24 1938

Music on the Disc

November Record Releases
A Feast for Which To Be Thankful

Tying in nicely with the Thanksgiving season comes a list of November record releases that gives music lovers much for which to be thankful. Toscanini, Koussevitsky and Goossens are among the conductors; Sibelius, Rimsky-Korsakow and Bach are among the composers; the Boston Symphony, the London Symphony, Jussi Bjoerling and Marian Anderson are among the performing artists. One couldn't ask for much more in the way of a musical feast. The "piece de resistance" is none other than:

SIBELIUS, SYMPHONY NO. 5 in E Flat Major (Op. 82), played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky. A Victor Musical Masterpiece album containing five 12-inch records, nine sides of which are devoted to the Symphony, and the tenth side to a short work by Sibelius, a tone poem entitled "Pohjola's Daughter" (Op. 49).

This particular recording is being hailed as one of the finest, most outstanding, that the Victor Company has ever released in its long history. Certainly all of the elements that make for a great recording are in it. Sibelius is commanding more attention from the American public today than any other composer, living or dead. Many say that he is incomparably the greatest composer since Beethoven, and some of the most exacting critics go even further and say that he is a greater composer than Beethoven. The Fifth Symphony is one of his very greatest works, and is one of the most popular, as well. The Boston Symphony is one of the world's finest orchestras; Dr. Koussevitsky is the foremost interpreter of Sibelius' works; and the recording was made in Boston's Symphony Hall whose acoustical properties are unexcelled. Out of this combination could only come a superlative masterpiece, and in this recording you have it! It is grandeur in wax!

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST - GAZETTE

NOV 26 1938

Serge Koussevitzky will bring the ~~Boston Symphony~~ Orchestra to Pittsburgh for two performances, December 10 and 11, at Syria Mosque. The concerts will be given under auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association. Jesus Maria Sanroma, Puerto Rican pianist, will play the Ravel Concerto with the orchestra.

Free Organ Recitals.

Dr. Caspar Koch will be heard in the usual free organ recital to be given in Northside Carnegie Hall at 3 o'clock tomorrow afternoon. Mary E. Friedel, soprano, will be the guest soloist, with Janet Spaugh Fischer at the piano. The program follows:

Overture to Martha	Flotow
Adagio from Clarinet Concerto	Mozart
Fugue in G Minor	Bach
Soprano solos—
(a) L'Insana Parola	Verdi
(b) Romanza	Mascagni
Reve Angelique	Rubinstein
Elfin Dance	Edmundson

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL - COURIER

NOV 25 1938

Musical Moments

By BEN ROUNDS

Simonds and Pernel Monday Night

Having achieved notable success in their first two recitals of Beethoven sonatas for piano and violin, Bruce Simonds, popular local pianist, and Miss Orrea Pernel, distinguished English violinist, will appear in Sprague Memorial Hall Monday evening in the concluding event of the series. Four of the greatest compositions of the master Beethoven will be heard upon the forthcoming occasion, and bring to a close a trio of performances that will rank with the finest ever presented on the local concert platform.

Both Mr. Simonds and Miss Pernel have made enviable reputations for themselves in the world of fine music. The former of course has been heard here many times, and each succeeding appearance adds to his retinue of admirers. While his duties as a faculty member of the Yale School of Music do not permit lengthy concert tours, upon occasion he appears in New York, Boston and other of the country's musical centers with well merited success. Miss Pernel is reckoned as one of the finest violinists England has sent to these shores in many years. In addition to numerous solo appearances she has made a host of friends as soloist with the Boston Symphony and other leading American orchestral organizations, including the New Haven Symphony Orchestra.

Another large and enthusiastic audience will greet the two fine artists here on Monday evening and hear a program that will be long remembereded by its auditors.

Verdi's Manzoni Requiem

Verdi's Manzoni Requiem will be sung at Center church Sunday afternoon at 4:30.

On May 22nd, 1874, the city of Milan held a memorial service at St. Mark's Cathedral, commemorating the first anniversary of the death of the great poet Alessancro Manzoni, and commissioned Italy's greatest composer, Verdi, to write a Requiem for the occasion. A gentle, devout and thoroughly ecclesiastical spirit pervades the work, which is, however, conceived in Italian style, therefore in lighter vein than is the case with most of the great Requiems of history.

Center Church Choir augmented to fifty-five voices, will be assisted by the following soloists. Mrs. Frances Waterman Stockwell, soprano soloist of the Naugatuck Cong'l church, well known radio and concert singer, at present coaching with Maestro Bimboni of New York, Mrs. Ruth Linsley Oliver, soloist of Center church, also known for radio and concert work, Philip Simonds, well known baritone of this city and New York, and William Ervin, tenor soloist of the Cathedral at Garden City. Mr. Ervin did such outstanding work last Spring, singing the tenor role of the Bach "St. Matthew" passion, which was given at Center church.

CLEVELAND, O.
NEWS

NOV 26 1938

Symphony

Serge Koussevitzky directs the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program at Music Hall, December 9, as a feature of the Cleveland Concert course, sponsored by the Cleveland Museum of Art. The program includes the Haydn B Flat Symphony No. 102, the Debussy "La Mer" Symphonic Sketches, and Sibelius' Symphony No. 2, D Major.

TWO NEW CONCERTOS PLAYED IN BOSTON

Symphony, Led by Koussevitzky and Burgin, Gives Premieres of Hill and Krenek Works

BOSTON, Nov. 20.—With Dr. Koussevitzky absent, it fell to Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony and assistant conductor, to take charge of the Friday-Saturday pair of concerts on Nov. 4 and 5. With Ernst Krenek as soloist in his own Piano Concerto No. 2, which came to a first hearing in America, Mr. Burgin conducted the following program:

Symphony in D, No. 86	Haydn
Piano Concerto No. 2, Op. 81 (First performances in America)	Krenek
'A Pagan Poem', Op. 14	Loeffler

It was natural that interest should center on the Krenek opus. Mr. Krenek is now a temporary resident of Boston, since his affiliation for a season with the Malkin Conservatory. He supplied complete program notes which contained an exhaustive analysis of the concerto and an explanation of the twelve-tone scale with its possible basic patterns upon which he fashioned his opus.

Bostonians who regularly patronize these concerts, knew that dissonance, in the old-fashioned sense of the word, would be plentiful. They were not disappointed. What proved most disturbing was the sparseness of sound. Possibly Herr Krenek intended to create the impression of austerity, but he could have produced a little more sonority without upsetting the tonal balance of the work. Despite a profoundly intellectual approach to the task in hand, Herr Krenek's Concerto does not impress as music for the ear. It was very coolly received, despite what must have been an excellent performance, since Mr. Burgin is ever friendly toward the new works of contemporary composers.

The Haydn received a faithful reading, and the work of J. M. Sanroma, pianist, and Louis Speyer, English horn player, distinguished the Loeffler composition.

Posselt Plays Hill Work

For the sixth pair of Friday-Saturday concerts, Dr. Koussevitzky was again at the helm. Ruth Posselt was the soloist in Edward Burlingame Hill's new Violin Concerto which was given its first performances upon this occasion. The program.

Symphony No. 2 in D, Op. 36	Beethoven
Concerto for Violin, Op. 38 (First performances)	Hill
Symphony No. 5 in E Flat, Op. 83	Sibelius

Dr. Koussevitzky gave to the Beethoven a reading which was at once recognized as authentic and individualized. There were no overdrawn adagios or peppery allegroes. Tonal balance was nicely maintained and the eloquence of the master spoke through the instrument which the conductor controlled. The Sibelius also received an unusually polished performance. Dr. Koussevitzky has, indeed, an admirable "way" with Sibelius.

The Hill Concerto of course was of paramount interest. It is his first excursion into the concerto field, unless one excepts a brief Concertino for piano and orchestra and a small Scherzo for two pianos and orchestra, in each of which he no doubt began to sound his musical depth in anticipation of this larger and more orthodox work.

The concerto has occasioned Mr. Hill considerable labor. According to a program note, he wrote the work in 1933; revised the score during the following winter and in 1937 revised the first movement, adding a cadenza in collaboration with Richard Burgin. It must be admitted that the considerable labor is evident. The first movement, despite some syncopated rhythms, does not step off spontaneously. In his attempt to produce an unstereotyped work, he too obviously reveals that attempt, with the result that the measures are more of a potpourri of harmonic examples and various rhythms, than a really homogeneous blending of thematic material undeniably original.

The composer no doubt feels more sympathetic toward the newer methods of approaching harmonic structure than he is able to make evident in his music. The concerto succeeds, not in being "modern" but self-conscious, which is all the more regrettable, since Professor Hill is a thoroughly well-grounded and efficient musician. Miss Posselt performed the work with an evident seriousness of purpose which gave it virtues not altogether inherent.

GRACE MAY STUTSMAN

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

NOV 27 1938

Copland Première on Air

To the Music Editor:

A recent review referred to the Boston Symphony's performance of Aaron Copland's "El Salon Mexico" on Saturday, Nov. 19, as its first hearing in New York. This work was given its American première by the NBC Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Sir Adrian Boult, on May 14.

WALTER E. KOONS.

New York, Nov. 21, 1938.

CLEVELAND, O.
PRESS

NOV 26 1938

Boston Symphony Boasts a Million-Dollar Endowment

By ARTHUR LOESSER, Press Music Editor

THE forthcoming Cleveland appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra induces some reflections.

Symphonic music has had a long and honorable history in this country; as early as during the second quarter of the 19th Century laudable efforts were made toward the formation of orchestras. The oldest still extant organization of the kind is the New York Philharmonic, founded in 1842, thus preceding the establishment of the famous Vienna Philharmonic by three or four years.

It was not until the 1880's, however, that an American orchestra was able, by the excellence of its performances, to challenge the standards of the leading European groups. This was done when the Boston Symphony Orchestra was formed and began to function.

An initial endowment fund of $1,000,000, a sum thitherto unheard-of lavishness, was created to insure the engagement of the finest available instrumentalists in more than adequate number. The results were gratifying. The Boston performances, under distinguished conductors, were of an exquisitness that soon created for the orchestra a position of world leadership.

For 40 years its supremacy was unchallenged and all other orchestras, certainly in this country, tended to measure themselves by how closely they could approximate the Boston's standards.

Excellent Musicians

DURING the last 20 years symphonic music has attained a wide spread of popularity throughout the United States. Orchestras in various cities have achieved results of superlative quality. Not the least distinguished of these newer groups is our own Cleveland Orchestra.

But if the supremacy of the Boston is perhaps not so unconditional as it was, that is not due to any lessening of its excellence. It still holds a unique position of leadership, by reason of its history and the firmness of its establishment, as well as for the perfection of its work. It is still our No. 1 orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear at Music Hall on Dec. 9, in the Cleveland concert course. It will be an occasion of unusual interest, since it will be, with one exception, the only appearance here by a visiting orchestra since about 10 years. Furthermore, opportunities for hearing this organization over the radio are very limited indeed.

All music lovers ought certainly be on hand for the concert. The program will include the Second Symphony of Sibelius.

CLEVELAND, O.
PLAIN DEALER

NOV 27 1938

Boston Orchestra Program

Mrs. Emil Brudno has announced the program of the Boston Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky coming to Public Music Hall as part of the Cleveland concert course Friday evening, Dec. 9. The first half will include the Haydn Symphony in B flat, No. 102, and Debussy's Three Symphonic Sketches, "La Mer." After the intermission the orchestra will play the Sibelius Symphony No. 2.

It has been years since Cleveland has had the privilege of a visit from the Boston Orchestra. Music lovers here will welcome this opportunity to renew acquaintance with this venerable organization, described by Time magazine as "One of Boston's hoary monuments to Brahmin gentility that stands like the Great Pyramid." Brought into the world in 1881 by the late Maj. Henry Lee Higginson at a cost of a million dollars, it was long rated by many as the finest orchestra in the world, and today holds its own with only two possible rivals in this country.

On Friday evening, Dec. 16, Harriet Eels, Arthur Loesser and Beryl Rubinstein, three artists whom Cleveland is proud to call its own, appear in concert at Public Music Hall for the benefit of Camp Ho Mita Koda, a camp for diabetic children directed by Dr. Henry J. John. Since its foundation in 1929 a total of 391 children have been cared for at this camp.

AKRON, O.
BEACON-JOURNAL

NOV 27 1938

Hampered

EUGENE GOOSSENS, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony orchestra, commented on his return from Europe that the presen disturbed condition of the worl has hampered musical composition.

He complained that few work are being written which deserv to be ranked as masterpieces.

Goossens said that while grea unheavals tend to produce great music when they have died down and artists are able to retire into a calm, creative atmosphere, the present upheaval is a continuing process that gives no interlude for contemplation.

The conductor praised the quality of contemporary English composition, which he feels has been unduly neglected. One of the new works which he has brought back is "Variation on the Theme of Frank Bridges," by Benjamin Bridges, young English composer.

After conducting the Boston Symphony in New York this week, Goossens will return to Cincinnati for his regular season.

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
TIMES - PICAYUNE

NOV 27 1938

Eugene Goossens, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, commented on his return from Europe that the present disturbed condition of the world has hampered musical composition. He complained that few works are being written which deserve to be ranked as masterpieces.

Goossens reports that while great upheavels tend to produce great music when they have died down and artists are able to retire into a calm, creative atmosphere, the present upheaval is a continuing process that gives no interlude for contemplation.

Goossens praised the quality of contemporary English composition, which he feels has been unduly neglected. After conducting the Boston Symphony in New York this week, Goossens returns to Cincinnati for his regular season.

CINCINNATI, O.
POST

NOV 24 1938

Music on the Disc

November Record Releases A Feast for Which To Be Thankful

Tying in nicely with the Thanksgiving season comes a list of November record releases that gives music lovers much for which to be thankful. Toscanini, Koussevitzky and Goossens are among the conductors; Sibelius, Rimsky-Korsakow and Bach are among the composers; the Boston Symphony, the London Symphony, Jussi Bjoerling and Marian Anderson are among the performing artists. One couldn't ask for much more in the way of a musical feast. The "piece de resistance" is none other than:

SIBELIUS, SYMPHONY NO. 5 in E Flat Major (Op. 82), played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. A Victor Musical Masterpiece album containing five 12-inch records, nine sides of which are devoted to the Symphony, and the tenth side to a short work by Sibelius, a tone poem entitled "Pohjola's Daughter" (Op. 49).

This particular recording is being hailed as one of the finest, most outstanding, that the Victor Company has ever released in its long history. Certainly all of the elements that make for a great recording are in it. Sibelius is commanding more attention from the American public today than any other composer, living or dead. Many say that he is incomparably the greatest composer since Beethoven, and some of the most exacting critics go even further and say that he is a greater composer than Beethoven. The Fifth Symphony is one of his very greatest works, and is one of the most popular, as well. The Boston Symphony is one of the world's finest orchestras; Dr. Koussevitzky is the foremost interpreter of Sibelius' works; and the recording was made in Boston's Symphony Hall whose acoustical properties are unexcelled. Out of this combination could only come a superlative masterpiece, and in this recording you have it! It is grandeur in wax!

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST - GAZETTE

NOV 26 1938

Serge Koussevitzky will bring the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Pittsburgh for two performances, December 10 and 11, at Syria Mosque. The concerts will be given under auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association. Jesus Maria Sanroma, Puerto Rican pianist, will play the Ravel Concerto with the orchestra.

Free Organ Recitals.

Dr. Caspar Koch will be heard in the usual free organ recital to be given in Northside Carnegie Hall at 3 o'clock tomorrow afternoon. Mary E. Friedel, soprano, will be the guest soloist, with Janet Spaugh Fischer at the piano. The program follows:

Overture to Martha	Flotow
Adagio from Clarinet Concerto	Mozart
Fugue in G Minor	Bach
Soprano solos—
(a) L'Insana Parola	Verdi
(b) Romanza	Mascagni
Reve Angelique	Rubinstein
Elfin Dance	Edmundson

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL - COURIER

NOV 25 1938

Musical Moments

By BEN ROUNDS

Simonds and Pernel Monday Night

Having achieved notable success in their first two recitals of Beethoven sonatas for piano and violin, Bruce Simonds, popular local pianist, and Miss Orrea Pernel, distinguished English violinist, will appear in Sprague Memorial Hall Monday evening in the concluding event of the series. Four of the greatest compositions of the master Beethoven will be heard upon the forthcoming occasion, and bring to a close a trio of performances that will rank with the finest ever presented on the local concert platform.

Both Mr. Simonds and Miss Pernel have made enviable reputations for themselves in the world of fine music. The former of course has been heard here many times, and each succeeding appearance adds to his retinue of admirers. While his duties as a faculty member of the Yale School of Music do not permit lengthy concert tours, upon occasion he appears in New York, Boston and other of the country's musical centers with well merited success. Miss Pernel is reckoned as one of the finest violinists England has sent to these shores in many years. In addition to numerous solo appearances she has made a host of friends as soloist with the Boston Symphony and other leading American orchestral organizations, including the New Haven Symphony Orchestra.

Another large and enthusiastic audience will greet the two fine artists here on Monday evening and hear a program that will be long rememberded by its auditors.

Verdi's Manzoni Requiem

Verdi's Manzoni Requiem will be sung at Center church Sunday afternoon at 4:30.

On May 22nd, 1874, the city of Milan held a memorial service at St. Mark's Cathedral, commemorating the first anniversary of the death of the great poet Alessancro Manzoni, and commissioned Italy's greatest composer, Verdi, to write a Requiem for the occasion. A gentle, devout and thoroughly ecclesiastical spirit pervades the work, which is, however, conceived in Italian style, therefore in lighter vein than is the case with most of the great Requiems of history.

Center Church Choir augmented to fifty-five voices, will be assisted by the following soloists. Mrs. Frances Waterman Stockwell, soprano soloist of the Naugatuck Cong'l church, well known radio and concert singer, at present coaching with Maestro Bimboni of New York, Mrs. Ruth Linsley Oliver, soloist of Center church, also known for radio and concert work, Philip Simonds, well known baritone of this city and New York, and William Ervin, tenor soloist of the Cathedral at Garden City. Mr. Ervin did such outstanding work last Spring singing the tenor role of the Bach "St. Matthew" passion which was given at Center church.

CLEVELAND, O.
NEWS

NOV 26 1938

Symphony.

Serge Koussevitzky directs the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program at Music Hall, December 9, as a feature of the Cleveland Concert course, sponsored by the Cleveland Museum of Art. The program includes the Haydn B Flat Symphony No. 102, the Debussy "La Mer" Symphonic Sketches, and Sibelius' Symphony No. 2, D Major.

---

22 MUSICAL AMERICA for November 25, 1938

TWO NEW CONCERTOS PLAYED IN BOSTON

Symphony, Led by Koussevitzky and Burgin, Gives Premieres of Hill and Krenek Works

BOSTON, Nov. 20.—With Dr. Koussevitzky absent, it fell to Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony and assistant conductor, to take charge of the Friday-Saturday pair of concerts on Nov. 4 and 5. With Ernst Krenek as soloist in his own Piano Concerto No. 2, which came to a first hearing in America, Mr. Burgin conducted the following program:

Symphony in D, No. 86	Haydn
Piano Concerto No. 2, Op. 81 (First performances in America)	Krenek
'A Pagan Poem', Op. 14	Loeffler

It was natural that interest should center on the Krenek opus. Mr. Krenek is now a temporary resident of Boston, since his affiliation for a season with the Malkin Conservatory. He supplied complete program notes which contained an exhaustive analysis of the concerto and an explanation of the twelve-tone scale with its possible basic patterns upon which he fashioned his opus.

Bostonians who regularly patronize these concerts, knew that dissonance, in the old-fashioned sense of the word, would be plentiful. They were not disappointed. What proved most disturbing was the sparseness of sound. Possibly Herr Krenek intended to create the impression of austerity, but he could have produced a little more sonority without upsetting the tonal balance of the work. Despite a profoundly intellectual approach to the task in hand, Herr Krenek's Concerto does not impress as music for the ear. It was very coolly received, despite what must have been an excellent performance, since Mr. Burgin is ever friendly toward the new works of contemporary composers.

The Haydn received a faithful reading, and the work of J. M. Sanroma, pianist, and Louis Speyer, English horn player, distinguished the Loeffler composition.

Posselt Plays Hill Work

For the sixth pair of Friday-Saturday concerts, Dr. Koussevitzky was again at the helm. Ruth Posselt was the soloist in Edward Burlingame Hill's new Violin Concerto which was given its first performances upon this occasion. The program.

Symphony No. 2 in D, Op. 36	Beethoven
Concerto for Violin, Op. 38 (First performances)	Hill
Symphony No. 5 in E Flat, Op. 83	Sibelius

Dr. Koussevitzky gave to the Beethoven a reading which was at once recognized as authentic and individualized. There were no overdrawn adagios or peppery allegroes. Tonal balance was nicely maintained and the eloquence of the master spoke through the instrument which the conductor controlled. The Sibelius also received an unusually polished performance. Dr. Koussevitzky has, indeed, an admirable "way" with Sibelius.

The Hill Concerto of course was of paramount interest. It is his first excursion into the concerto field, unless one excepts a brief Concertino for piano and orchestra and a small Scherzo for two pianos and orchestra, in each of which he no doubt began to sound his musical depth in anticipation of this larger and more orthodox work.

The concerto has occasioned Mr. Hill considerable labor. According to a program note, he wrote the work in 1933; revised the score during the following winter and in 1937 revised the first movement, adding a cadenza in collaboration with Richard Burgin. It must be admitted that the considerable labor is evident. The first movement, despite some syncopated rhythms, does not step off spontaneously. In his attempt to produce an unstereotyped work, he too obviously reveals that attempt, with the result that the measures are more of a potpourri of harmonic examples and various rhythms, than a really homogeneous blending of thematic material undeniably original.

The composer no doubt feels more sympathetic toward the newer methods of approaching harmonic structure than he is able to make evident in his music. The concerto succeeds, not in being "modern" but self-conscious, which is all the more regrettable, since Professor Hill is a thoroughly well-grounded and efficient musician. Miss Posselt performed the work with an evident seriousness of purpose which gave it virtues not altogether inherent.

GRACE MAY STUTSMAN

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 27 1938

Copland Première on Air

To the Music Editor:

A recent review referred to the Boston Symphony's performance of Aaron Copland's "El Salon Mexico" on Saturday, Nov. 19, as its first hearing in New York. This work was given its American première by the NBC Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Sir Adrian Boult, on May 14. WALTER E. KOONS, New York, Nov. 21, 1938.

CLEVELAND, O.
PRESS

NOV 26 1938

Boston Symphony Boasts a Million-Dollar Endowment

By ARTHUR LOESSER, Press Music Editor

THE forthcoming Cleveland appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra induces some reflections.

Symphonic music has had a long and honorable history in this country; as early as during the second quarter of the 19th Century laudable efforts were made toward the formation of orchestras. The oldest still extant organization of the kind is the New York Philharmonic, founded in 1842, thus preceding the establishment of the famous Vienna Philharmonic by three or four years.

It was not until the 1880's, however, that an American orchestra was able, by the excellence of its performances, to challenge the standards of the leading European groups. This was done when the Boston Symphony Orchestra was formed and began to function.

An initial endowment fund of $1,000,000, a sum thitherto unheard-of lavishness, was created to insure the engagement of the finest available instrumentalists in more than adequate number. The results were gratifying. The Boston performances, under distinguished conductors, were of an exquisitness that soon created for the orchestra a position of world leadership.

For 40 years its supremacy was unchallenged and all other orchestras, certainly in this country, tended to measure themselves by how closely they could approximate the Boston's standards.

Excellent Musicians

DURING the last 20 years symphonic music has attained a wide spread of popularity throughout the United States. Orchestras in various cities have achieved results of superlative quality. Not the least distinguished of these newer groups is our own Cleveland Orchestra.

But if the supremacy of the Boston is perhaps not so unconditional as it was, that is not due to any lessening of its excellence. It still holds a unique position of leadership, by reason of its history and the firmness of its establishment, as well as for the perfection of its work. It is still our No. 1 orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear at Music Hall on Dec. 9, in the Cleveland concert course. It will be an occasion of unusual interest, since it will be, with one exception, the only appearance here by a visiting orchestra since about 10 years. Furthermore, opportunities for hearing this organization over the radio are very limited indeed.

All music lovers ought certainly be on hand for the concert. The program will include the Second Symphony of Sibelius.

81

CLEVELAND, O.
PLAIN DEALER

NOV 27 1938

Boston Orchestra Program

Mrs. Emil Brudno has announced the program of the Boston Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky coming to Public Music Hall as part of the Cleveland concert course Friday evening, Dec. 9. The first half will include the Haydn Symphony in B flat, No. 102, and Debussy's Three Symphonic Sketches, "La Mer." After the intermission the orchestra will play the Sibelius Symphony No. 2.

It has been years since Cleveland has had the privilege of a visit from the Boston Orchestra. Music lovers here will welcome this opportunity to renew acquaintance with this venerable organization, described by Time magazine as "One of Boston's hoary monuments to Brahmin gentility that stands like the Great Pyramid." Brought into the world in 1881 by the late Maj. Henry Lee Higginson at a cost of a million dollars, it was long rated by many as the finest orchestra in the world, and today holds its own with only two possible rivals in this country.

On Friday evening, Dec. 16, Harriet Eels, Arthur Loesser and Beryl Rubinstein, three artists whom Cleveland is proud to call its own, appear in concert at Public Music Hall for the benefit of Camp Ho Mita Koda, a camp for diabetic children directed by Dr. Henry J. John. Since its foundation in 1929 a total of 391 children have been cared for at this camp.

AKRON, O.
BEACON-JOURNAL

NOV 27 1938

Hampered

EUGENE GOOSSENS, con ductor of the Cincinnati Symphony orchestra, commented on his re turn from Europe that the presen disturbed condition of the worl has hampered musical composi tion.

He complained that few work are being written which deserv to be ranked as masterpieces.

Goossens said that while grea unheavals tend to produce great music when they have died down and artists are able to retire into a calm, creative atmosphere, the present upheaval is a continuing process that gives no interlude for contemplation.

The conductor praised the quality of contemporary English composition, which he feels has been unduly neglected. One of the new works which he has brought back is "Variation on the Theme of Frank Bridges," by Benjamin Bridges, young English composer.

After conducting the Boston Symphony in New York this week, Goossens will return to Cincinnati for his regular season.

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
TIMES - PICAYUNE

NOV 27 1938

Eugene Goossens, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, commented on his return from Europe that the present disturbed condition of the world has hampered musical composition. He complained that few works are being written which deserve to be ranked as masterpieces.

Goossens reports that while great upheavels tend to produce great music when they have died down and artists are able to retire into a calm, creative atmosphere, the present upheaval is a continuing process that gives no interlude for contemplation.

Goossens praised the quality of contemporary English composition, which he feels has been unduly neglected. After conducting the Boston Symphony in New York this week, Goossens returns to Cincinnati for his regular season.

FORT WAYNE, IND.
NEWS - SENTINEL

NOV 26 1938

Pictured for the first time conducting Boston's famed symphony orchestra is Dr. Sergei Koussevitsky, the tyrannical genius who is starting his fifteenth consecutive year on the Boston Podium. The photos were made during rehearsal, and show the conductor in informal attire. (International News Photo.)

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
NOV 2 6 1938

MUSICAL EVENTS

Symphonies, Applause, and a Trio

THERE is a large congregation of conductors in attendance at almost every symphony concert in Carnegie Hall, and sometimes I suspect that the boys come for a good, although not necessarily genial, laugh. It wasn't that way, however, when Serge Koussevitzky conducted the first local concert this season of the Boston Symphony. His colleagues couldn't have been more rapturous about Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra if they had been old Bostonians themselves. Even the relatives of the other maestri seemed to be enjoying the session.

Mr. Koussevitzky started his New York year with a sensational performance of Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin" suite, which isn't in itself a sensational composition. I've heard it played with the accent on the tombeau or on Couperin, but Mr. Koussevitzky placed the emphasis on Ravel's lightness and ingenuity. It sounded as if he had pushed a button and the orchestra had automatically poured ingratiating music into the hall.

After that there were two fifth symphonies—Sibelius's and Beethoven's. Mr. Koussevitzky's enthusiasm for Sibelius has made him a one-man Sibelius Society, much to the benefit of the composer, whose current popularity owes a lot to the conductor's constant presentations of his works. The Boston director's doings with the Sibelius fifth constitute a definitive version of the symphony. Following his exhilarating projection of Sibelius, Mr. Koussevitzky still had ample energy left for Beethoven.

A SYMPHONY that hasn't been heard previously in town always is an event of sorts, because symphonies are Important Business. They take time and patience from the conductor and his men—and perhaps from the listeners.

John Barbirolli introduced the Philharmonic-Symphony audiences to the New York première of Arnold Bax's fourth symphony, which was impressive without being compelling. Mr. Bax is a distinguished composer, some of whose earlier symphonies are on the introspective side, and this one, according to an authorized proclamation, "is intentionally brighter" than any of his other symphonies. It's a bright, big symphony, and somehow bright symphonies always seem brighter when they're not so protracted as this one. It has the fine workmanship that might be expected from its maker, many charming moments, and ingenuities that may be more apparent to the student than to the usual listener; but put them all together and the sum doesn't seem to be as interesting as its parts. Mr. Barbirolli directed it as if it were an old friend, but it probably won't become one.

One of the longest of Philharmonic-Symphony subscription concerts had for its nightcap Tchaikovsky's violin concerto, with Jascha Heifetz as soloist. Mr. Heifetz, of course, had his customary success with the concerto and almost made the other fiddlers present want to throw away their instruments when he tossed off the cadenza as if it were no more trouble for him than "Turkey in the Straw."

INTERMEZZO ON APPLAUSE: We have with us an almost universal tradition that hand-clapping between movements of a symphony or a concerto is an offensive gesture that will mangle the mood of the music. So when a conductor pauses between movements, everyone maintains a sacrosanct manual silence, lest the atmosphere be poisoned by wonted symptoms of approval.

Meanwhile, what happens to sustain the mood? The performers wipe perspiration from their heads, tune instruments, or have mysterious conferences around the podium. Late-comers scramble to their chairs, sometimes reverberatingly. Coughers in various parts of the house contribute solo exercises and gossipers resume where they left off, vivacissimo. I wonder if all of these goings-on are more favorable to the aura than applause would be, especially with compositions that were written to get a hand.

When a conductor goes from movement to movement without any extensive break, that's one thing. When he doesn't, and there isn't some exceptional reason for refraining from applause, audiences might just as well indulge themselves. It's likely that the performers wouldn't be horribly insulted, after all.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE
NOV 2 8 1938

POPULAR ARTISTS

Interest in duo piano playing has been increasing in recent years and so the appearance here of Pierre Luboshutz and Genia Nemenoff will be welcome. They will play several of the most interesting compositions for two pianos. Luboschutz is a graduate of the Moscow Conservatory and made his debut in Moscow, playing a concerto with an orchestra directed by Koussevitzky in 1902 when he was 8 years old. He married Miss Neminoff in 1931 when she was a student in the Paris Conservatory and since then they have become famous as a two-piano team.

PITTSBURG, PA.
PRESS

NOV 27 1938

Recitals on Sunday Afternoons Increase Concert Interest Here

Gigli, Anderson and Menuhin Will Appear in Mosque Programs Under Guidance of Mae Beegle, in Addition To Regular Evening Musical Events

By RALPH LEWANDO
Press Music Editor

Music to left of us! Music to right of us! And there is much more ahead with the season but a month old. Yet there can never be too much of it, say its ardent devotees, so long as the music played and sung is of surpassing quality and performers are capable and desirous of maintaining high artistic standards.

Mr. Lewando

All that may matter then is whether the modest exchequers of the myriad of average patrons, whose interest makes possible box office success, can be budgeted to meet the added demands that the ever-increasing number of first-class concerts here entail.

But so long as people yearn for such events and enjoy attending them to listen to their adored favorites, be they singers, instrumentalists or conductors, so long shall the art of music continue in ascendance from the standpoint of popular support.

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra led by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will give concerts at Syria Mosque under Pittsburgh Orchestra Association auspices Saturday night, Dec. 10, at 8:30 o'clock and Sunday, Dec. 11 at 3.

The evening program will consist of Beethoven's 2nd symphony; Ravel's concerto for piano and orchestra with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist, and Brahms' 4th symphony in E-minor.

The matinee program embraces Haydn's B-flat symphony, No. 102; Debussy's La Mer and Tschaikowsky's 4th symphony.

* * *

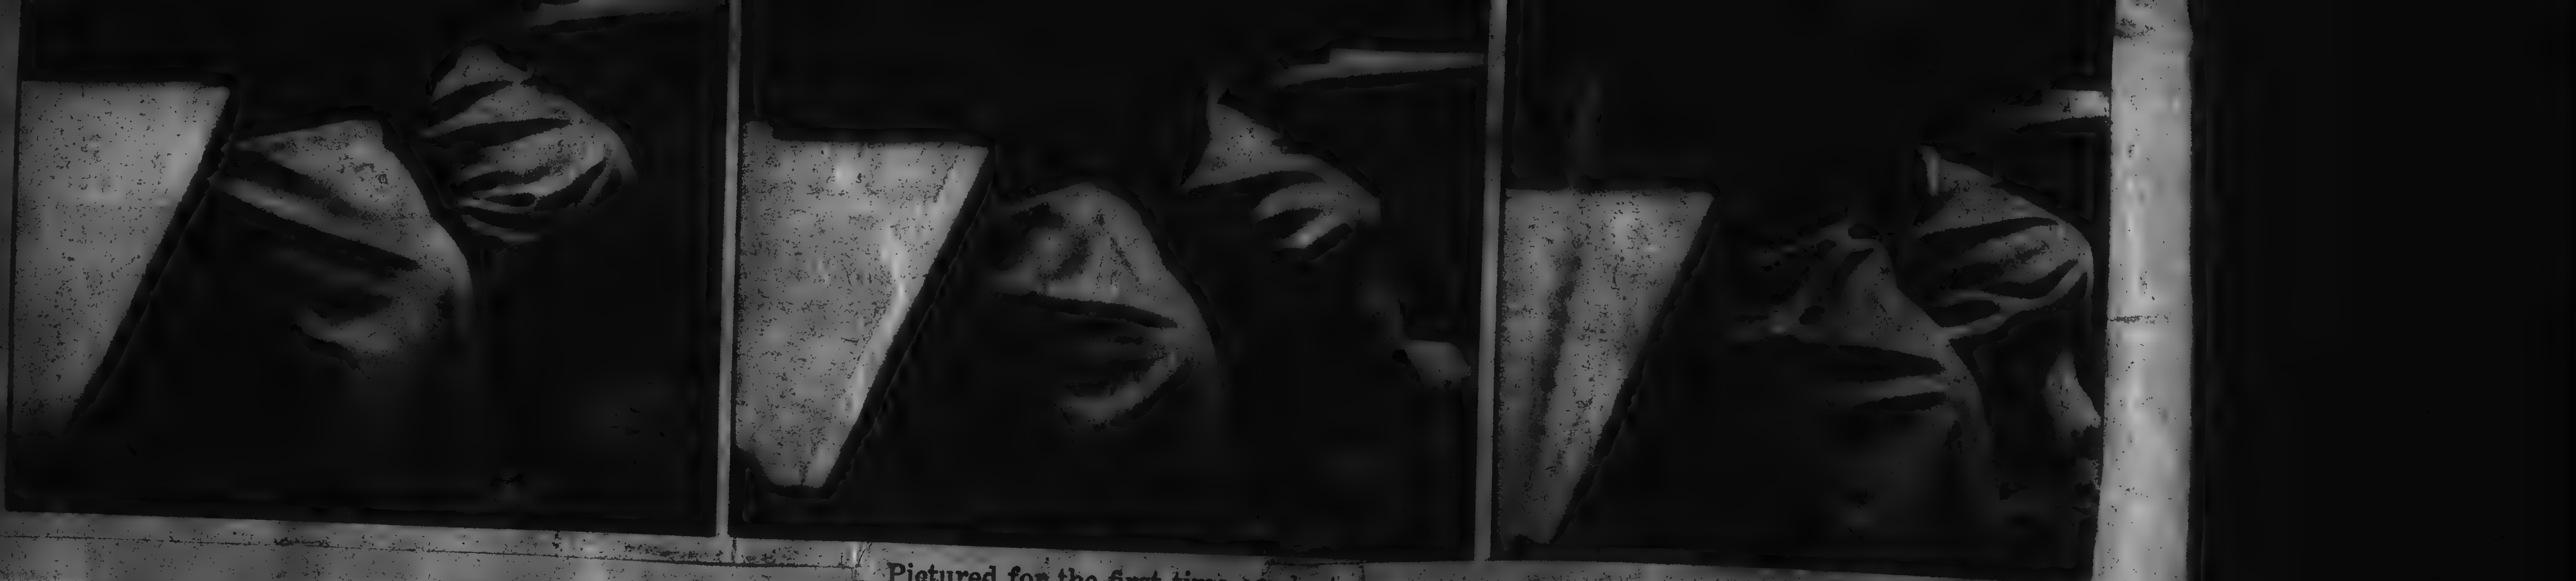
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
NOV 27 1938

Symphonic Trio

The Symphonic Trio, consisting of flute, 'cello and harp players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will give a program at ladies' afternoon at the Providence Art Club Thursday at 3:30 o'clock. The trio will be assisted by Nellie Zimmer, harpist.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 27 1938

The Boston Chamber Orchestra, consisting of thirty members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will give the opening concert of its third season this Wednesday night in Boston, Mass., under the direction of Bernard Zighera. Jan Smeterlin, piano, will be the soloist. At this event Pierné's ballet music, "Giration," will receive its American première. Other concerts are slated for Jan. 18 and March 1.



Pictured for the first time conducting Boston's famed symphony orchestra is Dr. Sergei Koussevitsky, the tyrannical genius who is starting his fifteenth consecutive year on the Boston Podium. The photos were made during rehearsal, and show the conductor in informal attire. (International News Photo.)

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
NOV 26 1938

MUSICAL EVENTS

Symphonies, Applause, and a Trio

THERE is a large congregation of conductors in attendance at almost every symphony concert in Carnegie Hall, and sometimes I suspect that the boys come for a good, although not necessarily genial, laugh. It wasn't that way, however, when Serge Koussevitzky conducted the first local concert this season of the Boston Symphony. His colleagues couldn't have been more rapturous about Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra if they had been old Bostonians themselves. Even the relatives of the other maestri seemed to be enjoying the session.

Mr. Koussevitzky started his New York year with a sensational performance of Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin" suite, which isn't in itself a sensational composition. I've heard it played with the accent on the tombeau or on Couperin, but Mr. Koussevitzky placed the emphasis on Ravel's lightness and ingenuity. It sounded as if he had pushed a button and the orchestra had automatically poured ingratiating music into the hall.

After that there were two fifth symphonies—Sibelius's and Beethoven's. Mr. Koussevitzky's enthusiasm for Sibelius has made him a one-man Sibelius Society, much to the benefit of the composer, whose current popularity owes a lot to the conductor's constant presentations of his works. The Boston director's doings with the Sibelius fifth constitute a definitive version of the symphony. Following his exhilarating projection of Sibelius, Mr. Koussevitzky still had ample energy left for Beethoven.

A SYMPHONY that hasn't been heard previously in town always is an event of sorts, because symphonies are Important Business. They take time and patience from the conductor and his men—and perhaps from the listeners.

John Barbirolli introduced the Philharmonic-Symphony audiences to the New York première of Arnold Bax's fourth symphony, which was impressive without being compelling. Mr. Bax is a distinguished composer, some of whose earlier symphonies are on the introspective side, and this one, according to an authorized proclamation, "is intentionally brighter" than any of his other symphonies. It's a bright, big symphony, and somehow bright symphonies always seem brighter when they're not so protracted as this one. It has the fine workmanship that might be expected from its maker, many charming moments, and ingenuities that may be more apparent to the student than to the usual listener; but put them all together and the sum doesn't seem to be as interesting as its parts. Mr. Barbirolli directed it as if it were an old friend, but it probably won't become one.

One of the longest of Philharmonic-Symphony subscription concerts had for its nightcap Tchaikovsky's violin concerto, with Jascha Heifetz as soloist. Mr. Heifetz, of course, had his customary success with the concerto and almost made the other fiddlers present want to throw away their instruments when he tossed off the cadenza as if it were no more trouble for him than "Turkey in the Straw."

INTERMEZZO ON APPLAUSE: We have with us an almost universal tradition that hand-clapping between movements of a symphony or a concerto is an offensive gesture that will mangle the mood of the music. So when a conductor pauses between movements, everyone maintains a sacrosanct manual silence, lest the atmosphere be poisoned by wonted symptoms of approval.

Meanwhile, what happens to sustain the mood? The performers wipe perspiration from their heads, tune instruments, or have mysterious conferences around the podium. Late-comers scramble to their chairs, sometimes reverberatingly. Coughers in various parts of the house contribute solo exercises and gossipers resume where they left off, vivacissimo. I wonder if all of these goings-on are more favorable to the aura than applause would be, especially with compositions that were written to get a hand.

When a conductor goes from movement to movement without any extensive break, that's one thing. When he doesn't, and there isn't some exceptional reason for refraining from applause, audiences might just as well indulge themselves. It's likely that the performers wouldn't be horribly insulted, after all.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE
NOV 28 1938

POPULAR ARTISTS

Interest in duo piano playing has been increasing in recent years and so the appearance here of Pierre Luboshutz and Genia Nemenoff will be welcome. They will play several of the most interesting compositions for two pianos. Luboschutz is a graduate of the Moscow Conservatory and made his debut in Moscow, playing a concerto with an orchestra directed by Koussevitzky in 1903 when he was [illegible] old. He married Miss Neminoff in 1931 when she was a student in the Paris Conservatory and since then they have become famous as a two-piano team.

PITTSBURG, PA.
PRESS
NOV 27 1938

Recitals on Sunday Afternoons Increase Concert Interest Here

Gigli, Anderson and Menuhin Will Appear in Mosque Programs Under Guidance of Mae Beegle, in Addition To Regular Evening Musical Events

By RALPH LEWANDO
Press Music Editor

Music to left of us! Music to right of us! And there is much more ahead with the season but a month old. Yet there can never be too much of it, say its ardent devotees, so long as the music played and sung is of surpassing quality and performers are capable and desirous of maintaining high artistic standards.

All that may matter then is whether the modest exchequers of the myriad of average patrons, whose interest makes possible box office success, can be budgeted to meet the added demands that the ever-increasing number of first-class concerts here entail.

Mr. Lewando

But so long as people yearn for such events and enjoy attending them to listen to their adored favorites, be they singers, instrumentalists or conductors, so long shall the art of music continue in ascendance from the standpoint of popular support.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra led by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will give concerts at Syria Mosque under Pittsburgh Orchestra Association auspices Saturday night, Dec. 10, at 8:30 o'clock and Sunday, Dec. 11 at 3.

The evening program will consist of Beethoven's 2nd symphony; Ravel's concerto for piano and orchestra with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist, and Brahms' 4th symphony in E-minor.

The matinee program embraces Haydn's B-flat symphony, No. 102; Debussy's La Mer and Tschaikowsky's 4th symphony.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
NOV 27 1938

Symphonic Trio

The Symphonic Trio, consisting of flute, 'cello and harp players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will give a program [illegible] afternoon at the Provid[illegible] Art Club Thursday at 3:30 o'[illegible] trio will be assisted by [illegible], harpist.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 27 1938

The Boston Chamber Orchestra, consisting of thirty members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will give the opening concert of its third season this Wednesday night in Boston, Mass., under the direction of Bernard Zighera. Jan Smeterlin, piano, will be the soloist. At this event Pierné's ballet music, "Giration," will receive its American première. Other concerts are slated for Jan. 18 and March 1.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

NOV 27 1938

DIRECTS BOSTON SYMPHONY

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor ~~of the celebrated~~ Boston Symphony Orchestra, on the podium during a recent rehearsal.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, is offering four series of concerts to New England music lovers this year at Symphony Hall, Boston. Two six concert series are available on Monday nights at 8.15 p. m. and another six concert series is held Tuesday afternoons at 3 p. m. The usual series of 24 Friday afternoon concerts at 2.30 o'clock and Saturday evening concerts at 8.15 p. m. are being given this year.

In order to make it convenient for Worcester patrons of the orchestra to obtain tickets, a branch office will open tomorrow morning at Steinert's, 308 Main street. Tickets for all concerts, information on future concerts and photographs of Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra may be had at at any time.

On the Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon series this year Myra Hess, English pianist, is on the program as are Pierre and Genia Luboshutz, pianists. In one pair of concerts next March Igor Stravinsky, who will be visiting in America, will conduct in music of his own as will Georges Enesco. In both series the concerts continue through April. The dates are available at Symphony Hall for any of the series.

In addition to these Boston concerts the Boston Symphony, one of the nation's outstanding musical organizations, has scheduled eight concerts in Cambridge, five in Providence, 15 in New York and Brooklyn, two each in New Haven, Hartford and Pittsburgh and one each in Rochester, Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Toledo, Cleveland, New Brunswick, Philadelphia and Northampton.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE

NOV 29 1938

Rodzinski Named by NBC

Will Conduct Orchestra in Four Saturday Night Broadcasts

The National Broadcasting Company announced yesterday that Dr. Artur Rodzinski, conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra, will direct the NBC Symphony Orchestra in its Saturday night broadcasts of December 10, 17, 24 and 31. Arturo Toscanini, who completes the first part of his second season with this orchestra with next Saturday night's broadcast, will resume his appearance in this series on January 7. Dr. Rodzinski's first program will consist of Russian works, Glinka's overture to "Russlan and Ludmilla," Tchaikovsky's fifth symphony, Michael Leonidovitch Starokadomsky's concerto, Op. 14, and the suite from Stravinsky's "Fire Bird."

The concerto by Starokadomsky, who was born in 1901, is new here, but was introduced to this country by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky on December 17, 1937. Dr. Rodzinski organized the NBC Symphony last fall and conducted several of its concerts last December and April.

DAYTON, O.
NEWS WEEK

NOV 23 1938

RECORD WEEK

One of the persons who had most to do with introducing the music of Jean Sibelius to America was Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony. Victor has released a recording by Koussevitzky and his orchestra of Sibelius' fifth symphony, and critics last week hailed the records as the most important of the year. Almost all felt that the symphony's earlier recording by the Sibelius Society was surpassed and likely to be replaced by the new album. (Symphony No. 5, E flat major, Opus 82, and the tone poem Pohjola's Daughter. Five 12-inch records, $10.)

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

NOV 27 1938

Records Take on New Value as Yule Gifts

With Christmas sneaking up, the possible utility of record albums as gifts takes prcedence over their value as additions to your own collection. Here are a few of Victor's recent releases, with suggestions as to the type of person they would be most likely to delight.

Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" is now available in the Lucien Cailliet transcription played by the Philadelphia orchestra under Eugene Ormandy. The piece makes a moderate sized album [four records, eight faces].

This is descriptive music, for the various short movements are intended to suggest tonally the various pictures which a visitor to the exhibition sees as he saunters around. There are gnomes, an old castle, an ancient market place, catacombs, the great gate of Kiev. Among the fantastic subjects is a hut on fowl's legs. The composer ventures into humor of character by presenting musically a Mr. Goldenburg and a Mr. Schmuyle. The set is ideal for some one who wishes to makes the acquaintance of the greatest of Russian composers yet demands some sort of help in the way of actual objects to hang the music on.

Even aside from its descriptive purpose, "Pictures at an Exhibition" is excellent, for the genius of the composer has extracted successfully the feeling tone of his various subjects and has re-presented it in music. The work is richly orchestrated [it was originally written for piano] and richly performed.

● ● ●

For the Sibelius fan among your friends there is a new recording of the Little Fifth symphony [E-flat major], complete with its haunting northern lyricism and its echoes of great sagas. To make a five record album, Victor has added the same composer's Symphonic fantasia "Pohjola's Daughter." Have no worry about the authenticity of the interpretation, for it is the charge of Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony orchestra, the most important Sibelius exponents in this country.

This album is valuable not only for Sibelius addicts but for any very musical person who wishes to become familiar with the work of the great Finnish composer. The Fifth symphony and this Symphonic fantasia contain some of his loveliest music.

● ● ●

But albums—even moderate sized albums—run into money. Here are a few individual records which may be purchased for tiny sums.

Marian Anderson, top ranking contralto, sings Bach's tremendous "Come, Sweet Death" on one side of a 10 inch record and Handel's "Siciliana" on the other. The Boston "Pops" orchestra, under Arthur Fiedler, fills both faces of a 12 incher with the gaudy ballet music from the third act of Saint-Saëns' "Samson and Delilah." The latter pressing is fine for a person who does not like "classical" music. The former would be a very doubtful choice for such a one.

The grave and the gay sides of Bach's genius are represented on opposite sides of a George Copeland [piano] record. A chorale fills one face, excerpts from the Fifth English suite the other.

Ten inchers of an easily appreciated sort are John Charles Thomas' "Children of Men" and "I Heard a Forest Praying," and Bruna Castagna's performance of the Seguidilla and the card song from "Carmen." To this same category belongs Weber's "Invitation to the Waltz" [Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia orchestra].

Important single recordings of a highly serious sort are a Kirsten Flagstad presentation of an air from Beethoven's "Fidelio" and Arturo Toscanini's performance of Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture. In this pressing, which was made abroad, the maestro directs the B. B. C. orchestra.

Hands Across the Keys

Abbreviated view of Jesus Maria Sanroma, soloist at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday and Saturday. The photograph is by his brother, John Sanroma.

CHICAGO, ILL.
DAILY CALUMET

NOV 28 1938

WORDS WITHOUT MUSIC

By LOUIS REID

(Music Features & Photo Syndicate, N. Y.)

WHEN it comes to songwriting industry consider Schubert and Brahms. Schubert, greatest creative genius in the world of song, wrote more than 600 melodies. Brahms, between symphonies and innumerable dance compositions, wrote more than 200 songs.

Louis Reid

Hackneyed Classics

Few are the listeners at the concert recitals of eminent vocalists who are familiar with more than a half dozen songs by these composers. Season after season, concert vocalists, touring the country, offer the same hackneyed songs of these composers. Inexplicable is their lack of enterprise and imagination in program-building.

Vocalists, for that matter, might also look into the unhackneyed songs of Mendelssohn, Debussy, Grieg and Hugo Wolf.

● ● ●

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is 58 years old, the Chicago 48, the Philadelphia 39 . . . John Charles Thomas has added Peter De Rose's ballad, "I Heard a Forest Praying"

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.

NOV 23 1938

New Haven

By Harold M. Bene

Jack Sidney in town briefly.

Chris Joyce out of hosp after operation.

Yale Drama will tour '1066 and All That.'

Boston Symph slated for second Woolsey Hall concert.

Alex Dean returns to Yale drama department early in the new year.

Hall Welles commuting between here and New York while doing Yale stage directing.

CINCINNATI, O.
RADIO DIAL

DEC 2 - 1938

Young Composer's "First Symphony" To Be Played

Completion of his "First Symphony," to be given its premiere at the New York 1939 World's Fair, was announced by Milton Rosen, brilliant young composer, who rejoined the musical staff of station WLW this week after a year's absence on the West Coast.

The premiere will be under the baton of Vladimir Bakaleinikoff, former assistant conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, who invited Mr. Rosen to join him in California in August, 1937.

MILTON ROSEN

Devoting his full time to writing Music, Mr. Rosen also composed a suite for orchestra entitled "Vintage '38," whose movements are named after various wines; wrote a book, "Encyclopedia of Orchestra and Band Instruments," and collaborated with Mr. Bakaleinikoff in two symphonic transcriptions. They were the "Adagio and Allegro Con Brio" of Beethoven and Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," now being published.

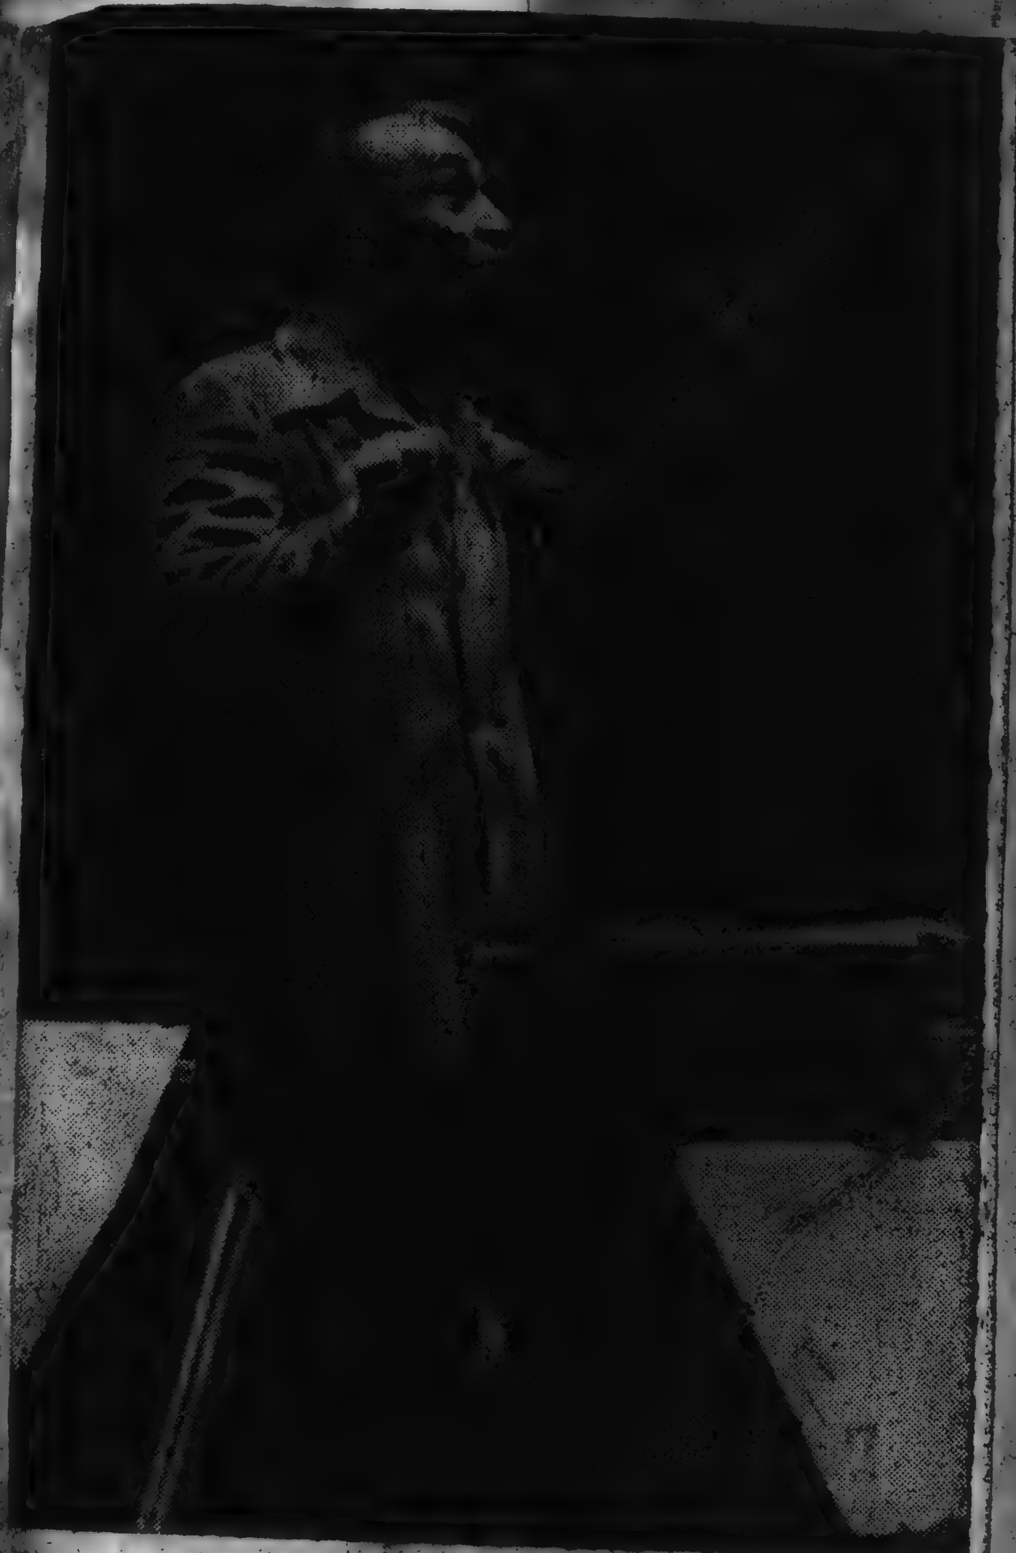
Mr. Rosen first received nationwide critical attention in 1934, when his "Columnist Suite" was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The permiere of his "Fantasie Americana" took place a year later at Boston, and was subsequently programmed by the Cincinnati Symphony.

At WLW he will reassume the dual capacity of composer-arranger on the musical staff.

83

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

NOV 27 1938



DIRECTS BOSTON SYMPHONY

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra, on the podium during a recent rehearsal.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, is offering four series of concerts to New England music lovers this year at Symphony Hall, Boston. Two six concert series are available on Monday nights at 8.15 p. m. and another six concert series is held Tuesday afternoons at 3 p. m. The usual series of 24 Friday afternoon concerts at 2.30 o'clock and Saturday evening concerts at 8.15 p. m. are being given this year.

In order to make it convenient for Worcester patrons of the orchestra to obtain tickets, a branch office will open tomorrow morning at Steinert's, 308 Main street. Tickets for all concerts, information on future concerts and photographs of Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra may be had at at any time.

On the Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon series this year Myra Hess, English pianist, is on the program as are Pierre and Genia Luboshutz, pianists. In one pair of concerts next March Igor Stravinsky, who will be visiting in America, will conduct in music of his own as will Georges Enesco. In both series the concerts continue through April. The dates are available at Symphony Hall for any of the series.

In addition to these Boston concerts the Boston Symphony, one of the nation's outstanding musical organizations, has scheduled eight concerts in Cambridge, five in Providence, 15 in New York and Brooklyn, two each in New Haven, Hartford and Pittsburgh and one each in Rochester, Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Toledo, Cleveland, New Brunswick, Philadelphia, and Northampton.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE

NOV 29 1938

Rodzinski Named by NBC

Will Conduct Orchestra in Four Saturday Night Broadcasts

The National Broadcasting Company announced yesterday that Dr. Artur Rodzinski, conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra, will direct the NBC Symphony Orchestra in its Saturday night broadcasts of December 10, 17, 24 and 31. Arturo Toscanini, who completes the first part of his second season with this orchestra with next Saturday night's broadcast, will resume his appearance in this series on January 7. Dr. Rodzinski's first program will consist of Russian works, Glinka's overture to "Russian and Ludmilla," Tchaikovsky's fifth symphony, Michael Leonidovitch Starokadomsky's concerto, Op. 14, and the suite from Stravinsky's "Fire Bird."

The concerto by Starokadomsky, who was born in 1901, is new here, but was introduced to this country by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky on December 17, 1937. Dr. Rodzinski organized the NBC Symphony last fall and conducted several of its concerts last December and April.

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

NOV 27 1938

Records Take on New Value as Yule Gifts

With Christmas sneaking up, the possible utility of record albums as gifts takes prcedence over their value as additions to your own collection. Here are a few of Victor's recent releases, with suggestions as to the type of person they would be most likely to delight.

Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" is now available in the Lucien Caillet transcription played by the Philadelphia orchestra under Eugene Ormandy. The piece makes a moderate sized album [four records, eight faces].

This is descriptive music, for the various short movements are intended to suggest tonally the various pictures which a visitor to the exhibition sees as he saunters around. There are gnomes, an old castle, an ancient market place, catacombs, the great gate of Kiev. Among the fantastic subjects is a hut on fowl's legs. The composer ventures into humor of character by presenting musically a Mr. Goldenburg and a Mr. Schmuyle. The set is ideal for some one who wishes to makes the acquaintance of the greatest of Russian composers yet demands some sort of help in the way of actual objects to hang the music on.

Even aside from its descriptive purpose, "Pictures at an Exhibition" is excellent, for the genius of the composer has extracted successfully the feeling tone of his various subjects and has re-presented it in music. The work is richly orchestrated [it was originally written for piano] and richly performed.

• • •

For the Sibelius fan among your friends there is a new recording of the Little Fifth symphony [E-flat major], complete with its haunting northern lyricism and its echoes of great sagas. To make a five record album, Victor has added the same composer's Symphonic fantasia "Pohjola's Daughter." Have no worry about the authenticity of the interpretation, for it is the charge of Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony orchestra, the most important Sibelius exponents in this country.

This album is valuable not only for Sibelius addicts but for any very musical person who wishes to become familiar with the work of the great Finnish composer. The Fifth symphony and this Symphonic fantasia contain some of his loveliest music.

• • •

But albums—even moderate sized albums—run into money. Here are a few individual records which may be purchased for tiny sums.

Marian Anderson, top ranking contralto, sings Bach's tremendous "Come, Sweet Death" on one side of a 10 inch record and Handel's "Siciliana" on the other. The Boston "Pops" orchestra, under Arthur Fiedler, fills both faces of a 12 incher with the gaudy ballet music from the third act of Saint-Saëns' "Samson and Delilah." The latter pressing is fine for a person who does not like "classical" music. The former would be a very doubtful choice for such a one.

The grave and the gay sides of Bach's genius are represented on opposite sides of a George Copeland [piano] record. A chorale fills one face, excerpts from the Fifth English suite the other.

Ten inchers of an easily appreciated sort are John Charles Thomas' "Children of Men" and "I Heard a Forest Praying," and Bruna Castagna's performance of the Seguidilla and the card song from "Carmen." To this same category belongs Weber's "Invitation to the Waltz" [Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia orchestra].

Important single recordings of a highly serious sort are a Kirsten Flagstad presentation of an air from Beethoven's "Fidelio" and Arturo Toscanini's performance of Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture. In this pressing, which was made abroad, the maestro directs the B. B. C. orchestra.

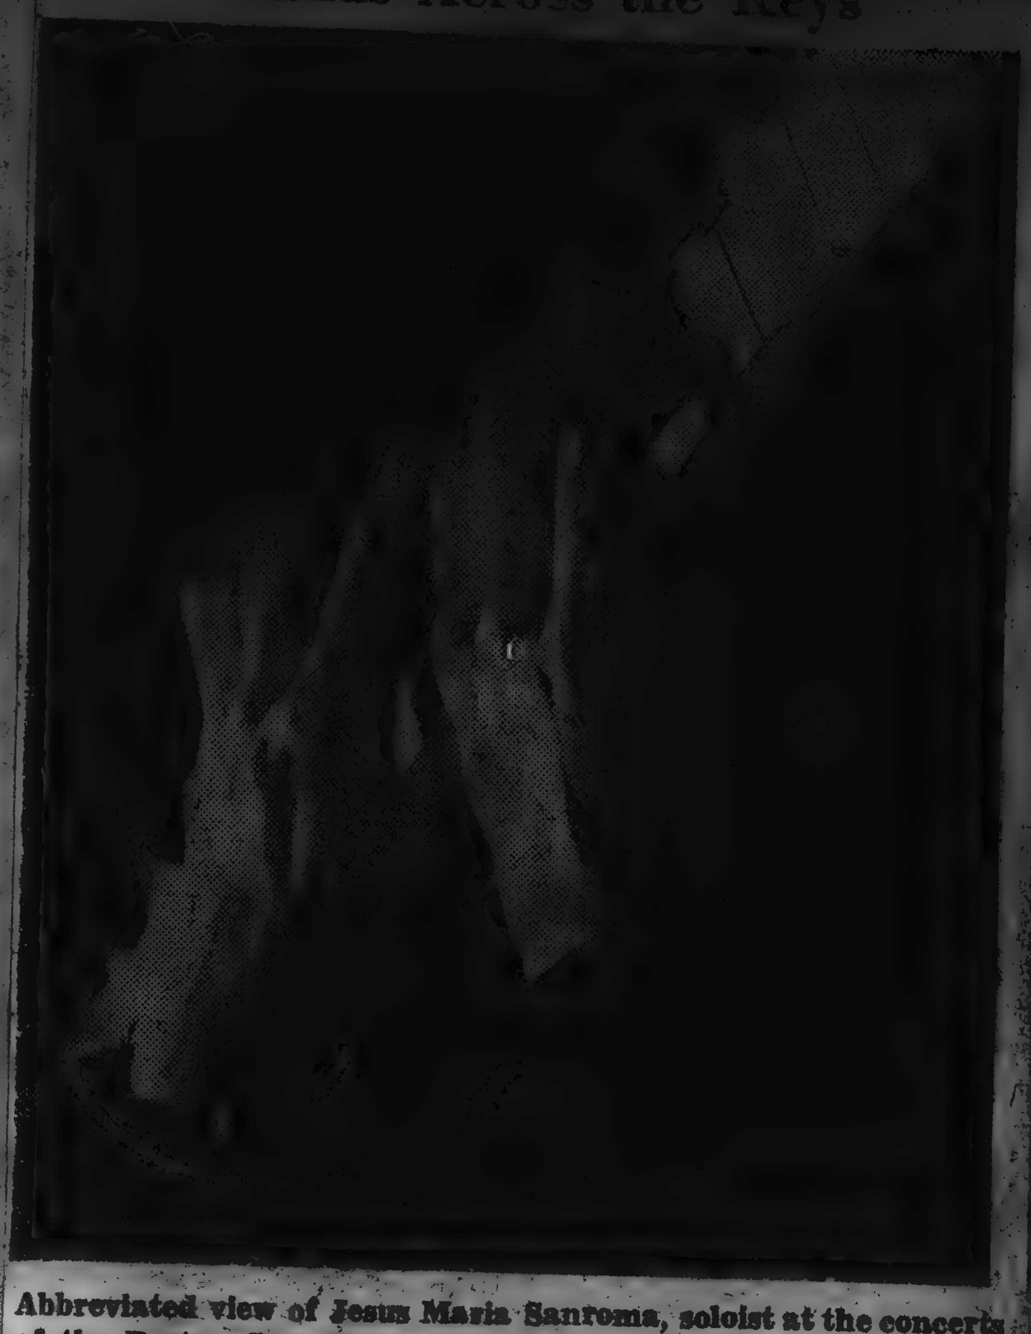
DAYTON, O.
NEWS WEEK

NOV 28 1938

RECORD WEEK

One of the persons who had most to do with introducing the music of Jean Sibelius to America was Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony. Victor has released a recording by Koussevitzky and his orchestra of Sibelius' fifth symphony, and critics last week hailed the records as the most important of the year. Almost all felt that the symphony's earlier recording by the Sibelius Society was surpassed and likely to be replaced by the new album. (Symphony No. 5, E flat major, Opus 82, and the tone poem Pohjola's Daughter. Five 12-inch records, $10.)

Hands Across the Keys



Abbreviated view of Jesus Maria Sanroma, soloist at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday and Saturday. The photograph is by his brother, John Sanroma.

CHICAGO, ILL.
DAILY CALUMET

NOV 28 1938

WORDS WITHOUT MUSIC

By LOUIS REID

(Music Features & Photo Syndicate, N. Y.)

WHEN it comes to songwriting industry consider Schubert and Brahms. Schubert, greatest creative genius in the world of song, wrote more than 600 melodies. Brahms, between symphonies and innumerable dance compositions, wrote more than 200 songs.

Louis Reid

Hackneyed Classics

Few are the listeners at the concert recitals of eminent vocalists who are familiar with more than a half dozen songs by these composers. Season after season, concert vocalists, touring the country, offer the same hackneyed songs of these composers. Inexplicable is their lack of enterprise and imagination in program-building.

Vocalists, for that matter, might also look into the unhackneyed songs of Mendelssohn, Debussy, Grieg and Hugo Wolf.

• • •

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is 58 years old, the Chicago 48, the Philadelphia 39. . . John Charles Thomas has added Peter De Rose's ballad, "I Heard a Forest Praying."

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.

NOV 23 1938

New Haven

By Harold M. Bone

Jack Sidney in town briefly.

Chris Joyce out of hosp after operation.

Yale Drama will tour '1066 and All That.'

Boston Symph slated for second Woolsey Hall concert.

Alex Dean returns to Yale drama department early in the new year.

Hall Welles commuting between here and New York while doing Yale stage directing.

CINCINNATI, O.
RADIO DIAL

DEC 2 - 1938

Young Composer's "First Symphony" To Be Played

Completion of his "First Symphony," to be given its premiere at the New York 1939 World's Fair, was announced by Milton Rosen, brilliant young composer, who rejoined the musical staff of station WLW this week after a year's absence on the West Coast.

The premiere will be under the baton of Vladimir Bakaleinikoff, former assistant conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, who invited Mr. Rosen to join him in California in August, 1937.

MILTON ROSEN

Devoting his full time to writing Music, Mr. Rosen also composed a suite for orchestra entitled "Vintage '38," whose movements are named after various wines; wrote a book, "Encyclopedia of Orchestra and Band Instruments," and collaborated with Mr. Bakaleinikoff in two symphonic transcriptions. They were the "Adagio and Allegro Con Brio" of Beethoven and Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," now being published.

Mr. Rosen first received nationwide critical attention in 1934, when his "Columnist Suite" was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The permiere of his "Fantasie Americana" took place a year later at Boston, and was subsequently programmed by the Cincinnati Symphony.

At WLW he will reassume the dual capacity of composer-arranger on the musical staff.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 6, 1938 B. Tran.

84

MUSIC

Recent Phonograph Records

Sibelius Fifth Superbly from the Bostonians; Some Music Associated with the Ballet

By MOSES SMITH

One of the most significant phonographic issues of the year and, by dint of that fact, in the history of the phonograph is the Victor album (Set No. M-474; ten 12-inch sides) devoted to the Fifth Symphony and "Pohjola's Daughter" by Sibelius, as played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky. The superlative performances by the same forces in Symphony Hall a few weeks ago is still fresh in the ears, and so there is nothing new to the records in that regard. What is new is the recording by Victor, surpassing even the previous high peak attained in the set given over to Prokofiev's "Lieutenant Kije." The remarkable series of recordings emanating indirectly from Symphony Hall in recent months, almost every one showing an improvement over the preceding, seems definitely not to be an accident, but very likely the result of a careful study of the specific acoustical medium—in this case, the Symphony Hall stage and auditorium. Both performance and recording promptly outmode the Victor album, satisfactory only a few months ago, in which Robert Kajanus and the London Symphony Orchestra traversed the same pieces in addition to Sibelius' "Tapiola."

Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" is also brilliantly recorded by Victor and brilliantly played by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Eugene Ormandy (Album No. M-442; eight twelve-inch sides). One may even speak of the orchestral transcription of Lucien Cailliet as brilliant, but the comparison with the old Boston Symphony recording of the "Pictures" ends there. Because obviously Cailliet is no Ravel. And even if he were, he would be hard put to it to provide an alternate transcription to one which is already a model of its kind for the music in question.

Related to the Dance

Meanwhile, Victor has issued several other albums now related to the dance in the public mind, the vogue for the ballet being what it is. A Bostonian, listening to first-rate performances of music that, in local productions, has been treated as a trivial accessory to the dance, envies the residents of other American cities where the ballet enlists the aid of the symphony orchestra. At any rate, there is some fun in hearing this music well played and imagining the accompanying action.

Eugene Goossens and the London Symphony Orchestra provide an excellent performance of a suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Coq d'or," the recording being good, too (Victor album M-504; six twelve-inch sides). The Boston Pops Orchestra under Arthur Fiedler also turns in a good account of a suite from De Falla's "Three-Cornered Hat," recorded according to the customary very high standards, but this set (Victor album M-505; four ten-inch sides) does not quite fill the need of the other, since there are reasonably good versions of de Falla's music available.

It is hard to know quite what to make of the playing of the "Polovetzian" Dances from "Prince Igor" by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Leopold Stokowski (Victor Album M-499; four twelve-inch sides). The playing is, of course, virtuosic in character. But it is badly mannered, according to the sometimes arbitrary, sometimes sentimental dictates of the Stokowskian muse. Besides, his own orchestral transcription (introducing some matter from the opera with which I am unfamiliar) seems far from an improvement over the one we usually hear at concerts (by Rimsky-Korsahov, I believe).

Stokowski seems also to have meddled with the Berlioz transcription of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" or to have made his own for a recent record (Victor 15189; twelve-inch). At any rate, there seems to be some over-lush patches of instrumentation, which mar an otherwise spirited and brilliant rendering. And here I may mention another single orchestral record, though it has nothing to do with the dance, containing a performance of Mozart's "Magic Flute" Overture by the B. B. C. Symphony Orchestra under Arturo Toscanini (Victor 15190; twelve-inch). It is a marvelously vibrant delivery by a first-class orchestra. But it is too vibrant, too dramatic; the tension is a little too great for Mozart, it seems to me. And the recording, wonderful as it is, seems to me too high-powered.

Unadorned "Nutcracker"

We have to be reminded occasionally that the delicious "Nutcracker" Suite by Tchaikovsky is drawn from his music to a ballet. In presenting it again on records Decca has varied the usual procedure, and for a reason. The orchestra has been reduced to chamber dimensions, though none of the required instruments is missing, and it is an admirable ensemble directed by Alexander Smallens. The version is "stream-lined." That is to say, all repeats are omitted, as is introductory material not germane, so to say, to the principal issue.

Such a procedure cuts the usually repetitious "Valse des fleurs" into rather less than half. Boiled-down versions of the classics are ordinarily objectionable. But when they are done as tastefully as here and for a frankly educational purpose the usual objections, it seems to me, do not prevail. The set (Decca album 23; six ten-inch sides) serves a purpose for which a larger set would be clumsy, and is in line with the admirable series of children's records issued by Decca to date.

December 1, 1938

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

ELISABETH SCHUMANN

NOVEMBER 17

Boston Symphony Orchestra To commemorate the death of Ravel a year ago, Serge Koussevitzky programmed the composer's suite, Tombeau de Couperin, at the initial seasonal concert of the orchestra from Boston, given before numerous Carnegie Hall subscribers. The aristocratic, perfectly fashioned music had finely-chiseled reading and performance.

Two "fifth" symphonies made up the rest of the bill, those by Sibelius and Beethoven, and showed a vast gulf of difference, with the former's involved thought and tortuous development, and the latter's heart-warming melodies and directness of statement. Symphonic language is indeed resourceful when it can lend itself to such contrasting expression.

Koussevitzky had his material beautifully in hand and received everything from his players in quality of tone and brilliancy of technic.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Carnegie Hall matinée auditors were treated to the unusual experience of hearing a living American composer share a program with Beethoven and Brahms—respectively, the second and fourth symphonies—coming off with high credit in the contact, and being vociferously applauded while he bowed from a box, and then from the stage.

The fortunate native was Aaron Copland, whose recent opus, El Salon Mexico, Serge Koussevitzky conducted with colorful glow and fine rhythmic verve. The opus treats Mexican themes interestingly, has facile orchestration and employs harmonies that appropriately keep the melody in chief emphasis—a proceeding not so easy for modern composers.

The Boston players and their leader gave finished simplicity to the early Beethoven music, and proclaimed and "sang" Brahms with lofty effect.

CLEVELAND, O.
Euclid Weekly Observer

NOV 16 1938

Reviewing Records

By

NORMAN NADEL

SWING drops to the lower half of the column this week to make way for a hit-of-the-week, or month, that will still be great music when the high gods of the jitterbugs, with their best recordings, will be outmoded as bustles and remembered only by historical societies as "typical of the 1930's."

Jan Sibelius, the Finnish composer best known, perhaps, for his tone poem, "Finlandia," created one of the most beautiful of modern musical structures in his symphony number 5 in E flat major, recorded this month for Victor by the Boston symphony orchestra under Serge Koussevitsky. The fifth is rich and filling. Its architecture is clean-cut and trim. It is neither ornate nor stark and severe. He has, in short, combined the grace of a Debussy poem with the economy of decorative orchestration of his own second symphony.

Little need be said about the quality of the recording or of the orchestra's performance, for both are superb. To be especially noted are the strange, moving quality of the strings in the mysterioso passage of the first movement, and the lovely and amazingly simple horn theme in the third.

Completing this set of five records, listed Victor M-474, is "Pohjola's Daughter," also by Sibelius, a more descriptive work based on an old Norse myth.

CARLISLE, PA.
SENTINEL

NOV 25 1938

The World of Music

New York (U.P.)—The opening of

Eugene Goossens, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, commented on his return from Europe that the present disturbed condition of the world has hampered musical composition. He complained that few works are being written which deserve to be ranked as masterpieces.

Goossens said while great upheavals tend to produce great music when they have died down and artists are able to retire into a calm, creative atmosphere, the present upheaval is a continuing process that gives no interlude for contemplation.

Goossens praised the quality of contemporary English composition, which he feels has been unduly neglected. One of the new works which he has brought back is a "Variation on the Theme of Frank Bridges," by Benjamin Bridges, young English composer.

After conducting the Boston Symphony in New York this week, Goossen returns to Cincinnati for his regular season.

HYANNIS, MASS.
Weekly Barnstable Patriot

NOV 17 1938

Here & There

By Samuel T. Stewart

The Cape is to be congratulated on the series of concerts it is to have this winter with such an artist as Albert Spaulding the first one. The financial success is apparently assured with the list of patrons over subscribed. Not only are such concerts a success from a musical standpoint, they unite the Cape more and more as a single unit.

* * * * * *

For historical parallel we can go back fifty years to Cleveland, Ohio where the lead was taken by the then Professor of Music in the Public schools. There was big barn of an auditorium called Doan's Music Hall, but it did hold five thousand people. What was called the "Star Course" was started and ran for a number of years. Ten entertainments for a dollar, general admission, reserved seats up to two dollars extra. Such people as John D. Rockefeller, Myron T. Herrick, Charles F. Brush (the original Arc Light Manufacturer), and a host of other people, acted as patrons and guaranteed the first financing. The concerts were the finest to be had with such organizations and artists as The Boston Symphony Orchestra, P. S. Gilmore's band, Adelina Patti, Victor Herbert, Paderewski. Cleveland became music conscious and owes its present Symphony orchestra to this beginning and to the fact that every child in the public schools was taught to read and sing music of a high grade. Who can tell what may come to the Cape from this beginning?

* * * * * *

Consciously or unconsciously Hyannis is building up a Civic center of which it is going to be proud. The Town House, the new postoffice fit into the picture and it is hoped that the new library is going to belong. The new newspaper building is down the street, but is of the right type. There are not many towns of its size in the country which can boast of its equal. Town planning does pay.

* * * * * *

Commander MacMillan once more brings us pictures from the far north and those who were priviledged to see his color films of the midnight sun will not soon forget the wonder of it. What a thrill the trip must have been to the young men who made up the crew and how real the experiences to make a hardened adventurer like Lowell Thomas regret that he was not along. Go again Mack and bring us more pictures and tell us about them in your own delightful flow of words.

* * * * * *

Years ago it was our privilege to drill under a German instructor in the old Central Park Riding Academy in New York which stood on Seventh Avenue between 58th and 59th Street. Whether it was the gutterals of the German dialect or the harsh way in which commands were given, an antagonism grew up which still lurks in memory. And this was long before the World War. One can realize what the under dogs in Germany are feeling today with every rowdy on the street a potential volcano of abuse. There must be somewhere among the German people a leaven of fair dealing and sympathy which will some day come to the fore, we here in America know those of German stock to be as fine as they come, the best of neighbors and citizens. Perhaps it is the truckling under to those in authority makes them take it out on those over whom they in turn have power. Our old Yankee spirit of "I am as good as the next" does build up a spirit of fairness after all.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER - CITIZEN

NOV 23 1938

MOMENTS MUSICAL

By SIDNEY . FLEET

To Whom Announcements and Communications on Musical Matters May Be Addr sed at This Office.

Having discussed musical matters and other topics with her in the course of summer vacations in East Gloucester, there was more than ordinary interest in reading Ethel Peyser's book, "The House that Music Built."

This is the story of Carnegie hall in New York in which the author as a reviewer of music and a writer of musical articles for several publications has been a frequent visitor. Naturally, since the primary purpose of the house was to provide an auditorium in which great artists and symphonic orchestras might be heard to the best advantage, the story of Carnegie hall reflects an era of great development in music in America.

But it is more than a concert hall. The structure contains the studios not only of teachers of music and composers but of creative artists in other lines, painters notable among them. And one of the most interesting chapters of Miss Peyser's narrative is that in which she tells of these tenants and their activities. Here is a veritable colony of artists.

As Walter Damrosch says in an introductory note to the volume, "the 100th anniversary of the birth of Andrew Carnegie has been an appropriate time for the preparation of this book. It is a vivid and interesting narrative of what might ordinarily have been only a schedule of events." For Dr. Damrosch there is a special interest in the book because from him and his distinguished father Leopold Mr. Carnegie's idea for a new music hall, much needed at the time, stemmed. If the thrifty Scotsman bought the site, then considered altogether too far up town, and made possible the building of the structure, it was for him a business venture and not a philanthropy. He anticipated that it could be made to pay its way. And despite some vicissitudes, which at one time led to talk of its demolition, that faith has been confirmed.

To quote Dr. Damrosch again: "If we want to get a picture of the musical life of New York during the last half century, we need only to look through Chapter 14 of this book, entitled Parnassus and the programs of the thousands of concerts that have been given within the walls."

It is interesting to notice that the Boston Symphony Orchestra first came to Music hall, as the house was then known, in the season of 1893-94. Prior to that time it had played in Steinway hall, in Chickering hall. Subsequently for a period from 1894 to 1898, its concerts were given in the Metropolitan Opera House. In the latter year under Gericke it returned to Music hall which by that time was called Carnegie hall. Since then the Boston orchestra figures frequently in the list of the first American performances of important orchestral compositions which Miss Peyser has painstakingly compiled.

Perusal of the many concert programs reveals a roster of the most distinguished in the art of music. From the House that Music Built has radiated an important influence upon the art and the appreciation of it in America. Miss Peyser may be thanked for the researches that make all the varied details of the story available in such convenient and readable form. The book is from the press of Robert M. McBride & Co., New York.

Boston Programs.

Guest conductor at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this week will be Eugen Goossens, the English musician who is now conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra. His program will include Handel's Overture to the "Occasional" Oratorio; Schumann's "Carnival" arranged for orchestra by Rimsky-Korsakoff; two Nature Poems of his own composition; Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" Symphony.

Just back from England he reports that more actual music of the creative sphere is being produced in England today than in any other nation. "When an Englishman chooses to say something, he takes care that he has something to say," avers Mr. Goossens, adding: "If England were to wave the flag a little more, in respect to her arts, the world would be staggered."

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 6, 1938 B. Trans.

MUSIC

Recent Phonograph Records

Sibelius Fifth Superbly from the Bostonians; Some Music Associated with the Ballet

By MOSES SMITH

One of the most significant phonographic issues of the year and, by dint of that fact, in the history of the phonograph is the Victor album (Set No. M-474; ten 12-inch sides) devoted to the Fifth Symphony and "Pohjola's Daughter" by Sibelius, as played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky. The superlative performances by the same forces in Symphony Hall a few weeks ago is still fresh in the ears, and so there is nothing new to the records in that regard. What is new is the recording by Victor, surpassing even the previous high peak attained in the set given over to Prokofiev's "Lieutenant Kije." The remarkable series of recordings emanating indirectly from Symphony Hall in recent months, almost every one showing an improvement over the preceding, seems definitely not to be an accident, but very likely the result of a careful study of the specific acoustical medium—in this case, the Symphony Hall stage and auditorium. Both performance and recording promptly outmode the Victor album, satisfactory only a few months ago, in which Robert Kajanus and the London Symphony Orchestra traversed the same pieces in addition to Sibelius' "Tapiola."

Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" is also brilliantly recorded by Victor and brilliantly played by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Eugene Ormandy (Album No. M-442; eight twelve-inch sides). One may even speak of the orchestral transcription of Lucien Cailliet as brilliant, but the comparison with the old Boston Symphony recording of the "Pictures" ends there. Because obviously Cailliet is no Ravel. And even if he were, he would be hard put to it to provide an alternate transcription to one which is already a model of its kind for the music in question.

Related to the Dance

Meanwhile, Victor has issued several other albums now related to the dance in the public mind, the vogue for the ballet being what it is. A Bostonian, listening to first-rate performances of music that, in local productions, has been treated as a trivial accessory to the dance, envies the residents of other American cities where the ballet enlists the aid of the symphony orchestra. At any rate, there is some fun in hearing this music well played and imagining the accompanying action.

Eugene Goossens and the London Symphony Orchestra provide an excellent performance of a suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Coq d'or," the recording being good, too (Victor album M-504; six twelve-inch sides). The Boston Pops Orchestra under Arthur Fiedler also turns in a good account of a suite from De Falla's "Three-Cornered Hat," recorded according to the customary very high standards, but this set (Victor album M-505; four ten-inch sides) does not quite fill the need of the other, since there are reasonably good versions of de Falla's music available.

It is hard to know quite what to make of the playing of the "Polovetzian" Dances from "Prince Igor" by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Leopold Stokowski (Victor Album M-499; four twelve-inch sides). The playing is, of course, virtuosic in character. But it is badly mannered, according to the sometimes arbitrary, sometimes sentimental dictates of the Stokowskian muse. Besides, his own orchestral transcription (introducing some matter from the opera with which I am unfamiliar) seems far from an improvement over the one we usually hear at concerts (by Rimsky-Korsahov, I believe).

Stokowski seems also to have meddled with the Berlioz transcription of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" or to have made his own for a recent record (Victor 15189; twelve-inch). At any rate, there seems to be some overlush patches of instrumentation, which mar an otherwise spirited and brilliant rendering. And here I may mention another single orchestral record, though it has nothing to do with the dance, containing a performance of Mozart's "Magic Flute" Overture by the B. B. C. Symphony Orchestra under Arturo Toscanini (Victor 15190; twelve-inch). It is a marvelously vibrant delivery by a first-class orchestra. But it is too vibrant, too dramatic; the tension is a little too great for Mozart, it seems to me. And the recording, wonderful as it is, seems to me too high-powered.

Unadorned "Nutcracker"

We have to be reminded occasionally that the delicious "Nutcracker" Suite by Tchaikovsky is drawn from his music to a ballet. In presenting it again on records Decca has varied the usual procedure, and for a reason. The orchestra has been reduced to chamber dimensions, though none of the required instruments is missing, and it is an admirable ensemble directed by Alexander Smallens. The version is "stream-lined." That is to say, all repeats are omitted, as is introductory material not germane, so to say, to the principal issue.

Such a procedure cuts the usually repetitious "Valse des fleurs" into rather less than half. Boiled-down versions of the classics are ordinarily objectionable. But when they are done as tastefully as here and for a frankly educational purpose the usual objections, it seems to me, do not prevail. The set (Decca album 23; six ten-inch sides) serves a purpose for which a larger set would be clumsy, and is in line with the admirable series of children's records issued by Decca to date.

December 1, 1938

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

ELISABETH SCHUMANN

NOVEMBER 17

Boston Symphony Orchestra To commemorate the death of Ravel a year ago, Serge Koussevitzky programmed the composer's suite, Tombeau de Couperin, at the initial seasonal concert of the orchestra from Boston, given before numerous Carnegie Hall subscribers. The aristocratic, perfectly fashioned music had finely-chiseled reading and performance.

Two "fifth" symphonies made up the rest of the bill, those by Sibelius and Beethoven, and showed a vast gulf of difference, with the former's involved thought and tortuous development, and the latter's heart-warming melodies and directness of statement. Symphonic language is indeed resourceful when it can lend itself to such contrasting expression.

Koussevitzky had his material beautifully in hand and received everything from his players in quality of tone and brilliancy of technic.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Carnegie Hall matinée auditors were treated to the unusual experience of hearing a living American composer share a program with Beethoven and Brahms—respectively, the second and fourth symphonies—coming off with high credit in the contact, and being vociferously applauded while he bowed from a box, and then from the stage.

The fortunate native was Aaron Copland, whose recent opus, El Salon Mexico, Serge Koussevitzky conducted with colorful glow and fine rhythmic verve. The opus treats Mexican themes interestingly, has facile orchestration and employs harmonies that appropriately keep the melody in chief emphasis—a proceeding not so easy for modern composers.

The Boston players and their leader gave finished simplicity to the early Beethoven music, and proclaimed and "sang" Brahms with lofty effect.

HYANNIS, MASS.
Weekly Barnstable Patriot

NOV 17 1938

Here & There

By Samuel T. Stewart

The Cape is to be congratulated on the series of concerts it is to have this winter with such an artist as Albert Spaulding the first one. The financial success is apparently assured with the list of patrons over subscribed. Not only are such concerts a success from a musical standpoint, they unite the Cape more and more as a single unit.

* * * * * *

For historical parallel we can go back fifty years to Cleveland, Ohio where the lead was taken by the then Professor of Music in the Public schools. There was big barn of an auditorium called Doan's Music Hall, but it did hold five thousand people. What was called the "Star Course" was started and ran for a number of years. Ten entertainments for a dollar, general admission, reserved seats up to two dollars extra. Such people as John D. Rockefeller, Myron T. Herrick, Charles F. Brush (the original Arc Light Manufacturer), and a host of other people, acted as patrons and guaranteed the first financing. The concerts were the finest to be had with such organizations and artists as The Boston Symphony Orchestra, P. S. Gilmore's band, Adelina Patti, Victor Herbert, Paderewski. Cleveland became music conscious and owes its present Symphony orchestra to this beginning and to the fact that every child in the public schools was taught to read and sing music of a high grade. Who can tell what may come to the Cape from this beginning?

* * * * * *

Consciously or unconsciously Hyannis is building up a Civic center of which it is going to be proud. The Town House, the new postoffice fit into the picture and it is hoped that the new library is going to belong. The new newspaper building is down the street, but is of the right type. There are not many towns of its size in the country which can boast of its equal. Town planning does pay.

* * * * * *

Commander MacMillan once more brings us pictures from the far north and those who were priviledged to see his color films of the midnight sun will not soon forget the wonder of it. What a thrill the trip must have been to the young men who made up the crew and how real the experiences to make a hardened adventurer like Lowell Thomas regret that he was not along. Go again Mack and bring us more pictures and tell us about them in your own delightful flow of words.

* * * * * *

Years ago it was our privilege to drill under a German instructor in the old Central Park Riding Academy in New York which stood on Seventh Avenue between 58th and 59th Street. Whether it was the gutterals of the German dialect or the harsh way in which commands were given, an antagonism grew up which still lurks in memory. And this was long before the World War. One can realize what the under dogs in Germany are feeling today with every rowdy on the street a potential volcano of abuse. There must be somewhere among the German people a leaven of fair dealing and sympathy which will some day come to the fore, we here in America know those of German stock to be as fine as they come, the best of neighbors and citizens. Perhaps it is the truckling under to those in authority makes them take it out on those over whom they in turn have power. Our old Yankee spirit of "I am as good as the next" does build up a spirit of fairness after all.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER - CITIZEN

NOV 23 1938

MOMENTS MUSICAL

By SIDNEY FLEET

To Whom Announcements and Communications on Musical Matters May Be Addressed at This Office.

Having discussed musical matters and other topics with her in the course of summer vacations in East Gloucester, there was more than ordinary interest in reading Ethel Peyser's book, "The House that Music Built."

This is the story of Carnegie hall in New York in which the author as a reviewer of music and a writer of musical articles for several publications has been a frequent visitor. Naturally, since the primary purpose of the house was to provide an auditorium in which great artists and symphonic orchestras might be heard to the best advantage, the story of Carnegie hall reflects an era of great development in music in America.

But it is more than a concert hall. The structure contains the studios not only of teachers of music and composers but of creative artists in other lines, painters notable among them. And one of the most interesting chapters of Miss Peyser's narrative is that in which she tells of these tenants and their activities. Here is a veritable colony of artists.

As Walter Damrosch says in an introductory note to the volume, "the 100th anniversary of the birth of Andrew Carnegie has been an appropriate time for the preparation of this book. It is a vivid and interesting narrative of what might ordinarily have been only a schedule of events." For Dr. Damrosch there is a special interest in the book because from him and his distinguished father Leopold Mr. Carnegie's idea for a new music hall, much needed at the time, stemmed. If the thrifty Scotsman bought the site, then considered altogether too far up town, and made possible the building of the structure, it was for him a business venture and not a philanthropy. He anticipated that it could be made to pay its way. And, despite some vicissitudes, which at one time led to talk of its demolition, that faith has been confirmed.

To quote Dr. Damrosch again: "If we want to get a picture of the musical life of New York during the last half century, we need only to look through Chapter 14 of this book, entitled Parnassus and the programs of the thousands of concerts that have been given within the walls."

It is interesting to notice that the Boston Symphony Orchestra first came to Music hall, as the house was then known, in the season of 1893-94. Prior to that time it had played in Steinway hall, in Chickering hall. Subsequently for a period from 1894 to 1898, its concerts were given in the Metropolitan Opera House. In the latter year under Gericke it returned to Music hall which by that time was called Carnegie hall. Since then the Boston orchestra figures frequently in the list of the first American performances of important orchestral compositions which Miss Peyser has painstakingly compiled.

Perusal of the many concert programs reveals a roster of the most distinguished in the art of music. From the "House that Music Built has radiated an important influence upon the art and the appreciation of it in America. Miss Peyser may be thanked for the researches that make all the varied details of the story available in such convenient and readable form. The book is from the press of Robert M. McBride & Co., New York.

Boston Programs.

Guest conductor at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this week will be Eugen Goossens, the English musician who is now conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra. His program will include Handel's Overture to the "Occasional" Oratorio; Schumann's "Carnival" arranged for orchestra by Rimsky-Korsakoff; two Nature Poems of his own composition; Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" Symphony.

Just back from England he reports that more actual music of the creative sphere is being produced in England today than in any other nation. "When an Englishman chooses to say something, he takes care that he has something to say," avers Mr. Goossens, adding: "If England were to wave the flag a little more, in respect to her arts, the world would be staggered."

CLEVELAND, O.
Euclid Weekly Observer

NOV 16 1938

Reviewing Records

By
NORMAN NADEL

SWING drops to the lower half of the column this week to make way for a hit-of-the-week, or month, that will still be great music when the high gods of the jitterbugs, with their best recordings, will be outmoded as bustles and remembered only by historical societies as "typical of the 1930's."

Jan Sibelius, the Finnish composer best known, perhaps, for his tone poem, "Finlandia," created one of the most beautiful of modern musical structures in his symphony number 5 in E flat major, recorded this month for Victor by the Boston symphony orchestra under Serge Koussevitsky. The fifth is rich and filling. Its architecture is clean-cut and trim. It is neither ornate nor stark and severe. He has, in short, combined the grace of a Debussy poem with the economy of decorative orchestration of his own second symphony.

Little need be said about the quality of the recording or of the orchestra's performance, for both are superb. To be especially noted are the strange, moving quality of the strings in the mysterioso passage of the first movement, and the lovely and amazingly simple horn theme in the third.

Completing this set of five records, listed Victor M-474, is "Pohjola's Daughter," also by Sibelius, a more descriptive work based on an old Norse myth.

CARLISLE, PA.
SENTINEL

NOV 25 1938

The World of Music

New York (I.P.)—The opening of

Eugene Goossens, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, commented on his return from Europe that the present disturbed condition of the world has hampered musical composition. He complained that few works are being written which deserve to be ranked as masterpieces.

Goossens said while great upheavals tend to produce great music when they have died down and artists are able to retire into a calm, creative atmosphere, the present upheaval is a continuing process that gives no interlude for contemplation.

Goossens praised the quality of contemporary English composition, which he feels has been unduly neglected. One of the new works which he has brought back is a "Variation on the Theme of Frank Bridges," by Benjamin Bridges, young English composer.

After conducting the Boston Symphony in New York this week, Goossen returns to Cincinnati for his regular season.

NUTLEY, N. J.
WEEKLY SUN

25 1938

Musical Silhouettes

A weekly outline of music by LEON CARSON

CCLX

Every great man . . . who has sought to bring birth to the souls of men has learned that nothing more surely provokes the hatred of the world than the knowledge that he is steering by a star they cannot see. MURRY

Who's Right:

What makes a good conductor? That's the question.

The records show that the great composer Richard Wagner once gave two fundamental rules for the conductor's art, — namely, giving the true tempo to the orchestra and then establishing the unifying line which gives a composition its form and shape.

Referring to these fundamental principles John Barbirolli, Conductor of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra, recently explained that given these two qualities "we have the conductor in excelsis and that most of our (conductors') lives must be spent in pursuance of these qualities, more especially the first." He added that he would advise any aspiring young conductor to choose as his ideal, — "Integrity and sincerity to yourself and loyalty to the man whose music you are seeking to interpret. Never think 'What can I make of this piece?,' but try to discover what the composer meant to say."

And now along comes Serge Koussevitzky, that intrepid conductor of the famous Boston Symphony Orhcestra, with his own declaration that the most important part of a conductor's art can neither be read nor learned, but that it rests with the conductor himself in his own emotions, depth and feeling. "Today" he continues "we often hear 'Let music speak for itself.' That up-to-date motto is dangerous, because it paves the way for mediocre performers to come and acurately play over a composition from beginning to end, claiming that they 'let the music speak for itself . . . . The deeper the emotion of the interpreter the greater and more vivid the performance. Let us have interpretation, then,—plus integrity."

And there you have it. Two rather opposite opinions from two great musicians. By chance, wouldn't it be a good idea for our young conductors to first trust to the fact that the composer knew exactly what was required to make the performance of his composition successfully complete, and that after an accurate reading of the score, to then apply his emotional instinct well within the confines of the composer's markings?

CANTON, ILL.
LEDGER

NOV 26 1938

Eugene Goossens, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, commented on his return from Europe that the present disturbed condition of the world has hampered musical composition. He complained that few works are being written which deserve to be ranked as masterpieces.

Gossens said that while great upheavals tend to produce great music when they have died down and artists are able to retire into a calm, creative atmosphere, the present upheaval is a continuing process that gives no interlude for contemplation.

Goossens, praised the quality of contemporary English composition, which he feels has been unduly neglected. One of the new works he has brought back is a "Variation on the Theme of Frank Bridges," by Benjamin Bridges, young English composer.

After conducting the Boston Symphony in New York this week, Goossen returns to Cincinnati for his regular season.

WAUKESHA, WIS.
FREEMAN

NOV 26 1938

EUGENE GOOSSENS, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony orches-

Etc. Like above

N. TONAWANDA, N. Y.
EVENING NEWS

NOV 26 1938

Eugene Goossens, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orches- Etc

---

BILLINGS, MONT.
MORNING GAZETTE

NOV 27 1938

Eugene Goossens, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony orchestra, Etc.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

NOV 26 1938

2 Symphony Concerts Due in December

The first week in December offers almost a Roman holiday for symphony-lovers. Our own Buffalo orchestra of the WPA Federal Music project will give its second concert on the afternoon of Dec. 4, bringing to the city the celebrated 'cello virtuoso, Emanuel Feuermann, as soloist.

Mr. Feuermann, an Austrian, has established an enviable reputation in Europe and this country for his exceptional technique and excellent interpretations. He has played with such famous conductors as Pierre Monteux of Paris, Felix Weingartner of Vienna and Bruno Walter of Berlin. At the local concert he will play two concertos, one by Schumann and one by Boccherini.

The orchestra, in keeping with Conductor Franco Autori's policy of presenting an American composition on each program, will play Samuel Barber's "Symphony in One Movement." Mr. Barber's symphony was first played by the Cleveland orchestra under Artur Rodzinski in 1937.

The famous Boston Symphony orchestra, about which there have been numerous rumors anent a possible European tour next Spring, will play here on Dec. 6 in Mrs. Zorah B. Berry's evening series. Under its dynamic and musically unconventional conductor, Serge Koussevitzky; this group will play Beethoven's second symphony and Brahms' fourth symphony.

Both concerts will take place in the Buffalo Consistory.

TIMES UNION
ROCHESTER, N. Y.

NOV 26 1938

Boston Symphony Here Dec. 5

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will appear in the Eastman Theater Monday evening, Dec. 5 as the second attraction in Sereis A of the concerts sponsored by the Civic Music Association.

Included in the program are the Beethoven Fifth Symphony; the Sibelius Fifth; and Ravel's Concerto for Piano and Orchestra. Jesus Maria Sanroma, noted Cuban pianist, will be soloist.

WALTHAM, MASS.
NEWS TRIBUNE

NOV 28 1938

Eugene Goossens, conductor for Cincinnati Symphony Orches- Etc.

CLEVELAND, TENN.
BANNER

EUGENE GOOSSENS, conductor of the Cincinnati Sym

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

NOV 27 1938

Wagner Program Here Represents Growth

Welcome Development Seen In Taste for Music of Great Composer

By Alice Eversman.

It was not a long time ago, as time is reckoned, that an evening of Wagner's music was a severe test of the staying powers of an audience. The minority that liked it was completely overshadowed by the great majority who sought superlatives to express its disapproval of it. The pros and cons of Wagner's music became a favorite argument of musical circles until not so many years ago. But times have changed and understanding has grown so that, as the wheel of progress turns, we find a cult of Wagner penetrating every land. In this country the great music of Wagner is particularly revered, and the program which the Philadelphia Orchestra will give on Tuesday night is bound to be a welcome one.

Surely no more contradictory person ever lived than Wagner. His many weak points, his vanity, his affection and his egotism were never hidden nor glossed over, and from a personal standpoint he had little to recommend him to undying fame. But in this individual, who lived his life in complete disregard of others, there glowed an unquenchable flame, a powerful force that was greater than the righteousness of more God-fearing men. This flame was music and the force his unique comprehension of the mystic and superhuman elements that are strong, if latent, in the human race.

In the beginning of the Wagner cult it was the fashion to believe that most of his music was obscure and required deep study in order to understand it. It was considered the ne plus ultra of culture to be able to comprehend the work of this master. This attitude would have vastly astonished Wagner himself, no doubt, who, time and again, reiterated that he was composing for the multitude. With the passing of the years it has been proven how right the master was and how much better he understood his fellow beings than they did themselves.

For he knew that hidden away in every one's make-up is a leaning toward that glorious land of dreams and fables where great deeds are done and where men are heroes in very fact. He proved the correctness of his belief by finding his own musical inspiration in the myothology of the northland, by bringing to life the gods and goddesses of the long dead past. And in contemplating their homeland, in re-creating their experiences, he has written some of the greatest music ever to be inscribed by mortal hand.

In these marvelous creations, so borderless in the immensity of their ideas and sound effects, Wagner lifts his listeners into a grandeur of mood and a courage of spirit that is man's birthright. It is the mood and courage that lies sleeping in every one and which every one longs to have revived in himself. The heroes and the heroines of his music dramas are of the same stuff that began the molding of character in the nursery and were the aim and ideal of the child who is father to the man.

Wagner understood human nature well and people are beginning to discover it. It is not, today, his appeal to the intellectual and the cultured that counts as much as the stirring of latent forces in every individual which his music arouses. He has reached his desire of being known as a composer for the multitude, and as our ears are more and more attuned to the inspired harmonies and tonal effects which his genius conceived the barriers that have prevented better appreciation of him are gradually being forced down. Today, Wagner's music is not a strange, unnatural music, but a music that has been drawn from the spheres where greatness of motives and greatness of deeds are untouched by human frailties.

The controversy which has arisen between Yehudi Menuhin and the American Guild of Musical Artists has not yet entirely died down nor has the situation which was evoked been remedied. Mr. Menuhin has taken a firm stand against any coercion into joining a union, even writing an open letter to Dr. Koussevitzky, a member of the board, outlining his views. Since the question is paramount at the moment, Menuhin's statement herewith quoted regarding his attitude in the matter.

"In subtle matters of conscience and principles of a purely independent, free-lance solo concert artist, who has absolutely nothing to do with employers, employes, salaries, wages, terms of employment, hours of employment, or any form of joint or common interest with others where the element of collective bargaining ever enters into consideration; in the particular case of pure art and genius where the whole life and art are, as they should be, far away from the turmoil of everyday conflicts of human attrition, to tell a free-lance concert artist 'You have no alternative than to become a member of "A. G. M. A." (American Guild of Musical Artists' Union) before your concert appearances' and slightly add 'the cost to you would be only $70' as if there exists a fixed and standard price for the sale of one's conscience and independent art, is a crime and disrespect to all God-given talent and pure free art. This calls for strong self-assertion and self-respect on the part of artists still free, and even on the part of such artists who have joined 'A. G. M. A.' because they were persuaded that in doing so they just render a generous hand to underpaid musicians, chorus girls, ballet dancers and movie actors.

"With me, it has never been a question of principle of not belonging to unions in general cases of salaried or wage workers! The Menuhins have always expressed their sympathy with organized labor.

"I have categorically and openly declared on many occasions that my own art belongs purely to the pure music solo concert stage! I chose forever to remain a free lance, purely musical artist whose art has nothing to do with actors, choruses, ballet dancers, scenario writers, movie operators or extras; my unique solo career never brings me in contact with other associates in other fields of equal or inferior standing, with whom I would have a common denominator wherein joint interests would require representatives for collective bargaining. They rightly need unions to protect their collective bargaining problems. Wherein will their cause be hurt, if they leave me alone? I cannot do them any good; neither can they do me any good! If all they need is my contribution of $70, I will gladly give them that and more to help poor artists!

"As a free citizen of a still free country, ardently believing in the liberty of the independent individual when his personal and sacred occupation is the sole and solitary enterprise of his own, based on pure art, interpretation and initiative; based on freedom of thought and conscience, I intend to defend my personal art and honor, my liberty and individualism, inch by inch and point by point, unless and until our country, too, is to be swallowed indifferently by the leveling, grinding and crushing steam-roller machines. If this continues, we shall soon have only one kind of art—that which conforms to union regulations. Artists must be free or there will be a leveling of art! Art cannot be leveled, for it is a matter of imagination and inspiration!

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
RECORD

Nov. 27/38

58 +

ON THE RECORDS

Sibelius Fifth Symphony Issued; Brahms Waltzes Recorded by Russian

The great Jean Sibelius is fortunate in not having to wait till his death before becoming popular. The orchestras have done kindly by him; the public is beginning to be aware. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony, always sympathetic interpreters of the great Finn, have made a laudable recording of his Fifth Symphony (Victor, $10).

Etc.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

NOV 27 1938

"MISSA SOLEMNIS" WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

The "Missa Solemnis" of Beethoven will be performed at the next regular pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Symphony Hall, Dec. 2 and 3, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. The "Missa Solemnis" had not been performed here for more than ten years when it was revived by Dr. Koussevitzky last spring at a Pension Fund concert. A chorus from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor, will join the orchestra in the performance of the Mass. The soloists will be Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Anna Kaskas, contralto; John Priebe, tenor; and Norman Gordon, bass. The organ part will be taken by E. Power Biggs.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

NOV 27 1938

SHORTER BOSTON SYMPHONY SERIES

Five pairs of concerts beginning Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon, December 26 and 27, remain to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra in its shorter series in Symphony hall. It will be possible for those who still wish to do so to subscribe for the five concerts in either series at a proportionate cost. Two pianists—Myra Hess and Frank Glazer are to appear as soloists, and likewise a violinist new to this country—Anja Ignatius, the young Finnish artist who wil make her Boston debut in the Concerto of Sibelius.

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct three of the five programmes. Georges Enesco will conduct one pair, and Igor Stravinsky another, as guests—the great Russian artist likewise appearing as piano soloist in his own Capriccio.

DAVENPORT, IA.
DEMOCRAT & LEADER

NOV 27 1938

PLANS TO SEND THE . . . Boston Symphony Orchestra to Europe next year are being formulated altho nothing definite is yet announced. The project is in the hands of the French-American Art association, which was formed during the World war. The orchestra according to tentative plans will play four concerts in Paris, one in Strasbourg, one in Lyons, four in London and four in other English cities not yet decided upon, two in Amsterdam, one in the Hague and two in Brussels. A guaranty fund of from $100,000 to $150,000 is required for the trip and this will come for the most part from the cities to be visited.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
SUNDAY HERALD

NOV 27 1938

AUDIENCE JOINS CHORUS

STOCKBRIDGE, Mass.—(INS)—When the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its season at "Tanglewood" here, an old custom was revived and the audience was invited to join the Cecelia Chorus of Boston in signing the second verse of Bach's magnificent old hymn, "Ein Feste Burg Ist Unser Gott."

ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS

NOV 28 1938

Mme. Flagstad's Concert Delayed

Next attraction on the Choral Union series is the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will play in Hill Auditorium under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky on Dec. 7.

LYNN, MASS.
TELEGRAM - NEWS

NOV 27 1938

Fine Program for Civic Vespers Today

Guest Artist

ALVIN BALL

Mrs. Dolly Morrow, creator and directors of the Vespers has prepared one of the most attractive programs of the season for the music lovers of Greater Lynn this afternoon, when a group of 55 talented artists will be heard in a highly inspirational program of sacred and secular compositions at the First M. E. Church, City Hall square, Lynn.

Mr. Alvin Ball, Boston Symphony trumpet soloist, who thrilled the vast audience on one of last season's Vespers programs, will be the guest artist, playing two trumpet solos.

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

DEC 1 - 1938

Few Masterpieces Being Written, Goossens Claims

NEW YORK, Nov. 30 (UP).—Eugene Goossens, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, commented on his reutrn from Europe that the present disturbed condition of the world has hampered musical composition. He complained that few works are being written which deserve to be ranked as masterpieces.

Goossens said that while great upheavals tend to produce great music when they have died down and artists are able to retire into a calm, creative atmosphere, the present upheaval is a continuing process that gives no interlude for contemplation.

Goossens praised the quality of contemporary English composition, which he feels has been unduly neglected. One of the new works which he has brought back is a Variation on the Theme of Frank Bridges, by Benjamin Bridges, young English composer.

After conducting the Boston Symphony in New York this week, Goossen returned to Cincinnati for his regular season.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
EXAMINER

NOV 27 1938

Playing Bach in Swingtime Stirs Lovers of Classics

East Has Symphony While S. F. Waits; Book on Toscanini

By Alexander Fried

LOVERS of Bach have been raising a stir in New York. They also have raised questions of taste and politics.

They are angry because jazz musicians are swinging Bach and the other classics. This sort of thing, they say, should be stopped.

As a matter of taste, of course it should. It would do the swingsters good to think up their own melodies. To parody the classics is harmful because it creates in the public mind vulgar associations with master music. For a time the vulgar associations tirelessly pop up whenever the original serious music is heard.

Formerly, such vulgarization was relatively a private affair. People who liked Bach rarely heard jazz except by choice. Nowadays the radio thrusts its swing, Bachian or otherwise, into every home.

Way to Protect Masters Is Suggested

But how can the masters be protected from the rapacity of swing? It is not worthwhile to have political dictation in order to have one good rule. Copyrights on the old masters have run out. It would be difficult to formulate and pass a law that would justly apply.

It might be a good thing to have the masters listed in an "International Music Treasure," just as nowadays historic sites and buildings are awarded an official status.

Then the radio companies and perhaps the movie companies could agree among themselves to handle the Treasure with care. Bach could be swung in the night clubs all anyone wished, and people who didn't like it could calm themselves by staying away.

* * *

Sundries in the music news—

Symphony has opened its season in New York (led by Barbirolli and Toscanini), Boston (Koussevitzky), Philadelphia (Ormandy), Chicago (Stock), Los Angeles (Klemperer), Cincinnati (Iturbi-Goossens), Detroit (Ghione), Washington (Kindler), St. Louis (Golschmann), Seattle (Sokoloff), Rochester, Harrisburg, Duluth, Toronto, Kansas City, Denver, Hartford—but San Francisco, sadly, must wait until January 6.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

NOV 27 1938

Music School Marks Silver Anniversary

By H. EARLE JOHNSON

TWENTY-FIVE years of service to the young people of New Haven is an enviable record to which the Neighborhood House Music School may point with pride. Devoted to the intelligent pursuit of music for pleasure, the Neighborhood School has brought happiness and a new joy into the lives of many who have flocked to its doors with the desire to partake in some measure of the inspiration which lifts one above seeming care and the complexities of daily life. Extraordinary talent has been encouraged to find the right path to sound training, while the musical amateur, the humble music-lover, has found a degree of under standing necessary to enjoy fully the matserpieces of great music.

The history of the Neighborhood House Music School is the story of a dream come true. The director these many years, Miss Jessie C. Beecher, envisioned a center to which all might come who desired instruction in the art, or to mingle in a society where music is the major enthusiasm. New Haven teachers are interested enough to give of their time and talent in teaching, directing choral or instrumental organization, or lecturing on harmony, or musical history. Miss Beecher stresses the gratitude due these co-operating hands whose labor, together with her own, has made the school a success. To these should be added the long list of cooperating members, Dr. Emerson Stone, chairman, Mrs. Edwin M. Borchard, vice-chairman, and Mrs. Louis L. Hemingway, secretary.

1913—1938

A slow but steady growth has characterized the entire career of this School; during the difficult times, now somewhat abated, the ministrations of music have been of especial value to many young persons whose existence was filled with hardships. At such times one turns to music, and to the Neighborhood School.

Miss Beecher is at hand almost constantly to plan and direct the manifold channels of the work. In the morning the executive aspect demands attention in her office, while elsewhere throughout the building may be heard those sounds which denote earnest students in the throes of practicing. During the afternoon individual lessons are given, small groups rehearse, either among themselves, or under the supervision of a teacher, and in the evening the school is bursting with sound and commotion. For instance, the senior orchestra (associate member of The National Federation of Music Clubs) has resumed rehearsals. The personnel of this orchestra is interesting in that it is made up of high school students, together with young men and women who are now in the world as wage-earners, all former members of the school. With them are small children whose abilities justify the opportunity of playing symphonies at so early an age. The subjects at hand are Dvorak's "Symphony from the New World" and Gluck's classic overture to "Alceste."

Elsewhere in the program is Dr. Stone's lecture course in harmony and appreciation for the more advanced pupils of tha school. The Young Women's Glee Club rehearses diligently under the direction of Mrs. Mary Loveridge Robbins. These, and other activities, mark the busy life of a truly musical center, for which the recipients pay only a portion of the total cost of instruction. Above that, are the manifold benefits of association with persons of similar interests.

On The Wing

Today, two recitals at the Neighborhood House Music School, given informally by students, and open to the public who may be interested in the work of the school. The first program is at 4 o'clock and the second at 8 o'clock, both comprising miscellaneous works for violin, piano, voice, violoncello, clarinet and guitar.

Friday evening, joint recital by Montague Newman and Walter West in the Northford Community House, Northford, at 8:30 o'clock. The program to be given by Mr. Newman and Mr. West comprises pianoforte solos and violin solos accompanied by Mr. West; both artists are known hereabouts from previous recitals given together.

Sarasate—Zigeunerweisen.
Cui—Oriental.
Drigo-Auer—Valse Bluette.
Tobani—Hungarian Fantasie.
Schumann—Novelette in B minor; Warum.
Arensky—Valse.
Lecuona—Malaguena.
Beethoven—Sonata, Opus 13; Romance.
Wienawski—Romance in D Major.
Tschaikowsky—Canzonetta.
Schubert—Sonatina in D Major.

December 5, third concert by the New Haven Orchestra Association, Richard Donovan, conducting, and Harold Bauer, pianist, as soloist in the Schumann Concerto.

New York heard Mr. Aaron Copland's piece on the Saturday afternoon following the performance in New Haven. The reviewers were somewhat guarded in their estimation of the work, but none cast a stone at Mr. Copland's workmanlike score. It is apparent that this composer has the respect of a great many persons and deserves a respectful hearing. The Times, however, expressed the regret that Doctor Koussevitsky presented so little contemporary music on this visit to New York; somehow, they look to Bostonians for a hearing of significant new music, since their own orchestra has so few hot irons on the fire.

Mr. Copland is author of a book published this week, entitled "What to Listen For in Music" (McGraw-Hill) a book written from the composer's point of view. Such an approach should afford a fresh conception of just what we hear, and what we should hear whether it be a Palestrina Mass a Balinese Gamelin, a Chavez Sonata, or the Fifth Symphony.

CINCINNATI, O.
TIMES - STAR

NOV 29 1938

This Show Business

by GROVERMAN BLAKE

Our Symphony Director Comes Home

EUGENE GOOSSENS arrived in Cincinnati yesterday from his European trip, several hours late, due to the snows, but as calm and unruffled as ever. Also as elegant, as distinguished looking and as agreeable to the prying press as ever. Avoiding several feminine reporters who were heckling Mrs. Goossens about the terrible hats and shoes all English women wear, we cornered the Cincinnati Symphony director and were almost at once deep in matters of musical import. Mr. Goossens informed us with regret of the "unenterprising, apathetic" state of the British symphony orchestras. Not, of course, he hastened to add, that this is true of the Royal Philharmonic or the British Broadcasting Co. orchestras. They are as musically alert as the orchestras in Paris or New York. But in the provinces, Manchester, Leeds, Liverpool, the orchestras comparing in England to our western and midwestern groups, the musical state is definitely and solidly British: what was good enough for their fathers is good enough for them. And if you offer the provincial audience more than one modern composition in a program there are snorts of indigation and viewings with profound alarm. Also from a purely technical point of view Mr. Goossens considers the American orchestras as superior to the British. They have more money, can consequently pay for more rehearsal time. Man for man, mind you, Mr. Goossens hedged patriotically, the English players are as good as the American; but it is their very skill, their virtuosity in reading music, that inclines the casual listener or conductor to consider them in no need of rehearsal. It is in the American mania for mechanical and ethical perfection, said Mr. Goossens, that our orchestras surpass the English. Mr. Goossens considers the British Broadcasting Co. Orchestra the best in Europe, and the Boston Symphony, which he conducted last week, the best in the world. "Comparisons are odious", said he, "and apt to get one into trouble, but the Boston orchestra is undoubtedly the finest in the world. At the first note of this incomparable group of musicians there is manifest a finish, a color, a patina, which belongs to no other orchestra. Man for man there are possibly orchestras numbering players of greater virtuosity; but as a group, they know no peer."

The maestro had little to say of The European Situation. Previous to his English tour he had taken a house near Paris in order to compose in quiet. After a few days he noticed that one of the windows of his studio looked out on the house of Premier Daladier, the other on the Italian Embassy. This, said Mr. Goossens was a trifle disturbing, like keeping house uneasily in no-man's land. A day or so later the air suddenly split with an infinity of noise. "All the sounds in Paris, magnified a thousand fold screamed suddenly in one sustained note," said Mr. Goossens, always the musician, though wincing at the memory. "A damnable, deafening note," he went on, "hardly propitious for the serenity necessary to musical composition." It was an air-raid drill, a frequent occurrence during the late Czechoslovakian crisis, and it retarded Mr. Goossens's work on his symphony, which will now be finished no sooner than the end of this season and possibly not then.

Mr. Goossens has won himself much critical laurel these past months abroad, laurel which redounds to the credit of the orchestra and the city as well. It is very pleasant to have him back.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES

NOV 28 1938

Rollin' Along

By W. A. S. Douglas

AND I would, no doubt, be able to wangle a pass to all four performances—in which case, I hope that "Tannhauser" will be on the program and that whoever may accompany me will have a proper appreciation of the brasses. Because, once, I had a sad experience.

Along with the lady who happened to be my wife at the time I went to a concert given at the Metropolitan in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The lady didn't care for the higher music and when she wasn't trying to sleep she was fidgeting up and down in her chair. There came the intermission—and fifty to sixty musicians trooped out through the wings.

"Let's go!" said the lady, gathering up her wraps.

"That's only the intermission," I told her. "They'll be back."

"Let's go, anyhow," she persisted. "I'm fed up."

"I'll go after we hear 'Tannhauser'," said I. "That will be right after the intermission."

She agreed grudgingly—and in a few moments the fifty to sixty musicians tramped back onto the stage. The lady looked them over appraisingly.

"Which one," she asked at last, "is Tannhauser?"

(Copyright, 1938, by Washington

87

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

NOV 2 9 1938

Glad To Be "Home" Again

Eugene Goossens

BY FREDERICK YEISER.

"I've never been so pleased in all my life to be back in a place as I am this time to be in Cincinnati," Eugene Goossens said yesterday morning in his suite at the Netherland Plaza.

"You see, I have been on the move ever since I left here last April. Now I am anchored for a bit and am looking forward to it. We musicians have to move around a lot, you know. It must be the gypsy in us." He was smiling when he called himself a gypsy.

Mr. Goossens felt terribly put out over missing the rehearsal of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra scheduled for yesterday morning. His train was several hours late, so there was really nothing he could do about it. "We'll make it up during the week, because we've a little leeway." He was referring to rehearsing time.

Whereas he did not appear reluctant to tell of his own doings of the last few months with a half-dozen or more orchestras in the United States and England, he was anxious to know what has been going on in Cincinnati. He was not in the least surprised to hear about the success of the first six concerts of the season.

"You've had two very fine conductors and the orchestra is very good—I don't have to tell you that—so why shouldn't the concerts have been successful? I'm sorry I missed that rehearsal this morning. We are going to have a nice program this week ourselves."

He went on to explain about the version of Schumann's "Carnaval" which he is presenting at this week's Symphony concerts.

"Most people have the idea that this is the one heard in ballet performance nowadays," he said. "As a matter of fact, this version has not been done in the United States since the tour of the Diaghilev Ballet in 1917. I gave the first American concert performance the other day in Boston."

Mr. Goossens owns one of the two existing copies of the score of this version, a legacy to him from the late Sir Percy Pitt. Another copy belongs to a man in London named O'Brien. He was referred to in these columns Sunday as possessing the performing rights. That is not the case, however, for this particular version has never been published. O'Brien had what was believed to be the only manuscript copy of the score until the one to which Mr. Goossens recently fell heir to turned up.

Having cleared up that point, Mr. Goossens said something about lunch. After that he and Mrs. Goossens had to go house hunting.

Presumably he is still heaping muttered imprecations upon the late train which caused him to miss his rehearsal.

COLUMBIA CITY, IND.
COMMERCIAL - MAIL

NOV 3 0 1938

Memberships for the Berkshire Symphonic Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitsky at the new Tanglewood shed next year have been received from 13 states and Canada. Memberships have come from such distant states as Arkansas, California and Florida.

COLUMBIA CITY, IND.
CITY POST

NOV 3 0 1938

Anna Kaskas, contralto, who was soloist under Serge Koussevitzky last August at the Berkshire festival, has been re-engaged to appear with the Boston Symphony on Dec. 2 and 3, singing in the Beethoven Missa Solemnis.

LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

DEC 1 - 1938

Music and The Drama

KOUSSEVITZKY HISSED FOR FIRST TIME AS CONDUCTOR,—BUT IT'S ALL IN FUN

BOSTON, Nov. 30-ÆP-Genial Serge Koussevitzky was hissed last night for the first time in his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it became known tonight—but it was all in fun.

Irked by the presence of spectators at a rehearsal of the Beethoven "Missa Solemnis," in which the Harvard and Radcliffe Glee Clubs were taking part, Koussevitzky had an aide announce after the intermission that friends of the singers would be barred from tomorrow night's rehearsal.

A wave of hisses rolled through the auditorium.

The conductor grinned, shook his finger at the students, and the rehearsal was resumed.

CINCINNATI, O.
POST

NOV 2 9 1938

Brave Blizzard in Trip Here

Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Goossens at the Netherland Plaza.

Maestro Goossens Returns For Cincinnati Welcome

Conductor and Wife Will Go House-Hunting Here; Tells of Paris Noise

BY NORINE FREEMAN

Cincinnati welcomed home, Monday, her world-famous symphony orchestra conductor, Eugene Goossens. He arrived, with Mrs. Goossens, on a train which had been delayed almost two hours by a blizzard in the east.

Mr. Goossens said they hope to select a house in a few days and have with them their little daughter, Sidonie, who has been staying with Mr. and Mrs. Roger Rogan in Glendale.

Mr. Goossens tried living in Paris for a few days—but only for a few days.

"I took a house," he said, "and a very beautiful place it was. Then I found on one side the home of M. Daladier, the French premier, and on the other side the Italian embassy.

"The first time I started writing music there the most infernal shriek-pitched noise arose and held for three or four minutes. It was blood-curdling. I had not been warned, but it was only air-raid practice. I went on to London."

Mrs. Goossens said she spent only a brief time in Paris and bought no new frocks there. "I hated to leave London," she added, "but I always buy my clothes in America."

Comparing English and American orchestras, Mr. Goossens said: "I think the Boston Symphony Orchestra is unquestionably the best in the world. There is a 'patina about it which is simply incomparable."

He was enthusiastic about the British Broadcasting Orchestra, which he described as "a magnificent thing of 125 pieces." Mr Goossens, conducted for two months in England.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

DEC 1 - 1938

FIRST HISS HEARD BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston, Dec. 1—To Harvard men goes the distinction of being the first to hiss Dr Serge Koussevitzky during his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra—and in Symphony hall itself, it was revealed last night. However, it was all in fun and was received by the conductor with an understanding grin.

The incident occured Tuesday night, while Dr Koussevitzky was rehearsing the Harvard and Radcliffe Glee clubs in their coming presentation of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis."

Disturbed by the presence of spectators, the conductor had an aid announce that they would be barred from tonight's rehearsal.

The answer was a wave of hisses. Grinning, the leader shook a finger at the students and resumed the rehearsal.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER - CITIZEN

NOV 30 1938

Boston Programs.

At the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis." This, as on a previous presentation, will enlist the services of the Radcliffe chorus and the Harvard Glee Club. The soloists will be Jeanette Vreeland, Anna Kaskas, John Priebe and Norman Cordon.

COLUMBIA CITY, IND.
CITY POST

NOV 3 0 1938

Memberships for the Berkshire Symphonic Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitsky at the new Tanglewood shed next year have been received from 13 states and Canada. Memberships have come from such distant states as Arkansas, California and Florida.

COLUMBIA CITY, IND.
COMMERCIAL - MAIL
Nov. 30/38

Anna Kaskas, contralto, who was soloist under Serge Koussevitzky last August at the Berkshire festival, has been re-engaged to appear with the Boston Symphony on Dec. 2 and 3, singing in the Beethoven Missa Solemnis.

SENTINEL
Winston Salem N C
NOV 2 7 1938

Making Musical History Here— Noted Philadelphia Orchestra To Give Concert in Twin City

The Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra will be heard for the first time in Winston-Salem on December 10, as the second program of the current season's concerts presented by the Civic Music Association.

This internationally known orchestra which ranks as one of the three great orchestras of the country, sharing honors with the Boston Symphony and the New York Philharmonic, will be conducted by Eugene Ormandy. Ormandy has appeared in Winston-Salem previously as a conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra.

The Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra plays annually to audiences of many thousands of people, but other millions throughout the nation, through radio and recorded music, also listen to it. The recorded repertoire of the Philadelphia orchestra is the largest in the world. The concert in Winston-Salem will be the first time one of the country's three major orchestras has played here.

Began in 1899

Only four men have been permanent conductors of the orchestra.

The year 1899 saw the start of this organization when Fritz Scheel, a young German musician, conducted a series of concerts in Philadelphia. So successful were these performances that steps were taken immediately to assure the orchestra's permanency. The first concert by the Philadelphia orchestra was thirty-eight years ago.

Scheel, who counted Bulow, Tchaikovsky and Rubinstein among his personal friends, remained conductor for seven years, establishing the firm foundations and high standards since maintained by the organization. Upon his death in 1907, Carl Pohlig left the position of the first-court conductor at Stuttgart, by permission of the King of Wurtemburg, to succeed him.

Stokowski Brought Some

Pohlig was succeeded by Leopold Stokowski, one of the great musicians of the century, and the man who brought the orchestra to the point of eminence it occupies in the world of music today. One of Stokowski's earliest and most impressive performances was the American premiere of Mahler's Eighth Symphony, requiring more than 1,000 orchestral and choral performers. This did much to win for the Philadelphia orchesra world-wide attention.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

NOV 29 1938

Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Impresssive List of Symphonies Played By Bostonians

One of a series of articles on the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

II

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

Every conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has appeared in Hartford except Artur Nikisch and Henri Rabaud, although the former was heard here in 1912 as leader of the London Symphony Orchestra on tour, and he once played the piano part of Schumann's Quintette in a concert with the Memnon Club.

Wilhelm Gericke, Emil Paur, Karl Muck, Max Fiedler, Pierre Monteaux and, for more concerts than any other, Serge Koussevitzky have all wielded the baton for the Boston Symphony here. These concerts have been held in various places. After Roberts' Opera House, there were programs in Allyn Hall, later at the Coliseum, where the Palace Theater is now located, at Foot Guard Hall where it performed at the "grand opening" of the Armory Nov. 20, 1888, at Parsons' Theater between the years 1910-15 and at the Capitol Theater. The Bushnell concerts are of the present period.

Some of the soloists who have appeared here with the Bostonians were: Franz Kneisel, Cesar Thomson, Fritz Kreisler, Harold Bauer, Louise Homer, Adele Aus der Ohe, Olga Samaroff, Heinrich Gebhard, Willy Hess, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Sergei Rachmaninoff, Mischa Elman, Ferrucio Busoni, Kathleen Parlow, Winifred Christie, Leo Ornstein and many others.

Prior to the Bushnell era the Boston Orchestra had performed in Hartford all the symphonies of Brahms, the second one three times; all four of Schumann's; the fourth, fifth and sixth of Tschaikowsky, the latter four times; Franck's D minor four times; Mendelssohn's Scotch symphony; Schubert's Unfinished and the C major; the first Symphony of Sibelius twice, the first time in 1913; Dvorak's "From the New World" in 1904.

Beethoven performances led all the rest. The Seventh symphony was done six times, the Fifth five times and the Third three. The Sixth and Eighth had also been played, leaving the First, Second, Fourth and Ninth. Taking account of Bushnell programs, of course, alters the whole record.

The point is that the process of education—and musical growth is just that—has been from an early date at the hands of the Boston Orchestra. This is not to derogate the heroic struggle of the local Philharmonic and the tremendous incentive it provided for music lovers and students. The building of taste has been a gradual process, from the cool puzzled reception of Schumann's A minor Concerto in 1885 to the acceptance of Stravinsky and Prokofieff.

It took sincere support to continue these concerts year after year by a visiting orchestra. During only one brief period did interest lag. Frances Hall Johnson in her book, "Musical Memories of Hartford" says: "There was no concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Artur Nikisch's direction who followed Gericke's first term as conductor. This third conductor of Hungarian birth, who infused so much warmth and passion into the playing of the orchestra, did not visit Hartford as the receipts had been too small in the past. 'Hartford was checked off as a city not important enough for the orchestra which was recognized as probably without peer.' After five years elapsed the supposition was that in the interval the city had increased in population as well as in musical activities and the management made another attempt." Emil Paur was then the leader.

All Conductors Except Nikisch and Rabaud Here

Except for this comparatively brief hiatus the visits of the Boston Orchestra have been consistent. From 1902 onward there were 14 seasons during which the Boston Symphony played here three times each season.

The only inference to be drawn is that Hartford has always needed this orchestra. Whether there have been local attractions or brilliant competitive ones from the outside, the Bostonians have always been in the picture. Besides the fact of the matchless quality of this organization, there has always been a musical affinity between Hartford and Boston, just as there have been spiritual ties.

The orchestra has many friends in this city. The ticket buyers have always been friends in that besides nurturing their own cultural needs, they have helped to sustain a musical body which for more than half a century has been one of the wonders of the orchestral world. There have been other friends, too, and these have been quietly making contributions toward the support of the organization and have received, therefore, the significant title, Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Their number is growing.

(Another article will appear tomorrow).

LOWELL, MASS.
SUN

DEC 1 - 1938

SAMPASCOOPIES

By CHARLES G. SAMPAS

Bermuda . . . Miami . . . And Lowell

Quiz . . . Styles . . . Phrases . . . Alice

"A Pretty Girl, Like A Melody"

Faces You Meet: People You Know

Welcome To Our Little Notebook:

FIRST THRILLS: Max Miller's book, "I Cover The Waterfront"... Paul Whiteman's recording of "What'll I Do" That 1929 Lowell high senior prom...The Adirondacks of an autumn of 1935...Intimations of finer worlds, somewhere, brought by Serge Koussevitsky's direction of the Boston symphony...The first Titian-tressed [illegible] we fell in love with...

PASADENA, CAL.
STAR-NEWS

DEC 3 - 1938

Recent Recordings

This has been a rather profitable month for the fancier of records even from the RCA-Victor angle alone. I am particularly delighted with a "Magic Flute" performance by the B. B. C. Orchestra of London, Toscanini conducting. This is true Mozart. The brass sounds stern, questioningly as it should, yet it does not jar, as in the cases of isolated spots of Sibelius records by Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony. But much depends on one's manipulation of the phonograph and the capacity of such a machine. Phonographs are articles of mass production as a rule, and while they could be made to reproduce better, production speed and the public ear pass over certain deficiencies. The Sibelius recordings include the fifth symphony, by no means as bright a work as most commentators make it out to be. Written during the war and revised three times in years immediately following, it will prove reflective and grave quite often the oftener it is heard. The epic, and also that atmospheric shadowplay of folklorist background always can be sensed, if not as actual programmatic background, then as an atmospheric presence of which Sibelius is always aware, though almost unconsciously. It is that very quality which makes him so essentially Finnish. The same album brings likewise "Pohjola's Daughter."

I may be mistaken, but I believe there is a Beecham-conducted recording which is more dazzling of brilliancy of color. My reason for hazarding this statement is that I wonder whether Sibelius has ever put more felicitously the manifold, crystal-like flashing and light-catching color kaleidoscope of snow and ice into a score. To say that Goossens' "Coq d'Or" suite is a gorgeous piece of playing and sound-engineering is enough. It is exactly that. I must mention, too, superb vocal records by Gussi Bjorling, the Norwegian tenor, and and extremely well-played violin and piano sonata by Ernest Bloch. There has not been much of Block among the record lists. This deeply introspective, modern-toned work needs study to be appreciated. I cannot imagine that it will prove popular, but those who love it will go to it in hours of self-communion.

SHENENDOAH, IA.
SENTINEL

DEC 2 - 1938

Praises Paderewski

Mr. and Mrs. F. Anshutz have received a copy of the Boston (Mass.) Traveler in which Henry Woelber of Jamaica Plain, a brother of Henry Woelber, New York musician, who lived here many years, pays a great tribute to Ignace Jan Paderewski and his connections with the Boston Symphony orchestra.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

DEC 1 - 1938

Radcliffe Singers, Not Conductor, Hissed

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., Dec. 1 (UP) — Harvard students who hissed during a glee club rehearsal conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky in Symphony Hall were not booing the famed conductor, they explained today.

Instead they were hisssing several Radcliffe College girl singers who were off key during the rehearsal of "Missa Solemnis" by the glee clubs of the two colleges. Believing himself the object of the students' displeasure, Dr. Koussevitzy turned and waved a finger in admonition at them.

AUGUSTA, ME.
KENNEBEC JOURNAL

DEC 1 - 1938

Symphony Leader Politely Hissed

Boston, Nov. 30 —(AP)— Genial Serge Koussevitzky was hissed last

---

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

DEC 1 - 1938

HISS RADCLIFFE GIRLS

CAMBRIDGE, Dec. 1 (UP) — Harvard students who hissed dur-

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
Dec. \ EAGLE

Harvard Men Hiss, Koussevitzky Just Grins

Harvard men Tuesday night

HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript Telegram

DEC 1 - 1938

DOWN THE LINE — IN — NEWS OF THE DAY

HARVARD students who hissed during a glee club rehearsal conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky in Symphony Hall were not booing the famed conductor, they explained today. Instead they were hissing several Radcliffe College girl singers who were off key during the rehearsal of "Missa Solemnis" by the glee clubs of the two colleges. Believing himself the object of the students' displeasure, Dr. Koussevitzky turned and waved a finger in admonition at them.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

DEC 2 - 1938

Dr Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony orchestra after their home concert tomorrow night take Horace Greeley's advice and on successive nights starting Monday, hit Rochester, Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Toledo, Cleveland and Pittsburg, the Smoky city being treated to two concerts.

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH.
PRESS
DEC 2 - 1938

Concert at Ann Arbor By Boston Symphony

Ann Arbor—Serge Koussevitzky will lead the Boston Symphony orchestra in its annual University of

KOUSSEVITZKY.

Michigan concert Wednesday evening, Dec. 7, at Hill auditorium in Ann Arbor. Annually, since 1900, he has brought his distinguished band of players to Choral union concert patrons. This engagement is the only Michigan appearance of the organization. This year the orchestra will play the following program:

Symphony in B flat, No. 102 ..... Haydn
"La Mer," Trois Esquisses Symphoniques ..... Debussy
Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36 ..... Tschaikowsky

ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION

DEC 2 - 1938

ALBANY MUSIC LOVERS HEAR OPERA BASSO

Ezio Pinza Enthralls His Audience; Program Ranges From Opera to Spirituals

(Pictures on Page 14)

By EDGAR S. VAN OLINDA

A capacity audience at Philip Livingston High school last night sat spell-bound until the raising of the lights indicated that the first concert of the Albany Civic Music Association was one to cherish in memory.

The artist was Ezio Pinza, star basso of the Metropolitan Opera and one of the great voices of the world. Mr. Pinza early set at rest fears that perhaps an evening with a bass voice might pall on a concert audience. As Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra began his career as a virtuosi of the double-bass, so Mr. Pinza uses his noble organ for the projection of vocal music necessarily relegated to the less sympathetic roles, such as for instance, Mephistopheles in Faust.

As an encore, last evening Mr. Pinza sang the serenade from that opera with all the diabolical glee and musical inuendo that is associated with this operatic character.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

DEC 3 - 1938

MUSIC—Orchestras at Carnegie Hall: Philharmonic-Symphony, Barbirolli conducting, through Jan. 22; Enesco, Jan. 26-Feb. 5. Paul Whiteman's Orchestra, Dec. 25. Philadelphia Orchestra, Ormandy conducting, Dec. 27, Jan. 3, and 24. Boston Symphony, Koussevitzky conducting, Jan. 5 and 7. . . . Important recitals at Carnegie Hall: Virovai, Dec. 17 (Aft.); Flagstad, Jan. 2; Menuhin, Jan. 18.

RACING—Tropical Park, Fla., Dec. 19-Jan. 10. . . . Hialeah Park, Fla., Jan. 11-Mar. 4. . . . Santa Anita, Cal., Dec. 31-Mar. 11.

THEATRE OPENINGS (Dates uncertain)—"Everywhere I Roam," by Arnold Sundgaard, staged by Marc Connelly: National, Dec. 19. . . . "The Merchant of Yonkers," by Thorton Wilder, with Jane Cowl: Guild, Dec. 28. . . . D'Oyly Carte Gilbert and Sullivan Opera Company: Martin Beck, Jan. 5. . . . "Gentle People," by Irwin Shaw, with Franchot Tone and Sylvia Sidney: Belasco, Jan. 5.

CUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.

DEC 3 - 1938

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Carnegie—Mr. Koussevitzky and his visiting players give us a moving, penetrating, and majestic reading of the Sibelius fifth, a symphony which commands an arresting degree of poetic insight and eloquence. The advent of the Bostonians always is refreshing.

ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION ✓

DEC 4 - 1938

With Glee Club

Esther A. Raymond of 318 New Scotland avenue was among the members of the Radcliffe College Choral society who sang with the Harvard Glee club and the Boston Symphony orchestra Friday afternoon and last evening in Symphony hall, Boston, when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky directed them in a presentation of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis"

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

NOV 29 1938

Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Impresssive List of Symphonies Played By Bostonians

One of a series of articles on the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

II

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

Every conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has appeared in Hartford except Artur Nikisch and Henri Rabaud, although the former was heard here in 1912 as leader of the London Symphony Orchestra on tour, and he once played the piano part of Schumann's Quintette in a concert with the Memnon Club.

Wilhelm Gericke, Emil Paur, Karl Muck, Max Fiedler, Pierre Monteaux and, for more concerts than any other, Serge Koussevitzky have all wielded the baton for the Boston Symphony here. These concerts have been held in various places. After Roberts' Opera House, there were programs in Allyn Hall, later at the Coliseum, where the Palace Theater is now located, at Foot Guard Hall where it performed at the "grand opening" of the Armory Nov. 20, 1888, at Parsons' Theater between the years 1910-15 and at the Capitol Theater. The Bushnell concerts are of the present period.

Some of the soloists who have appeared here with the Bostonians were: Franz Kneisel, Cesar Thomson, Fritz Kreisler, Harold Bauer, Louise Homer, Adele Aus der Ohe, Olga Samaroff, Heinrich Gebhard, Willy Hess, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Sergei Rachmaninoff, Mischa Elman, Ferrucio Busoni, Kathleen Parlow, Winifred Christie, Leo Ornstein and many others.

Prior to the Bushnell era the Boston Orchestra had performed in Hartford all the symphonies of Brahms, the second one three times; all four of Schumann's; the fourth, fifth and sixth of Tschaikowsky, the latter four times; Franck's D minor four times; Mendelssohn's Scotch symphony; Schubert's Unfinished and the C major; the first Symphony of Sibelius twice, the first time in 1913; Dvorak's "From the New World" in 1904.

Beethoven performances led all the rest. The Seventh symphony was done six times, the Fifth five times and the Third three. The Sixth and Eighth had also been played, leaving the First, Second, Fourth and Ninth. Taking account of Bushnell programs, of course, alters the whole record.

The point is that the process of education—and musical growth is just that—has been from an early date at the hands of the Boston Orchestra. This is not to derogate the heroic struggle of the local Philharmonic and the tremendous incentive it provided for music lovers and students. The building of taste has been a gradual process, from the cool puzzled reception of Schumann's A minor Concerto in 1885 to the acceptance of Stravinsky and Prokofieff.

It took sincere support to continue these concerts year after year by a visiting orchestra. During only one brief period did interest lag. Frances Hall Johnson in her book, "Musical Memories of Hartford" says: "There was no concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Artur Nikisch's direction who followed Gericke's first term as conductor. This third conductor of Hungarian birth, who infused so much warmth and passion into the playing of the orchestra, did not visit Hartford as the receipts had been too small in the past. 'Hartford was checked off as a city not important enough for the orchestra which was recognized as probably without peer.' After five years elapsed the supposition was that in the interval the city had increased in population as well as in musical activities and the management made another attempt." Emil Paur was then the leader.

Except for this comparatively brief hiatus the visits of the Boston Orchestra have been consistent. From 1902 onward there were

All Conductors Except Nikisch and Rabaud Here

14 seasons during which the Boston Symphony played here three times each season.

The only inference to be drawn is that Hartford has always needed this orchestra. Whether there have been local attractions or brilliant competitive ones from the outside, the Bostonians have always been in the picture. Besides the fact of the matchless quality of this organization, there has always been a musical affinity between Hartford and Boston, just as there have been spiritual ties.

The orchestra has many friends in this city. The ticket buyers have always been friends in that besides nurturing their own cultural needs, they have helped to sustain a musical body which for more than half a century has been one of the wonders of the orchestral world. There have been other friends, too, and these have been quietly making contributions toward the support of the organization and have received, therefore, the significant title, Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Their number is growing.

(Another article will appear tomorrow).

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

DEC 1 - 1938

Radcliffe Singers, Not Conductor, Hissed

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., Dec. 1 (UP)—Harvard students who hissed during a glee club rehearsal conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky in Symphony Hall were not booing the [illegible] conductor, they explained today.

Instead they were hissing several Radcliffe College girl singers who were off key during the rehearsal of "Missa Solemnis" by the glee clubs of the two colleges. Believing himself the object of the students' displeasure, Dr. Koussevitzy turned and waved a finger in admonition at them.

AUGUSTA, ME.
KENNEBEC JOURNAL

DEC 1 - 1938

Symphony Leader Politely Hissed

Boston, Nov. 30—(AP)—Genial Serge Koussevitzky was hissed last

---

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

DEC 1 - 1938

HISS RADCLIFFE GIRLS

CAMBRIDGE, Dec. 1 (UP) — Harvard students who hissed dur-

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
Dec EAGLE

Harvard Men Hiss, Koussevitzky Just Grins

Harvard men Tuesday night

HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript Telegram

DEC 1 - 1938

DOWN THE LINE — IN — NEWS OF THE DAY

HARVARD students who hissed during a glee club rehearsal conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky in Symphony Hall were not booing the famed conductor, they explained today. Instead they were hissing several Radcliffe College girl singers who were off key during the rehearsal of "Missa Solemnis" by the glee clubs of the two colleges. Believing himself the object of the students' displeasure, Dr. Koussevitzky turned and waved a finger in admonition at them.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

DEC 2 - 1938

Dr Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony orchestra after their home concert tomorrow night take Horace Greeley's advice and on successive nights starting Monday, hit Rochester, Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Toledo, Cleveland and Pittsburg, the Smoky city being treated to two concerts.

SHENENDOAH, IA.
SENTINEL

DEC 2 - 1938

Praises Paderewski

Mr. and Mrs. F. Anshutz have received a copy of the Boston (Mass.) Traveler in which Henry Woelber of Jamaica Plain, a brother of Henry Woelber, New York musician, who lived here many years, pays a great tribute to Ignace Jan Paderewski and his connections with the Boston Symphony orchestra.

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH.
PRESS
DEC 2 - 1938

Concert at Ann Arbor By Boston Symphony

Ann Arbor—Serge Koussevitzky will lead the Boston Symphony orchestra in its annual University of Michigan concert Wednesday evening, Dec. 7, at Hill auditorium in Ann Arbor. Annually, since 1900, he has brought his distinguished band of players to Choral union concert patrons. This engagement is the only Michigan appearance of the organization. This year the orchestra will play the following program:

KOUSSEVITZKY,

Symphony in B flat, No. 102.....Haydn
"La Mer," Trois Esquisses Symphoniques.....Debussy
Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36.....Tschaikowsky

LOWELL, MASS.
SUN

DEC 1 - 1938

SAMPASCOOPIES

By CHARLES G. SAMPAS

Bermuda . . . Miami . . . And Lowell
Quiz . . . Styles . . . Phrases . . . Alice
"A Pretty Girl, Like A Melody"
Faces You Meet: People You Know
Welcome To Our Little Notebook:

FIRST THRILLS: Max Miller's book, "I Cover The Waterfront"... Paul Whiteman's recording of "What'll I Do" That 1929 Lowell high senior prom...The Adirondacks of an autumn of 1935...Intimations of finer worlds, somewhere, brought by Serge Koussevitzky's direction of the Boston symphony...The first Titian-tressed [illegible] we fell in love with...

PASADENA, CAL.
STAR-NEWS

DEC 3 - 1938

Recent Recordings

This has been a rather profitable month for the fancier of records even from the RCA-Victor angle alone. I am particularly delighted with a "Magic Flute" performance by the B. B. C. Orchestra of London, Toscanini conducting. This is true Mozart. The brass sounds stern, questioningly as it should, yet it does not jar, as in the cases of isolated spots of Sibelius records by Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony. But much depends on one's manipulation of the phonograph and the capacity of such a machine. Phonographs are articles of mass production as a rule, and while they could be made to reproduce better, production speed and the public ear pass over certain deficiencies. The Sibelius recordings include the fifth symphony, by no means as bright a work as most commentators make it out to be. Written during the war and revised three times in years immediately following, it will prove reflective and grave quite often the oftener it is heard. The epic, and also that atmospheric shadowplay of folklorist background always can be sensed, if not as actual programmatic background, then as an atmospheric presence of which Sibelius is always aware, though almost unconsciously. It is that very quality which makes him so essentially Finnish. The same album brings likewise "Pohjola's Daughter."

I may be mistaken, but I believe there is a Beecham-conducted recording which is more dazzling of brilliancy of color. My reason for hazarding this statement is that I wonder whether Sibelius has ever put more felicitously the manifold, crystal-like flashing and light-catching color kaleidoscope of snow and ice into a score. To say that Goossens' "Coq d'Or" suite is a gorgeous piece of playing and sound-engineering is enough. It is exactly that. I must mention, too, superb vocal records by Gussi Bjorling, the Norwegian tenor, and and extremely well-played violin and piano sonata by Ernest Bloch. There has not been much of Block among the record lists. This deeply introspective, modern-toned work needs study to be appreciated. I cannot imagine that it will prove popular, but those who love it will go to it in hours of self-communion.

ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION

DEC 2 - 1938

ALBANY MUSIC LOVERS HEAR OPERA BASSO

Ezio Pinza Enthralls His Audience; Program Ranges From Opera to Spirituals

(Pictures on Page 14)

By EDGAR S. VAN OLINDA

A capacity audience at Philip Livingston High school last night sat spell-bound until the raising of the lights indicated that the first concert of the Albany Civic Music Association was one to cherish in memory.

The artist was Ezio Pinza, star basso of the Metropolitan Opera and one of the great voices of the world. Mr. Pinza early set at rest fears that perhaps an evening with a bass voice might pall on a concert audience. As Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra began his career as a virtuosi of the double-bass, so Mr. Pinza uses his noble organ for the projection of vocal music necessarily relegated to the less sympathetic roles, such as for instance, Mephistopheles in Faust.

As an encore, last evening Mr. Pinza sang the serenade from that opera with all the diabolical glee and musical inuendo that is associated with this operatic character.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

DEC 3 - 1938

MUSIC—Orchestras at Carnegie Hall: Philharmonic-Symphony, Barbirolli conducting, through Jan. 22; Enesco, Jan. 26-Feb. 5. Paul Whiteman's Orchestra, Dec. 25. Philadelphia Orchestra, Ormandy conducting, Dec. 27, Jan. 3, and 24. Boston Symphony, Koussevitzky conducting, Jan. 5 and 7. . . . Important recitals at Carnegie Hall: Virovai, Dec. 17 (Aft.); Flagstad, Jan. 2; Menuhin, Jan. 18.
RACING—Tropical Park, Fla., Dec. 19-Jan. 10. . . . Hialeah Park, Fla., Jan. 11-Mar. 4. . . . Santa Anita, Cal., Dec. 31-Mar. 11.
THEATRE OPENINGS (Dates uncertain)—"Everywhere I Roam," by Arnold Sundgaard, staged by Marc Connelly: National, Dec. 19. . . . "The Merchant of Yonkers," by Thorton Wilder, with Jane Cowl: Guild, Dec. 28. . . . D'Oyly Carte Gilbert and Sullivan Opera Company: Martin Beck, Jan. 5. . . . "Gentle People," by Irwin Shaw, with Franchot Tone and Sylvia Sidney: Belasco, Jan. 5.

CUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.

DEC 3 - 1938

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Carnegie—Mr. Koussevitzky and his visiting players give us a moving, penetrating, and majestic reading of the Sibelius fifth, a symphony which commands an arresting degree of poetic insight and eloquence. The advent of the Bostonians always is refreshing.

ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION

DEC 4 - 1938

With Glee Club

Esther A. Raymond of 818 New Scotland avenue was among the members of the Radcliffe College Choral society who sang with the Harvard Glee club and the Boston Symphony orchestra Friday afternoon and last evening in Symphony hall, Boston, when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky directed them in a presentation of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis."

CLEVELAND, O.
PRESS

DEC 3 - 1938

Ringwall Conducts Thursday; Boston Plays Here Next Week

Koussevitzky Brings Famous Orchestra of 110 Men to Music Hall; Singers Present Miss Vreeland

A BUSY week confronts music lovers and concert goers of Cleveland for the next seven days.

The Cleveland Orchestra resumes its concerts Thursday and Saturday nights with Rudolph Ringwall as conductor; the Boston Symphony Orchestra makes one of its rare appearances Friday night in Public Music Hall, and Jeanette Vreeland, fine American soprano, appears with the Singers' Club Tuesday night.

For the sixth pair of symphony concerts Mr. Ringwall will continue the Beethoven cycle with the playing of the Fifth Symphony—among the most famous of the Austrian master's symphonic works—and some rarely heard orchestral compositions.

Included in these will be Richard Strauss' arrangement for orchestra Couperin's "Dance Suite"; Cesar Franck's symphonic poem "The Wild Huntsman"; Rimsky-Korsakoff's musical tableau "Sadko" and Jan Sibelius' "The Return of Lemminkainen."

Again Sibelius

THE 110-piece Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of the famous Sergei Koussevitzky, one of our foremost musicians, will play the third concert in the Cleveland Concert Course series.

On the Koussevitzky program are Haydn's Symphony in B Flat; three Debussy pieces that comprise his composition "The Sea" and Sibelius' "Second Symphony" in D Major.

It will be a distinct privilege to hear the famous Boston here again, for the organization has not been heard "in person" for more than a decade, except over the radio waves.

The Singers' Club's first concert of the season will be held Tuesday night in Severance Hall with Miss Vreeland in the solo role, and the 100-voice chorus under the direction of Boris Goldovsky.

Miss Vreeland will sing one number with the club—Schubert's "Nachthelle," and two groups of songs including works by Sibella, Bossi, Wintzer, Strauss, Warlock and Deems Taylor. She will be accompanied on the piano by Mr. Goldovsky.

Music Notes

Vaughan Cahill, supervisor for the Federal Music Project, and Alfred Metzdorf, assistant conductor, will share the baton when the Cleveland Civic Symphony Orchestra plays a concert Friday night at the East Side Turnverein, 1622 E. 55th street.

The first half of the program will be devoted to Mr. Cahill's A Minor Symphony, which had its first and very successful hearing here last week, and Mr. Metzdorf will conduct works by Smetana, Schubert, Liszt and Berlioz.

Beryl Rubinstein, pianist, and Joseph Fuchs, violinist, will make their first public appearance as co-artists Wednesday night at the Cleveland Institute of Music. The pair will play Cesar Franck's Sonata in A Major and Beethoven's Kreutzer Sonata.

The Fortnightly Musical Club will present its third formal concert Tuesday at 2:30 p. m. at Steinway Hall of Halle Bros. Co. Irene H. Klinger, soprano; Robert Horak, violinist, and Eunice Podis, pianist, will participate.

The Baldwin-Wallace Conservatory Orchestra, directed by George Poinar, will give a concert tomorrow afternoon in the Kulas Musical Arts Building. Works by Beethoven, Mozart, Gounod and Wagner will be played.

Tomorrow night the College Club will be the scene of a concert by the small ensemble from Hiram College.

Two Orchestra Conductors

Rudolph Ringwall conducts the Cleveland Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzsky (left) brings his Boston Symphony here next week

---

BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

DEC 4 - 1938

Polly can't remember WHEN she's seen a Buffalo audience as enthusiastic as the one which threatened to climb on the stage after Marian Anderson's performance last Sunday. Recalling with civic shame that the Philadelphia orchestra played to a half filled house last year, she hopes the music urge shown last week will extend to greet the Boston Symphony and to support our own orchestra which will present Emanuel Feuermann today.

FLINT, MICH.
SEMI-WEEKLY NEWS

DEC 2 - 1938

Boston Symphony Plays at Ann Arbor

Serge Koussevitzky, who will lead the Boston Symphony orchestra in its 38th consecutive annual concert next Wednesday evening at Ann Arbor in the University of Michigan Choral Union series. He has selected for his program: Haydn's Symphony in B flat, No. 102; Debussy's "La Mer," Trois Esquisses Symphoniques and Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 4 in F Minor, Op. 36.

MONNESSEN, PA.
INDEPENDENT

DEC 3 - 1938

Symphony Orchestra

The high-light of the musical season is the visit of the world-famous Boston Symphony orchestra, and all roads ~~within a radius of 75~~ miles of Pittsburgh will lead to Syria Mosque next Saturday evening, December 10th, and Sunday afternoon, December 11th. The Sunday afternoon concert has special appeal to out-of-town music lovers. The concert starts at 3 o'clock, which makes possible an early return home. A young pianist will be featured as soloist at the Saturday evening concert. His name is Jesus Maria Sanroma, and he will play the Ravel Concerto for Piano and Orchestra. Sanroma has toured with great success in both Europe and Amesica. Other works on the evening program are the Beethoven Symphony No. 2 in D major, and the Brahams Symphony No. 4.

The Sunday afternoon program will also feature two great symphonies. They are the Haydn Symphony in B-flat, and the Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 4. Three orchestral sketches, entitled "La Mer" by Debussy will also be included in the afternoon program. The orchestra for both concerts is under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, and comes to Pittsburgh under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra association, May Beegle, manager.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST - GAZETTE

DEC 3 - 1938

Choirs Open Week Filled With Music

Pittsburgh and Boston Orchestra to Give Pairs of Concerts.

One talent which Serge Koussevitzky, who will conduct the Boston Symphony at the Mosque next Saturday night and Sunday afternoon, seldom reveals to a concert audience is that of the critic.

Bares Role of Conductor.

Although his opinion of latecomers, concert conversationalists and clanging radiators may be apparent to all, his pronunciamentos on music usually are reserved for speeches before the American Academy of Arts and Sciences. It was in one such address that Koussevitzky interpreted the role of the conductor of symphonic music. He said:

"A perfect interpretation may have two different aspects, equally faithful to the score of the composer. One may be called mechanically perfect. The other, organically perfect. The first gives the beauty of mathematical balance, symmetry and clarity. It aims to give a beautified reflection of the composition. The second is an indivisible, living, pulsating 'elan vital' of the work."

"The one is always enjoyable, pleasant and delightful, but remains, like a beautiful scene, external to the listener. The other—the organic interpretation—puts the listener in direct touch with the absolute reality hidden in the great score. It is like a mystic experience."

He himself is an "organic" interpreter.

Great Compositions Included.

Koussevitzky's program for Saturday night will include Beethoven's Second Symphony, Brahms' Fourth and Ravel's Concerto for Piano and Orchestra. The soloist will be Jesus Maria Sanroma. The Sunday afternoon program, given at 3 o'clock, will be Haydn's Symphony in B-flat, Debussy's "La Mer," a group of orchestral sketches, and Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony.

DETROT, MICH.
TIMES

DEC 4 - 1938

Music Notes

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its annual University of Michigan concert, Wednesday evening, in Hill Auditorium. Annually, since 1900, the Boston orchestra has played in Ann Arbor. The engagement this year constituting the only Michigan appearance of the organization. The program will consist of Haydn's Symphony in B-flat, No. 102; "La Mer" by Debussy and Symphony No. 4 by Tschaikowsky.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION-STAR

DEC 3 - 1938

2 From Here Sing With Boston Symphony

Miss Augusta Alger of 1758 Wendell Avenue and Miss Ruth A. Jones of 1392 Glenwood Boulevard are members of the Radcliffe College Choral Society which sang with the Harvard Glee Club and the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday in Symphony Hall, Boston, when Dr. Serge Koussevitsky directed them in a presentation of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis." The performance will be reported tonight.

The Choral Society is one of the most popular student organizations at Radcliffe and has 150 members. Almost every year since 1917 it has sung with the Harvard Glee Club and the Boston Symphony Orchestra and this year it is to sing with them three times.

Artists in Music Programs

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

SERGE JAROFF

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
EVE. NEWS

DEC 3 - 1938

Famous Orchestra At Eastman

More than one feature of Monday night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have its audience in a busy anticipation before the opening number.

First of all, Serge Koussevitsky is one of the greatest living conductors. Second, the orchestra debates with a scarce few others for ranking as the greatest orchestra in the world.

Third, the brilliant Jesus Maria Sanroma, Puerto Rican pianist and growing in the estimation of audiences in several countries, will appear as guest soloist. Fourth, two of the most sweeping composers in musical literature will be heard in music from the best of their talents: a symphony from Beethoven, and one from Sibelius will be played.

With all this, it is not surprising that only a limited number of seats have remained in the outstanding pre-performance sale at the Eastman Theater box office.

The program, possibly not in ibelius ra

Ravel
t hoven

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN - TELEGRAPH

DEC 4 - 1938

PIANIST

Jesus Maria Sanroma, Spanish pianist, will be soloist when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the famed Koussevitsky, gives a program here Saturday night at Syria Mosque.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

CLEVELAND, O.
PRESS

DEC 3 - 1938

Ringwall Conducts Thursday; Boston Plays Here Next Week

Koussevitzky Brings Famous Orchestra of 110 Men to Music Hall; Singers Present Miss Vreeland

A BUSY week confronts music lovers and concert goers of Cleveland for the next seven days.

The Cleveland Orchestra resumes its concerts Thursday and Saturday nights with Rudolph Ringwall as conductor; the Boston Symphony Orchestra makes one of its rare appearances Friday night in Public Music Hall, and Jeanette Vreeland, fine American soprano, appears with the Singers' Club Tuesday night.

For the sixth pair of symphony concerts Mr. Ringwall will continue the Beethoven cycle with the playing of the Fifth Symphony—among the most famous of the Austrian master's symphonic works—and some rarely heard orchestral compositions.

Included in these will be Richard Strauss' arrangement for orchestra Couperin's "Dance Suite"; Cesar Franck's symphonic poem "The Wild Huntsman"; Rimsky-Korsakoff's musical tableau "Sadko" and Jan Sibelius' "The Return of Lemminkainen."

Again Sibelius

THE 110-piece Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of the famous Sergei Koussevitzky, one of our foremost musicians, will play the third concert in the Cleveland Concert Course series.

On the Koussevitzky program are Haydn's Symphony in B Flat; three Debussy pieces that comprise his composition "The Sea" and Sibelius' "Second Symphony" in D Major.

It will be a distinct privilege to hear the famous Boston here again, for the organization has not been heard "in person" for more than a decade, except over the radio waves.

The Singers' Club's first concert of the season will be held Tuesday night in Severance Hall with Miss Vreeland in the solo role, and the 100-voice chorus under the direction of Boris Goldovsky.

Miss Vreeland will sing one number with the club—Schubert's "Nachthelle," and two groups of songs including works by Sibella, Bossi, Wintzer, Strauss, Warlock and Deems Taylor. She will be accompanied on the piano by Mr. Goldovsky.

Music Notes

Vaughan Cahill, supervisor for the Federal Music Project, and Alfred Metzdorf, assistant conductor, will share the baton when the Cleveland Civic Symphony Orchestra plays a concert Friday night at the East Side Turnverein, 1622 E. 55th street.

The first half of the program will be devoted to Mr. Cahill's A Minor Symphony, which had its first and very successful hearing here last week, and Mr. Metzdorf will conduct works by Smetana, Schubert, Liszt and Berlioz.

Beryl Rubinstein, pianist, and Joseph Fuchs, violinist, will make their first public appearance as co-artists Wednesday night at the Cleveland Institute of Music. The pair will play Cesar Franck's Sonata in A Major and Beethoven's Kreutzer Sonata.

The Fortnightly Musical Club will present its third formal concert Tuesday at 2:30 p. m. at Steinway Hall of Halle Bros. Co. Irene H. Klinger, soprano; Robert Horak, violinist, and Eunice Podis, pianist, will participate.

The Baldwin-Wallace Conservatory Orchestra, directed by George Poinar, will give a concert tomorrow afternoon in the Kulas Musical Arts Building. Works by Beethoven, Mozart, Gounod and Wagner will be played.

Tomorrow night the College Club will be the scene of a concert by the small ensemble from Hiram College.

Two Orchestra Conductors

Rudolph Ringwall conducts the Cleveland Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzsky (left) brings his Boston Symphony here next week

---

FLINT, MICH.
SEMI-WEEKLY NEWS

DEC 2 - 1938

Boston Symphony Plays at Ann Arbor

Serge Koussevitzky, who will lead the Boston Symphony orchestra in its 38th consecutive annual concert next Wednesday evening at Ann Arbor in the University of Michigan Choral Union series. He has selected for his program: Haydn's Symphony in B flat, No. 102; Debussy's "La Mer," Trois Esquisses Symphoniques, and Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 4 in F Minor, Op. 36.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

DEC 4 - 1938

Polly can't remember WHEN she's seen a Buffalo audience as enthusiastic as the one which threatened to climb on the stage after Marian Anderson's performance last Sunday. Recalling with civic shame that the Philadelphia orchestra played to a half filled house last year, she hopes the music urge shown last week will extend to greet the Boston Symphony and to support our own orchestra which will present Emanuel Feuermann today.

MONNESSEN, PA.
INDEPENDENT

DEC 3 - 1938

Symphony Orchestra

The high-light of the musical season is the visit of the world-famous Boston Symphony orchestra, and all roads within a radius of 75 miles of Pittsburgh will lead to Syria Mosque next Saturday evening, December 10th, and Sunday afternoon, December 11th. The Sunday afternoon concert has special appeal to out-of-town music lovers. The concert starts at 3 o'clock, which makes possible an early return home. A young pianist will be featured as soloist at the Saturday evening concert. His name is Jesus Maria Sanroma, and he will play the Ravel Concerto for Piano and Orchestra. Sanroma has toured with great success in both Europe and Amesica. Other works on the evening program are the Beethoven Symphony No. 2 in D major, and the Brahams Symphony No. 4.

The Sunday afternoon program will also feature two great symphonies. They are the Haydn Symphony in B-flat, and the Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 4. Three orchestral sketches, entitled "La Mer" by Debussy will also be included in the afternoon program. The orchestra for both concerts is under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, and comes to Pittsburgh under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra association, May Beegle, manager.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST - GAZETTE

DEC 3 - 1938

Choirs Open Week Filled With Music

Pittsburgh and Boston Orchestra to Give Pairs of Concerts.

One talent which Serge Koussevitzky, who will conduct the Boston Symphony at the Mosque next Saturday night and Sunday afternoon, seldom reveals to a concert audience is that of the critic.

Bares Role of Conductor.

Although his opinion of latecomers, concert conversationalists and clanging radiators may be apparent to all, his pronunciamentos on music usually are reserved for speeches before the American Academy of Arts and Sciences. It was in one such address that Koussevitzky interpreted the role of the conductor of symphonic music. He said:

"A perfect interpretation may have two different aspects, equally faithful to the score of the composer. One may be called mechanically perfect. The other, organically perfect. The first gives the beauty of mathematical balance, symmetry and clarity. It aims to give a beautified reflection of the composition. The second is an indivisible, living, pulsating 'elan vital' of the work."

"The one is always enjoyable, pleasant and delightful, but remains, like a beautiful scene, external to the listener. The other—the organic interpretation—puts the listener in direct touch with the absolute reality hidden in the great score. It is like a mystic experience."

He himself is an "organic" interpreter.

Great Compositions Included.

Koussevitzky's program for Saturday night will include Beethoven's Second Symphony, Brahms' Fourth and Ravel's Concerto for Piano and Orchestra. The soloist will be Jesus Maria Sanroma. The Sunday afternoon program, given at 3 o'clock, will be Haydn's Symphony in B-flat, Debussy's "La Mer," a group of orchestral sketches, and Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony.

DETROT, MICH.
TIMES

DEC 4 - 1938

A Rem
Good

SERGE lead the chestra in its annual University of Michigan concert, Wednesday evening, in Hill Auditorium. Annually, since 1900, the Boston orchestra has played in Ann Arbor. The engagement this year constituting the only Michigan appearance of the organization. The program will consist of Haydn's Symphony in B-flat, No. 102; "La Mer" by Debussy

---

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION-STAR

DEC 3 - 1938

2 From Here Sing With Boston Symphony

Miss Augusta Alger of 1758 Wendell Avenue and Miss Ruth A. Jones of 1392 Glenwood Boulevard are members of the Radcliffe College Choral Society which sang with the Harvard Glee Club and the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday in Symphony Hall, Boston, when Dr. Serge Koussevitsky directed them in a presentation of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis." The performance will be reported tonight.

The Choral Society is one of the most popular student organizations at Radcliffe and has 150 members. Almost every year since 1917 it has sung with the Harvard Glee Club and the Boston Symphony Orchestra and this year it is to sing with them three times.

Artists in Music Programs

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY SERGE JAROFF

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
EVE. NEWS

DEC 3 - 1938

Famous Orchestra At Eastman

More than one feature of Monday night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have its audience in a busy anticipation before the opening number.

First of all, Serge Koussevitsky is one of the greatest living conductors. Second, the orchestra debates with a scarce few others for ranking as the greatest orchestra in the world.

Third, the brilliant Jesus Maria Sanroma, Puerto Rican pianist and growing in the estimation of audiences in several countries, will appear as guest soloist. Fourth, two of the most sweeping composers in musical literature will be heard in music from the best of their talents: a symphony from Beethoven, and one from Sibelius will be played.

With all this, it is not surprising that only a limited number of seats have remained in the outstanding pre-performance sale at the Eastman Theater box office.

The program, possibly not in his order, follows:

mphony No. 5 .... Sibelius ncerto for Piano and Orchestra
.... Ravel
Jesus Maria Sanroma, Soloist
mphony No. 5 .... Beethoven

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN - TELEGRAPH

DEC 4 - 1938

PIANIST

Jesus Maria Sanroma, Spanish pianist, will be soloist when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the famed Koussevitsky, gives a program here Saturday night at Syria Mosque.

YPSILANTI, MICH.
PRESS

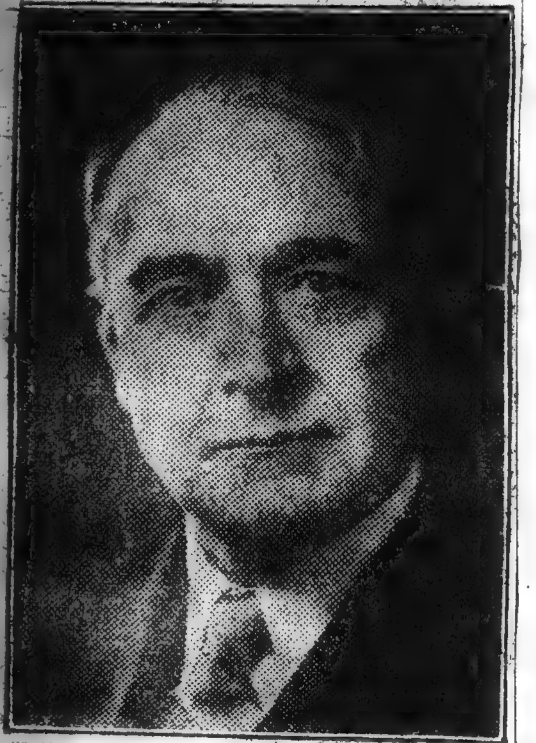
DEC 2 - 1938

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PLAY NEXT WEDNESDAY

Ann Arbor, Mich., Dec. 2—Serge Koussevitzky will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its annual University of Michig n concert Wednesday evening, Dec. 7, in Hill Auditorium. Annually, since 1900 he has brought his distinguished band of players to Choral Union concert patrons, the engagement consisting the only Michigan appearance of the organization.

On this occasion the orchestra will play the following program: Symphony in B-flat, No. 102, Haydn; "La Mer", Trois Esquisses Symphoniques, Debussy; Symphony No. 4, in F minor, Op. 36, Tschaikowsky.

Directs Orchestra

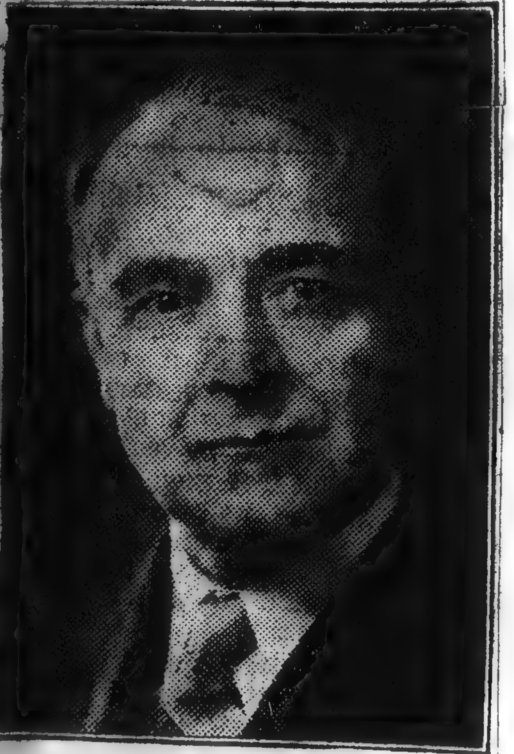


Serge Koussevitzky, who will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Wednesday evening, Dec. 7, in the Choral Union Series, in Hill Auditorium, Ann Arbor.

ADRIAN, MICH.
TELEGRAM

DEC 3 - 1938

Appears in Ann Arbor



Serge Koussevitzky

Serge Koussevitzky will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its annual University of Michigan conce t Wednesday evening, December 7, in Hill Auditorium. Annually, since 1900, he has brought his distinguished band af players to Choral Union concert patrons, the engagement constituting the only Michigan appearance of the organization.

nO this occasion the orchestra will play the following program: Symphony in B-flit, No. 102, (Haydn); "LaMe ," Trois Esquisses Eymphoniques, (Debussy); Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36, (Tschaikowsky).

CLEVELAND, O.
NEWS

DEC 3 - 1938

MUSIC

Boston Symphony, Singers Club, Ringwall Program Mark Week

BY ELMORE BACON

WITH the Ballet Russe still in our midst, the week in music brings us the first visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in many years, the winter concert of the Singers Club and the Cleveland Orchestra offering a most interesting program under the baton of Rudolph Ringwall, the associate director.

A presentation of works by Josephine Forsyth Myers by the Music and Drama Club, and other recitals are also coming features.

With Dr. Artur Rodzinski in New York directing the NBC Symphony over the radio this month, Director Ringwall devotes his first Thursday-Saturday symphony program at Severance Hall to compositions by Couperin, Franck, Rimsky-Korsakoff and Sibelius, in addition to the beloved Fifth Symphony by Beethoven.

The Couperin Dance Suite which opens the program is a Richard Strauss arrangement of a group of dances popular in the day of King Louis XV.

The Franck Symphonic Poem, "The Accursed Huntsman," is based on a popular folk tale and is one of the composer's later writings. The Rimsky-Korsakoff Musical Tableau, "Sadko," also is based on a legend, the same Russian tale around which he later wrote the opera of the same name. And Sibelius' "The Return of Lemminkainen" is another orchestral work based on legend, a Finnish folk epic, "The Kalavala."

Boston Symphony

For the first time in many years the Boston Symphony Orchestra pays Cleveland a visit. And for that matter it is the first time in many years that we have had a visiting orchestra, barring the Philadelphians under Stokowski.

The famous 58-year-old organization has had many noted directors at its head. However, at present under the baton of Serge Koussevitsky it is believed by many to have reached the pinnacle of its artistic accomplishments.

Coming to Music Hall Friday night for a concert at 8:45, it plays three compositions. Opening with the Haydn Symphony in B Flat Major, No. 102, it next presents the Debussy Symphonic Sketches, "La Mer." And after intermission Koussevitsky directs his 110 men in Sibelius' Second Symphony, D Major.

The concert is a feature of the Cleveland Concert Course under auspices of the Cleveland Museum of Art and directed by Mrs. Emil Brudno.

Featured in Week's Music

LEFT to right—Serge Koussevitzky, who directs the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a concert at Music Hall Friday night; Jeanette Vreeland, soloist with the Singers Club at its Severance Hall concert, Tuesday night; Rudolph Ringwall, associate conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra, who directs the programs next Thursday and Saturday nights at Severance Hall.

Week in Music:

Today
2:30 and 8:30—Ballet Russe, Music Hall.

Tomorrow
3:30—Ballet Russe, Music Hall.
4:00—Baldwin-Wallace Conservatory Orchestra, Berea.
5:15—Arthur W. Quimby, organ recital, Cleveland Museum of Art.

Monday
2:30—Music and Drama Club, Wade Park Manor.

Tuesday
2:30—Fortnightly Musical Club, Halle Bros. Co. Hall.
8:15—Singers' Club, Severance Hall.

Wednesday
8:30—Rubinstein-Loesser Recital, Cleveland Institute of Music.

Thursday
8:30—Cleveland Orchestra, Rudolph Ringwall directing, Severance Hall.

Friday
8:45—Boston Symphony, Serge Koussevitzky directing, Music Hall.

Saturday, December 10
8:30—Cleveland Orchestra, Rudolph Ringwall directing, Severance Hall.

RINGWALL PROGRAM
Dance Suite .... Couperin-Strauss
Symphony No. 5, C Minor, op. 67 .... Beethoven
Symphonic Poem, the Accursed Huntsman .... Franck
Sadko, Musical Tableau, op. 5 .... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Legend for orchestra, the Return of Lemminkainen .... Sibelius

KOUSSEVITZKY PROGRAM
Symphony in B Flat, No. 102 .... Haydn
"La Mer" Symphonic Sketches .... Debussy
Symphony No. 2, D Major... Sibelius

ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS

DEC 3 - 1938

Boston Symphony Due Wednesday

Ann Arbor Gets Only Concert In Michigan

During the past eight years the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will play next Wednesday night in Hill Auditorium, has become a fixture on the Choral Union concert series, an unique recognition of the regard in which it is held locally.

The Boston organization, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, has been heard here annually since 1930. It will not play in any other city in Michigan this year.

More than 100 players are now in the orchestra which Koussevitzky has conducted since 1924 when he arrived in America from Russia. The span of intervening years has seen the organization reach the peak of its virtuosity and tonal beauty.

For the Ann Arbor concert, Dr. Koussevitzky has built a program comprising the following numbers:

Symphony in B-flat, No. 102 .... Haydn
"La Mer" .... Debussy
Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36 ..... Tschaikowsky

PORTLAND, ME.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

DEC 4 - 1938

Artur Rodzinski, conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra will return to the NBC Symphony Orchestra as its guest conductor for the four Saturday nights during December. For the first concert Dr. Rodzinski has selected an all Russian program which will include the first American radio presentation of "Concerto for Orchestra," Starokadomsky. The other numbers to be included: overture "Russian and Ludmilla," Glinka; "Fifth Symphony," Tschaikowsky and "Fire Bird Suite," Stravinsky.

"Russian And Ludmilla," the second opera of Glinka's is based on the fairy tale of the Princess Ludmilla who was kidnaped by a wicked magician and rescued by Russlan. True to fairy tale tradition they married and lived happily ever after. This work written in 1842 is especially interesting because it is one of the earliest symphonic writings in which the whole-tonescale was used. It appeared almost fifty years before the great French composer, Debussy, made popular the scale without semi-tones.

When Tschaikowsky first played his "Fifth Symphony," it was so coldly received that he wondered if he had written a worthwhile work. Later when it was played in Germany it won favor and today rivals that of his "Pathetique," in popularity.

After a somber and dignified introduction, the "First Movement" develops vigorously without becoming gay. The meditative beauty of the "Second Movement," has its foreboding interruptions. The graceful "Waltz" which constitutes the "Third Movement," never completely loses itself in pleasure, while the sunshine illuminating the last movement casts reminding shadows. Like Beethoven's "Fifth," there is a "fateful" motive which hovers throughout the entire work.

Starokadomsky is a young Russian composer, born 1901 and now residing in Moscow. His "Concerto for Orchestra" was first performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Dec. 17, 1937. ~~In a letter~~ addressed to Nicolas Slonimsky, which was quoted in the program notes of that date, Starokadomsky says of himself:

"In 1921 I entered the Moscow Conservatory in the organ class under Prof. Goedicke and composition under Miaskovsky. I graduated in 1928. After graduation I began to trace my own path in art more clearly. I found that my task was not to indulge in individualistic psychologizing, which has value solely as a revelation of one's own emotions. The aims of art of our epoch appear to me now in the creation of objective music, embodying the entire gamut of human emotions, which are subordinate, however to general philosophy. Eighteenth-century music comes nearest to my ideals; in its artistic accomplishment reaches the highest point in the correspondence of the specific musical means to the artistic task; ludity of form, sharpness of thematic content, the functional character of harmony, and perfection of polyphonic texture.

"Beyond doubt, these views have been condictoned by my own instrument, the organ, the repertoire of which consists of music of objective and non-individualistic quality."

This composition is a "Concerto" in the 17th century sense of the word for it is a composition for orchestra without any solo parts. It is further reminiscent of that period in the style and naming of its movements. The first is a "Sinfonia" followed by "Passacaglia" and concluding with "Toccata."

TOLEDO, O.
TIMES

DEC 4 - 1938

Members Of Society Will Hear Symphony

THE annual members' concert to be given Thursday evening by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, will attract a large group, including many out-of-town guests.

Every museum member is entitled to two tickets for this outstanding event, and the capacity of the peristyle will be taxed on this occasion.

Miss Sally Libbey will have as her guests for the concert, Mrs. Mott Bradley and Mrs. Katherine Warner of Cleveland.

Others who will attend include Mr. and Mrs. Jefferson D. Robinson, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. John F. Davis, Mr. and Mrs. Lyman Spitzer, Mr. and Mrs. Carl B. Spitzer, Mr. and Mrs. Justus Wilcox, Mrs. Cornelia Colton Hollister, Mr. and Mrs. Lloyd T. Williams, Mr. and Mrs. James Bentley, Dr. and Mrs. William Gardiner, Mr. and Mrs. Karl S. Moening, Mr. and Mrs. Albert F. Miller.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry A. Page, Mr. and Mrs. Charles B. Belknap, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas P. Goodbody, Mr. and Mrs. Ward M. Canaday, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Eversman, Mr. and Mrs. Henry C. Bloch, Mr. and Mrs. John S. Pratt, Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Tiedtke and Mr. and Mrs. Frank S. Lewis.

Dr. and Mrs. John T. Murphy, Mrs. John J. Manning, Herman H. Brand, Mrs. George B. Storer, Mr. and Mrs. Charles T. Harther, Mr. and Mrs. Benjamin Basch, Mr. and Mrs. Henry P. Dodge, Mrs. Flora Ward Hineline, Mr. and Mrs. Edwin J. Marshall, Judge and Mrs. Julian H. Tyler, Mr. and Mrs. William M. Booker, Mr. and Mrs. William E. Levis, Mr. and Mrs. Sinclair Walbridge, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Bentley, Mr. and Mrs. John P. Rohr and Mr. and Mrs. Dean Higgins.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

DEC 4 - 1938

Tribute to Godowsky

To the Music Editor:

THE passing of Leopold Godowsky is an unredeemable loss to the musical world. Not only was he a great, masterful pianist and pedagogue but also a man of the highest culture of whom his contemporaries could justly be proud. I, as one of them, treasure the memory of thirty years of friendship during which I learned to deeply admire, respect and love him. Although he was less active of late, the presence alone of Leopold Godowsky among us was stimulating and his influence could be felt in all and every one close to him. Today I mourn the passing of a beloved friend and above all I mourn the loss of a great artist and a great human heart.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

Boston, Nov. 28, [redacted]

PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

DEC 4 - 1938

* * *

Teutonia Maenerchor (male chorus) of 80 supplemented by a 50-voice women's chorus and conducted by Charles H. Martin will give a concert Wednesday at 8:15 p. m. in Northside Carnegie Hall. They will be assisted by Dr. Caspar P. Koch, organist; Homer Ochsenhirt, piano; and a string ensemble directed by Dr. Joseph Rauterkus. Vincent Kroen, tenor, will be solist.

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra led by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky will give two concerts under auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association next Saturday night at 8:30 and next Sunday at 3 p. m.

The evening program comprises Beethoven's 2nd symphony; Ravel's piano concerto for left hand alone with Jesus Marie Sanroma as soloist, and Brahms 4th symphony.

The matinee list consists of Haydn's B-flat symphony, No. 102; Debussy's "La Mer," and Tschaikowsky's 4th symphony.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN - TELEGRAPH

DEC 4 - 1938

Bach Choir Program Tuesday Night

By J. FRED LISSFELT
Sun-Telegraph Music Critic

From now until the New Year we shall have Christmas as a motivation for many of our musical programs, and not without reason, for much of the great music of this earth is written about the Nativity and the picturesque legends which come out of that time.

No other great composer devoted so much of his talent to writing for church festivals as John Sebastian Bach, and so it is altogether fitting that our Bach Festival Choir, John Julius Baird directing, should give us the best of Bach in its Christmastide program Tuesday night in Carnegie Hall, North Side.

Boston Symphony

To close a week of fine music comes the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday night and next Sunday afternoon in Syria Mosque with the incomparable Koussevitsky.

At the Saturday concert we shall hear a soloist, so that we may for a change hear a concerto for piano which is not the daily fare of all piano players. Jesus Maria Sanroma, Spanish pianist, will play Ravel's Concerto, a tributé to the late French composer. Two symphonies, Beethoven's Second and Brahms' Fourth complete this monumental program.

For Sunday there will also be two symphonies, Haydn's No. 102 in B Flat, and the Tschaikowsky Fourth, with DeBussy's Symphonic Sketches "La Mer" as interlude.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE

DEC 4 - 1938

THE ORCHESTRAS

N. B. C. Symphony

The N. B. C. Symphony Orchestra under Arturo Toscanini, will give its first out of town concert Tuesday night, December 13, at the Mosque Theater, in Newark, N. J. (1020 Broad Street), under the auspices of the Griffith Music Foundation and for the benefit of the Essex County Conference of Catholics, Jews and Protestants. Inquiries about tickets should be directed to the foundation's office in Newark, 605 Broad Street (MArket 3-5886). The program will include Wiser's overture to "Oberon," Tchaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony, Brahms's Haydn Variations, Liszt's "Orpheus," the Waldweben from Wagner's "Siegfried" and the prelude to Wagner's "Meistersinger."

According to present plans Mr. Toscanini and the N. B. C. Symphony will visit about seven other Eastern cities this season, not going, however, beyond the radius of one-day trip, owing to the demands of its regular Saturday night broadcasting schedule.

The next four concerts of the N. B. C. Symphony's radio series will be directed by Artur Rodzinski, conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra, who organized this orchestra last fall, and conducted several of its 1937-'38 concerts. His Russian program for next Saturday will include a work new here, a concerto for orchestra, Op. 14, by Michael Leonidovitch Starokadomsky, who was born in Brest-Litovsk in 1901. The concerto was composed in 1933 and published in Moscow in 1936. The first performance outside of Russia was at the festival of the International Society for Contemporary Music in Paris on June 22, 1937. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, introduced it to the United States on December 17-18, 1937. Mr. Toscanini will resume the direction of these concerts on January 7.

Dimitri Mitropoulos, of the Minneapolis Symphony, will be in charge of the Cleveland Orchestra during the first week of Dr. Rodzinski's absence, conducting the first performances of Ernest Bloch's violin concerto on December 15 and 17 with Joseph Szigeti as the soloist. Rudolph Ringwall, associate conductor, and Albert Stoessel will conduct the Cleveland concerts of the holiday period.

The Vienna Choir Boys will be the assisting artists with the National Orchestral Association at Carnegie Hall in the second concert of its Monday night series under Leon Barzin's direction, Monday, December 12.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat-Chronicle

DEC 4 - 1938

In Final Rehearsal on Concerto

Jose Iturbi is shown with his sister, Amparo, going over the Schumann Concerto in A Minor, which the Philharmonic orchestra will play on tour, with Amparo as guest artist.

Iturbi's Sister Will Be Guest Star On Philharmonic Orchestra's Tour

Brother and sister make a good story when they're teamed up in music. They make a better one when the brother is Jose Iturbi, conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic, and the sister, Amparo Iturbi.

Someone once said that the Iturbi family's good looks went to Jose's sister, who more pertinently also got an abundant share of the family's piano-playing talent when that was passed out.

Now Amparo, who is 2½ years younger than her fiery brother, is to be Jose's guest star when the Philharmonic takes to the road tomorrow.

Yesterday brother and sister put the final touches to the Schumann Concerto in A Minor, the great composition for piano and orchestra, which the orchestra will perform Dec. 9 at Scranton, Pa. They rehearsed at the Eastman Theater.

Sister on Own Tour

The sister, who succeeded to Jose's pianoforte class when he abandoned piano teaching in Spain at the age of 14 to go to France, made her concert debut with Iturbi at New York a year ago. This winter she is on an independent concert tour of her own, and her appearance as guest artist with her brother's orchestra is just one date on that schedule.

The concert tour which her brother's orchestra begins tomorrow boasts several ununsual features.

Sometime tomorow, somewhere between Rochester and Albany, the 85 Rochester musicians who form the orchestra, will meet—if for only a fleeting moment—the famous Boston Symphony, which will be en route from tomorrow night's concert in Eastman Theater.

While Dr. Sergie Koussevitzky and his men are approaching Rochester, Iturbi and his organization will stop off briefly at Schenectady to fill the weekly broadcast engagement of the Rochester Civic Orchestra.

Which isn't as strange as it sounds, because the Civic Orchestra musicians all hold chairs in the Philharmonic. Guy Fraser Harrison, who usually conducts the Civic Orchestra in the program generally broadcast over a coast-to-coast network from the Eastman Theater, will go to lead his men at 3 p. m. in Station WGY studios.

First concert on the Philharmonic tour is tomorrow night at Troy Music Hall. Later the Philharmonic will play in Saratoga Springs, Newburgh, Williamstown, Mass., and Scranton, Pa. In Newburgh, Thursday, the Civic Orchestra is also booked—for a children's program in the high school auditorium. Harrison will conduct.

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

DEC 4 - 1938

THE MUSICAL DIGEST:

Gluck's Orfeo Magnificently Given at Met

BY PIERRE V. R. KEY,
Special Correspondent of The News.

NEW YORK, Dec. 3.—New York's

Orchestras Reign.

Where could one hear within a few days three such orchestras as New York's Philharmonic-Symphony, the Boston Symphony and the Philadelphia? Only in New York—at present. Perhaps some other city will later have that good fortune, but it isn't likely to be soon.

Mr. Barbirolli has no easy task, seeking to please several times a week. There is first the difficulty of making the programs, then of interpreting them to the various tastes of different groups of listeners. A late program had Jose Iturbi appearing as piano soloist instead of conducting (as he so often does, nowadays) and it was a worth-while occasion.

The Bostonians constitute a great band and their two concerts were high enough in accomplishment to make the task of the Philadelphia Orchestra, which followed, more difficult because of the inevitable comparisons in which American music listeners indulge. But everybody was well served, orchestrally—no matter which of these concerts was heard.

CLEVELAND, O.
PLAIN DEALER
DEC 4 - 1938

Right Off the Records

By Stewart Matter

SIBELIUS—Symphony No. 5 in E flat, opus 82; with Pohjola's Daughter, opus 49; played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, direction of [illegible] Koussevitzky. Victor set 474. $10.

There will be criticism of Victor for bringing out this set when it already has both these numbers represented in its catalog. The older set was by Kajanus and the London Orchestra, and it must be admitted that there is an air of authenticity about the reading, for Kajanus was Sibelius' favored pupil. But Sibelius also has expressed complete approval of Koussevitzky's interpretations of his works. Even though Koussevitzky does depart from certain markings in the score, his reading is certainly more brilliant and more exciting than that of Kajanus. From the mechanical standpoint, the older set comes through well only on high-fidelity machines, but for the usual domestic instrument the newer set will be found to be better balanced. In truth, this set must be ranked one of the finest in the catalog.

It may be said that this is the most logical and yet the most bewildering of Sibelius' symphonies. As with the fourth, do not expect to grasp it immediately; the first and second are apparent with the first hearing, but not so this one. What a revelation to study this magnificent work, to become aware of its gradual unfolding, to admire the genius and invention of he who was able to accomplish a master work of the highest order with such an economy of means.

Concert-goers are familiar with the tone poem, "Pohjola's Daughter," and are certain to find increasing delight in its brilliance, especially so in the definitive version Koussevitzky offers.

Shorter Mention

Several years ago Sir Hamilton Harty with the Halle Orchestra of London made a recording for British Columbia of the overture and incidental music from Schubert's "Rosamunde." While not presenting the finest recording standard, the discs are not in the least dated, and for Harty's delicious abandon in bringing forth this rich stream of melody we cannot but be grateful. Columbia set 343. $6.

One of the biggest sellers Victor ever had was the Weber "Invitation to the Waltz" played by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Stokowski. This number has been one of the highlights of the Monte Carlo Ballet Russe as well. The same group remakes the disc with the new high-fidelity recording equipment, and it becomes a must item. Victor 15189.

WASHINGTON, PA.
REPORTER

DEC 5 - 1938

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Be Heard in Pittsburgh

A high-light of the musical season is the visit of the world-famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, to Syria Mosque next Saturday evening, December 10, and Sunday afternoon, December 11.

The Sunday afternoon concert will begin at 3 o'clock.

A young pianist, featured as soloist at the Saturday evening concert, Jesus Maria Sanroma, will play the Ravel Concerto for piano and orchestra. Other works on the evening program are the Beethoven Symphony No. 2 in D major, and the Brahms Symphony No. 4.

The Sunday afternoon program will also feature two great symphonies. They are the Haydn Symphony in B-flat, and the Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 4. Three orchestral sketches, entitled "La Mer" by Debussy will also be included in the afternoon program. The orchestra for both concerts is under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

DEC 5 - 1938

Enjoys Sibelius

To the Editor of The Times:

In a letter on Nov. 25 John J. Duffy makes some statements to the effect that the symphonic works of Jean Sibelius are, for the most part unmusical, and "insults to music." Acting as an unofficial spokesman for that substantial portion of the music-loving public which frankly admires Sibelius' music, may I say that Mr. Duffy's opinions in this matter are not so final and indisputable as his letter would seem to indicate, nor are they widely accepted among serious music lovers.

Mr. Duffy has some justification in his objection to Dr. Koussevitzky's labeling of Rachmaninoff as "old-fashioned." Dr. Koussevitzky is correct insofar as he means that Rachmaninoff's music is written in a style which was developed and prevalent in the past; but within reasonable limits, time and dates have little significance in the consideration of great music. The greatest composers have always written music which was satisfactory to themselves, whether it be conventional or not. A composer is at perfect liberty to write in the style of an earlier master, or masters, if he so desires, but his works must be about as good as or better than those he uses as models if he is to gain much personal recognition. In my opinion, Rachmaninoff, in the E Minor Symphony and similar works, has done just that.

In estimating the worth of a musical compostion, there are two factors, one concrete and the other less tangible. The first is the question of form and structure. Without these, a composition is worthless, but when they are present, and logically suited to the type of composition intended the music may be perfectly justified in spite of extreme individuality, as is sometimes the case with Sibelius symphonies.

The second factor is personal taste. This varies with individuals, and once the concrete worth of a work has been determined, further appraisal is a personal matter for each separate listener. For example: the symphonies of Beethoven are indisputably masterpieces of form and structure, but they do not appeal to me as do the symphonies of Brahms and Sibelius, and are, therefore, not as important to me as the latter works. But that is my loss, and not Beethoven's.

So, when we are considering a musical work, let us become familiar with its form and structure before we criticize this phase, and let us remember, that in matters of taste, the next person's opinion is as good as our own.

MUSICAL AMATEUR.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER EXPRESS

DEC 4 - 1938

Boston Symphony Here Tuesday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Sergi Koussevitzky, indisputably the foremost of the world's great symphony orchestra conductors, will play in Buffalo Consistory, Tuesday evening, in the fourth concert of Mrs. Zorah B. Berry's evening series.

Patrons are urged to be on time as the concert will begin with the Beethoven Symphony No. 2 in D major and late arrivals will be obliged to wait until the conclusion of the symphony before being escorted to their seats.

This is Dr. Koussevitzky's fifteenth season as conductor of the Boston. Now in the full maturity of his powers, Dr. Koussevitzky has proved his ability, during the lengthening succession of seasons, to keep his approach to the more familiar "classics" vital and absorbing. The musical public never fails to be electrified by his personality and by the strength and vividness of his interpretations.

The young Puerto Rican pianist, Jesus Maria Sanroma, will appear as assisting artist in the Ravel Concerto.

The program for Tuesday evening:

Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 36 .... Beethoven
Concerto for piano and orchestra..Ravel
Jesus Maria Sanroma, soloist
Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98 ....Brahms

Alexander Brailowsky, distinguished Russian pianist, will play in the Consistory, January 10th, in the fifth concert of Mrs. Berry's evening series. His repertoire embraces the entire classic and modern field of pianitsic literature. Some idea of its size may be gained from the fact that when recently he gave twelve recitals in five weeks in Buenos Aires, he was able to present twelve different programs without repeating a single number.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat-Chronicle

DEC 4 - 1938

Boston Symphony, Radio Star, Organist and Pianists Highlight Programs

Today: Strong Auditorium, 4 p. m.—Andre Marchal, French organist, in recital sponsored by the University of Rochester; public invited, no tickets required for admission.
Tonight: Eastman Theater, 8:20 p. m.—Rochester Civic Orchestra, Guy Fraser Harrison conductor; Virginia Rea, radio star, soprano soloist.
Monday: Eastman Theater, 8:20 p. m.—Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitski, conductor; second event in Series A, Eastman Theater concerts.
Wednesday: Hochstein School Auditorium, 12 Hoeltzer Street, 8:20 p. m.—Benefit concert by Major John A. Warner, Emanuel Balaban, Leopold Mannes, pianists, and the Hochstein School String Orchestra, Samuel Belov conductor.
Tuesday, Dec. 13: Kilbourn Hall, 8:20 p. m.—Yella Pessl, harpsichordist, and Georges Barrere, flutist, in recital; third event in the Kilbourn Hall chamber series.
Thursday, Dec. 15: Eastman Theater, 3:15 p. m.—Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra, Guy Fraser Harrison conducting.

By STEWART B. SABIN

Boston Symphony Has Sanroma as Soloist

The large Rochester public that welcomes visits to the Eastman Theater by the Boston Symphony Orchestra may take note of two circumstances; the orchestra plays tomorrow night as the second event in the Eastman Theater Series A, all other events of which are on Friday evenings, and this time it brings with it a piano soloist.

Sanroma is a pianist of wide reputation and from recent newspaper reviews his performance of the Ravel piano concerto is one to attract music lovers.

In another particular Koussevitski's program challenges attention; symphonies by Sibelius and Beethoven have as interlude a modern work about which there has been considerable discussion. Furthermore it is years since Rochester heard the Boston Symphony play Beethoven's 5th Symphony. The orchestra in its home city and on tour is evoking as cordial praise as ever.

Tomorrow night's program follows:

Symphony No. 5...........Sibelius
Concerto for Piano and Orchestra ....Ravel
Jesus Maria Sanroma, soloist
Symphony No. 5........Beethoven

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
EVE. NEWS

DEC 5 - 1938

Boston Symphony Tonight

One of the most significant musical events in Rochester music takes place tonight, when Dr. Serge Kouusevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra perform an impressive program at the Eastman Theater.

The Boston Symphony has been called a miracle of music ensemble, and its choice of two monumental symphonies will aptly demonstrate its claim to the title given it by many, as the greatest orchestra in the world.

Adding to the richness of the program, Jesus Maria Sanroma, facile pianist, will perform in a concerto for piano and orchestra, by Ravel.

The Boston Symphony and Koussevitsky will play the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius, and the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven. More need not be said.

A limited number of seats may be available at the Eastman Theater Box Office. Performance time is 8:20 tonight.

LATROBE, PA.
BULLETIN

DEC 5 - 1938

Boston Symphony To Give Concerts At Syria Mosque

The high-light of the musical season is the visit of the world-famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, and all roads within a radius of 75 miles of Pittsburgh will lead to Syria Mosque next Saturday evening, December 10th, and Sunday afternoon, December 11th. The Sunday afternoon concert has special appeal to out-of-town music lovers. The concert starts at 3 o'clock, which makes possible an early return home. A young pianist will be featured as soloist at the Saturday evening concert. His name is Jesus Maria Sanroma, and he will play the Ravel Concerto for Piano and Orchestra. Sanroma has toured with great success in both Europe and America. Other works on the evening program are the Beethoven Symphony No. 2 in D Major, and the Brahms Symphony No. 4.

The Sunday afternoon program will also feature two great symphonies. They are the Haydn Symphony in B-Flat, and the Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 4. Three orchestral selections, entitled "La Wer," by Debussy, will also be included in the afternoon program. The orchestra for both concerts is under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, and comes to Pittsburgh under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association, May Beegle, manager.

BATTLE CREEK, MICH.
MOON JOURNAL

DEC 5 - 1938

Koussevitzky To Be Heard In Ann Arbor

Serge Koussevitzky will lead the Boston Symphony orchestra in its annual University of Michigan concert Wednesday evening in Hill Auditorium. Annually, since 1900, he has brought his distinguished band of players to Choral Union concert patrons, the engagement constituting the only Michigan appearance of the organization.

On this occasion the orchestra will play the following program:

Symphony in B-flat, No. 102 Haydn
"La Mer," Trois Esquisses Symphoniques .... Debussy
Symphony No. 4 in F minor,

Boston Symphony Presents Evening of Superb Music

Large Audience Indicates Interest in Brilliant Orchestra; Tonal Effects Outstanding; Dr. Koussevitzky Conducts

By WILLIAM BREACH

The great crowd which greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its distinguished conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, at the Consistory Auditorium last night, was tangible evidence of the interest of the general public in the superb playing of symphonic music—such as we have learned to expect from this famous organization.

The concert was the fourth in the Zorah B. Berry series. With conductor and players in fine fettle, it was an evening of superlative deeds.

Among the myriad of details to admire, one was impressed with the orchestral tone—whether string, wood or brass—a constant joy to the ear.

It was a pleasure to hear the Beethoven Second Symphony—with which the concert opened—a work too frequently passed by for others less vital. The buoyant music of this "Prince of symphonies"—at Dr. Koussevitzky's hands—glowed with a full measure of its exhilarating and exultant power. The slow movement was notable for its lovely lyricism, the scherzo for its flashing spirit, and the finale for its capricious humor and gusto.

The Ravel Piano Concerto, which closed the first half of the program, was played by Jesus Maria Sanroma, soloist at the Boston premiere in 1932. With the co-operation of Dr. Koussevitzky, long regarded a leading Ravel interpreter, the concerto was given a vivid and brilliant performance which reached a dizzy peak of virtuosity.

It is brittle and ironic music with a pungent effectiveness that clearly shows the jazz influence. The scoring is dazzling and adroit with its uncanny play of rare tonal tints. The audience was stirred by Mr. Sanroma's bravura playing and recalled him a number of times.

The crown of the evening was the Brahms Fourth Symphony. It will be many a day before we hear this classic masterpiece set forth with such beauty and dramatic power. From the exquisite articulation of the opening theme to the stupendous closing passacaglia, the music gathered momentum until it reached a stirring intensity that was profoundly impressive.

WASHINGTON, PA.
OBSERVER

DEC 6 - 1938

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Be Heard in Pittsburgh

A high-light of the musical season is the visit of the world-famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, to Syria Mosque next Saturday evening, December 10, and Sunday afternoon, December 11.

The Sunday afternoon concert will begin at 3 o'clock.

A young pianist, featured as soloist at the Saturday evening concert, Jesus Maria Sanroma, will play the Ravel Concerto for piano and orchestra. Other works on the evening program are the Beethoven Symphony No. 2 in D major, and the Brahms Symphony No. 4.

The Sunday afternoon program will also feature two great symphonies. They are the Haydn Symphony in B-flat, and the Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 4. Three orchestral sketches, entitled "La Mer" by Debussy will also be included in the afternoon program. The orchestra for both concerts is under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

LYNN, MASS.
ITEM

DEC 6 - 1938

PAINTS PORTRAIT.

A portrait of Serge Koussevitsky, noted conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, now on exhibition at the Memorial Gallery of the famous Eastman School of Music at the University of Rochester, is the work of Miss Sarah Chorover, daughter of Mrs. George Chorover, 159 Burrill street, Swampscott.

The portrait, regarded by critics as an excellent likeness of the world famous conductor, is described as a "fine expression of his character and personality, beautifully rendered in pencil."

The portrait was brought to the attention of Doctor See, director of the Eastman School of Music, and he was so impressed by the likeness that he requested the portrait be hung in the gallery at Rochester, N. Y. Coincidental with the exhibit is the fact that the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the baton of Koussevitsky, gave a concert at the university, Monday.

Miss Chorover has been studying drawing and painting, under the tutorship of Max Gordon, widely known art instructor, in the WPA Opportunity School for Adults. Prior to enrolling at the school, the Swampscott girl had no previous training along artistic lines, but her instructor feels that her work is certain to win her recognition within a few years.

VANDEGRIFT, PA.
NEWS

DEC 6 - 1938

Boston Symphony Plays In Syria Mosque Saturday

The high-light of the musical season is the visit of the world-famous Boston Symphony orchestra, and all roads within a radius of 75 miles of Pittsburgh will lead to Syria Mosque next Saturday night and Sunday afternoon.

The Sunday afternoon concert has special appeal to out-of-town music lovers. The concert starts at 3 o'clock, which makes possible an early return home. A young pianist will be featured as soloist at the Saturday night concert. His name is Jesus Maria Sanroma, and he will play the Ravel Concerto for piano and orchestra. Sanroma has toured with great success in both Europe and America.

Other works on the night program are the Beethoven Symphony No. 2 in D major, and the Brahms Symphony No. 4.

The Sunday afternoon program will also feature two great symphonies. They are the Haydn Symphony in B-flat, and the Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 4. Three orchestral sketches, entitled "La Mer" by Debussy will also be included in the afternoon program. The orchestra for both concerts is under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, and comes to Pittsburgh under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra association, May Beegle, manager.

WASHINGTON, PA.
OBSERVER

DEC 7 - 1938

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT SYRIA MOSQUE SATURDAY EVENING

The high-light of the musical season is the visit of the world-famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, and all roads within a radius of 75 miles of Pittsburgh will lead to Syria Mosque next Saturday evening, December 10, and Sunday afternoon, December 11. The Sunday afternoon concert has special appeal to out-of-town music lovers. The concert starts at 3 o'clock which makes possible an early return home. A young pianist will be featured as soloist at the Saturday evening concert. His name is Jesus Maria Sanroma and he will play the Ravel Concerto for Piano and Orchestra. Sanroma has toured with great success in both Europe and America. Other works on the evening program are the Beethoven Symphony No. 2 in D major and the Brahms Symphony No. 4.

The Sunday afternoon program will also feature two great syphonies. They are the Hayden Symphony in B-flat and the Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 4. Three orchestral sketches, entitled "La Mer" by Debussy will also be included in the afternoon program. The orchestra for both concerts is under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, and comes to Pittsburgh under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association, May Beegle, manager.

SAN ANTONIO, TEX.
EXPRESS

DEC 5 - 1938

NEGRO CONTRALTO CHEERED IN BOSTON

BOSTON, Dec. 4 (AP).—Stamping of feet and shouts of "more," instead of the usual polite handclapping, echoed today in staid Symphony Hall as Marian Anderson, Philadelphia negro contralto, concluded a concert.

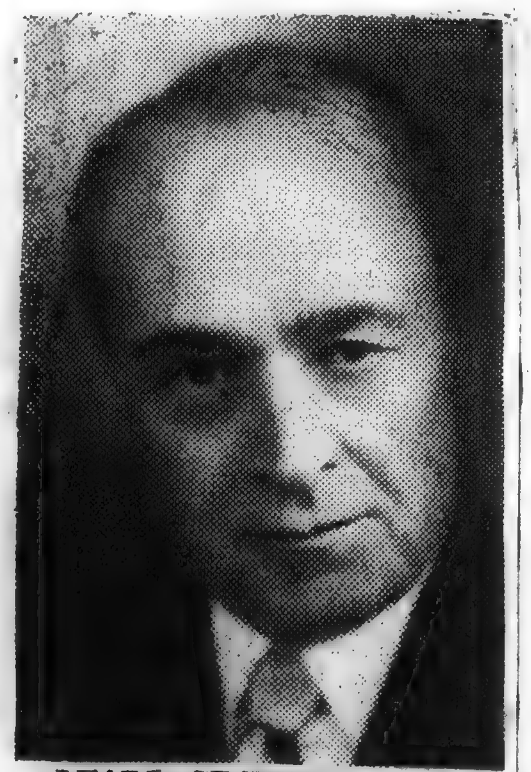
Tumultuous applause broke out even before her last note had faded and eager listeners from rear seats rushed down side aisles to the stage to applaud.

The more than 2,000 audience—not a seat was vacant in the home of the world-famous Boston Symphony Orchestra—refused to be content as the singer, wearing a long, copper-colored afternoon gown, acknowledged the ovation with grave bows.

Finally acceding to demands, she sang four encores as half the audience sat on the edges of their seats and the rest stood in the aisles with hats and coats on.

ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS

DEC 7 - 1938



LEADS ORCHESTRA: Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra of more than 100 players in its annual Choral Union concert at 8:30 tonight in Hill Auditorium.

TOLEDO, O.
BLADE

DEC 7 - 1938

Symphony Concert And Junior League Dance Hold Attention Of Society

Other Toledoans Are Taking Short Trips Before Holidays

Visitors Here From Out Of Town For Events This Week And Next

BY HELEN FOOTE GRAHAM

WHILE many members of society are interested in the Boston Symphony concert tomorrow, the Junior League's dinner dance Saturday and the appearance of Sir Cedric Hardwicke in "Shadow and Substance" Monday evening in the Paramount Theater, others are slipping away for short visits and trips to New York before the holiday season gets under way. Visitors coming for the above mentioned events also claim attention of various sets this week.

Mr. and Mrs. Dean Higgins are leaving tonight for a week's stay in New York City before going to Troy to meet their daughter, Elaine, who will return with them for the holiday recess. Elaine, who is a senior at Emma Willard School, will appear in the play her class will give the night before school closes, Dec. 15, as part of the Revels, annual Christmas program.

Mrs. Jan S. Irvine, who has been in Chicago for a week, is expected back tonight. While there she visited her brother-in-law and sister, Mr. and Mrs. W. W. Scott, in Waukegan. Mrs. H. A. Knowlson is among other Toledoans in New York this week. She is arriving home Saturday morning.

Mrs. Robert A. Stranahan has gone to Chicago for a brief stay and Mrs. Paul Kirchmaier and Mrs. Donald Buckhout left yesterday for a trip to New York.

Mr. and Mrs. Earl W. Newcomer are just back after a week's stay in New York.

Mrs. Evan Galbraith is arriving home tomorrow after a visit with relatives in Little Rock, Ark.

Mrs. Leslie Henry is in Columbus this week visiting her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Stuart Bolin. Last evening Mrs. Henry and her mother and three sisters were hostesses at a party in the Bolin home honoring Miss Marjorie Snively of Columbus, whose approaching marriage to James S. Twohey of New York, recently was announced in that city.

Among the visitors coming for the concert in the Museum of Art peristyle tomorrow are Mr. and Mrs. Zolton Sepeshy of the Cranbrook Academy, who will be guests of Mr. and Mrs. William A. Gosline, Jr. The Goslines are entertaining at dinner in their honor before the musical event.

Mrs. Frank A. Sieberling of Akron will be a guest of her son, Frank A. Sieberling, Jr., for the concert.

Mr. and Mrs. A. Lewis Bentley are among others entertaining guests before the Boston Symphony Orchestra program.

TOLEDO, O.
TIMES

DEC 7 - 1938

Symphony Concert At Museum Of Art To Attract Guests

By IDA TAYLOR

MANY out-of-town guests will be in the city tomorrow to attend the Boston Symphony orchestra concert in the Museum of Art peristyle, and numerous dinners will be given preceding the affair.

Mr. and Mrs. Zolton Sepeshy of the Cranbrook Academy of Arts will be guests of Mr. and Mrs. William A. Gosline, Jr. In their honor Mr. and Mrs. Gosline entertain a few guests at dinner in their Perrysburg home preceding the concert.

Mr. Frank A. Sieberling, Jr., will have as a guest for the concert his mother, Mrs. Frank A. Sieberling, of Akron, O.

Mrs. Arthur C. Johnson, Jr., and her mother, Mrs. Ernest Smith, of Columbus, will arrive tomorrow to spend the night with Mr. and Mrs. Albert Fullerton Miller and attend the concert.

Mr. and Mrs. A. Lewis Bentley will entertain a group of the married set at dinner in their home in Eagle Point colony tomorrow evening. Later they will accompany their guests to the concert.

The Junior league dinner dance Saturday evening at the Commodore Perry will be one of the week's most brilliant affairs, and more and more parties are being formed before the dinner.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles P. Baither have invited a small group to their home on Talmadge road preceding the dinner.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

DEC 7 - 1938

Music Lovers Attend Concert

Mrs. Arthur Victor Jr. and Mrs. Arthur Victor were among the many who attended the Boston Symphony orchestra concert Tuesday evening in the Buffalo Consistory.

Large Audience Hears Orchestra

Crowd Requires Extra Seats in Buffalo Consistory.

Every seat was taken and many extras were put in for the magnificent program presented Tuesday evening in the Buffalo Consistory by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Long before 8 o'clock, limousines lined Delaware avenue and the approaching streets, filled with music lovers. Some were in evening dress and many in street clothes. All were enthralled with the evening's entertainment.

Among those noticed were Miss Margaret Marfield, in bright green chiffon, and her mother, Mrs. William D. Ward; Mr. and Mrs. Rudolph B. Flershem, the latter in deep red velvet with mink coat.

Miss Mary Louise O'Brien, accompanied by Mrs. Allen F. Chellas, wore a silver fox cape over her black dinner gown, and Miss Anna M. Kimball, with Mrs. James Willard Wheeler of Chestnut Hill, Mass., was in black lace.

Music Lovers Attend.

Also attending were Mrs. Edmund B. McKenna, Miss Nancy Spaulding, Miss Jane Wells, Mrs. Harvey Gaylord, Mrs. David W. Baker, Miss Harriett Babcock, Mrs. George S. Buck, Mrs. G. Barrett Rich, Mrs. William E. Danforth, Mr. and Mrs. Hubert L. Perry.

Mrs. Donald M. Eddy, Mrs. Elbridge G. Spaulding Jr., Mr and Mrs. Frederick H. Williams, Mrs. Fred D. Corey, Mrs. Henry W. Wendt.

Mr. and Mrs. Dorr Temple Denton, Miss Jane Keeler, Mrs. John Ives Sewall, Miss Anita Frank, Mrs. James W. Greene.

Mrs. Edward A. Sharp, Mrs. Albert G. Hatch, Miss Anna Hatch, Mrs. Irving M. Snow, Miss Mildred Snow.

Mrs. George A. Himmelsbach, Miss Cora Anthony, Mrs. Edward A. Eisele, Mrs. Edward H. Letchworth, Mrs. Langdon Albright.

Dinner Before Concert.

Mrs. Paul H. Husted, Mrs. William H. Marcy, Miss Hilda H. Marcy, Mrs. John K. Metzger, Mrs. Charles S. Clark.

Miss Katharine L. Eagan, Miss Elizabeth L. McDonnell, Mrs. Edward J. Barcalo, Mrs. Edward B. Holmes, Mrs. Robert S. Donaldson.

Mrs. Henry Ware Sprague, Mr. and Mrs. John S. N. Sprague, Mrs. George P. Warner, Mrs. M. Warren Hedstrom, Miss Mabel Wilcox, Mrs. George I. Seney and Miss Elizabeth A. Welch.

Mrs. Lewis J. Surdam entertained at dinner in her home in Middlesex road Tuesday evening before the concert. Among the guests were Mr. and Mrs. Franco Autori, Mr. and Mrs. Lester F. Gilbert, Mr. Roswell Park, Mrs. Jan P. Wolanek, Dr. and Mrs. Nelson G. Russell, Mr. R. Leon Trick.

CLEVELAND, O.
PRESS

DEC 9 - 1938

ORCHESTRA ARRIVES

Dr. Koussevitzky to Lead Boston Symphony Here Tonight

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of 110 men and its famous conductor, Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky, arrived in Cleveland today for their first concert here in 15 years.

Dr. Koussevitzky will direct the orchestra in works by Sibelius, Debussy and Hayden. The concert starts at 8:45 p. m. in Public Music Hall.

AMBRIDGE, PA.
CITIZEN

DEC 7 - 1938

94

Boston Symphony Comes To Syria Mosque For Saturday and Sunday

PITTSBURGH, Dec. 7 — The high-light of the musical season is the visit of the world-famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, and all roads within a radius of 75 miles of Pittsburgh will lead to Syria Mosque next Saturday evening, December 10 and Sunday afternoon, December 11. The Sunday afternoon concert has special appeal to out-of-town music lovers. The concert starts at 3 o'clock, which makes possible an early return home. A young pianist will be featured as soloist at the Saturday evening concert, Jesus Maria Sanroma, who will play the Ravel Concerto for Piano and Orchestra. Sanroma has toured with great success in both Europe and America. Other works on the evening program are the Beethoven Symphony No. 2 in D major, and the Brahms Symphony No. 4.

The Sunday afternoon program will also feature two great symphonies. They are the Haydn Symphony in B-flat, and the Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 4. Three orchestral sketches, entitled "La Mer" by Debussy will also be included in the afternoon program. The orchestra for both concerts is under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, and comes to Pittsburgh under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association, May Beegle, Manager.

CLEVELAND, O.
Catholic Universe
Bulletin

DEC 2 - 1938

Boston Symphony Here Next Friday

Selections from Haydn, Debussy, and Sibelius will comprise the program of the concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday, ~~December~~ 9. With Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, the concert will be given in Public Music Hall at 8:45 p. m. under auspices of the Cleveland Museum of Art.

The program:

Haydn ....Symphony in B flat, No. 102
Largo: Allego vivace
Adagio
Minuetto: Allegro: trio
Finale: Presto
Debussy
"La Mer," Trois Esquisses Symphoniques
De l'aube a midi sur la mer
Jeux de Vagues
Dialogue du Vent et de la Mer
Sibelius.......Symphony No. 2 in D Major
Allegro
Andante
Scherzo
Finale

Another program in Public Music Hall is a benefit concert for the Diabetic Camp for Children, on December 16. Vocal selections will be given by Harriet Eells, mezzo soprano; Arpad Sandor, accompanist, and Beryl Rubinstein and Arthur Loesser in a duo piano recital. Both programs are under the direction of Mrs. Emil Brudno.

KALAMAZOO, MICH.
GAZETTE

DEC 4 - 1938

Boston Orchestra to Play at Ann Arbor

ANN ARBOR-Serge Koussevitzky will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its annual University of Michigan concert, Wednesday evening, Dec. 7, in Hill auditorium. Annually, since 1900, he has brought his distinguished band of players to Choral Union concert patrons, the engagement constituting the only Michigan appearance of the organization.

On this occasion the orchestra will play the following program: Symphony In B-Flat, No. 102, Haydn, "La Mer," Trois Esquisses Symphoniques, Debussy, Symphony No. 4 in F Minor, Op. 36, Tschaikowsky.

SUPERB CONCERT GIVEN BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Buffalo News

Hundreds Are Turned Away From Consistory.

Dec. 7/38

By THEODOLINDA C. BORIS

The Boston Symphony orchestra's concert Tuesday evening in the Buffalo Consistory must be set down as a memorable occasion in a concert season already well-marked with outstanding musical events. This superb orchestra, which is in its 58th season and its 15th under the leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, attracted so large an audience that several hundred persons had to be turned away.

The program offered Beethoven's second symphony and Brahms' fourth, the one a mood of vibrant joy and strength and the other a mood of magnificent and tranquil resignation. A diverting contrast was provided by the Ravel piano concerto, played by Jesus Maria Sanroma between the two symphonies.

* * *

The readings of the symphonies shone with vitality and dignity, familiar qualities of Dr. Koussevitzky's directing. The Beethoven reflected the lovely Austrian countryside where the master composed portions of this symphony at the very moment when he was tortured by thoughts of his approaching deafness. The opening theme of the Larghetto, surely one of Beethoven's most appealing movements, sang with beauty as the violins enunciated its lovely melody, and the Scherzo was tossed off with a charming capriciousness.

Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of the Brahms' fourth made it something considerably more than the classic masterpiece it is for so many listeners. It became personal and eloquent with intimate meaning for those who listened with their hearts. Perhaps the most beautiful portion was the Finale, in which Brahms made use of one of his favorite devices, variations upon a simple theme, to build up a majestic movement. The rich and translucent tone quality of the orchestra was particularly noteworthy in these 31 variations, with the theme sung now by the solo flute, now by the trombones and again by the entire brass choir.

* * *

Dr. Koussevitzky has made of his orchestra a perfectly balanced unit in which the highly trained players speak with the voice of assurance and a sensitive understanding of their conductor's interpretative demands. While there are persons who question this director's original treatment of certain details and tempi, no one will deny that his readings are remarkable for a clarity of detail which does not, however, obscure the broad outline of the whole composition.

Mr. Sanroma delighted the audience with his spirited and masterly playing of the Ravel Concerto. This concerto has a highly effective bite and brilliance and its jazz echoes are amusing.

The audience made no secret of its enjoyment of the entire program and repeatedly recalled both conductor and soloist to acknowledge enthusiastic applause.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

DEC 5 - 1938

Briefs

George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was the weekend guest of Mr. and Mrs. George W. Edman, 187 Wendell Avenue. Early this morning he boarded the special train bearing the orchestra on its annual tour for New York, Michigan, Ohio and Pennsylvania engagements.

Boston Symphony Presents Evening of Superb Music

Large Audience Indicates Interest in Brilliant Orchestra; Tonal Effects Outstanding; Dr. Koussevitzky Conducts

Buffalo Times Dec. 7/38

By WILLIAM BREACH

The great crowd which greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its distinguished conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, at the Consistory Auditorium last night, was tangible evidence of the interest of the general public in the superb playing of symphonic music—such as we have learned to expect from this famous organization.

The concert was the fourth in the Zorah B. Berry series. With conductor and players in fine fettle, it was an evening of superlative deeds.

Among the myriad of details to admire, one was impressed with the orchestral tone—whether string, wood or brass—a constant joy to the ear.

It was a pleasure to hear the Beethoven Second Symphony—with which the concert opened—a work too frequently passed by for others less vital. The buoyant music of this "Prince of symphonies"—at Dr. Koussevitzky's hands—glowed with a full measure of its exhilarating and exultant power. The slow movement was notable for its lovely lyricism, the scherzo for its flashing spirit, and the finale for its capricious humor and gusto.

The Ravel Piano Concerto, which closed the first half of the program, was played by Jesus Maria Sanroma, soloist at the Boston première in 1932. With the co-operation of Dr. Koussevitzky, long regarded a leading Ravel interpreter, the concerto was given a vivid and brilliant performance which reached a dizzy peak of virtuosity.

It is brittle and ironic music with a pungent effectiveness that clearly shows the jazz influence. The scoring is dazzling and adroit with its uncanny play of rare tonal tints. The audience was stirred by Mr. Sanroma's bravura playing and recalled him a number of times.

The crown of the evening was the Brahms Fourth Symphony. It will be many a day before we hear this classic masterpiece set forth with such beauty and dramatic power. From the exquisite articulation of the opening theme to the stupendous closing passacaglia, the music gathered momentum until it reached a stirring intensity that was profoundly impressive.

MUSIC REVIEW

Buffalo Courier-Express

By Isabelle Workman Evans

Dec. 7/38

When the magnificent Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared last night under the baton of its singularly gifted conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, literally hundreds of dejected music lovers were turned away from the box office of the Buffalo Consistory by the report of sold-out house. Long before the appointed hour of the concert all available seats were taken by devotees of Dr. Koussevitzky and his amazingly perfect body of approximately 115 superlative musicians. The concert was one of the regular attractions of the Tuesday evening series of Zorah B. Berry.

The diversified and interesting program included two contrasting symphonies; the second symphony, Opus 36 by Beethoven, the genius who pioneered in the realm of symphonic writing, who first performed in Vienna in 1803, while the fourth symphony, in E minor, the product of the mature master, Johannes Brahms, was first performed in 1885. These early and late creations of two of the giants of all musical literature were separated, in the performance yesterday evening, by the Concerto for piano and orchestra by Ravel, which received its first performance in Paris as recently as 1932. The soloist in the Concerto was the brilliant young Puerto Rican pianist, Jesus Maria Sanroma, who is the official pianist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The splendor of the orchestral tone and the amazing degree of technical development of this superb symphonic group were apparent immediately in the Beethoven opus. The spontaneity of the phrasing and the absolute rhythmic control gave full beauty to the eloquent music of the young Beethoven, exulting in the realization of own individuality.

Mr. Sanroma was accorded an ovation for his effective performance of the Ravel concerto. Equipped with a brilliant technique this pianist interpreted the work with freedom, brilliancy, and style.

INDEPENDENT

[illegible]

DEC 2 - 1938

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Appear at Public Hall

The Boston Symphony Orchestra with Dr. Koussevitzky conducting will appear in a concert at Public Music Hall Friday, Dec. 9, at 8:45 p. m. under the auspices of the Cleveland Museum of Art and the direction of Mrs. Emil Brudno. The program follows:

Haydn, Symphony in B flat, No. 102—Largo: Allegro vivace; Adagio; Minuetto: Allegro: trio; Finale: Presto. Debussy, "La Mer," Trois Esquisses Symphoniques—De l'aube a midi sur la mer; Jeux de Vagues; Dialogue du Ven et de la Mer. Intermission. Sibelius, Symphony No. 2 in D Major— Allegro; Andante; Scherzo; Finale.

CLEVELAND PLAIN DEALER

, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1938

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS SUPERBLY

Koussevitzky Dynamic in Concert Here

BY HERBERT ELWELL

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under its eminent leader, Serge Koussevitzky, presented a concert at Public Music Hall last night, appearing in the Cleveland Concert Course sponsored by the Cleveland Museum of Art and managed by Mrs. Emil Brudno.

This was the first time in many years music lovers here have had the pleasure of a visit from this veteran organization, headed by one of the most dynamic figures in the world of music. They were not slow to show their appreciation. If there was a vacant seat anywhere in the hall, it would have been hard to discover. And this throng, thrilled by a program of constantly mounting intensity, voiced its enthusiasm in unrestrained applause, recalling the conductor time and time again.

He and his 110 men rewarded their listeners with playing of superb quality and with music that moved by progressive degrees of intensity to a really stupendous climax in the Finale of Sibelius' Second Symphony.

Purity in Singing Strings

In the opening B Flat Major Symphony of Haydn one was conscious at once of the superior balance and finish of this orchestra, of the mellowness and purity of its singing strings, of the softness and precision of its attacks. Above all, one was aware of a guiding force so strongly self-composed and so completely in control of every element that details fell into place with utmost ease, leaving one with a sense of unity, compactness and integrity of direction that was simplicity itself.

To move from this radiant clarity and conciseness of outline into the highly diversified patterns and sensuous luxuriance of Debussy's Three Symphonic Sketches, "The Sea," was to discover another side to Koussevitsky's extraordinary temperament and another phase of many-sided interpretive nature, for here was music of almost voluptuous appeal and dazzling color.

What he made of it was something so strikingly at one with its essential character that one may perhaps be forgiven for speaking of it in rhapsodical terms. It took on an ethereal quality so vividly suggestive that one could fairly feel the light spray of water and the warm sunlight making rainbows through the luminous orchestral texture. And this magical effect was produced with such ease that one was led to conclude that a gigantic task of clearing away obstacles had been achieved in the preparation of this work, a task which left the conductor free in performance to transmit nothing but unadulterated feeling, nothing but the distilled essence of what had transpired in the fascinating realm of Debussy's fertile imagination.

Cellos Sing With Fervor

This same directness of contact with the inner spirit of the music was again in force in the Sibelius Symphony, though the change in style brought a corresponding change of approach from a delicate, evanescent blending of surface impressions to a type of phrasing that brought out the deep earnestness of a northern temperament and unearthed imposing realms of turgid and passionate expression. The cellos sang with magnificent fervor. There was no blaring brass nor strident intensity of strings, but an ever throbbing upward surge and unanimity of feeling in the entire orchestral body that brought the splendid architecture of this work to a focus with an impressiveness that has seldom been recognized in it here. Every nerve in the conductor seemed on fire with the emotional urgency of this music. And this high voltage was transmitted throughout every fiber of the instrumental texture until it reached an audience breathless with the excitement of its irresistible current.

Here is indeed an admirable orchestra and a conductor who knows how to show it off to advantage, but whose musicianship is so great that no mere act of showmanship arises to obstruct our view of or diminish our admiration for an imaginative force in full, free possession of tremendous communicative power.

AMBRIDGE, PA.
CITIZEN
DEC 7 - 1938

94

Boston Symphony Comes To Syria Mosque For Saturday and Sunday

PITTSBURGH, Dec. 7 — The high-light of the musical season is the visit of the world-famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, and all roads within a radius of 75 miles of Pittsburgh will lead to Syria Mosque next Saturday evening, December 10 and Sunday afternoon, December 11. The Sunday afternoon concert has special appeal to out-of-town music lovers. The concert starts at 3 o'clock, which makes possible an early return home. A young pianist will be featured as soloist at the Saturday evening concert, Jesus Maria Sanroma, who will play the Ravel Concerto for Piano and Orchestra. Sanroma has toured with great success in both Europe and America. Other works on the evening program are the Beethoven Symphony No. 2 in D major, and the Brahms Symphony No. 4.

The Sunday afternoon program will also feature two great symphonies. They are the Haydn Symphony in B-flat, and the Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 4. Three orchestral sketches, entitled "La Mer" by Debussy will also be included in the afternoon program. The orchestra for both concerts is under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, and comes to Pittsburgh under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association, May Beegle, Manager.

SUPERB CONCERT GIVEN BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Buffalo News

Hundreds Are Turned Away From Consistory.

Dec — 7/38

By THEODOLINDA C. BORIS

The Boston Symphony orchestra's concert Tuesday evening in the Buffalo Consistory must be set down as a memorable occasion in a concert season already well-marked with outstanding musical events. This superb orchestra, which is in its 58th season and its 15th under the leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, attracted so large an audience that several hundred persons had to be turned away.

The program offered Beethoven's second symphony and Brahms' fourth, the one a mood of vibrant joy and strength and the other a mood of magnificent and tranquil resignation. A diverting contrast was provided by the Ravel piano concerto, played by Jesus Maria Sanroma between the two symphonies.

* * *

The readings of the symphonies shone with vitality and dignity, familiar qualities of Dr. Koussevitzky's directing. The Beethoven reflected the lovely Austrian countryside where the master composed portions of this symphony at the very moment when he was tortured by thoughts of his approaching deafness. The opening theme of the Larghetto, surely one of Beethoven's most appealing movements, sang with beauty as the violins enunciated its lovely melody, and the Scherzo was tossed off with a charming capriciousness.

Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of the Brahms' fourth made it something considerably more than the classic masterpiece it is for so many listeners. It became personal and eloquent with intimate meaning for those who listened with their hearts. Perhaps the most beautiful portion was the Finale, in which Brahms made use of one of his favorite devices, variations upon a simple theme, to build up a majestic movement. The rich and translucent tone quality of the orchestra was particularly noteworthy in these 31 variations, with the theme sung now by the solo flute, now by the trombones and again by the entire brass choir.

* * *

Dr. Koussevitzky has made of his orchestra a perfectly balanced unit in which the highly trained players speak with the voice of assurance and a sensitive understanding of their conductor's interpretative demands. While there are persons who question this director's original treatment of certain details and tempi, no one will deny that his readings are remarkable for a clarity of detail which does not, however, obscure the broad outline of the whole composition.

Mr. Sanroma delighted the audience with his spirited and masterly playing of the Ravel Concerto. This concerto has a highly effective bite and brilliance and its jazz echoes are amusing.

The audience made no secret of its enjoyment of the entire program and repeatedly recalled both conductor and soloist to acknowledge enthusiastic applause.

Boston Symphony Presents Evening of Superb Music

Large Audience Indicates Interest in Brilliant Orchestra; Tonal Effects Outstanding; Dr. Koussevitzky Conducts

Buffalo Times Dec. 7/38

By WILLIAM BREACH

The great crowd which greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its distinguished conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, at the Consistory Auditorium last night, was tangible evidence of the interest of the general public in the superb playing of symphonic music—such as we have learned to expect from this famous organization.

The concert was the fourth in the Zorah B. Berry series. With conductor and players in fine fettle, it was an evening of superlative deeds.

Among the myriad of details to admire, one was impressed with the orchestral tone—whether string, wood or brass—a constant joy to the ear.

It was a pleasure to hear the Beethoven Second Symphony—with which the concert opened—a work too frequently passed by for others less vital. The bucyant music of this "Prince of symphonies"—at Dr. Koussevitzky's hands—glowed with a full measure of its exhilarating and exultant power. The slow movement was notable for its lovely lyricism, the scherzo for its flashing spirit, and the finale for its capricious humor and gusto.

The Ravel Piano Concerto, which closed the first half of the program, was played by Jesus Maria Sanroma, soloist at the Boston première in 1932. With the co-operation of Dr. Koussevitzky, long regarded a leading Ravel interpreter, the concerto was given a vivid and brilliant performance which reached a dizzy peak of virtuosity.

It is brittle and ironic music with a pungent effectiveness that clearly shows the jazz influence. The scoring is dazzling and adroit with its uncanny play of rare tonal tints. The audience was stirred by Mr. Sanroma's bravura playing and recalled him a number of times.

The crown of the evening was the Brahms Fourth Symphony. It will be many a day before we hear this classic masterpiece set forth with such beauty and dramatic power. From the exquisite articulation of the opening theme to the stupendous closing passacaglia, the music gathered momentum until it reached a stirring intensity that was profoundly impressive.

CLEVELAND, O.
Catholic Universe Bulletin
DEC 2 - 1938

Boston Symphony Here Next Friday

Selections from Haydn, Debussy and Sibelius will comprise the program of the concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday, December 9. With Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, the concert will be given in Public Music Hall at 8:45 p. m. under auspices of the Cleveland Museum of Art.

The program:

Haydn ......Symphony in B flat, No. 102
  Largo: Allego vivace
  Adagio
  Minuetto: Allegro: trio
  Finale: Presto
Debussy ....
  "La Mer," Trois Esquisses Symphoniques
  De l'aube a midi sur la mer
  Jeux de Vagues
  Dialogue du Vent et de la Mer
Sibelius ......Symphony No. 2 in D Major
  Allegro
  Andante
  Scherzo
  Finale

Another program in Public Music Hall is a benefit concert for the Diabetic Camp for Children, on December 16. Vocal selections will be given by Harriet Eells, mezzo soprano; Arpad Sandor, accompanist, and Beryl Rubinstain and Arthur Loesser in a duo piano recital. Both programs are under the direction of Mrs. Emil Brudno.

MUSIC REVIEW

Buffalo Courier-Express

By Isabelle Workman Evans

Dec. 7/38

When the magnificent Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared last night under the baton of its singularly gifted conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, literally hundreds of dejected music lovers were turned away from the box office of the Buffalo Consistory by the report of sold-out house. Long before the appointed hour of the concert all available seats were taken by devotees of Dr. Koussevitzky and his amazingly perfect body of approximately 115 superlative musicians. The concert was one of the regular attractions of the Tuesday evening series of Zorah B. Berry.

The diversified and interesting program included two contrasting symphonies; the second symphony, Opus 36 by Beethoven, the genius who pioneered in the realm of symphonic writing, who first performed in Vienna in 1803, while the fourth symphony, in E minor, the product of the mature master, Johannes Brahms, was first performed in 1885. These early and late creations of two of the giants of all musical literature were separated, in the performance yesterday evening, by the Concerto for piano and orchestra by Ravel, which received its first performance in Paris as recently as 1932. The soloist in the Concerto was the brilliant young Puerto Rican pianist, Jesus Maria Sanroma, who is the official pianist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The splendor of the orchestral tone and the amazing degree of technical development of this superb symphonic group were apparent immediately in the Beethoven opus. The spontaneity of the phrasing and the absolute rhythmic control gave full beauty to the eloquent music of the young Beethoven, exulting in the realization of own individuality.

Mr. Sanroma was accorded an ovation for his effective performance of the Ravel concerto. Equipped with a brilliant technique this pianist interpreted the work with freedom, brilliancy, and style.

KALAMAZOO, MICH.
GAZETTE
DEC 4 - 1938

Boston Orchestra to Play at Ann Arbor

ANN ARBOR—Serge Koussevitzky will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its annual University of Michigan concert, Wednesday evening, Dec. 7, in Hill auditorium. Annually, since 1900, he has brought his distinguished band of players to Choral Union concert patrons, the engagement constituting the only Michigan appearance of the organization.

On this occasion the orchestra will play the following program: Symphony In B-Flat, No. 102, Haydn, "La Mer," Trois Esquisses Symphoniques, Debussy, Symphony No. 4 in F Minor, Op. 36, Tschaikowsky.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
DEC 5 - 1938

Briefs

George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was the weekend guest of Mr. and Mrs. George W. Edman, 187 Wendell Avenue. Early this morning he boarded the special train bearing the orchestra on its annual tour for New York, Michigan, Ohio and Pennsylvania engagements.

INDEPENDENT
Cleveland Ohio
DEC 2 - 1938

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Appear at Public Hall

The Boston Symphony Orchestra with Dr. Koussevitzky conducting will appear in a concert at Public Music Hall Friday, Dec. 9, at 8:45 p. m. under the auspices of the Cleveland Museum of Art and the direction of Mrs. Emil Brudno. The program follows:

Haydn, Symphony in B flat, No. 102—Largo: Allegro vivace; Adagio; Minuetto: Allegro: trio; Finale: Presto. Debussy, "La Mer," Trois Esquisses Symphoniques—De l'aube a midi sur la mer; Jeux de Vagues; Dialogue du Ven et de la Mer. Intermission. Sibelius, Symphony No. 2 in D Major— Allegro; Andante; Scherzo; Finale.

CLEVELAND PLAIN DEALER
SATURDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1938

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS SUPERBLY

Koussevitzky Dynamic in Concert Here

BY HERBERT ELWELL

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under its eminent leader, Serge Koussevitzky, presented a concert at Public Music Hall last night, appearing in the Cleveland Concert Course sponsored by the Cleveland Museum of Art and managed by Mrs. Emil Brudno.

This was the first time in many years music lovers here have had the pleasure of a visit from this veteran organization, headed by one of the most dynamic figures in the world of music. They were not slow to show their appreciation. If there was a vacant seat anywhere in the hall, it would have been hard to discover. And this throng, thrilled by a program of constantly mounting intensity, voiced its enthusiasm in unrestrained applause, recalling the conductor time and time again.

He and his 110 men rewarded their listeners with playing of superb quality and with music that moved by progressive degrees of intensity to a really stupendous climax in the Finale of Sibelius' Second Symphony.

Purity in Singing Strings

In the opening B Flat Major Symphony of Haydn one was conscious at once of the superior balance and finish of this orchestra, of the mellowness and purity of its singing strings, of the softness and precision of its attacks. Above all, one was aware of a guiding force so strongly self-composed and so completely in control of every element that details fell into place with utmost ease, leaving one with a sense of unity, compactness and integrity of direction that was simplicity itself.

To move from this radiant clarity and conciseness of outline into the highly diversified patterns and sensuous luxuriance of Debussy's Three Symphonic Sketches, "The Sea," was to discover another side to Koussevitsky's extraordinary temperament and another phase of many-sided interpretive nature, for here was music of almost voluptuous appeal and dazzling color.

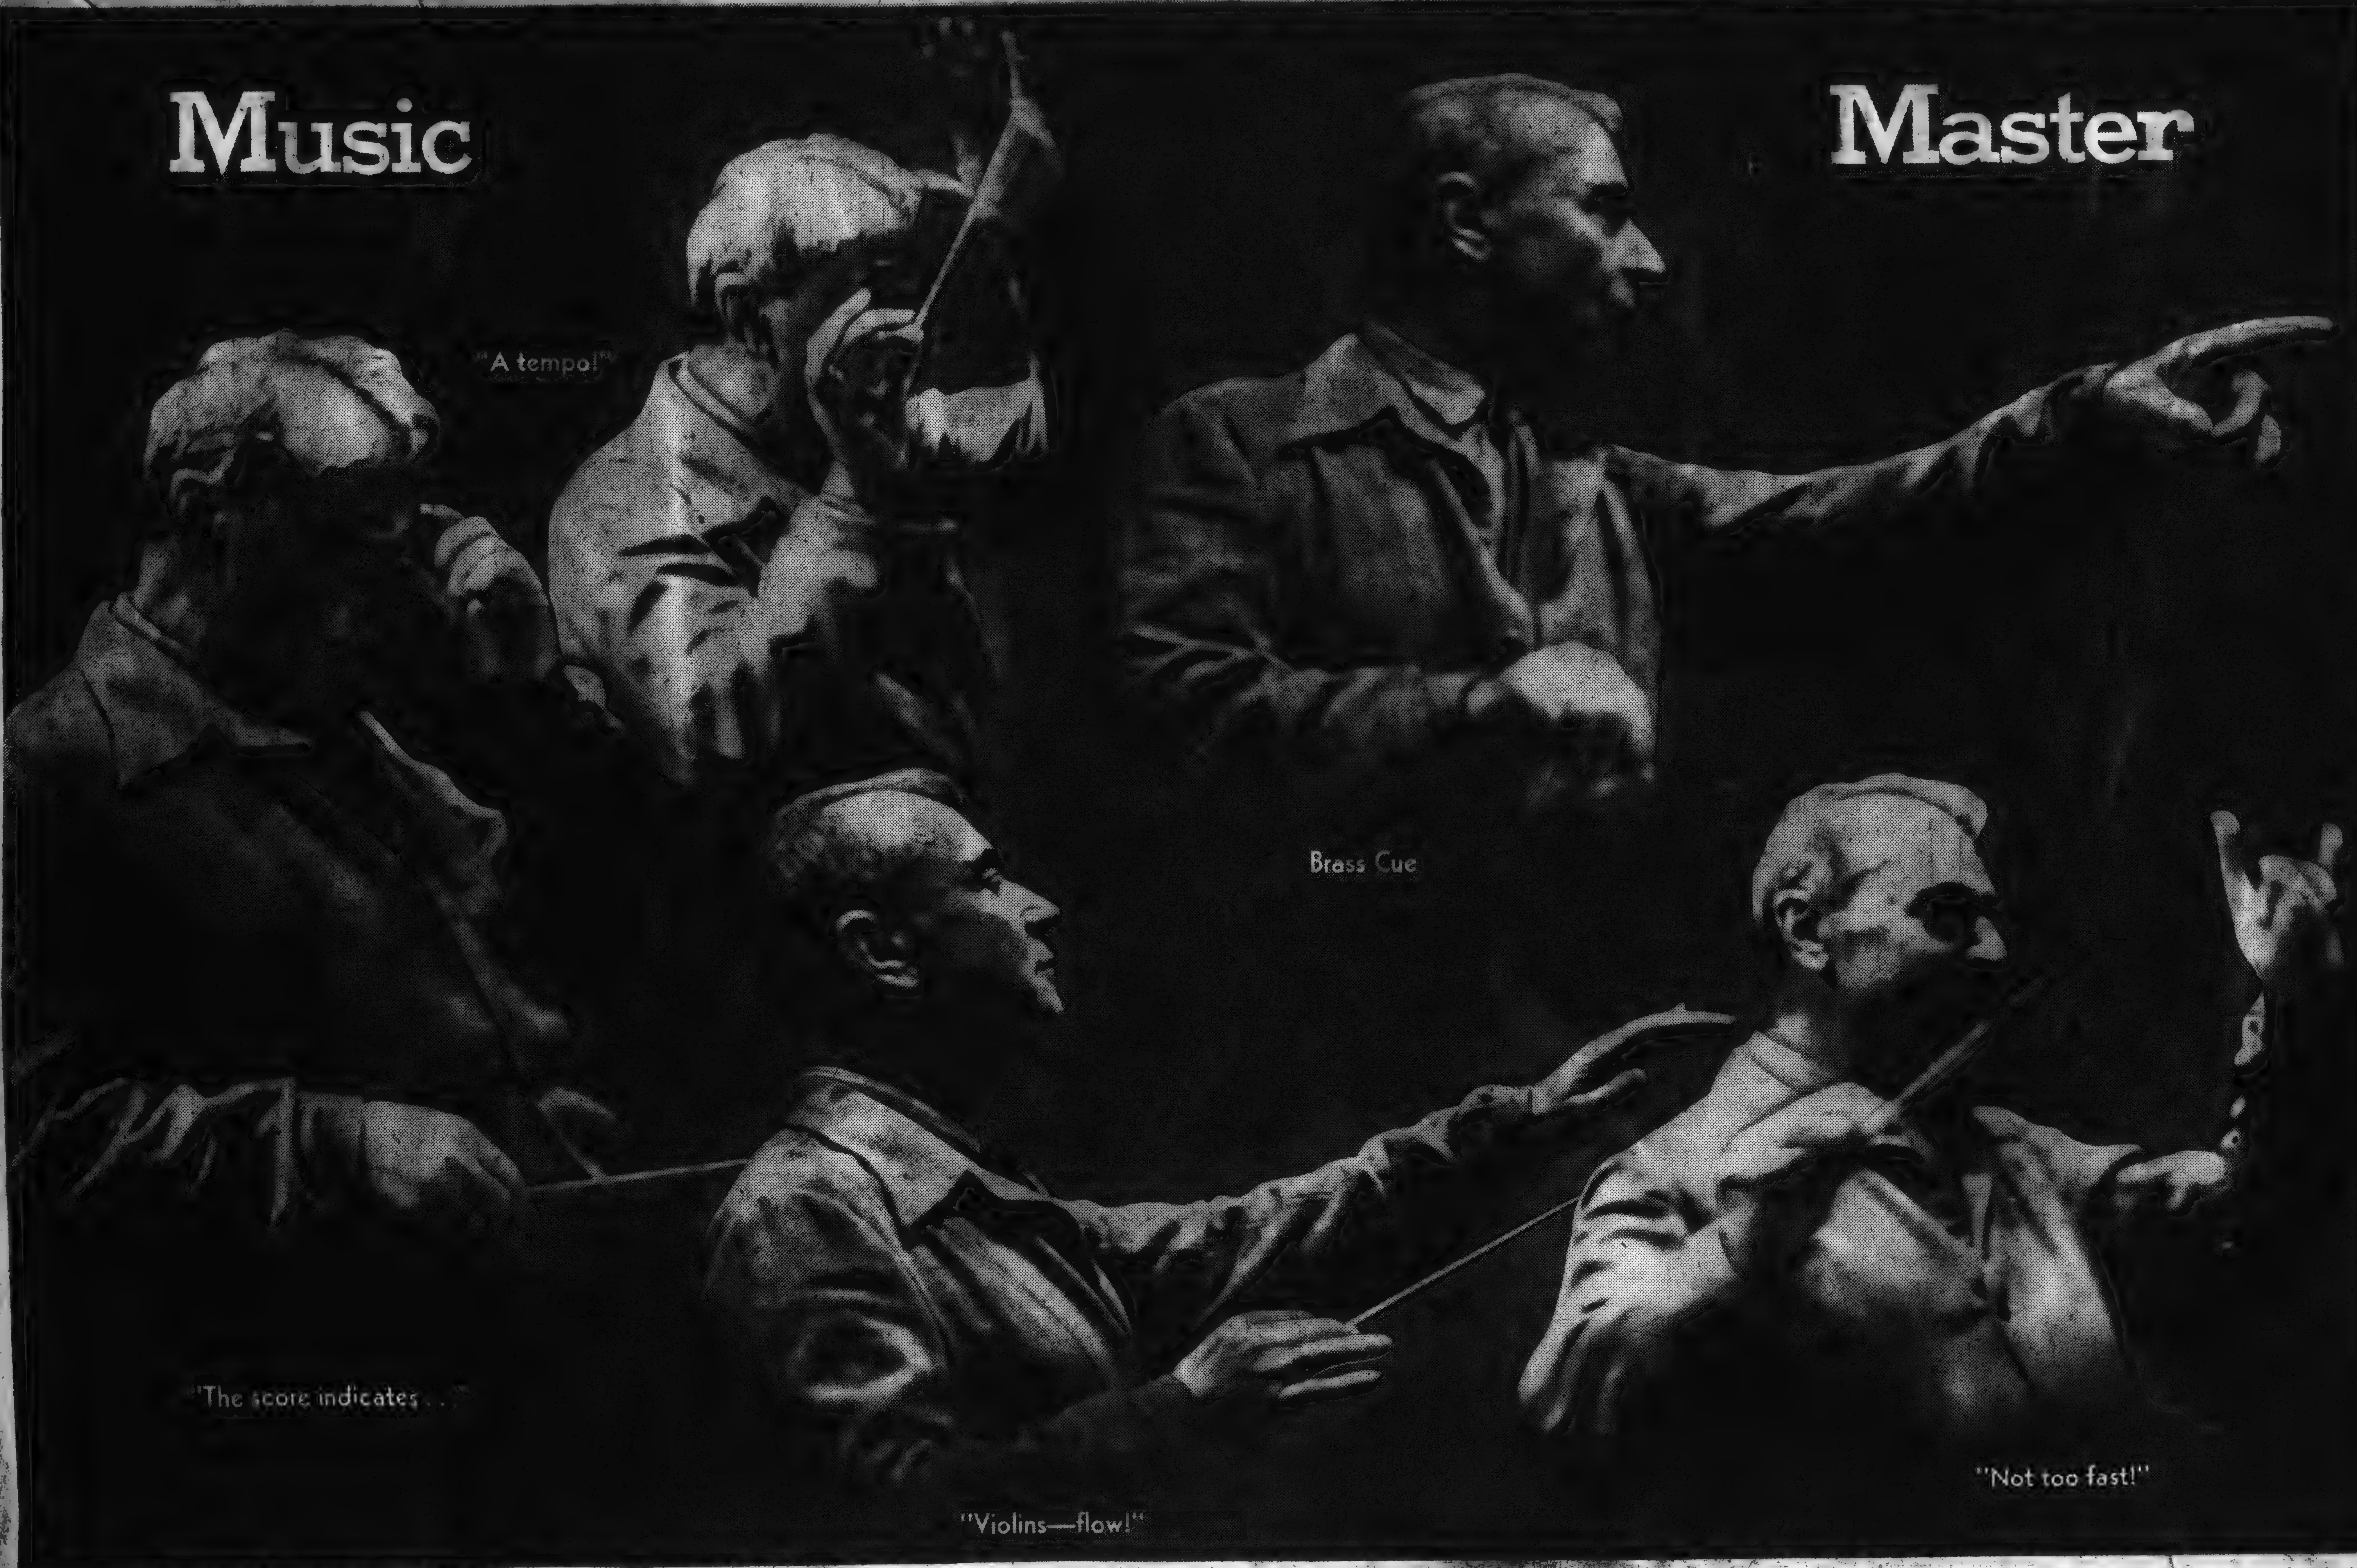
What he made of it was something so strikingly at one with its essential character that one may perhaps be forgiven for speaking of it in rhapsodical terms. It took on an ethereal quality so vividly suggestive that one could fairly feel the light spray of water and the warm sunlight making rainbows through the luminous orchestral texture. And this magical effect was produced with such ease that one was led to conclude that a gigantic task of clearing away obstacles had been achieved in the preparation of this work, a task which left the conductor free in performance to transmit nothing but unadulterated feeling, nothing but the distilled essence of what had transpired in the fascinating realm of Debussy's fertile imagination.

Cellos Sing With Fervor

This same directness of contact with the inner spirit of the music was again in force in the Sibelius Symphony, though the change in style brought a corresponding change of approach from a delicate, evanescent blending of surface impressions to a type of phrasing that brought out the deep earnestness of a northern temperament and unearthed imposing realms of turgid and passionate expression. The cellos sang with magnificent fervor. There was no blaring brass nor strident intensity of strings, but an ever throbbing upward surge and unanimity of feeling in the entire orchestral body that brought the splendid architecture of this work to a focus with an impressiveness that has seldom been recognized in it here. Every nerve in the conductor seemed on fire with the emotional urgency of this music. And this high voltage was transmitted throughout every fiber of the instrumental texture until it reached an audience breathless with the excitement of its irresistible current.

Here is indeed an admirable orchestra and a conductor who knows how to show it off to advantage, but whose musicianship is so great that no mere act of showmanship arises to obstruct our view of or diminish our admiration for an imaginative force in full, free possession [illegible] tremendous communicative [illegible]

Music Master



"A tempo!"

Brass Cue

"The score indicates . . ."

"Violins—flow!"

"Not too fast!"

On Saturday night and Sunday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear in Syria Mosque under the brilliant baton of its famous conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. His gestures are a marvel of grace and eloquence when viewed from the audience behind him. But here he is as his musicians see him. As he takes his place he does not tap loudly to signal attention. He seems to make a prayerful pause, head slightly bent. He glances over the faces of his musicians. His breathing seems to indicate suppressed excitement. He sets himself, reaches out deliberately to pick up his baton. Suddenly both hands sweep upward. Again he pauses until there is breathless attention from players and listeners. Then the arms come down and the music starts.

MUSIC

96

Michigan Daily

By WILLIAM T. LICHTENWANGER

Dec. Boston Symphony 8/38

The problems which confront the reviewer, in his thankless task of safeguarding the public morals musical, are many. In Ann Arbor the great problem of all problems comes once each year, when Dr. Koussevitzky's Boston Symphony plays in Hill Auditorium and leaves one with the inescapable conviction that any words he may use will be anticlimactical and powerless as far as conveying a true and vivid idea of the concert are concerned. The critical thermometer which registers dutifully for the ninety-nine ordinary performances is wholly dissolved in the white heat of Koussevitzky's transcendant programs, his omniscient and omnipotent interprative genius, and the sublime perfection of his orchestral instrument. Emotional rhapsody in reviewing we have always detested; though others may abandon themselves entirely to the torrent of the music, the reviewer must always keep his critical head above the water, so that he not only feels but knows why and what he feels. And the reward for this critical reservation, which some souls more easily pleased would call cynicism and fault-finding, comes on those rare occasions, such as last night, when the music is so perfectly re-created that one is carried away not only emotionally but mentally and spiritually as well. The emotion of such an experience will fade with time, but the mental thrill will last as long as memory.

To be more stuffily repertorial, let us record that the Boston Symphony, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, played in Hill Auditorium last evening a program comprising the B flat Symphony, No. 102, of Haydn, Debussy's La Mer, and the Fourth Symphony in F minor of Tchaikowsky. Each of these three works is of a world apart unto itself, and yet the conductor welded the three into one subtle drama, organically complete throughout. For each work there was the exact and particular approach whichit demanded. The Haydn, one of the composer's last half dozen symphonies and far closer in its maturity and expressive freedom to the approaching Beethoven than to its own humble and experimental predecessors of thirty years before, was played with a quiet power and perfect feeling for its surprisingly chromatic songfulness, its humor and gusto, and yet with a tone that was never forced or strident. The Debussy La Mer to those sensitive to its peculiar idiom, must have been a vast and colorful painting of some inner ocean; to us it was a feast of sensuous and often exotic sound, of which the Orchestra was a miraculous chef.

And the Tchaikowsky Symphony, that ordinarily bores us with its theatrical fanfares and drum rolls, its long stretches of desert-like "passage work" between oases of luscious themes that only Tchaikowsky could produce, became surprisingly logical and legitimately dramatic under the magic of Koussevitzky's baton, its usual blatancy polished over by the Orchestra's round, glowing tone and the conductor's ever-tasteful reserve. Though this Symphony is patently concerned with emotion, it is to us a sort of objective, un-emphatic emotion, through which we were always aware, not unpleasantly, of the brilliancy of the performance—a brilliancy based not on mere showiness but on a conception that sounded the utmost depths of the work and was brought to life with un-human beauty and perfection by the artists of the Orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CLEVELAND, O.
PRESS

DEC 6 - 1938

MUSICAL PRIVILEGE

THE opportunity Clevelanders will have Friday night in Public Music Hall to hear the fine Boston Symphony Orchestra is a rare one. The 110-man musical organization, thought by some musicians to be the best in this country, has not been in Cleveland for more than a decade.

There are two outstanding reasons why the Boston Symphony towers in musical stature. One is the inspirational leadership provided by Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor who compromises with nothing, least of all artistic integrity; and the other is the powerfully strong financial backing the orchestra gets at home.

The privilege of hearing the orchestra in Cleveland has also an important bearing on national relationship. Last year our own fine Cleveland Orchestra visited Boston and achieved notable success there. In reciprocity it is no more than proper that we should acclaim the Boston's appearance with a filled Public Hall Friday night.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
DEC 10 1938

Ernst Krenek Will Talk About Modern Music

Friends and Enemies Will Present Viennese Musician

Ernst Krenek, who will give a lecture-recital Tuesday evening in the Avery Memorial, as the first of two "concerts intimes" under the auspices of the Friends and Enemies of Modern Music, is the composer of "Jonny Spielt Auf," and is internationally known as composer, conductor, pianist, writer and lecturer.

H. H. Stuckenschmidt, writing in Musical America, says of Herr Krenek: "Ernst Krenek doubtless is one of the most interesting and problematic figures in contemporary music. His combination of artistic gifts makes him as important as an essayist and musicologist as he is as a composer. His development, like a mirror, reflects every tendency of modern music since 1920. Starting as an atonalist, then turning toward jazz ('Jonny Spielt Auf'), later toward classicism and a Schubert-like romanticism ('Reisebuch'), since 1932 he has returned to the radicalism of his early days. In the now rather small parish of atonality and twelve-tone composition, Krenek is one of the most ardent and uncompromising figures."

To Be Heard Here Tuesday Evening

An informal portrait of Ernst Krenek, composer, pianist, conductor, musicologist and lecturer, who will give a lecture-recital on "Why Modern Music is Unpopular" Tuesday evening under the auspices of the Friends and Enemies of Modern Music.

Will Illustrate on Piano

Ernst Krenek comes to Hartford as an authority exceptionally well fitted to speak on the topic, "Why Modern Music is Unpopular," which he will illustrate by playing on the piano excerpts from various contemporary compositions.

Ernst Krenek was born in Vienna in 1900, and studied with Franz Schreker, well-known composer of opera, and at the Imperial Academy of Music in Vienna and the State Academy in Berlin.

He began to compose music when he was still a youth, and his first opera, written when he was 23 years old, was given at the State Opera in Berlin in 1924, with Erich Kleiber conducting. In the following years he composed ten successful operas, especially his "Jonny Spielt Auf," which was performed all over the world, including the Metropolitan Opera in New York.

His latest work, "Karl V," written in 1932, was scheduled for its first performance at the Vienna State Opera, but the performance was cancelled on the pretext that it was impossible. It was rumored that the cancellation was brought about primarily by political antagonism to its content. At any rate, it was not given until last summer, when the Prague German Opera presented it with great success.

Historical Drama

It is acclaimed as a new type of historical opera, leading the audience back to the struggle between the Church and the Reformation, with the Hapsburg Emperor Karl, who is the hero, embodying the intellectual discord between the Middle Ages and Modern Times. In the first scene the old emperor is seen confessing his life to a young friar. And thereafter the opera shows the scenes his memory brings forth. Drama, melodrama and opera are combined in "Karl V." And in the music, most radical of all, critics have found a fanatical rebellion against impressionism, handled with great technical skill and a deep inspiration. The composer uses the hardest, most abstract sounds, daring polyphony, and a style ranging from powerful drama to lyric mysticism.

In addition to his operas, Krenek has composed much chamber music, Lieder, choruses, three symphonies, two concerti grossi, two piano concerti, and a violin concerto. These have been conducted by Koussevitzky, Monteux, Kleiber and Sir Henry Wood.

In his role of conductor, the artist has directed orchestras at the state opera houses at Wiesbaden and Cassel, and has conducted concerts and broadcasts in Vienna, Zurich, Lugano, Helsingfors, Warsaw and Brussels.

As pianist, he has played his own works, particularly concertos with orchestra.

Musicologist and Writer

He is equally well known as a musicologist and writer, and has published more than 400 articles on music and various artistic, cultural and sociological problems in important papers and magazines. For many years he has lectured in Austria, Czechoslovakia, Switzerland, France, Belgium, Holland, Spain and Italy, giving his talks in German, French or English. Last year he lectured at Yale, Columbia, Smith and Princeton, and has come to America to make his permanent home.

The lecture-recital Tuesday evening will be the first of two "concerts intimes" to be given at the Avery under the auspices of the Friends and Enemies jointly with the Wadsworth Atheneum. The second will be a recital Sunday evening, Jan. 22, by Elsie Houston, Brazilian soprano.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TOLEDO, O.
TIMES

NOV 27 1938

Noted Pianist To Play Here

Career of Puerto Rican Varied, Unusual

JESUS MARIA SANROMA, pianist, who will appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra in the Toledo Museum of Art peristyle, Dec. 8, has had an unusual career.

He was born in 1903 in Puerto Rico of Catalonian parents. He was sent to this country in 1917 by the government to complete his musical education at the New England conservatory.

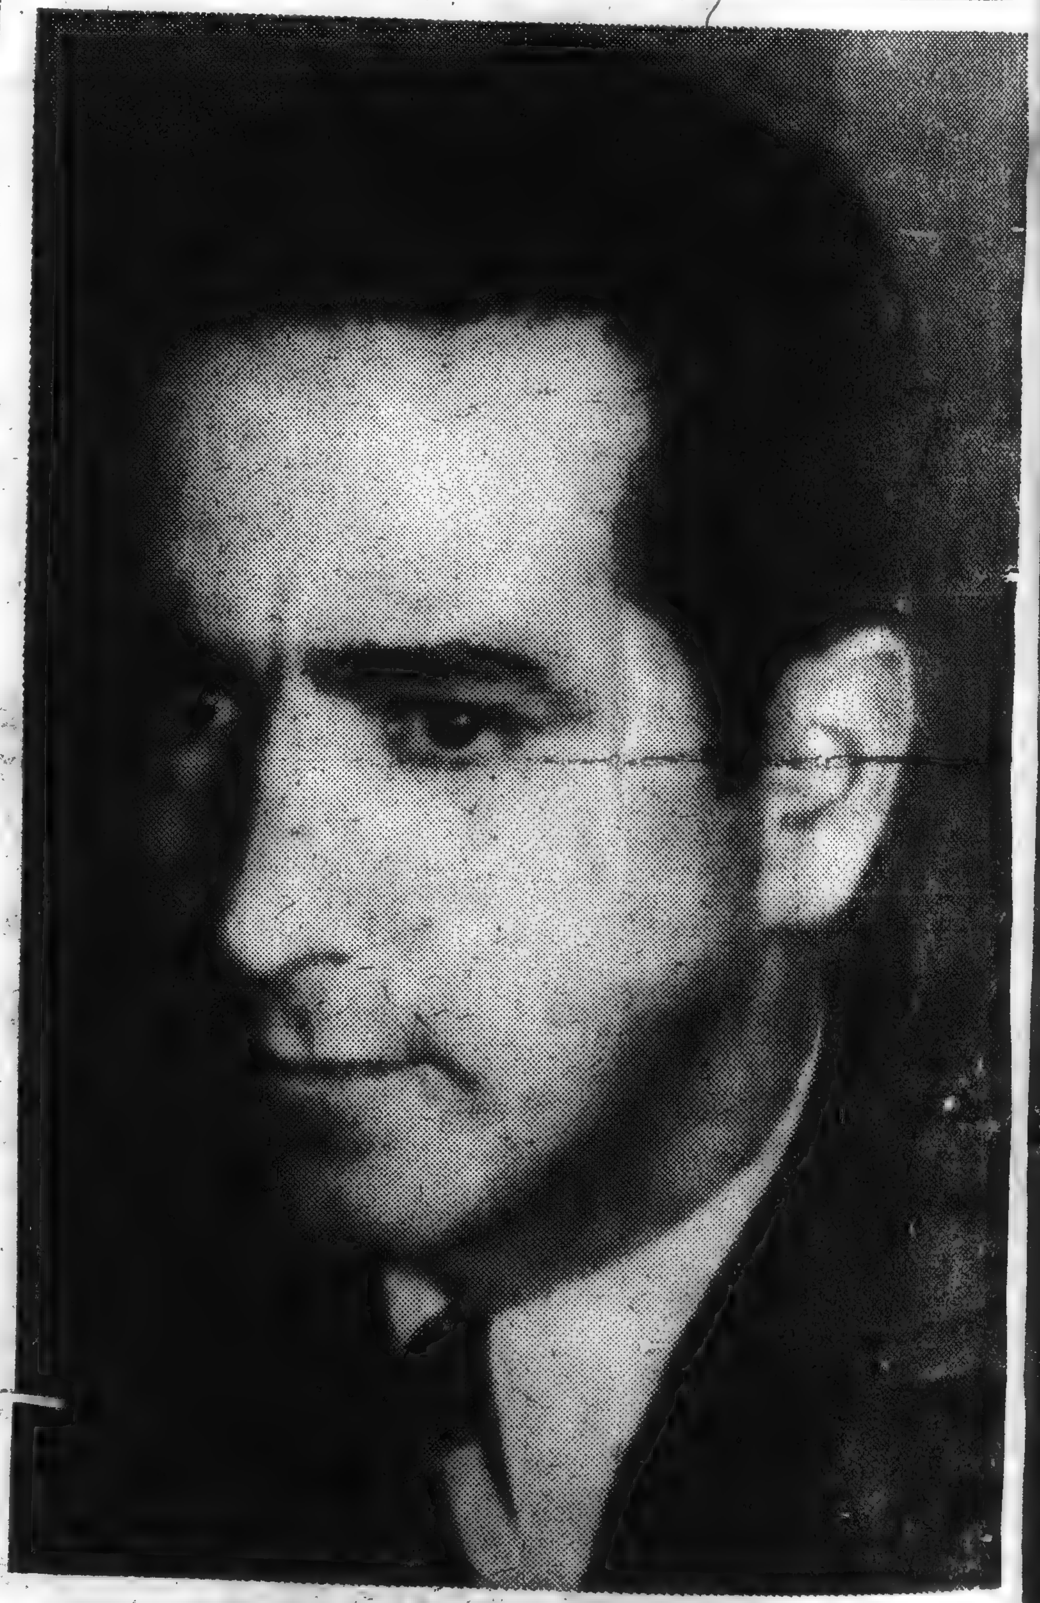
Following his graduation he studied with Mme. Antoinette Szumowska. He gave local recitals and orchestral appearances, touring the country with Jacques Tribaud, as his accompanist. In 1926 he became official pianist with the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Sanroma then went abroad, made an interpretative study of the piano with Arthur Schnabel in Berlin and Alfred Cortot in Paris.

Besides his Paris performance of Toch's Concerto, Sanroma gave recitals in Berlin, Paris, Madrid and Barcelona, and then with the Boston Symphony in Boston and New York. He has taken his place with the foremost of the younger generation of pianists.

He will play Ravel's "Concerto for Piano and Orchestra" with the orchestra when it appears here next month.

Orchestra Soloist



JESUS MARIA SANROMA, pianist, will appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra, Thursday, Dec. 8, in the Toledo Museum of Art peristyle. This concert is complimentary to members of the museum. Sanroma will play Ravel's "Concerto for Piano and Orchestra."

oday's Closing Prices on the New York Stoc

97

By a Staff Photographer

Vladimir Dukelsky

Whose "Dedicaces" was given a first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra today.

Vernon Duke

Composer of swing, musical comedy and cinema called in by Hollywood on the Gershwin "Goldwyn Follies" completion.

Antipodal Composers Meet; And 'They' Muse Mellifluently

Monitor Dec. 16/38

By E. Bigelow Thompson

Staff Writer of The Christian Science Monitor

Vladimir Dukelsky, distinguished young Russian composer, whose "Dédicaces" was given a first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this afternoon, and Vernon Duke, American citizen, esteemed by "swing" fans for recent compositions, known musically for light stage pieces and for his completion of numbers left unfinished for the Goldwyn Follies by the passing on of the late George Gershwin, were in Boston today.

They elected to be interviewed in the orchestra library at Symphony Hall, together—rather unusual in itself. Generally the press outnumbers a celebrity rather than celebrities outnumbering the press.

Both have lived eventful lives. In the interview, they found they had much in common. Dukelsky is of Georgian and Spanish ancestry. Showing considerable precocity as a child, his boyhood, beginning at nine, was spent studying composition under Glière, piano with Dombrovsky, and he was enrolled in Kiev Conservatory at 13.

He did not graduate. "By 15 I went through the whole works." A year later, in the disturbed political changes of 1920, the Dukelsky family "left hurriedly." Since then his course lay through Paris, London, New York, Hollywood.

Vernon Duke has not had an easy time either. In that same year, 1920, he came across some of Gershwin's works in Constantinople. They were captioned in English and Greek. He was fascinated by the scoring. He harmonized a Turkish song in the jazz manner and sold the first jazz tunes published in a Turkish edition.

Arrived in the United States, his livelihood was precarious. One odd job followed another: conductor of the orchestra in a burlesque theater, composer of a slinky waltz to accompany a stage magician's act, accompanist at New York night clubs.

For climax, he met Mr. Gershwin,

(Continued on Page 11, Column 3)

Antipodal Conductors Meet

(Continued from Page 1)

then doing the "George White Scandals" (1922), and made copies for him; later, "in spite of all claims to the contrary, I made the two-piano arrangement of the 'Rhapsody in Blue'. . . ."

In the interview, each composer was politely complimentary of the other's work. Mr. Dukelsky remarked that he liked to think of Mr. Duke's compositions as "written principally for Mr. Duke's own enjoyment, and, ah, also for the appreciation of two or three other people, because he is unable to adapt serious music to popular needs."

Mr. Duke rejoined, clarifying his position, that "writing light tunes (his cinema "atmospheric" backgrounds, the London operetta "Yvonne" and popular numbers) is like playing golf—only more profitable. . . . I feel at ease writing jazz. . . ." Politely to Mr. Dukelsky—"I am not influenced by Dukelsky. . . . My music is like taking a pleasant walk."

Mr. Dukelsky (of classical tradition and training) said, "I think Mr. Duke's music will last. I have come to the conclusion that 'April in Paris' is in for long life. See, it was written in 1933 and the fact that it is still 'on' shows signs of its becoming a standard. . . ."

Coming to closer grips, Mr. Duke vouchsafed the opinion that some of Dukelsky's works are "a bit heavy." "Emphatically," was his word for it. He explained he felt "the musical language is complex."

Mr. Dukelsky interrupted to remark, "I have spent the past three years sharpening it. I hope my language is clear to my audience." Then came amplification of intricate, not complex . . . energy and verve . . . rhythmic life, as footnotes to the Dukelsky technique.

Agreement was reached in consensus that "We both have this in common: belielief that melody is the important thing."

Then Mr. Dukelsky laughed at Mr. Duke and Mr. Duke joined in. In one voice, being one and the same man, he (they) told the interviewer who set them at odds by his questions, that, seriously, "I owe a lot to Gershwin, as Duke, and I owe an enormous lot to Koussevitzky as Dukelsky."

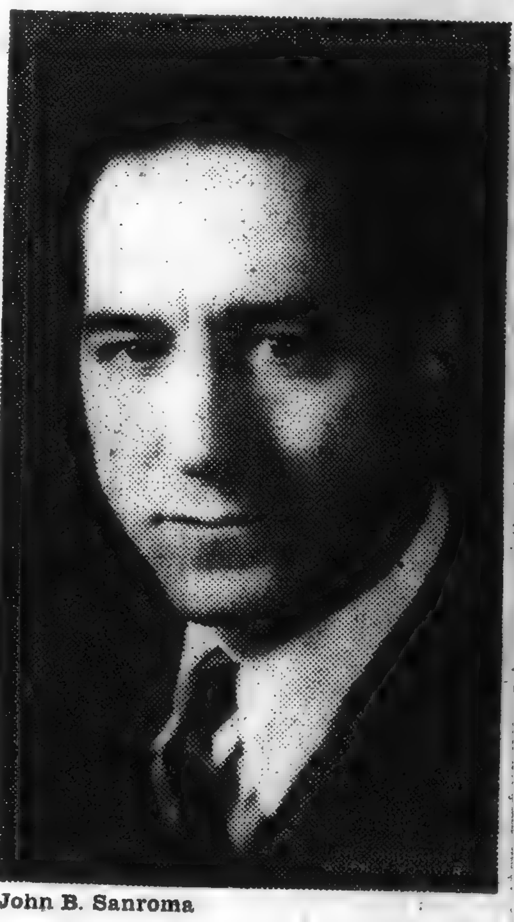
The composer explained that he was forced to use two names, although it has brought complications. For his serious work, his ballet "Zéphyr et Flore," done on Diaghliev's order, his symphonies, concertos, works for chamber combinations, piano sonatas, today's "Dédicaces," a concerto for orchestra and piano with soprano obligato . . . the Editions Russe de Musique. The music publishing house in Paris with which Mr. Koussevitzy is identified, objected, and the serious composer had to find another name for his lighter and equally successful side.

"I always find that people who call themselves serious musicians look on me with suspicion of being a Broadwayite with the taint of jazz. The swing fans think Duke must be a highbrow because of his Carnegie Hall setting . . . One publisher lately asked me to write as Kelly because he wanted some Irish ballads!"

Mr. Dukelsky is now working on a something new in musical plays, "The Carousel," writetn in collaboration with Robert Nathan (from Nathan's novel, "The Orchid") and Georges Balanchine, for January production. "We are trying to do away with certain fallacies of musical comedies. All the songs further the action!"

Dukelsky Knocks at the Door Of Symphony Hall Once More

The composer brings a new composition for first performance by Dr. Koussevitzky.



John B. Sanroma

Jesús María Sanromá

He will be heard at the week-end symphony concerts in the first performances of Dukelsky's "Dedications."

Vladimir Dukelsky is a curious figure on the American musical landscape. He would seem sufficiently exotic if he were judged upon the single score of his serious music. Such a work as his "Dédicaces," which Dr. Koussevitzky will introduce at the week-end symphony concerts, would alone be reason to seek the varied and conflicting sources of so ingenious and odd a creative intellect. But Mr. Dukelsky does not feed upon bread alone; he sweetens it well with the rich flavors of the musical comedy stage under the half-abbreviated, half-anglicized pseudonym of Vernon Duke. He has contrived much theatrical and film music, and is responsible for a number of "hits" from such works as "The Show Is On," "Three's a Crowd," and others since he made his début in London in 1926 with "Yvonne." His latest musical play is "The Carousel," written in collaboration with Robert Nathan and Georges Balanchine. It is to be produced in January with a possible Boston opening.

Mr. Dukelsky traces his ancestry to both Spanish and Georgian sources. As a boy he studied composition with Glière at the Conservatory of Kiev. A suite from his ballet "Zéphyr et Flore," written at the request of Serge Diaghileff, was presented at the symphony concerts in 1927. Dr. Koussevitzky has also performed his first two symphonies and an "Epitaph" for soprano solo, chorus, and orchestra in memory of Diaghileff.

Dedicated to Balanchine

The new work, which is dedicated to Georges Balanchine, bears the somewhat fulsome title "Dédicaces, pour piano, orchestre et voix de femme obligato (paroles de Guillaume Apollinaire)." It was begun in 1934 and completed in the spring of 1938. Despite the factual length of the title, the composer has added the information that the work is really "a three-movement piano concerto with a vocal epigraph." The soprano sings Apollinaire's poem in the first movement, "L'Envoi," is silent in the second and third movements—"To the City" and "To the Country" respectively—and is heard again repeating the final lines of the poem in the epilogue to the fourth movement, "To the Sea."

The titles of the movements are drawn from various allusions of the poem. "Apollinaire breathlessly describes those features of his existence in the city, the country, and on the water that startled or touched him the most," the composer writes. "Thus the soprano becomes the narrator, while the solo pianist could perhaps be likened (this time literally) to a man pitched against the universe of the orchestra." Apollinaire's poem follows, in a translation by George Davis:

Oh dear companions!
Electric signals of railway stations,
Song of the harvesters,
A butcher's truck,
Regiment of streets without number,
Cavalry of bridges . . .
Do you recall the suburbs and plaintive herd of landscapes?
Beneath the moon the cypress trees
cast their shadows,
This night of summer's waning I hear a languishing and ever restless bird and the eternal rushing of a broad and sombre river.

"Emery Boards" Used

The composer would insist that in spite of all the literary connotations, the work is in no way descriptive. The orchestra employed is of the usual size with an augmented percussion choir containing the seldom used "emery boards." . . . "These, when rubbed together, convey the illusion of splashing waves—the one and only concession to the impressionistic orchestral palette," Mr. Dukelsky explains.

All the movements of the work are developed with intricate detail requiring careful listening from those hearing the work for the first time. Mr. Dukelsky writes freely in the contemporary idiom, but one is pleased to discover that his is a music that communicates itself easily to the understanding of his audience. More than any earlier work of his, the "Dedications" seem engrossing and stimulating.

The orchestration is of interest, particularly the unison of kettle drums and a solo double at the beginning of the opening movement, and the accompaniment of the soprano voice by a pair of clarinets in the declamation of the poem. In opposition to the energy and exuberance of the movements, "To the City" and "To the Sea," the slow movement, "To the Country," is diatonic, peaceful, pastorale in character.

G. H. L. S.

LITCHFIELD, CONN.
WEEKLY ENQUIRER

DEC 1 - 1938

Notes of Music

With the arrival of Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra, the ~~New York~~ concert season can really be said to be in full swing. Each year the first—and subsequent—appearance of this magnificent group is awaited eagerly by those lucky ones who possess the highly-prized subscriptions, and by the rest of us who want to know just how fine and keenly trained an orchestra can be. Each year we feel that the performances we have been privileged to hear have come as close to perfection as a great Art will allow mere humans to approach, and yet each new season brings new revelations of tone, of unity, of depth of musical understanding on the parts of both the men and their leader. And the first concert served to re-emphasize this outstanding quantity.

* * * * *

The program was extremely well-chosen. Mr. Koussevitzky began with Maurice Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin", played by the orchestra in commemoration of Ravel's death last year. It has been said that this music was written by Ravel as an ode to the memory of a friend who fell in the World War. It has also been argued that this story is necessarily apocryphal, since the music is not in any evident way elegiac, but instead shows the consummate perfection of style and composition that we have learned to expect of Ravel; it would seem, to the superficial, that the expression of any deep feeling, and particularly any sincere grieving, would not be possible in so finished and polished a composition. To hold to this view would be to show no grasp of the composer. With Maurice Ravel, a grief would drive him to the deep and proud springs of the ancient culture of his ancestors, to express that grief in a form of beauty, with head held high and erect. Only the gallant could know that this apparent stylism, this almost formal and too-perfect phrasing, masked a feeling too deep and above all too proud for all to see and to be told. The orchestra played it superbly throughout, maintaining the spirit of the music and its message with the clarity and perfection of phrasing that we take all too much for granted, and hear all too seldom.

* * * * *

The "Fifth Symphony" of Sibelius, which was next presented, is one of those things about which perhaps too much has been written out of too little knowledge and love. It is true that each of this master's works bears the unmistakable mark of his thought and individuality; it is equally true that each of them—and we are thinking now of the symphonies—is as clearly and sharply different from the others as two children of the same parent frequently—and generally—are. In all of them we get the pastoral feeling, the sense of loneliness and detachment; in all of them the essential sombreness of their progenitor's environment and thought-processes is carried through, yet in each of them the expression is different while being wholly honest. The Fifth differs greatly from the Second, not only in thematic idea but in synthesis and development, both emotionally and technically. Its demands on the personnel are perhaps not as great as its immediate predecessor in a purely technical sense, yet the need of full understanding on the part of the conductor is greater by far. The contrast between this and the Ravel could hardly have been greater, or, for that matter, could there have been a fuller revelation of the powers of the men and their leader. From the quiet, pastoral beginning and its woodwind development, through the beautiful mounting of ideas to the superb finale, as glorious as a northern sunrise, the music expresed to everyone who would listen, their own personal analysis of a work that is elusive and rare, in the best senses of these words. It is needless to add that the audience felt the implications fully and showed their feelings tumultuously.

* * * * *

It is worth noting here that the performance of Beethoven's Fifth, was the fourth playing of this symphony within a fortnight. All of our major orchestras in New York have now played it—the Philadelphians, Toscanini and his NBC Orchestra, ~~the Philharmonic~~-Symphony, and now the Boston. It is a tribute to this great music, that it has not even slightly palled, and an equal tribute to its performers that each hearing of it discloses thoughts and presentations of ideas that somehow did not occur previously. Any discussion of this Symphony from an analytical standpoint would be superfluous—it is thrice familiar; it is sufficient to say that the elemental strength and drama of the Beethoven detracted nothing from that which had gone before, and that the way this Orchestra played it made one wish, after three immediate previous hearings, that it were played more often rather than less, if it were always played this way.

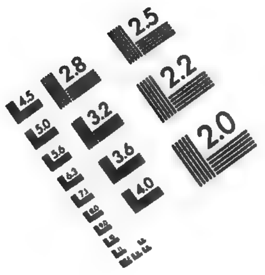
Ralph M. Fremont

REDUCTION
RATIO
18x

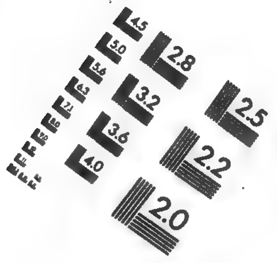
2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

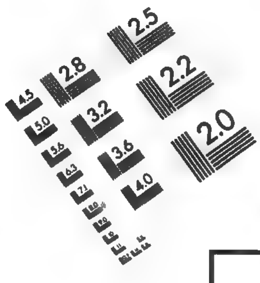


2.5
2.8
2.2
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0

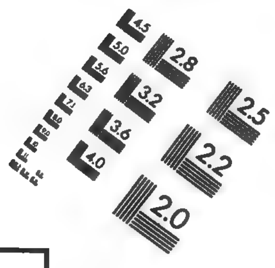


4.5
5.0
2.8
3.2
2.5
3.6
2.2
4.0
2.0

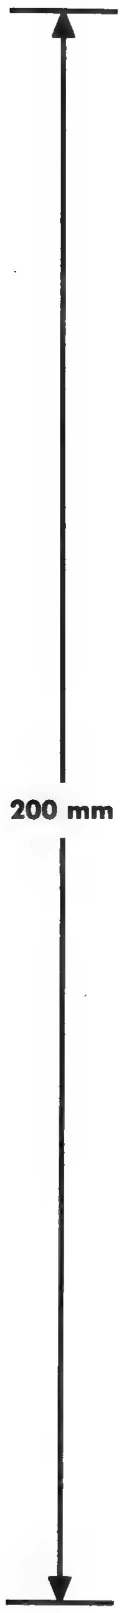
PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

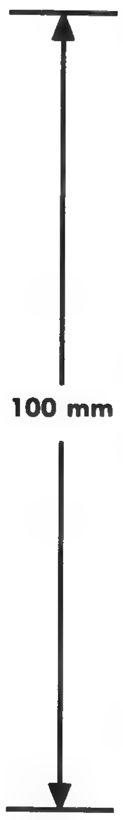


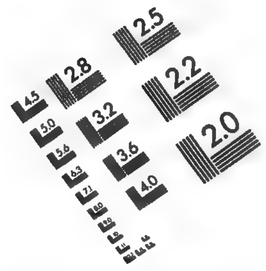
2.5
2.8
2.2
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0



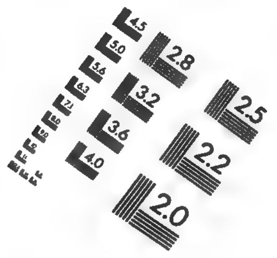
2.8
3.2
2.5
3.6
2.2
4.0
2.0



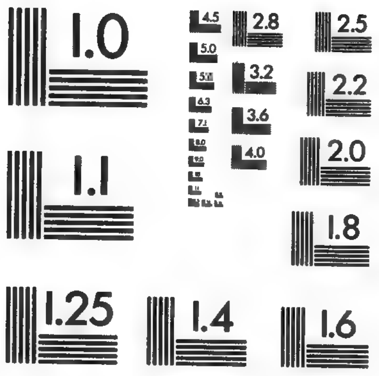




2.5
2.8
2.2
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0



2.8
3.2
2.5
3.6
2.2
4.0
2.0



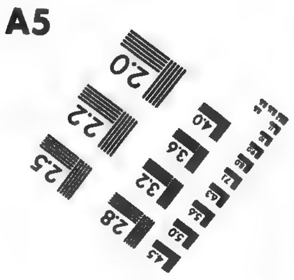
1.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
2.5
2.2
2.0
1.1
1.8
1.25
1.4
1.6

1.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

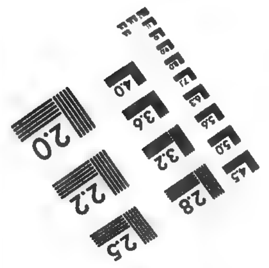
1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

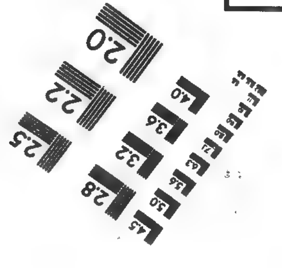
2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890



2.0
2.2
2.5
3.6
3.2
2.8
4.0



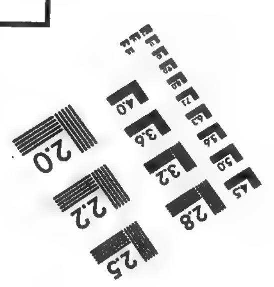
2.0
3.6
4.0
2.2
3.2
2.8
2.5



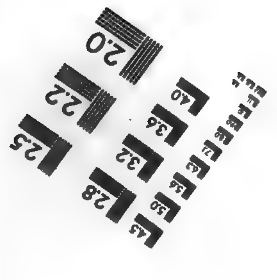
2.0
2.2
2.5
3.6
3.2
2.8
4.0

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119



2.0
4.0
3.6
2.2
3.2
2.8
2.5



2.0
2.2
2.5
4.0
3.6
3.2
2.8

4.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0
4.0
3.6
2.2
3.2
2.8
2.5

3.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

Two Thoughts, With but a Single Head

Monitor — Dec. 16

By a Staff Photographer

Vladimir Dukelsky

Whose "Dedicaces" was given a first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra today.

Vernon Duke

Composer of swing, musical comedy and cinema called in by Hollywood on the Gershwin "Goldwyn Follies" completion.

Antipodal Composers Meet; And 'They' Muse Mellifluently

Monitor Dec. 16/38

By E. Bigelow Thompson

Staff Writer of The Christian Science Monitor

Vladimir Dukelsky, distinguished young Russian composer, whose "Dédicaces" was given a first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this afternoon, and Vernon Duke, American citizen, esteemed by "swing" fans for recent compositions, known musically for light stage pieces and for his completion of numbers left unfinished for the Goldwyn Follies by the passing on of the late George Gershwin, were in Boston today.

They elected to be interviewed in the orchestra library at Symphony Hall, together—rather unusual in itself. Generally the press outnumbers a celebrity rather than celebrities outnumbering the press.

Both have lived eventful lives. In the interview, they found they had much in common. Dukelsky is of Georgian and Spanish ancestry. Showing considerable precocity as a child, his boyhood, beginning at nine, was spent studying composition under Glière, piano with Dombrovsky, and he was enrolled in Kiev Conservatory at 13.

He did not graduate. "By 15 I went through the whole works." A year later, in the disturbed political changes of 1920, the Dukelsky family "left hurriedly." Since then his course lay through Paris, London, New York, Hollywood.

Vernon Duke has not had an easy time either. In that same year, 1920, he came across some of Gershwin's works in Constantinople. They were captioned in English and Greek. He was fascinated by the scoring. He harmonized a Turkish song in the jazz manner and sold the first jazz tunes published in a Turkish edition.

Arrived in the United States, his livelihood was precarious. One odd job followed another: conductor of the orchestra in a burlesque theater, composer of a slinky waltz to accompany a stage magician's act, accompanist at New York night clubs.

For climax, he met Mr. Gershwin,

(Continued on Page 11, Column 2)

Antipodal Conductors Meet

(Continued from Page 1)

then doing the "George White Scandals" (1922), and made copies for him; later, "in spite of all claims to the contrary, I made the two-piano arrangement of the 'Rhapsody in Blue'. . . ."

In the interview, each composer was politely complimentary of the other's work. Mr. Dukelsky remarked that he liked to think of Mr. Duke's compositions as "written principally for Mr. Duke's own enjoyment, and, ah, also for the appreciation of two or three other people, because he is unable to adapt serious music to popular needs."

Mr. Duke rejoined, clarifying his position, that "writing light tunes (his cinema "atmospheric" backgrounds, the London operetta "Yvonne" and popular numbers) is like playing golf—only more profitable. . . . I feel at ease writing jazz. . . ." Politely to Mr. Dukelsky—"I am not influenced by Dukelsky. . . . My music is like taking a pleasant walk."

Mr. Dukelsky (of classical tradition and training) said, "I think Mr. Duke's music will last. I have come to the conclusion that 'April in Paris' is in for long life. See, it was written in 1933 and the fact that it is still 'on' shows signs of its becoming a standard. . . ."

Coming to closer grips, Mr. Duke vouchsafed the opinion that some of Dukelsky's works are "a bit heavy." "Emphatically," was his word for it. He explained he felt "the musical language is complex."

Mr. Dukelsky interrupted to remark, "I have spent the past three years sharpening it. I hope my language is clear to my audience." Then came amplification of intricate, not complex . . . energy and verve . . . rhythmic life, as footnotes to the Dukelsky technique.

Agreement was reached in consensus that "We both have this in common: belielief that melody is the important thing."

Then Mr. Dukelsky laughed at Mr. Duke and Mr. Duke joined in. In one voice, being one and the same man, he (they) told the interviewer who set them at odds by his questions, that, seriously, "I owe a lot to Gershwin, as Duke, and I owe an enormous lot to Koussevitzky as Dukelsky."

The composer explained that he was forced to use two names, although it has brought complications. For his serious work, his ballet "Zéphyr et Flore," done on Diaghliev's order, his symphonies, concertos, works for chamber combinations, piano sonatas, today's "Dédicaces," a concerto for orchestra and piano with soprano obligato . . . the Editions Russe de Musique. The music publishing house in Paris with which Mr. Koussevitzy is identified, objected, and the serious composer had to find another name for his lighter and equally successful side.

"I always find that people who call themselves serious musicians look on me with suspicion of being a Broadwayite with the taint of jazz. The swing fans think Duke must be a highbrow because of his Carnegie Hall setting . . . One publisher lately asked me to write as Kelly because he wanted some Irish ballads!"

Mr. Dukelsky is now working on a something new in musical plays, "The Carousel," writetn in collaboration with Robert Nathan (from Nathan's novel, "The Orchid") and Georges Balanchine, for January production. "We are trying to do away with certain fallacies of musical comedies. All the songs further the action!"

LITCHFIELD, CONN.
WEEKLY ENQUIRER

DEC 1 - 1938

Notes of Music

With the arrival of Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra, the ~~New York~~ concert season can really be said to be in full swing. Each year the first—and subsequent—appearance of this magnificent group is awaited eagerly by those lucky ones who possess the highly-prized subscriptions, and by the rest of us who want to know just how fine and keenly trained an orchestra can be. Each year we feel that the performances we have been privileged to hear have come as close to perfection as a great Art will allow mere humans to approach, and yet each new season brings new revelations of tone, of unity, of depth of musical understanding on the parts of both the men and their leader. And the first concert served to reemphasize this outstanding quantity.

* * * * *

The program was extremely well-chosen. Mr. Koussevitzky began with Maurice Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin", played by the orchestra in commemoration of Ravel's death last year. It has been said that this music was written by Ravel as an ode to the memory of a friend who fell in the World War. It has also been argued that this story is necessarily apocryphal, since the music is not in any evident way elegiac, but instead shows the consummate perfection of style and composition that we have learned to expect of Ravel; it would seem, to the superficial, that the expression of any deep feeling, and particularly any sincere grieving, would not be possible in so finished and polished a composition. To hold to this view would be to show no grasp of the composer. With Maurice Ravel, a grief would drive him to the deep and proud springs of the ancient culture of his ancestors, to express that grief in a form of beauty, with head held high and erect. Only the gallant could know that this apparent stylism, this almost formal and too-perfect phrasing, masked a feeling too deep and above all too proud for all to see and to be told. The orchestra played it superbly throughout, maintaining the spirit of the music and its message with the clarity and perfection of phrasing that we take all too much for granted, and hear all too seldom.

* * * * *

The "Fifth Symphony" of Sibelius, which was next presented, is one of those things about which perhaps too much has been written out of too little knowledge and love. It is true that each of this master's works bears the unmistakable mark of his thought and individuality; it is equally true that each of them—and we are thinking now of the symphonies—is as clearly and sharply different from the others as two children of the same parent frequently—and generally—are. In all of them we get the pastoral feeling, the sense of loneliness and detachment; in all of them the essential sombreness of their progenitor's environment and thought-processes is carried through, yet in each of them the expression is different while being wholly honest. The Fifth differs greatly from the Second, not only in thematic idea but in synthesis and development, both emotionally and technically. Its demands on the personnel are perhaps not as great as its immediate predecessor in a purely technical sense, yet the need of full understanding on the part of the conductor is greater by far. The contrast between this and the Ravel could hardly have been greater, or, for that matter, could there have been a fuller revelation of the powers of the men and their leader. From the quiet, pastoral beginning and its woodwind development, through the beautiful mounting of ideas to the superb finale, as glorious as a northern sunrise, the music expresed to everyone who would listen, their own personal analysis of a work that is elusive and rare in the best senses of these words. It is needless to add that the audience felt the implications fully and showed their feelings tumultuously.

* * * * *

It is worth noting here that the performance of Beethoven's Fifth, was the fourth playing of this symphony within a fortnight. All of our major orchestras in New York have now played it—the Philadelphians, Toscanini and his NBC Orchestra, the ~~Philharmonic~~-Symphony, and now the Boston. It is a tribute to this great music, that it has not even slightly palled, and an equal tribute to its performers that each hearing of it discloses thoughts and presentations of ideas that somehow did not occur previously. Any discussion of this Symphony from an analytical standpoint would be superfluous—it is thrice familiar; it is sufficient to say that the elemental strength and drama of the Beethoven detracted nothing from that which had gone before, and that the way this Orchestra played it made one wish, after three immediate previous hearings, that it were played more often rather than less, if it were always played this way.

Ralph M. Fremont

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, THURSDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1938

on Boston Amusements—Symph[illegible]y Notes, Concerts,

97

Dukelsky Knocks at the Door Of Symphony Hall Once More

The composer brings a new composition for first performance by Dr. Koussevitzky.

John B. Sanroma

Jesús María Sanromá

He will be heard at the week-end symphony concerts in the first performances of Dukelsky's "Dedications."

Vladimir Dukelsky is a curious figure on the American musical landscape. He would seem sufficiently exotic if he were judged upon the single score of his serious music. Such a work as his "Dédicaces," which Dr. Koussevitzky will introduce at the week-end symphony concerts, would alone be reason to seek the varied and conflicting sources of so ingenious and odd a creative intellect. But Mr. Dukelsky does not feed upon bread alone; he sweetens it well with the rich flavors of the musical comedy stage under the half - abbreviated, half - anglicized pseudonym of Vernon Duke. He has contrived much theatrical and film music, and is responsible for a number of "hits" from such works as "The Show Is On," "Three's a Crowd," and others since he made his début in London in 1926 with "Yvonne." His latest musical play is "The Carousel," written in collaboration with Robert Nathan and Georges Balanchine. It is to be produced in January with a possible Boston opening.

Mr. Dukelsky traces his ancestry to both Spanish and Georgian sources. As a boy he studied composition with Glière at the Conservatory of Kiev. A suite from his ballet "Zéphyr et Flore," written at the request of Serge Diaghileff, was presented at the symphony concerts in 1927. Dr. Koussevitzky has also performed his first two symphonies and an "Epitaph" for soprano solo, chorus, and orchestra in memory of Diaghileff.

Dedicated to Balanchine

The new work, which is dedicated to Georges Balanchine, bears the somewhat fulsome title "Dédicaces, pour piano, orchestre et voix de femme obligato (paroles de Guillaume Apollinaire)." It was begun in 1934 and completed in the spring of 1938. Despite the factual length of the title, the composer has added the information that the work is really "a three-movement piano concerto with a vocal epigraph." The soprano sings Apollinaire's poem in the first movement, "L'Envoi," is silent in the second and third movements—"To the City" and "To the Country" respectively—and is heard again repeating the final lines of the poem in the epilogue to the fourth movement, "To the Sea."

The titles of the movements are drawn from various allusions of the poem. "Apollinaire breathlessly describes those features of his existence in the city, the country, and on the water that startled or touched him the most," the composer writes. "Thus the soprano becomes the narrator, while the solo pianist could perhaps be likened (this time literally) to a man pitched against the universe of the orchestra." Apollinaire's poem follows, in a translation by George Davis:

Oh dear companions!
Electric signals of railway stations,
Song of the harvesters,
A butcher's truck,
Regiment of streets without number,
Cavalry of bridges . . .
Do you recall the suburbs and plaintive herd of landscapes?
Beneath the moon the cypress trees cast their shadows,
This night of summer's waning I hear a languishing and ever restless bird and the eternal rushing of a broad and sombre river.

"Emery Boards" Used

The composer would insist that in spite of all the literary connotations, the work is in no way descriptive. The orchestra employed is of the usual size with an augmented percussion choir containing the seldom used "emery boards." . . . "These, when rubbed together, convey the illusion of splashing waves—the one and only concession to the impressionistic orchestral palette," Mr. Dukelsky explains.

All the movements of the work are developed with intricate detail requiring careful listening from those hearing the work for the first time. Mr. Dukelsky writes freely in the contemporary idiom, but one is pleased to discover that his is a music that communicates itself easily to the understanding of his audience. More than any earlier work of his, the "Dedications" seem engrossing and stimulating.

The orchestration is of interest, particularly the unison of kettle drums and a solo double at the beginning of the opening movement, and the accompaniment of the soprano voice by a pair of clarinets in the declamation of the poem. In opposition to the energy and exuberance of the movements, "To the City" and "To the Sea," the slow movement, "To the Country," is diatonic, peaceful, pastorale in character.

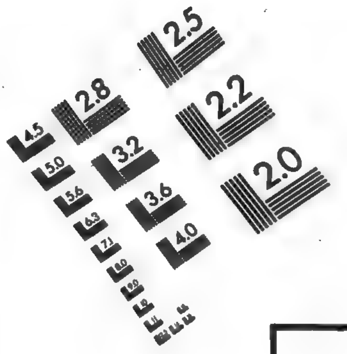
G. H. L. S.

REDUCTION

RATIO

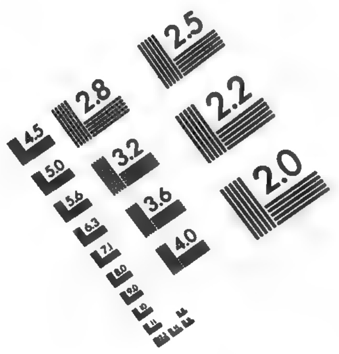
14x

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

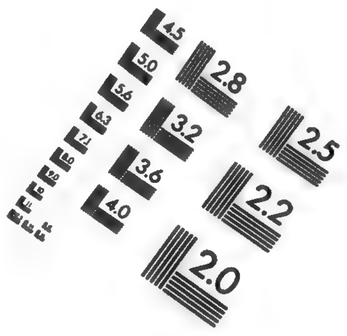


2.5
2.8
2.2
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6

4.5
5.0
2.8
3.2
2.5
3.6
2.2
4.0
2.0



2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
3.2
5.0
2.0
3.6
5.6
4.0

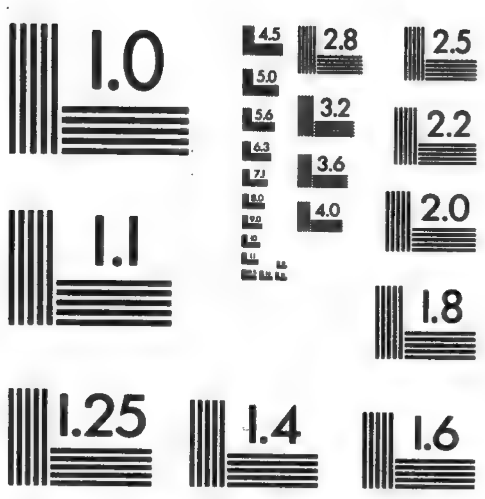


4.5
5.0
2.8
3.2
2.5
3.6
2.2
4.0
2.0

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm



1.0
4.5
2.8
2.5
5.0
5.6
3.2
2.2
6.3
3.6
1.1
4.0
2.0
1.8
1.25
1.4
1.6

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

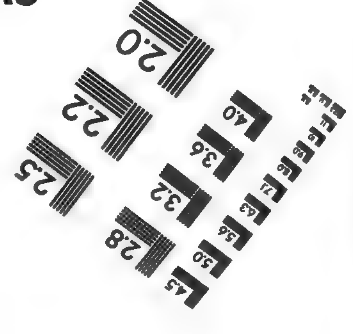
1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

A5

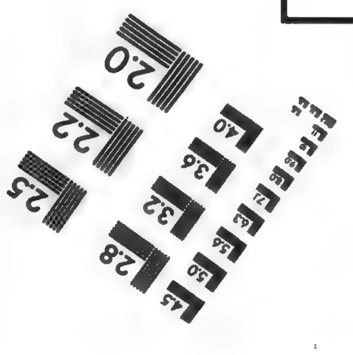


2.0
2.2
4.0
2.5
3.6
3.2
2.8

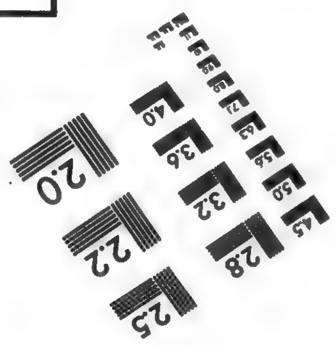
4.0
3.6
2.0
3.2
2.2
2.8
2.5

A4

A3



2.0
2.2
4.0
2.5
3.6
3.2
2.8



4.0
3.6
2.0
3.2
2.2
2.8
2.5

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

Two Thoughts With but a Single Head

Monitor — Dec. [illegible]

By a Staff Photographer

Vladimir Dukelsky

Whose "Dedicaces" was given a first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra today.

Vernon Duke

Composer of swing, musical comedy and cinema called in by Hollywood on the Gershwin "Goldwyn Follies" completion.

Antipodal Composers Meet; And 'They' Muse Mellifluently

Monitor — Dec. 16/38

By E. Bigelow Thompson

Staff Writer of The Christian Science Monitor

Vladimir Dukelsky, distinguished young Russian composer, whose "Dédicaces" was given a first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this afternoon, and Vernon Duke, American citizen, esteemed by "swing" fans for recent compositions, known musically for light stage pieces and for his completion of numbers left unfinished for the Goldwyn Follies by the passing on of the late George Gershwin, were in Boston today.

They elected to be interviewed in the orchestra library at Symphony Hall, together—rather unusual in itself. Generally the press outnumbers a celebrity rather than celebrities outnumbering the press.

Both have lived eventful lives. In the interview, they found they had much in common. Dukelsky is of Georgian and Spanish ancestry. Showing considerable precocity as a child, his boyhood, beginning at nine, was spent studying composition under Glière, piano with Dombrovsky, and he was enrolled in Kiev Conservatory at 13.

He did not graduate. "By 15 I went through the whole works." A year later, in the disturbed political changes of 1920, the Dukelsky family "left hurriedly." Since then his course lay through Paris, London, New York, Hollywood.

Vernon Duke has not had an easy time either. In that same year, 1920, he came across some of Gershwin's works in Constantinople. They were captioned in English and Greek. He was fascinated by the scoring. He harmonized a Turkish song in the jazz manner and sold the first jazz tunes published in a Turkish edition.

Arrived in the United States, his livelihood was precarious. One odd job followed another: conductor of the orchestra in a burlesque theater, composer of a slinky waltz to accompany a stage magician's act, accompanist at New York night clubs.

For climax, he met Mr. Gershwin,

(Continued on Page 11, Column 2)

Antipodal Conductors Meet

(Continued from Page 1)

then doing the "George White Scandals" (1922), and made copies for him; later, "in spite of all claims to the contrary, I made the two-piano arrangement of the 'Rhapsody in Blue'. . . ."

In the interview, each composer was politely complimentary of the other's work. Mr. Dukelsky remarked that he liked to think of Mr. Duke's compositions as "written principally for Mr. Duke's own enjoyment, and, ah, also for the appreciation of two or three other people, because he is unable to adapt serious music to popular needs."

Mr. Duke rejoined, clarifying his position, that "writing light tunes (his cinema "atmospheric" backgrounds, the London operetta "Yvonne" and popular numbers) is like playing golf—only more profitable. . . . I feel at ease writing jazz. . . ." Politely to Mr. Dukelsky—"I am not influenced by Dukelsky. . . . My music is like taking a pleasant walk."

Mr. Dukelsky (of classical tradition and training) said, "I think Mr. Duke's music will last. I have come to the conclusion that 'April in Paris' is in for long life. See, it was written in 1933 and the fact that it is still 'on' shows signs of its becoming a standard. . . ."

Coming to closer grips, Mr. Duke vouchsafed the opinion that some of Dukelsky's works are "a bit heavy." "Emphatically," was his word for it. He explained he felt "the musical language is complex."

Mr. Dukelsky interrupted to remark, "I have spent the past three years sharpening it. I hope my language is clear to my audience." Then came amplification of intricate, not complex . . . energy and verve . . . rhythmic life, as footnotes to the Dukelsky technique.

Agreement was reached in consensus that "We both have this in common: belielief that melody is the important thing."

Then Mr. Dukelsky laughed at Mr. Duke and Mr. Duke joined in. In one voice, being one and the same man, he (they) told the interviewer who set them at odds by his questions, that, seriously, "I owe a lot to Gershwin, as Duke, and I owe an enormous lot to Koussevitzky as Dukelsky."

The composer explained that he was forced to use two names, although it has brought complications. For his serious work, his ballet "Zéphyr et Flore," done on Diaghliev's order, his symphonies, concertos, works for chamber combinations, piano sonatas, today's "Dédicaces," a concerto for orchestra and piano with soprano obligato . . . the Editions Russe de Musique. The music publishing house in Paris with which Mr. Koussevitzy is identified, objected, and the serious composer had to find another name for his lighter and equally successful side.

"I always find that people who call themselves serious musicians look on me with suspicion of being a Broadwayite with the taint of jazz. The swing fans think Duke must be a highbrow because of his Carnegie Hall setting . . . One publisher lately asked me to write as Kelly because he wanted some Irish ballads!"

Mr. Dukelsky is now working on a something new in musical plays, 'The Carousel," writetn in collaboration with Robert Nathan (from Nathan's novel, "The Orchid") and Georges Balanchine, for January production. "We are trying to do away with certain fallacies of musical comedies. All the songs further the action!"

LITCHFIELD, CONN.
WEEKLY ENQUIRER

DEC 1 - 1938

Notes of Music

With the arrival of Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra, the New ~~York~~ concert season can really be said to be in full swing. Each year the first—and subsequent—appearance of this magnificent group is awaited eagerly by those lucky ones who possess the highly-prized subscriptions, and by the rest of us who want to know just how fine and keenly trained an orchestra can be. Each year we feel that the performances we have been privileged to hear have come as close to perfection as a great Art will allow mere humans to approach, and yet each new season brings new revelations of tone, of unity, of depth of musical understanding on the parts of both the men and their leader. And the first concert served to reemphasize this outstanding quantity.

* * * * *

The program was extremely well-chosen. Mr. Koussevitzky began with Maurice Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin", played by the orchestra in commemoration of Ravel's death last year. It has been said that this music was written by Ravel as an ode to the memory of a friend who fell in the World War. It has also been argued that this story is necessarily apocryphal, since the music is not in any evident way elegiac, but instead shows the consummate perfection of style and composition that we have learned to expect of Ravel; it would seem, to the superficial, that the expression of any deep feeling, and particularly any sincere grieving, would not be possible in so finished and polished a composition. To hold to this view would be to show no grasp of the composer. With Maurice Ravel, a grief would drive him to the deep and proud springs of the ancient culture of his ancestors, to express that grief in a form of beauty, with head held high and erect. Only the gallant could know that this apparent stylism, this almost formal and too-perfect phrasing, masked a feeling too deep and above all too proud for all to see and to be told. The orchestra played it superbly throughout, maintaining the spirit of the music and its message with the clarity and perfection of phrasing that we take all too much for granted, and hear all too seldom.

* * * * *

The "Fifth Symphony" of Sibelius, which was next presented, is one of those things about which perhaps too much has been written out of too little knowledge and love. It is true that each of this master's works bears the unmistakable mark of his thought and individuality; it is equally true that each of them—and we are thinking now of the symphonies—is as clearly and sharply different from the others as two children of the same parent frequently—and generally—are. In all of them we get the pastoral feeling, the sense of loneliness and detachment; in all of them the essential sombreness of their progenitor's environment and thought-processes is carried through, yet in each of them the expression is different while being wholly honest. The Fifth differs greatly from the Second, not only in thematic idea but in synthesis and development, both emotionally and technically. Its demands on the personnel are perhaps not as great as its immediate predecessor in a purely technical sense, yet the need of full understanding on the part of the conductor is greater by far. The contrast between this and the Ravel could hardly have been greater, or, for that matter, could there have been a fuller revelation of the powers of the men and their leader. From the quiet, pastoral beginning and its woodwind development, through the beautiful mounting of ideas to the superb finale, as glorious as a northern sunrise, the music expresed to everyone who would listen, their own personal analysis of a work that is elusive and rare in the best senses of these words. It is needless to add that the audience felt the implications fully and showed their feelings tumultuously.

* * * * *

It is worth noting here that the performance of Beethoven's Fifth, was the fourth playing of this symphony within a fortnight. All of our major orchestras in New York have now played it—the Philadelphians, Toscanini and his NBC Orchestra, the ~~Philharmonic~~ - Symphony, and now the Boston. It is a tribute to this great music, that it has not even slightly palled, and an equal tribute to its performers that each hearing of it discloses thoughts and presentations of ideas that somehow did not occur previously. Any discussion of this Symphony from an analytical standpoint would be superfluous—it is thrice familiar; it is sufficient to say that the elemental strength and drama of the Beethoven detracted nothing from that which had gone before, and that the way this Orchestra played it made one wish, after three immediate previous hearings, that it were played more often rather than less, if it were always played this way.

Ralph M. Fremont

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

on Boston Amusements — Sy

Dukelsky Knocks at the Door Of Symphony Hall Once More

97

The composer brings a new composition for first performance by Dr. Koussevitzky.

John B. Sanroma

Jesús María Sanromá

He will be heard at the week-end symphony concerts in the first performances of Dukelsky's "Dedications."

Vladimir Dukelsky is a curious figure on the American musical landscape. He would seem sufficiently exotic if he were judged upon the single score of his serious music. Such a work as his "Dédicaces," which Dr. Koussevitzky will introduce at the week-end symphony concerts, would alone be reason to seek the varied and conflicting sources of so ingenious and odd a creative intellect. But Mr. Dukelsky does not feed upon bread alone; he sweetens it well with the rich flavors of the musical comedy stage under the half - abbreviated, half - anglicized pseudonym of Vernon Duke. He has contrived much theatrical and film music, and is responsible for a number of "hits" from such works as "The Show Is On," "Three's a Crowd," and others since he made his début in London in 1926 with "Yvonne." His latest musical play is "The Carousel," written in collaboration with Robert Nathan and Georges Balanchine. It is to be produced in January with a possible Boston opening.

Mr. Dukelsky traces his ancestry to both Spanish and Georgian sources. As a boy he studied composition with Gliére at the Conservatory of Kiev. A suite from his ballet "Zéphyr et Flore," written at the request of Serge Diaghileff, was presented at the symphony concerts in 1927. Dr. Koussevitzky has also performed his first two symphonies and an "Epitaph" for soprano solo, chorus, and orchestra in memory of Diaghileff.

Dedicated to Balanchine

The new work, which is dedicated to Georges Balanchine, bears the somewhat fulsome title "Dédicaces, pour piano, orchestre et voix de femme obligato (paroles de Guillaume Apollinaire)." It was begun in 1934 and completed in the spring of 1938. Despite the factual length of the title, the composer has added the information that the work is really "a three-movement piano concerto with a vocal epigraph." The soprano sings Apollinaire's poem in the first movement, "L'Envoi," is silent in the second and third movements—"To the City" and "To the Country" respectively—and is heard again repeating the final lines of the poem in the epilogue to the fourth movement, "To the Sea."

The titles of the movements are drawn from various allusions of the poem. "Apollinaire breathlessly describes those features of his existence in the city, the country, and on the water that startled or touched him the most," the composer writes. "Thus the soprano becomes the narrator, while the solo pianist could perhaps be likened (this time literally) to a man pitched against the universe of the orchestra." Apollinaire's poem follows, in a translation by George Davis:

Oh dear companions!
Electric signals of railway stations.
Song of the harvesters,
A butcher's truck,
Regiment of streets without number,
Cavalry of bridges . . .
Do you recall the suburbs and plaintive herd of landscapes?
Beneath the moon the cypress trees cast their shadows,
This night of summer's waning I hear a languishing and ever restless bird and the eternal rushing of a broad and sombre river.

"Emery Boards" Used

The composer would insist that in spite of all the literary connotations, the work is in no way descriptive. The orchestra employed is of the usual size with an augmented percussion choir containing the seldom used "emery boards." . . . "These, when rubbed together, convey the illusion of splashing waves—the one and only concession to the impressionistic orchestral palette," Mr. Dukelsky explains.

All the movements of the work are developed with intricate detail requiring careful listening from those hearing the work for the first time. Mr. Dukelsky writes freely in the contemporary idiom, but one is pleased to discover that his is a music that communicates itself easily to the understanding of his audience. More than any earlier work of his, the "Dedications" seem engrossing and stimulating.

The orchestration is of interest, particularly the unison of kettle drums and a solo double at the beginning of the opening movement, and the accompaniment of the soprano voice by a pair of clarinets in the declamation of the poem. In opposition to the energy and exuberance of the movements, "To the City" and "To the Sea," the slow movement, "To the Country," is diatonic, peaceful, pastorale in character.

G. H. L. S.

Single Head

ernon Duke

sical comedy and cinema called in by shwin "Goldwyn Follies" completion.

LITCHFIELD, CONN.
WEEKLY ENQUIRER

DEC 1 - 1938

Notes of Music

With the arrival of Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra, the New ~~York~~ concert season can really be said to be in full swing. Each year the first—and subsequent—appearance of this magnificent group is awaited eagerly by those lucky ones who possess the highly-prized subscriptions, and by the rest of us who want to know just how fine and keenly trained an orchestra can be. Each year we feel that the performances we have been privileged to hear have come as close to perfection as a great Art will allow mere humans to approach, and yet each new season brings new revelations of tone, of unity, of depth of musical understanding on the parts of both the men and their leader. And the first concert served to re-emphasize this outstanding quantity.

* * * * *

The program was extremely well-chosen. Mr. Koussevitzky began with Maurice Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin", played by the orchestra in commemoration of Ravel's death last year. It has been said that this music was written by Ravel as an ode to the memory of a friend who fell in the World War. It has also been argued that this story is necessarily apocryphal, since the music is not in any evident way elegiac, but instead shows the consummate perfection of style and composition that we have learned to expect of Ravel; it would seem, to the superficial, that the expression of any deep feeling, and particularly any sincere grieving, would not be possible in so finished and polished a composition. To hold to this view would be to show no grasp of the composer. With Maurice Ravel, a grief would drive him to the deep and proud springs of the ancient culture of his ancestors, to express that grief in a form of beauty, with head held high and erect. Only the gallant could know that this apparent stylism, this almost formal and too-perfect phrasing, masked a feeling too deep and above all too proud for all to see and to be told. The orchestra played it superbly throughout, maintaining the spirit of the music and its message with the clarity and perfection of phrasing that we take all too much for granted, and hear all too seldom.

* * * * *

The "Fifth Symphony" of Sibelius, which was next presented, is one of those things about which perhaps too much has been written out of too little knowledge and love. It is true that each of this master's works bears the unmistakable mark of his thought and individuality; it is equally true that each of them—and we are thinking now of the symphonies—is as clearly and sharply different from the others as two children of the same parent frequently—and generally—are. In all of them we get the pastoral feeling, the sense of loneliness and detachment; in all of them the essential sombreness of their progenitor's environment and thought-processes is carried through, yet in each of them the expression is different while being wholly honest. The Fifth differs greatly from the Second, not only in thematic idea but in synthesis and development, both emotionally and technically. Its demands on the personnel are perhaps not as great as its immediate predecessor in a purely technical sense, yet the need of full understanding on the part of the conductor is greater by far. The contrast between this and the Ravel could hardly have been greater, or, for that matter, could there have been a fuller revelation of the powers of the men and their leader. From the quiet, pastoral beginning and its woodwind development, through the beautiful mounting of ideas to the superb finale, as glorious as a northern sunrise, the music expresed to everyone who would listen, their own personal analysis of a work that is elusive and rare in the best senses of these words. It is needless to add that the audience felt the implications fully and showed their feelings tumultuously.

* * * * *

It is worth noting here that the performance of Beethoven's Fifth, was the fourth playing of this symphony within a fortnight. All of our major orchestras in New York have now played it—the Philadelphians, Toscanini and his NBC Orchestra, the ~~Philharmonic~~ - Symphony, and now the Boston. It is a tribute to this great music, that it has not even slightly palled, and an equal tribute to its performers that each hearing of it discloses thoughts and presentations of ideas that somehow did not occur previously. Any discussion of this Symphony from an analytical standpoint would be superfluous—it is thrice familiar; it is sufficient to say that the elemental strength and drama of the Beethoven detracted nothing from that which had gone before, and that the way this Orchestra played it made one wish, after three immediate previous hearings, that it were played more often rather than less, if it were always played this way.

Ralph M. Fremont

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, THURSDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1938

on Boston Amusements—Symph[illegible]y Notes, Concerts,

97

Dukelsky Knocks at the Door Of Symphony Hall Once More

The composer brings a new composition for first performance by Dr. Koussevitzky.

Vladimir Dukelsky is a curious figure on the American musical landscape. He would seem sufficiently exotic if he were judged upon the single score of his serious music. Such a work as his "Dédicaces," which Dr. Koussevitzky will introduce at the week-end symphony concerts, would alone be reason to seek the varied and conflicting sources of so ingenious and odd a creative intellect. But Mr. Dukelsky does not feed upon bread alone; he sweetens it well with the rich flavors of the musical comedy stage under the half - abbreviated, half - anglicized pseudonym of Vernon Duke. He has contrived much theatrical and film music, and is responsible for a number of "hits" from such works as "The Show Is On," "Three's a Crowd," and others since he made his début in London in 1926 with "Yvonne." His latest musical play is "The Carousel," written in collaboration with Robert Nathan and Georges Balanchine. It is to be produced in January with a possible Boston opening.

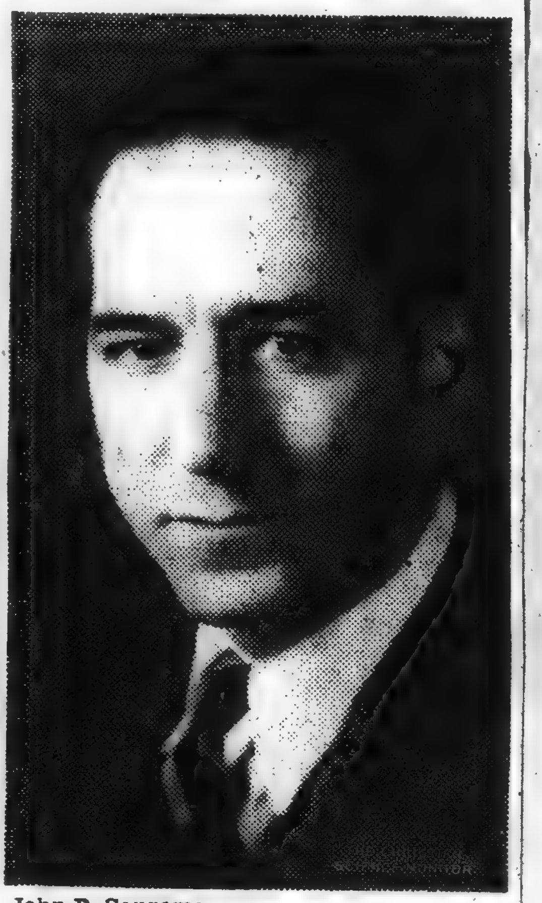
Mr. Dukelsky traces his ancestry to both Spanish and Georgian sources. As a boy he studied composition with Glière at the Conservatory of Kiev. A suite from his ballet "Zéphyr et Flore," written at the request of Serge Diaghileff, was presented at the symphony concerts in 1927. Dr. Koussevitzky has also performed his first two symphonies and an "Epitaph" for soprano solo, chorus, and orchestra in memory of Diaghileff.

Dedicated to Balanchine

The new work, which is dedicated to Georges Balanchine, bears the somewhat fulsome title "Dédicaces, pour piano, orchestre et voix de femme obligato (paroles de Guillaume Apollinaire)." It was begun in 1934 and completed in the spring of 1938. Despite the factual length of the title, the composer has added the information that the work is really "a three-movement piano concerto with a vocal epigraph." The soprano sings Apollinaire's poem in the first movement, "L'Envoi," is silent in the second and third movements—"To the City" and "To the Country" respectively—and is heard again repeating the final lines of the poem in the epilogue to the fourth movement, "To the Sea."

The titles of the movements are drawn from various allusions of the poem. "Apollinaire breathlessly describes those features of his existence in the city, the country, and on the water that startled or touched him the most," the composer writes. "Thus the soprano becomes the narrator, while the solo pianist could perhaps be likened (this time literally) to a man pitched against the universe of the orchestra." Apollinaire's poem follows, in a translation by George Davis:

Oh dear companions!
Electric signals of railway stations,
Song of the harvesters,
A butcher's truck,
Regiment of streets without number,
Cavalry of bridges . . .
Do you recall the suburbs and plaintive herd of landscapes?
Beneath the moon the cypress trees cast their shadows,
This night of summer's waning I hear a languishing and ever restless bird and the eternal rushing of a broad and sombre river.



John B. Sanroma

Jesús María Sanromá

He will be heard at the week-end symphony concerts in the first performances of Dukelsky's "Dedications."

"Emery Boards" Used

The composer would insist that in spite of all the literary connotations, the work is in no way descriptive. The orchestra employed is of the usual size with an augmented percussion choir containing the seldom used "emery boards." . . . "These, when rubbed together, convey the illusion of splashing waves—the one and only concession to the impressionistic orchestral palette," Mr. Dukelsky explains.

All the movements of the work are developed with intricate detail requiring careful listening from those hearing the work for the first time. Mr. Dukelsky writes freely in the contemporary idiom, but one is pleased to discover that his is a music that communicates itself easily to the understanding of his audience. More than any earlier work of his, the "Dedications" seem engrossing and stimulating.

The orchestration is of interest, particularly the unison of kettle drums and a solo double at the beginning of the opening movement, and the accompaniment of the soprano voice by a pair of clarinets in the declamation of the poem. In opposition to the energy and exuberance of the movements, "To the City" and "To the Sea," the slow movement, "To the Country," is diatonic, peaceful, pastorale in character.

G. H. L. S.

98

B. Her. MUSIC Dec. 17/38

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The ninth regular concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternooon in Symphony Hall. Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Symphony in B flat No. 102 .... Haydn
"Dedicaces" for piano and orchestra with soprano obbligato .... Dukelsky
Symphony No. 2 in D major Op. 43 Sibelius

Mr. Dukelsky's "Dedications," which was heard for the first time yesterday, is the most impressive novelty that we have so far been offered this season. Provided that a pianist such as Mr. Sanroma can be had to play the difficult piano part—for it is not what is known as grateful music for the soloist—the work should stay in the repertoire for some time to come. It is a brilliant work and does not deserve the fate of so much new music, that of enjoying a solitary performance and a "succes d'estime."

What are we to call and how define "Dedications"? In spite of the importance of the soloist, it cannot be called a concerto. So meager are the musical terms at our disposal that we already call pieces "concer-

---

SYMPHONY IS GREETED WITH CHEERS

Audience Wild Over Playing of Sibelius' Second

B. Post Dec. 17/38

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The most exciting moment of the Symphony season thus far came yesterday with the finale of Sibelius' Second Symphony. Good to hear were the answering cheers, stamping and cries of "Bravo!" It is all too easy to take our orchestra and conductor not too

ENT
rom first en better although formance oussevit-
y. Some are real-
d to be.
tour, in received s of one ession of stra beyester-
he Symdn's ex-
n B-flat on the cations" soprano
st pubtly preght be.
ying of r Marr brief
"
Vernon
r young who can current the con-
musical ominate or the God and ved for well and as his vocative
re, Mr.
the soaccom-
empt at ng the te three no con-
To the
"To the soprano a most sea in is no Dukel-rather ve been er, the bed in Coun-also a le-Duke
Jekyll-
he way,
r. San-has al-
to hear ted last nmoned latform udits of ith Mr.
e hand
S.
8 highly nd, will in this with the Serge
he Con-
of cond Tues-
d 27, in is said special lled its
er. For concerts ats are ny hall.
erts will pair of nductor,
avinsky,
There ra Hess and Frank Glazer.

Symphony Concert

Symphonies by Haydn and Sibelius And a New Composition by Dukelsky

B. Trans. Dec. 17/38

By MOSES SMITH

Neither a new work by Vladimir Dukelsky, requiring two soloists, nor the remarkable Haydn Symphony in B-flat (No. 102) stirred the audience appreciably from Christmas-shopping apathy at yesterday's matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Only after a characteristically intense and glowing performance of the Sibelius Second Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky did the listeners seem to add warmth to their handclapping, and some of the more venturesome even generated sounds with their feet and throats. The combination of the composer-hero of the day, the particular favorite Symphony in question, and the way of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky with it prevailed as it has almost annually through the past decade.

For the Symphony in D major is a favorite of the conductor as of the audience. In a little more than nine years it has now appeared seven times on the programs of the main subscription series of concerts. That number, it is submitted, is a little too large even if the heroic mould of the composition be conceded. The available symphonic repertory is too varied, the number of neglected masterworks and works of the second flight too great to warrant frequent iteration of any given work. Even Sibelius, now a popular composer whose music Dr. Koussevitzky presents so compellingly, could yield the Third, Fourth and Sixth Symphonies, which are still relatively unfamiliar in Boston.

One of the answers, of course (it always is at this time of year), is the western trip of the orchestra during last week. Returning from arduous journeying and a full week of concerts, the musicians faced the prospect of preparing a difficult new contemporary score. What more natural than to surround it was a symphony the men could almost play by heart and (in the case of the Haydn) another prepared for the trip? To clinch the case, there was the additional consideration that the Dukelsky composition, despite its elaborate piano solo and vocal obbligato, was not likely to be an ingratiating work, a sure-fire audience success. Sugar the pill, then, with music of familiar flavor.

* * *

As it happened the audience could have responded with cheers to the performance of the Haydn Symphony almost as justifiably as in the case of the Sibelius. Donald Francis Tovey regards it as one of Haydn's "three greatest instrumental works." It is easy to agree with the professor. The Symphony exhibits a wealth of invention and resource, a variety of expressiveness and, in general, freshness and originality rare even for Haydn. Here was no lackey making music momentarily to entertain his patron. Here rather was an artist and creator of the first rank, setting down his profoundest as well as most persuasive thoughts for the most cultivated persons of his time (and, whether or not he realized it, of successive generations) to hear.

The performance of yesterday was such as to make these things clear. The richness of tone and precision of technic of the Boston Orchestra were admirably suited to make the Symphony sound at its best. So, too, was the approach of the conductor—refined but not precious, dramatic but not cheap. Dr. Koussevitzky has been praised for many things and blamed for others. We were reminded yesterday that he is now almost the ideal interpreter of the music of Haydn.

* * *

Dukelsky's "Dedicaces" is essentially a three-movement piano concerto. As a sort of prelude there is a short movement, which he calls "L'envoi," that serves as setting for a text by Guillaume Apollinaire, which a soprano sings with the orchestra. An even briefer postlude follows the last movement and, in the voice of the singer, recalls the last lines of the text. The words themselves, suitably modern, are not meant to describe the music (or vice versa), according to the composer; and he ought to know. So far as I could tell, the vocal part, apparently well sung yesterday by Marguerite Porter, is pleasant enough with orchestral accompaniment, but adds nothing essential to the concerto proper, the sub-titles of which—"Town," "Country" and "Sea"—seemed arbitrary.

The composer writes with a more or less expert hand. Most of the time his harmonic and orchestral vocabulary is the one made especially familiar in the nineteen-twenties. By so much the music seemed already out of date. Only a first-rater, which Dukelsky obviously is not, could immortalize such a vocabulary. The dissonances have lost their pungency, the huge percussion section its "kick." When Dukelsky occasionally employs a simpler language, as in the slow movement, the music becomes sentimental and more than faintly suggestive of the lighter theater with which the composer, under an alias, has had more than passing intercourse.

The jazzier sections also recall his other nature. But they seemed, on the whole, the best parts of the score, the most natural and the most vital. There was a rhythmic exhilaration in the patterns and cross-patterns, as apparently brilliantly played on the piano by Jesus Maria Sanroma and more tentatively (as it seemed) by the orchestra.

B. Globe MUSIC Dec. 17/38

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

"Miracles" occasionally happen even to a great conductor and orchestra with whom superlative performances are the rule. Such "miracles," if they can be analyzed at all, consist of technical finesse, interpretive distinction and emotional intensity carried to a degree where they convince a listener that he is in the presence of sheer perfection. One of these "miracles" occurred yesterday afternoon when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Second Symphony by the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius.

This performance was the finest of the work this reviewer has ever heard, so clear and beautifully proportioned that the general structure and every fine detail stood revealed like a Grecian temple in the sunlight of midday. But in addition, Dr. Koussevitzky's reading increased in voltage as it progressed until the grandeur of the finale was literally overwhelming.

In itself, the Second Symphony is "repertory music" (though a masterpiece), thrice familiar to conductor, players and audience. How, then, was it so miraculously recreated, since it has been excellently performed many times before?

It is enough to call it an unpredictable achievement resulting from an extraordinary joining of virtuosity, mind and spirit. That the audience realized this was made clear by their applause, stamping and cheering.

The program began with one of Haydn's later — and finest — symphonies, that in B-flat, No. 102, the ninth in the series Haydn wrote for concerts in London. Almost Beethovenish in its boldness, the score looks ahead to the 19th Century. It was superbly played.

Vladimir Dukelsky's "Dedications" was presented for the first time anywhere. A species of piano concerto unconventionally involving soprano solos, "Dedications" is complicated music, inspired by verses of Guillaume Apollinaire. It rhapsodizes about the city, the country and the sea. The verse is sung in full at the beginning, and a portion is repeated for quiet, closing measures.

Jesus Maria Sanroma, the soloist, navigated with his usual dexterity the bristling difficulties of his part. Marguerite Porter made effective the exacting portion for voice. The first and last movements are in the bustling, dissonant manner of the day, with formidable rapid passages for solo double-bass, trombones and other instruments.

The slow movement, perhaps the best of the three, is melodically and harmonically less rigorous. The composer was present and bowed from the stage.—C. W. D.

CLEVELAND, O.
PLAIN DEALER

DEC 4 - 1938

Boston Orchestra Under Koussevitzky Appears at Music Hall Friday Night

By Herbert Elwell

HERBERT ELWELL

THE Cleveland Concert Course under the direction of Mrs. Emil Brudno and the auspices of the Cleveland Museum of Art presents the Boston Orchestra in a concert at Public Music Hall Friday evening. This famous orchestra under its equally famous conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will be heard in a program that includes Haydn's Symphony in B flat, No. 102, Debussy's Three Symphonic Sketches, "La Mer," and the Sibelius Symphony No. 2.

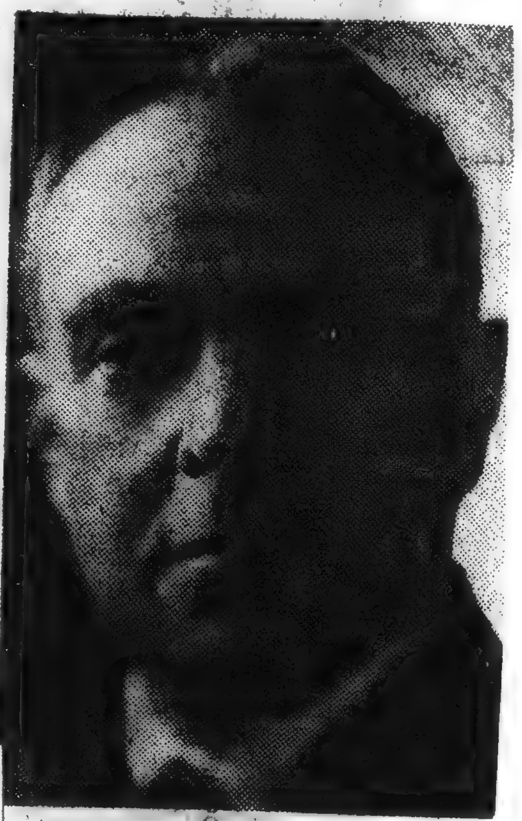
The Boston Orchestra of 106 members is the second oldest symphony orchestra in this country. It is now in its 58th season and its fifteenth consecutive year under Koussevitsky. During this long period it has accumulated a large and varied repertory in many ways more interesting than that of most orchestras.

We think of Bostonians as having conservative taste. Yet their orchestra, under Koussevitsky at least, probably has performed more contemporary music of a venturesome nature than any other major American orchestra. And this has been due largely to Koussevitsky's passionate interest in the works of modern composers. The number of living composers who have dedicated compositions to him and have had first performances of their works under his baton would make a long list.

My own acquaintance with the conducting of Koussevitzky was made, not in this country, but in Paris back in the early '20s, when he was giving orchestral concerts at the Paris Opera. To music students in Paris at that time these concerts were like a ray of sunshine in the rather gray atmosphere of routine programs offered by the permanently established French orchestras. One could always count on the Koussevitzky concerts giving us something new and stimulating. The memory of his electric personality and thrilling interpretations is still very vivid.

Curiously enough, Koussevitzky's career began as a double bass player. His skill on this instrument was so exceptional that he made quite a name for himself giving solo recitals. He had a self-endowed orchestra in Russia, also a music publishing company of his own until the revolution of 1917. He stayed on for a short time after that to conduct the Petrograd State Orchestra, but encountered too much bureaucratic friction and finally left Russia, leaving his possessions behind. Koussevitzky is now 64, has a reputation for being a tryannical taskmaster and is acknowledged as this country's foremost regular symphony conductor.

Stars



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 6, 1938 B. Trans.

MUSIC

Rece Phonograph Records

Sibelius Fifth Superbly from the Bostonians; Some Music Associated with the Ballet

By MOSES SMITH

One of the most significant phonographic issues of the year and, by dint of that fact, in the history of the phonograph is the Victor album (Set No. M-474; ten 12-inch sides) devoted to the Fifth Symphony and "Pohjola's Daughter" by Sibelius, as played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky. The superlative performances by the same forces in Symphony Hall a few weeks ago is still fresh in the ears, and so there is nothing new to the records in that regard. What is new is the recording by Victor, surpassing even the previous high peak attained in the set given over to Prokofiev's "Lieutenant Kije." The remarkable series of recordings emanating indirectly from Symphony Hall in recent months, almost every one showing an improvement over the preceding, seems definitely not to be an accident, but very likely the result of a careful study of the specific acoustical medium—in this case, the Symphony Hall stage and auditorium. Both performance and recording promptly outmode the Victor album, satisfactory only a few months ago, in which Robert Kajanus and the London Symphony Orchestra traversed the same pieces in addition to Sibelius' "Tapiola."

PRESS

Greensburg

DEC 9 - 1938

Boston Symphony

TO GIVE TWO CONCERTS AT SYRIA MOSQUE, PITTSBURGH

The high-light of the musical season is the visit of the world-famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, and all roads within a radius of 75 miles of Pittsburgh will lead to Syria Mosque next Saturday evening, December 10th, and Sunday afternoon, December 11th.

The Sunday aternoon concert has special appeal to out-of-town music lovers. The concert starts at 3 o'clock, which makes possible an early return home. A young pianist will be featured as soloist at the Saturday evening concert. His name is Jesus Maria Sanroma, and he will play the Ravel Concerto for Piano and Orchestra. Sanroma has toured with great success in both Europe and America. Other works on the evening program are the Beethoven Symphony No. 2 in D major, and the Brahms Symphony No. 4.

The Sunday afternoon program will also feature two great symphonies. They are the Haydn Symphony in B-flat, and the Tschaiknowsky Symphony No. 4. Three orchestral sketches, entitled "La Mer" by Debussy will also be included in the afternoon program. The orchestra for both concerts is under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, and comes to Pittsburgh under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association, May Beegle, Manager.

98

B. Her. Dec. 17/38

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The ninth regular concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Symphony in B flat No. 102	Haydn
"Dedicaces" for piano and orchestra with soprano obbligato	Dukelsky
Symphony No. 2 in D major Op. 43	Sibelius

Mr. Dukelsky's "Dedications," which was heard for the first time yesterday, is the most impressive novelty that we have so far been offered this season. Provided that a pianist such as Mr. Sanroma can be had to play the difficult piano part—for it is not what is known as grateful music for the soloist—the work should stay in the repertoire for some time to come. It is a brilliant work and does not deserve the fate of so much new music, that of enjoying a solitary performance and a "succes d'estime."

What are we to call and how define "Dedications"? In spite of the importance of the soloist, it cannot be called a concerto. So meager are the musical terms at our disposal

---

STAGE

Broadway Highlights

Plays

Tobacco Road	Dec. 4, '33
Bachelor Born (Suspended Week of Dec. 19)	Jan. 25, 38
Kiss the Boys Goodbye	Sept. 28
Oscar Wilde	Oct. 10
Hamlet (Suspended Week of Dec. 19)	Oct. 12
Abe Lincoln in Illinois	Oct. 15
Knickerbocker Holiday	Oct. 19
Rocket to the Moon	Nov. 24
Here Come the Clowns	Dec. 7
Spring Meeting	Dec. 8

Musicals

Pins and Needles	Nov. 27, '37
I Married an Angel	May 11, '38
Hellzapoppin	Sept. 22
Sing Out the News (Closed until Dec. 26)	Sept. 24
Leave It to Me!	Nov. 9
The Boys from Syracuse	Nov. 23

What Actors Made Sixty Years Ago

Salaries paid to stage celebrities during 1875-1879 contrast sharply with salaries received by movie stars today, says Professor C. D. Odell in Volume X of "Annals of the New York Stage," a publication of the Columbia University Press.

Professor Odell, who occupies the Brander Matthews Chair of Dramatic Literature at Columbia, glanced back to that almost forgotten period of the stage in New York to find that Maurice Barrymore got $80 a week, while John Drew earned $50. About the biggest salary of the period came to Fanny Davenport—$200. It's explained at length in his new volume, fittingly titled, "Hard Times for the Theaters."

Much of the information, which also shows that orchestras in that day were well paid at $288 for a week's work, was taken from the exhaustive records in the Brander Matthews Dramatic Museum, where, too, there are relics of bygone days in the theater which make the Museum almost a mecca for the specially curious.

The season of 1875-76 seems to have been one of the most trying of the period. Houses whose names were almost household words, such as Niblo's, the Lyceum and the Grand Opera, fared poorly. Professor Odell adds: "If all theaters were as easily dismissed as Niblo's in the season now passing before our eyes, there would be no 'Annals of the New York Stage.' That once popular and even elegant establishment was closed throughout the year, and no amount of advertising induced a willing adventurer to undertake its management."

But there was one item of cheer! One play, "Pique," at the Fifth Avenue Theater, ran 238 performances, called by Professor Odell "a remarkable record

---

SYMPHONY IS GREETED WITH CHEERS

Audience Wild Over Playing of Sibelius' Second

B. Post Dec. 17/38

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The most exciting moment of the Symphony season thus far came yesterday with the finale of Sibelius' Second Symphony. Good to hear were the answering cheers, stamping and cries of "Bravo!" It is all too easy to take our orchestra and conductor for granted—and there are not too many Sibelius No. 2's.

PLAYERS AT TOP BENT

Seemingly this Symphony, from first bar to last, could not have been better played than it was yesterday; although if there ever is a better performance it will surely come from Dr. Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony. Some things in this imperfect world are really quite as good as they need to be.

Fresh from a brief Western tour, in which they were rapturously received by audiences that, in the words of one of the players, gave the impression of never having heard an orchestra before, conductor and men were yesterday at top bent, not only in the Symphony of Sibelius but in Haydn's extraordinarilly fine Symphony in B-flat major, No. 102. The third piece on the programme, Dukelsky's "Dedications" for piano and orchestra with soprano obligato, then receiving its first public performance, was apparently presented as convincingly as might be. And this goes for the piano playing of Jesus Maria Sanroma and for Marguerite Porter's singing of her brief and none too grateful portion.

Dukelsky's "Dedications"

Vladimir Dukelsky, alias Vernon Duke, is an enormously clever young man (he was born in 1903), who can write effectively in any of the current styles. Whether Dukelsky of the concert hall or Duke of the lighter musical theatre and the films will predominate remains to be seen; but one or the other must do so eventually. God and Mammon cannot both be served for long.

This "Dedications" promised well and began auspiciously. Taking as his point of departure eight provocative lines by Guillaume Apollinaire, Mr. Dukelsky assigned these to the soprano over a light orchestral accompaniment, though with little attempt at characterization, of underlining the text, and then proceeded to write three movements in the form of a piano concerto, respectively entitled "To the City," "To the Country" and "To the Sea." The closing lines of the soprano solo are repeated at the end, a most happy device.

Summoned to Stage

There is no mention of the sea in M. Apollinaire's verses; there is no audible suggestion of it in Mr. Dukelsky's so-called epilogue. This rather noisy movement might also have been dedicated to the city. However, the movement actually so inscribed is much better sustained. "To the Country" has pleasing moments and also a fleeting suggestions that Hyde-Duke was going to get the better of Jekyll-Dukelsky. The piano part, by the way, is of fearsome difficulty. Mr. Sanroma's masterly handling of it has already been mentioned. Present to hear the premiere of a work completed last spring, Mr. Dukelsky was summoned by Dr. Koussevitzky to the platform. There he acknowledged the plaudits of the audience, shook hands with Mr. Burgin and gallantly kissed the hand of Miss Porter.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

DEC 16 1938

Anja Ignatius, a young and highly praised violinist from Finland, will make her first appearances in this country when she appears with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, in the Concerto of Sibelius, at the pair of concerts on Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon, December 26 and 27, in Symphony hall. Miss Ignatius is said to play the Concerto with a special understanding, having studied its interpretation with the composer. For this, and the four remaining concerts in this series, subscription seats are still to be had at Symphony hall. Events of the remaining concerts will be the appearance at one pair of Georges Enesco as guest conductor, and at another of Igor Stravinsky, conducting music of his own. There will be two piano soloists, Myra Hess and Frank Glazer.

B. Globe Dec 17/38

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

"Miracles" occasionally happen even to a great conductor and orchestra with whom superlative performances are the rule. Such "miracles," if they can be analyzed at all, consist of technical finesse, interpretive distinction and emotional intensity carried to a degree where they convince a listener that he is in the presence of sheer perfection. One of these "miracles" occurred yesterday afternoon when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Second Symphony by the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius.

This performance was the finest of the work this reviewer has ever heard, so clear and beautifully proportioned that the general structure and every fine detail stood revealed like a Grecian temple in the sunlight of midday. But in addition, Dr. Koussevitzky's reading increased in voltage as it progressed until the grandeur of the finale was literally overwhelming.

In itself, the Second Symphony is "repertory music" (though a masterpiece), thrice familiar to conductor, players and audience. How, then, was it so miraculously recreated, since it has been excellently performed many times before?

It is enough to call it an unpredictable achievement resulting from an extraordinary joining of virtuosity, mind and spirit. That the audience realized this was made clear by their applause, stamping and cheering.

The program began with one of Haydn's later — and finest — symphonies, that in B-flat, No. 102, the ninth in the series Haydn wrote for concerts in London. Almost Beethovenish in its boldness, the score looks ahead to the 19th Century. It was superbly played.

Vladimir Dukelsky's "Dedications" was presented for the first time anywhere. A species of piano concerto unconventionally involving soprano solos, "Dedications" is complicated music, inspired by verses of Guillaume Apollinaire. It rhapsodizes about the city, the country and the sea. The verse is sung in full at the beginning, and a portion is repeated for quiet, closing measures.

Jesus Maria Sanroma, the soloist, navigated with his usual dexterity the bristling difficulties of his part. Marguerite Porter made effective the exacting portion for voice. The first and last movements are in the bustling, dissonant manner of the day, with formidable rapid passages for solo double-bass, trombones and other instruments.

The slow movement, perhaps the best of the three, is melodically and harmonically less rigorous. The composer was present and bowed from the stage.—C. W. D.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 6, 1938 B. Trans.

MUSIC

Rece Phonograph Records

Sibelius Fifth Superbly from the Bostonians; Some Music Associated with the Ballet

By MOSES SMITH

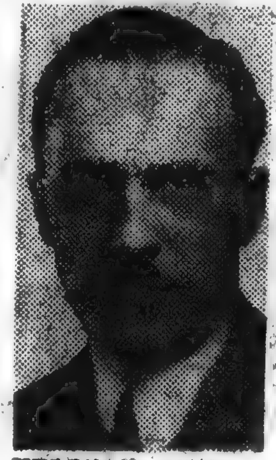
One of the most significant phonographic issues of the year and, by dint of that fact, in the history of the phonograph is the Victor album (Set No. M-474; ten 12-inch sides) devoted to the Fifth Symphony and "Pohjola's Daughter" by Sibelius, as played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky. The superlative performances by the same forces in Symphony Hall a few weeks ago is still fresh in the ears, and so there is nothing new to the records in that regard. What is new is the recording by Victor, surpassing even the previous high peak attained in the set given over to Prokofiev's "Lieutenant Kije." The remarkable series of recordings emanating indirectly from Symphony Hall in recent months, almost every one showing an improvement over the preceding, seems definitely not to be an accident, but very likely the result of a careful study of the specific acoustical medium—in this case, the Symphony Hall stage and auditorium. Both performance and recording promptly outmode the Victor album, satisfactory only a few months ago, in which Robert Kajanus and the London Symphony Orchestra traversed the same pieces in addition to Sibelius' "Tapiola."

CLEVELAND, O.
PLAIN DEALER

DEC 4 - 1938

Boston Orchestra Under Koussevitzky Appears at Music Hall Friday Night

By Herbert Elwell



HERBERT ELWELL

THE Cleveland Concert Course under the direction of Mrs. Emil Brudno and the auspices of the Cleveland Museum of Art presents the Boston Orchestra in a concert at Public Music Hall Friday evening. This famous orchestra under its equally famous conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will be heard in a program that includes Haydn's Symphony in B flat, No. 102, Debussy's Three Symphonic Sketches, "La Mer," and the Sibelius Symphony No. 2.

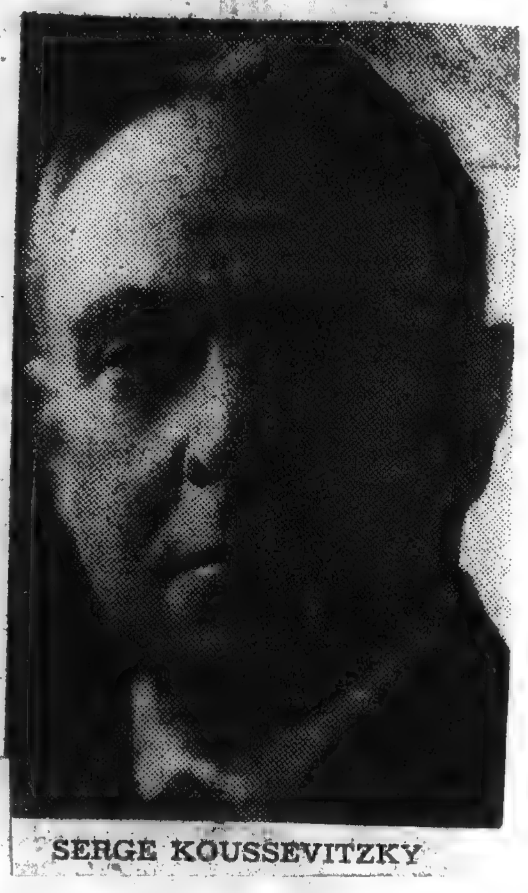
The Boston Orchestra of 106 members is the second oldest symphony orchestra in this country. It is now in its 58th season and its fifteenth consecutive year under Koussevitsky. During this long period it has accumulated a large and varied repertory in many ways more interesting than that of most orchestras.

We think of Bostonians as having conservative taste. Yet their orchestra, under Koussevitsky at least, probably has performed more contemporary music of a venturesome nature than any other major American orchestra. And this has been due largely to Koussevitsky's passionate interest in the works of modern composers. The number of living composers who have dedicated compositions to him and have had first performances of their works under his baton would make a long list.

My own acquaintance with the conducting of Koussevitzky was made, not in this country, but in Paris back in the early '20s, when he was giving orchestral concerts at the Paris Opera. To music students in Paris at that time these concerts were like a ray of sunshine in the rather gray atmosphere of routine programs offered by the permanently established French orchestras. One could always count on the Koussevitzky concerts giving us something new and stimulating. The memory of his electric personality and thrilling interpretations is still very vivid.

Curiously enough, Koussevitzky's career began as a double bass player. His skill on this instrument was so exceptional that he made quite a name for himself giving solo recitals. He had a self-endowed orchestra in Russia, also a music publishing company of his own until the revolution of 1917. He stayed on for a short time after that to conduct the Petrograd State Orchestra, but encountered too much bureaucratic friction and finally left Russia, leaving his possessions behind. Koussevitzky is now 64, has a reputation for being a tryannical taskmaster and is acknowledged as this country's foremost regular symphony conductor.

Stars



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

PRESS

Greensburg

DEC 9 - 1938

Boston Symphony

TO GIVE TWO CONCERTS AT SYRIA MOSQUE, PITTSBURGH

The high-light of the musical season is the visit of the world-famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, and all roads within a radius of 75 miles of Pittsburgh will lead to Syria Mosque next Saturday evening, December 10th, and Sunday afternoon, December 11th.

The Sunday aternoon concert has special appeal to out-of-town music lovers. The concert starts at 3 o'clock, which makes possible an early return home. A young pianist will be featured as soloist at the Saturday evening concert. His name is Jesus Maria Sanroma, and he will play the Ravel Concerto for Piano and Orchestra. Sanroma has toured with great success in both Europe and America. Other works on the evening program are the Beethoven Symphony No. 2 in D major, and the Brahms Symphony No. 4.

The Sunday afternoon program will also feature two great symphonies. They are the Haydn Symphony in B-flat, and the Tschaiknowsky Symphony No. 4. Three orchestral sketches, entitled "La Mer" by Debussy will also be included in the afternoon program. The orchestra for both concerts is under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, and comes to Pittsburgh under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association, May Beegle, Manager.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

B. Her. Dec. 17/38

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The ninth regular concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Symphony in B flat No. 102........Haydn
"Dedicaces" for piano and orchestra with soprano obbligato.........Dukelsky
Symphony No. 2 in D major Op. 43 Sibelius

Mr. Dukelsky's "Dedications," which was heard for the first time yesterday, is the most impressive novelty that we have so far been offered this season. Provided that a pianist such as Mr. Sanroma can be had to play the difficult piano part —for it is not what is known as grateful music for the soloist—the work should stay in the repertoire for some time to come. It is a brilliant work and does not deserve the fate of so much new music, that of enjoying a solitary performance and a "succes d'estime."

What are we to call and how define "Dedications"? In spite of the importance of the soloist, it cannot be called a concerto. So meager are the musical terms at our disposal that we already call pieces "concertos" which are manifestly nothing of the kind. Nor is it what the French call a "symphonie concertante." It is not program music, a tone poem or a suite. Has Mr. Dukelsky invented a new form? Hardly—but he has done what any composer of talent always ends by doing when he cannot fit his ideas into one of the conventional forms. He expands those forms and rigs up something that will present his thoughts in the most effective way.

Accordingly Mr. Dukelsky appears to have begun with the Guillaume Apollinaire poems as inspiration or imaginative spring-board. He then sets one of these poems for soprano voice with rather spare and even freakish orchestral accompaniment, not unlike the manner of Stravinsky in some of his later works. Marguerite Porter was the capable soprano in yesterday's performance.

The voice does not reappear again until the short epilogue where the composition ends in the mood of the beginning. This alone would dispose of the concerto notion, for who ever heard of a concerto, from Mozart on, where the soloist does not wind up in a blaze of glory? The second movement, "To the City," is a sort of brilliant toccata, an instrumental show piece. With its syncopation, its restlessness and the relentless fury of its drive, it most nearly approaches program music. We do get an impression of a city in these pages, whereas in the movements devoted to the country and the sea we are not necessarily carried away by pastoral or oceanic emotions.

The third movement, as the composer admits, is the most diatonic

---

Film Library To Assemble World Product

Group Will Preserve Significant Pictures As Record of Times

John Hay Whitney, president of the Museum of Modern Art Film Library, announced this week the formation of the International Federation of Film Archives which will be open to recognized private, semi-official, and national film libraries. The following are the charter members: The Cinematheque Francaise, Paris; The Reichsfilmarchiv, Berlin; The National Film Library, London; The Museum of Modern Art Film Library, New York.

The purpose of this Federation is to develop closer co-operation between the film archives of the member-countries in order that the greatest possible use may be made of the historical, educational and artistic films of all countries for non-commercial purposes. The need for such an organization to lessen duplication of effort and greatly increase the results obtained individually had for some eason now passing before our yes, there would be no 'Annals f the New York Stage.' That nce popular and even elegant stablishment was closed hroughout the year, and no mount of advertising induced a villing adventurer to undertake ts management."

---

But there was one item of heer! One play, "Pique," at the ifth Avenue Theater, ran 238 erformances, called by Profesor Odell "a remarkable record

---

SYMPHONY IS GREETED WITH CHEERS

Audience Wild Over Playing of Sibelius' Second

B. Post Dec. 17/38

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The most exciting moment of the Symphony season thus far came yesterday with the finale of Sibelius' Second Symphony. Good to hear were the answering cheers, stamping and cries of "Bravo!" It is all too easy to take our orchestra and conductor for granted—and there are not too many Sibelius No. 2's.

PLAYERS AT TOP BENT

Seemingly this Symphony, from first bar to last, could not have been better played than it was yesterday; although if there ever is a better performance it will surely come from Dr. Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony. Some things in this imperfect world are really quite as good as they need to be.

Fresh from a brief Western tour, in which they were rapturously received by audiences that, in the words of one of the players, gave the impression of never having heard an orchestra before, conductor and men were yesterday at top bent, not only in the Symphony of Sibelius but in Haydn's extraordinarilly fine Symphony in B-flat major, No. 102. The third piece on the programme, Dukelsky's "Dedications" for piano and orchestra with soprano obligato, then receiving its first public performance, was apparently presented as convincingly as might be. And this goes for the piano playing of Jesus Maria Sanroma and for Marguerite Porter's singing of her brief and none too grateful portion.

Dukelsky's "Dedications"

Vladimir Dukelsky, alias Vernon Duke, is an enormously clever young man (he was born in 1903), who can write effectively in any of the current styles. Whether Dukelsky of the concert hall or Duke of the lighter musical theatre and the films will predominate remains to be seen; but one or the other must do so eventually. God and Mammon cannot both be served for long.

This "Dedications" promised well and began auspiciously. Taking as his point of departure eight provocative lines by Guillaume Apollinaire, Mr. Dukelsky assigned these to the soprano over a light orchestral accompaniment, though with little attempt at characterization, of underlining the text, and then proceeded to write three movements in the form of a piano concerto, respectively entitled "To the City," "To the Country" and "To the Sea." The closing lines of the soprano solo are repeated at the end, a most happy device.

Summoned to Stage

There is no mention of the sea in M. Apollinaire's verses; there is no audible suggestion of it in Mr. Dukelsky's so-called epilogue. This rather noisy movement might also have been dedicated to the city. However, the movement actually so inscribed is much better sustained. "To the Country" has pleasing moments and also a fleeting suggestions that Hyde-Duke was going to get the better of Jekyll-Dukelsky. The piano part, by the way, is of fearsome difficulty. Mr. Sanroma's masterly handling of it has already been mentioned. Present to hear the premiere of a work completed last spring, Mr. Dukelsky was summoned by Dr. Koussevitzky to the platform. There he acknowledged the plaudits of the audience, shook hands with Mr. Burgin and gallantly kissed the hand of Miss Porter.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

DEC 16 1938

Anja Ignatius, a young and highly praised violinist from Finland, will make her first appearances in this country when she appears with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, in the Concerto of Sibelius, at the pair of concerts on Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon, December 26 and 27, in Symphony hall. Miss Ignatius is said to play the Concerto with a special understanding, having studied its interpretation with the composer. For this, and the four remaining concerts in this series, subscription seats are still to be had at Symphony hall. Events of the remaining concerts will be the appearance at one pair of Georges Enesco as guest conductor, and at another of Igor Stravinsky, conducting music of his own. There will be two piano soloists, Myra Hess and Frank Glazer.

Globe Dec. 17/38

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

"Miracles" occasionally happen even to a great conductor and orchestra with whom superlative performances are the rule. Such "miracles," if they can be analyzed at all, consist of technical finesse, interpretive distinction and emotional intensity carried to a degree where they convince a listener that he is in the presence of sheer perfection. One of these "miracles" occurred yesterday afternoon when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Second Symphony by the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius.

This performance was the finest of the work this reviewer has ever heard, so clear and beautifully proportioned that the general structure and every fine detail stood revealed like a Grecian temple in the sunlight of midday. But in addition, Dr. Koussevitzky's reading increased in voltage as it progressed until the grandeur of the finale was literally overwhelming.

In itself, the Second Symphony is "repertory music" (though a masterpiece), thrice familiar to conductor, players and audience. How, then, was it so miraculously recreated, since it has been excellently performed many times before?

It is enough to call it an unpredictable achievement resulting from an extraordinary joining of virtuosity, mind and spirit. That the audience realized this was made clear by their applause, stamping and cheering.

The program began with one of Haydn's later — and finest — symphonies, that in B-flat, No. 102, the ninth in the series Haydn wrote for concerts in London. Almost Beethovenish in its boldness, the score looks ahead to the 19th Century. It was superbly played.

Vladimir Dukelsky's "Dedications" was presented for the first time anywhere. A species of piano concerto unconventionally involving soprano solos, "Dedications" is complicated music, inspired by verses of Guillaume Apollinaire. It rhapsodizes about the city, the country and the sea. The verse is sung in full at the beginning, and a portion is repeated for quiet, closing measures.

Jesus Maria Sanroma, the soloist, navigated with his usual dexterity the bristling difficulties of his part. Marguerite Porter made effective the exacting portion for voice. The first and last movements are in the bustling, dissonant manner of the day, with formidable rapid passages for solo double-bass, trombones and other instruments.

The slow movement, perhaps the best of the three, is melodically and harmonically less rigorous. The composer was present and bowed from the stage.—C. W. D.

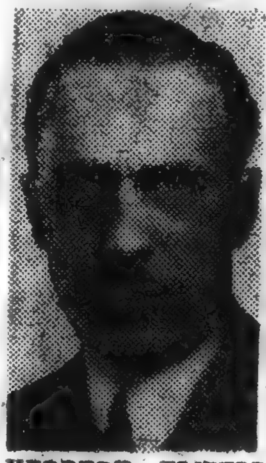
CLEVELAND, O.
PLAIN DEALER

DEC 4 - 1938

Boston Orchestra Under Koussevitzky Appears at Music Hall Friday Night

By Herbert Elwell

THE Cleveland Concert Course under the direction of Mrs. Emil Brudno and the auspices of the Cleveland Museum of Art presents the Boston Orchestra in a concert at Public Music Hall Friday evening. This famous orchestra under its equally famous conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will be heard in a program that includes Haydn's Symphony in B flat, No. 102, Debussy's Three Symphonic Sketches, "La Mer," and the Sibelius Symphony No. 2.



HERBERT ELWELL

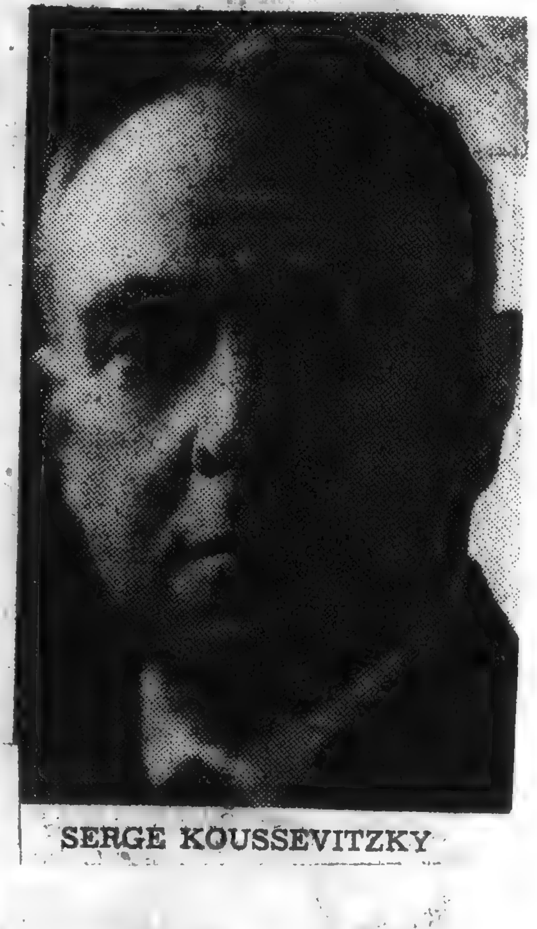
The Boston Orchestra of 106 members is the second oldest symphony orchestra in this country. It is now in its 58th season and its fifteenth consecutive year under Koussevitsky. During this long period it has accumulated a large and varied repertory in many ways more interesting than that of most orchestras.

We think of Bostonians as having conservative taste. Yet their orchestra, under Koussevitsky at least, probably has performed more contemporary music of a venturesome nature than any other major American orchestra. And this has been due largely to Koussevitsky's passionate interest in the works of modern composers. The number of living composers who have dedicated compositions to him and have had first performances of their works under his baton would make a long list.

My own acquaintance with the conducting of Koussevitzky was made, not in this country, but in Paris back in the early '20s, when he was giving orchestral concerts at the Paris Opera. To music students in Paris at that time these concerts were like a ray of sunshine in the rather gray atmosphere of routine programs offered by the permanently established French orchestras. One could always count on the Koussevitzky concerts giving us something new and stimulating. The memory of his electric personality and thrilling interpretations is still very vivid.

Curiously enough, Koussevitzky's career began as a double bass player. His skill on this instrument was so exceptional that he made quite a name for himself giving solo recitals. He had a self-endowed orchestra in Russia, also a music publishing company of his own until the revolution of 1917. He stayed on for a short time after that to conduct the Petrograd State Orchestra, but encountered too much bureaucratic friction and finally left Russia, leaving his possessions behind. Koussevitzky is now 64, has a reputation for being a tryannical taskmaster and is acknowledged as this country's foremost regular symphony conductor.

Stars



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 6, 1938 B. Trans.

MUSIC

Rece Phonograph Records

Sibelius Fifth Superbly from the Bostonians; Some Music Associated with the Ballet

By MOSES SMITH

One of the most significant phonographic issues of the year and, by dint of that fact, in the history of the phonograph is the Victor album (Set No. M-474; ten 12-inch sides) devoted to the Fifth Symphony and "Pohjola's Daughter" by Sibelius, as played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky. The superlative performances by the same forces in Symphony Hall a few weeks ago is still fresh in the ears, and so there is nothing new to the records in that regard. What is new is the recording by Victor, surpassing even the previous high peak attained in the set given over to Prokofiev's "Lieutenant Kije." The remarkable series of recordings emanating indirectly from Symphony Hall in recent months, almost every one showing an improvement over the preceding, seems definitely not to be an accident, but very likely the result of a careful study of the specific acoustical medium—in this case, the Symphony Hall stage and auditorium. ~~Both performance and~~ recording promptly outmode the Victor album, satisfactory only a few months ago, in which Robert Kajanus and the London Symphony Orchestra traversed the same pieces in addition to Sibelius' "Tapiola."

PRESS
Greensburg

DEC 9 - 1938

Boston Symphony

TO GIVE TWO CONCERTS AT SYRIA MOSQUE, PITTSBURGH

The high-light of the musical season is the visit of the world-famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, and all roads within a radius of 75 miles of Pittsburgh will lead to Syria Mosque next Saturdav evening, December 10th, and Sunday afternoon, December 11th.

The Sunday aternoon concert has special appeal to out-of-town music lovers. The concert starts at 3 o'clock, which makes possible an early return home. A young pianist will be featured as soloist at the Saturday evening concert. His name is Jesus Maria Sanroma, and he will play the Ravel Concerto for Piano and Orchestra. Sanroma has toured with great success in both Europe and America. Other works on the evening program are the Beethoven Svmphony No. 2 in D major, and the Brahms Symphony No. 4.

The Sunday afternoon program will also feature two great symphonies. They are the Haydn Symphony in B-flat, and the Tschaiknowsky Symphony No. 4. Three orchestral sketches, entitled "La Mer" by Debussy will also be included in the afternoon program. The orchestra for both concerts is under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, and comes to Pittsburagh under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association, May Beegle, Manager.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

98

B. Her. Dec. 17/38

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The ninth regular concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternooon in Symphony Hall. Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Symphony in B flat No. 102........Haydn
"Dedicaces" for piano and orchestra with soprano obbligato.........Dukelsky
Symphony No. 2 in D major Op. 43 Sibelius

Mr. Dukelsky's "Dedications," which was heard for the first time yesterday, is the most impressive novelty that we have so far been offered this season. Provided that a pianist such as Mr. Sanroma can be had to play the difficult piano part—for it is not what is known as grateful music for the soloist—the work should stay in the repertoire for some time to come. It is a brilliant work and does not deserve the fate of so much new music, that of enjoying a solitary performance and a "succes d'estime."

What are we to call and how define "Dedications"? In spite of the importance of the soloist, it cannot be called a concerto. So meager are tedious, he never goes on talking after he has ceased to have anything to say. If one heard this work in the distant future, doubtless one could place it historically as to its style. At the moment it sounds both original and interesting. It is, perhaps, an exhilarating rather than a profound work. The performance, barring one slip, if we are not mistaken, seemed particularly efficient. Mr. Sanroma was the able soloist in a very difficult role, which reached a climax in a really ferocious cadenza. The composer was in the audience to receive the applause.

We have not left much space for Haydn and Sibelius, nor is much needed. The former is a masterpiece of Haydn's later symphonic style, full of the freshest invention and richness of thought. It is advisable, as Dr. Koussevitzky did, to employ all the modern orchestra's strings, for these late Haydn symphonies have no more reason to be mollycoddled than Beethoven. The Sibelius 2nd Symphony drew forth tumultuous applause. The performance on the whole was splendid, though there was one faulty entrance in the finale. The symphony has, however, been too frequently played of late. It is time it had a rest, at least in Boston, along with the Franck D minor and the Tchaikovsky 5th. It is not so perfect that it can stand unlimited hearings.

Common interests expressed at this first meeting led to a second, which took place upon the occasion of the Gala Soiree of American films selected by the Cinematheque Francaise from its own archives and given to a distinguished audience in honor of the Museum of Modern Art Film Library. A practical basis for mutual co-operation was reached, not without difficulties arising through differences of national outlook and even more, of varying legal and other circumstances obtaining in the four countries. It was in very large measure due to the efforts of M. Henri Langlois of the Cinematheque Francaise that the project was begun and to those of M. Yves Chataigneau, Permanent General Secretary of the Office of Prime Minister, and Mlle. Suzanne Borel, Bureau of Cultural Relations of the Foreign Office, that minor difficulties were ironed out and the scheme brought to completion.

The central offices of the Federation will be located in the Palais Royal in Paris in quarters made available by the French Government. It will act as a clearing house between the members and will also serve as a source of information for any similar organizations not yet members of the Federation.

Membership in the International Federation of Film Archives will be open to national semi-official and recognized private film archives, provided these organizations have for their prime object the conservation of films, the compilation of national and private film records and, if desired, the projection of films for a non-commercial purpose, either historic

---

SYMPHONY IS GREETED WITH CHEERS

Audience Wild Over Playing of Sibelius' Second

B. Post Dec. 17/38

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The most exciting moment of the Symphony season thus far came yesterday with the finale of Sibelius' Second Symphony. Good to hear were the answering cheers, stamping and cries of "Bravo!" It is all too easy to take our orchestra and conductor for granted—and there are not too many Sibelius No. 2's.

PLAYERS AT TOP BENT

Seemingly this Symphony, from first bar to last, could not have been better played than it was yesterday; although if there ever is a better performance it will surely come from Dr. Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony. Some things in this imperfect world are really quite as good as they need to be.

Fresh from a brief Western tour, in which they were rapturously received by audiences that, in the words of one of the players, gave the impression of never having heard an orchestra before, conductor and men were yesterday at top bent, not only in the Symphony of Sibelius but in Haydn's extraordinarilly fine Symphony in B-flat major, No. 102. The third piece on the programme, Dukelsky's "Dedications" for piano and orchestra with soprano obligato, then receiving its first public performance, was apparently presented as convincingly as might be. And this goes for the piano playing of Jesus Maria Sanroma and for Marguerite Porter's singing of her brief and none too grateful portion.

Dukelsky's "Dedications"

Vladimir Dukelsky, alias Vernon Duke, is an enormously clever young man (he was born in 1903), who can write effectively in any of the current styles. Whether Dukelsky of the concert hall or Duke of the lighter musical theatre and the films will predominate remains to be seen; but one or the other must do so eventually. God and Mammon cannot both be served for long.

This "Dedications" promised well and began auspiciously. Taking as his point of departure eight provocative lines by Guillaume Apollinaire, Mr. Dukelsky assigned these to the soprano over a light orchestral accompaniment, though with little attempt at characterization, of underlining the text, and then proceeded to write three movements in the form of a piano concerto, respectively entitled "To the City," "To the Country" and "To the Sea." The closing lines of the soprano solo are repeated at the end, a most happy device.

Summoned to Stage

There is no mention of the sea in M. Apollinaire's verses; there is no audible suggestion of it in Mr. Dukelsky's so-called epilogue. This rather noisy movement might also have been dedicated to the city. However, the movement actually so inscribed is much better sustained. "To the Country" has pleasing moments and also a fleeting suggestions that Hyde-Duke was going to get the better of Jekyll-Dukelsky. The piano part, by the way, is of fearsome difficulty. Mr. Sanroma's masterly handling of it has already been mentioned. Present to hear the premiere of a work completed last spring, Mr. Dukelsky was summoned by Dr. Koussevitzky to the platform. There he acknowledged the plaudits of the audience, shook hands with Mr. Burgin and gallantly kissed the hand of Miss Porter.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

DEC 16 1938

Anja Ignatius, a young and highly praised violinist from Finland, will make her first appearances in this country when she appears with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, in the Concerto of Sibelius, at the pair of concerts on Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon, December 26 and 27, in Symphony hall. Miss Ignatius is said to play the Concerto with a special understanding, having studied its interpretation with the composer. For this, and the four remaining concerts in this series, subscription seats are still to be had at Symphony hall. Events of the remaining concerts will be the appearance at one pair of Georges Enesco as guest conductor, and at another of Igor Stravinsky, conducting music of his own. There will be two piano soloists, Myra Hess and Frank Glazer.

B. Globe Dec. 17/38

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

"Miracles" occasionally happen even to a great conductor and orchestra with whom superlative performances are the rule. Such "miracles," if they can be analyzed at all, consist of technical finesse, interpretive distinction and emotional intensity carried to a degree where they convince a listener that he is in the presence of sheer perfection. One of these "miracles" occurred yesterday afternoon when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Second Symphony by the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius.

This performance was the finest of the work this reviewer has ever heard, so clear and beautifully proportioned that the general structure and every fine detail stood revealed like a Grecian temple in the sunlight of midday. But in addition, Dr. Koussevitzky's reading increased in voltage as it progressed until the grandeur of the finale was literally overwhelming.

In itself, the Second Symphony is "repertory music" (though a masterpiece), thrice familiar to conductor, players and audience. How, then, was it so miraculously recreated, since it has been excellently performed many times before?

It is enough to call it an unpredictable achievement resulting from an extraordinary joining of virtuosity, mind and spirit. That the audience realized this was made clear by their applause, stamping and cheering.

The program began with one of Haydn's later—and finest—symphonies, that in B-flat, No. 102, the ninth in the series Haydn wrote for concerts in London. Almost Beethovenish in its boldness, the score looks ahead to the 19th Century. It was superbly played.

Vladimir Dukelsky's "Dedications" was presented for the first time anywhere. A species of piano concerto unconventionally involving soprano solos, "Dedications" is complicated music, inspired by verses of Guillaume Apollinaire. It rhapsodizes about the city, the country and the sea. The verse is sung in full at the beginning, and a portion is repeated for quiet, closing measures.

Jesus Maria Sanroma, the soloist, navigated with his usual dexterity the bristling difficulties of his part. Marguerite Porter made effective the exacting portion for voice. The first and last movements are in the bustling, dissonant manner of the day, with formidable rapid passages for solo double-bass, trombones and other instruments.

The slow movement, perhaps the best of the three, is melodically and harmonically less rigorous. The composer was present and bowed from the stage.—C. W. D.

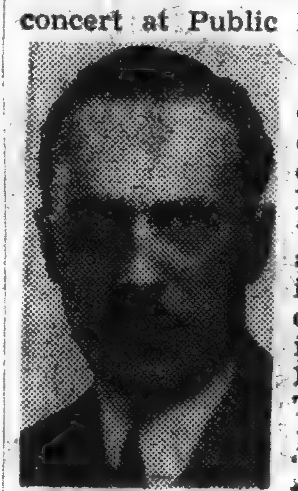
CLEVELAND, O.
PLAIN DEALER

DEC 4 - 1938

Boston Orchestra Under Koussevitzky Appears at Music Hall Friday Night

By Herbert Elwell

THE Cleveland Concert Course under the direction of Mrs. Emil Brudno and the auspices of the Cleveland Museum of Art presents the Boston Orchestra in a concert at Public Music Hall Friday evening. This famous orchestra under its equally famous conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will be heard in a program that includes Haydn's Symphony in B flat, No. 102, Debussy's Three Symphonic Sketches, "La Mer," and the Sibelius Symphony No. 2.



HERBERT ELWELL

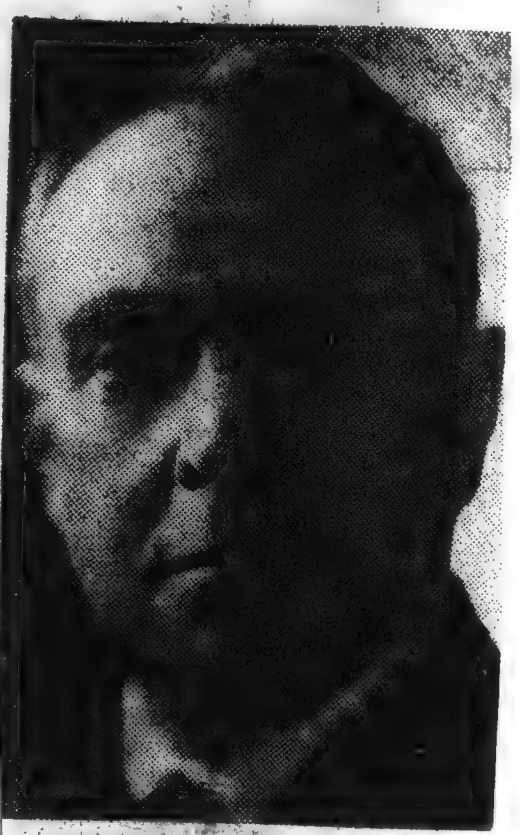
The Boston Orchestra of 106 members is the second oldest symphony orchestra in this country. It is now in its 58th season and its fifteenth consecutive year under Koussevitsky. During this long period it has accumulated a large and varied repertory in many ways more interesting than that of most orchestras.

We think of Bostonians as having conservative taste. Yet their orchestra, under Koussevitsky at least, probably has performed more contemporary music of a venturesome nature than any other major American orchestra. And this has been due largely to Koussevitsky's passionate interest in the works of modern composers. The number of living composers who have dedicated compositions to him and have had first performances of their works under his baton would make a long list.

My own acquaintance with the conducting of Koussevitzky was made, not in this country, but in Paris back in the early '20s, when he was giving orchestral concerts at the Paris Opera. To music students in Paris at that time these concerts were like a ray of sunshine in the rather gray atmosphere of routine programs offered by the permanently established French orchestras. One could always count on the Koussevitzky concerts giving us something new and stimulating. The memory of his electric personality and thrilling interpretations is still very vivid.

Curiously enough, Koussevitzky's career began as a double bass player. His skill on this instrument was so exceptional that he made quite a name for himself giving solo recitals. He had a self-endowed orchestra in Russia, also a music publishing company of his own until the revolution of 1917. He stayed on for a short time after that to conduct the Petrograd State Orchestra, but encountered too much bureaucratic friction and finally left Russia, leaving his possessions behind. Koussevitzky is now 64, has a reputation for being a tryannical taskmaster and is acknowledged as this country's foremost regular symphony conductor.

Stars



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

PRESS
Greensburg

DEC 9 - 1938

Boston Symphony

TO GIVE TWO CONCERTS AT SYRIA MOSQUE, PITTSBURGH

The high-light of the musical season is the visit of the world-famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, and all roads within a radius of 75 miles of Pittsburgh will lead to Syria Mosque next Saturdav evening, December 10th, and Sunday afternoon, December 11th.

The Sunday aternoon concert has special appeal to out-of-town music lovers. The concert starts at 3 o'clock, which makes possible an early return home. A young pianist will be featured as soloist at the Saturday evening concert. His name is Jesus Maria Sanroma, and he will play the Ravel Concerto for Piano and Orchestra. Sanroma has toured with great success in both Europe and America. Other works on the evening program are the Beethoven Symphony No. 2 in D major, and the Brahms Symphony No. 4.

The Sunday afternoon program will also feature two great symphonies. They are the Haydn Symphony in B-flat, and the Tschaiknowsky Symphony No. 4. Three orchestral sketches, entitled "La Mer" by Debussy will also be included in the afternoon program. The orchestra for both concerts is under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, and comes to Pittsburagh under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association, May Beegle, Manager.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 6, 1938 B. Trans.

MUSIC

Rece Phonograph Records

Sibelius Fifth Superbly from the Bostonians; Some Music Associated with the Ballet

By MOSES SMITH

One of the most significant phonographic issues of the year and, by dint of that fact, in the history of the phonograph is the Victor album (Set No. M-474; ten 12-inch sides) devoted to the Fifth Symphony and "Pohjola's Daughter" by Sibelius, as played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky. The superlative performances by the same forces in Symphony Hall a few weeks ago is still fresh in the ears, and so there is nothing new to the records in that regard. What is new is the recording by Victor, surpassing even the previous high peak attained in the set given over to Prokofiev's "Lieutenant Kije." The remarkable series of recordings emanating indirectly from Symphony Hall in recent months, almost every one showing an improvement over the preceding, seems definitely not to be an accident, but very likely the result of a careful study of the specific acoustical medium—in this case, the Symphony Hall stage and auditorium. Both performance and recording promptly outmode the Victor album, satisfactory only a few months ago, in which Robert Kajanus and the London Symphony Orchestra traversed the same pieces in addition to Sibelius' "Tapiola."

99

TOLEDO, O.
BLADE

DEC 9 - 1938

Many Family Groups Are Noted At Concert Of Boston Symphony Orchestra

Younger Set Wears Color

Fashionable Gowns Are Noticed

BY HELEN FOOTE GRAHAM

MANY family groups were in the fashionably dressed audience at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert last evening in the Museum of Art Peristyle. And particularly among the young daughters of Toledo's first families were there many colorful gowns to give contrast to the ever popular black and white.

Elizabeth Knight, who was with her parents, Mr. and Mrs. W. W. Knight, and the George Pope MacNichols, wore bright red velvet, the bodice of her gown fashioned with short fitted sleeves and square neckline. Mrs. Knight's gown was of rose satin with soft blue satin sash, and Mrs. MacNichol wore light blue taffeta.

Betty Blair's dress of magenta red taffeta with draped bodice, marked by a jeweled clip, was particularly becoming. She was with her aunt, Mrs. James C. Blair, her sisters, Misses Josephine and Virginia Blair, and her brother, William.

Marcia Dodd, with her mother, Mrs. Martin S. Dodd was in turquoise blue moire, and Cynthia Morgan, who was with her mother, Mrs. H. J. Morgan, and her sister, Mrs. McKinley Greaves-Walker, wore plum colored velvet.

Mrs. Edwin J. Marshall, Jr., who was with her husband and his parents, the E. J. Marshalls, wore a black gown under her long fitted coat of off-white wool with gold braid applique at the shoulders. A colorful flowered gown combining taffeta and tulle in fuchsia shades was worn by the senior Mrs. Marshall.

Dorothy Rowland's gown was entirely covered by her black tailored reefer which was without trimming. She was with her mother, Mrs. C. E. Chenevert. Alice Williams was in turquoise lace and Nettie Belle Thomas in pink satin.

Mrs. Albert F. Miller and her guests, Mrs. Arthur C. Johnson, Jr., and Mrs. Ernest Smith of Columbus were all in black. Mrs. Johnson's velvet dress was outlined at the neckline and short sleeves with white lace, and large red flowers marked the neckline of Mrs. Miller's dress, also of velvet. Mrs. Alfred Hirth's gown was of raspberry red crepe.

Mrs. Geoffrey Bennett's gown was of gray satin, Mrs. Isaac Kinsey wore black, Mrs. Rollin A. Wilbur's black velvet gown was trimmed with white lace at the neckline, and Mrs. Walter Christen was in light blue velvet. Mrs. Charles Harther's gown was of black net and sequins and Mrs. Sidney Spitzer wore a dark red crepe dress with a short fur wrap.

CYNTHIA MORGAN   MRS. M'KINLEY GREAVES-WALKER

MRS. ALBERT F. MILLER   MRS. ERNEST SMITH   MRS. ALFRED C. HIRTH   MRS. ARTHUR C. JOHNSON, JR.

Miss Morgan and her sister, Mrs. Greaves-Walker, were among the Art Museum Concert patrons who heard the Boston Symphony orchestra at the complimentary concert last evening in the peristyle.

Mrs. Smith and her daughter, Mrs. Johnson of Columbus, were among the out-of-town guests at the concert. They were house guest of Mrs. Miller. Mrs. Hirth also was a member of their party.

TIMES UNION
ROCHESTER, N. Y.

DEC 9 - 1938

It's This Way . . .

Abe Lincoln, Johnson and the Rochester Counterfeiter

By HOWARD C. HOSMER

A LOT of people have been wondering what became of the first violinist in the Boston Symphony Orchestra who broke out in a fit of coughing during one of its numbers at the Eastman, thereby dragging daggers from the eyes of Serge Koussevitsky.

The baldheaded violinist was plainly embarrassed. He tried swallowing lozenges. He looked for a handkerchief and finally had to take the one padding his chin. This he used and put in his trouser pocket. When he came to take up his fiddle again, he had to get out the same handkerchief. When the orchestra came on for its next number, he had been deposed from his chair up front.

CAMDEN, N. J.
COURIER

DEC 9 - 1938

Sibelius 'Fifth' Given Beautiful Recording

Victor Captures Tonal Magnificence of Symphony, Tone Poem

The recorders have done right well by Sibelius in making available the encompassing eloquence of the last great symphonist on the horizon of music—but never before, it seems, have they done quite so well as has RCA Victor in capturing the tonal magnificence of the Finn's great Fifth Symphony. Enclosed within Albun M-474 is a recording by Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra that is breathtaking in beauty and fidelity. A recording of the Fifth has been available before—but here the Fifth itself is available on records.

The choice of Koussevitzky to do the recording is more than a happy one; it is the logical one of letting the best man do it. Old Sibelius himself has the erratic habit of telling most every conductor whom he hears perform one of his works that he, the current conductor, is the supreme interpreter thereof. The less talented but more critical listener can forgive the composer for being deafened by his own genius, and be thankful that this work is conducted by the man who, at the death of Kajanus, succeeded by universal acclaim to the place held by the Finnish conductor in the hearts of Sibelius lovers.

Included in the album is Sibelius' earlier tone poem, "Pohjola's Daughter." It is a worthy addition, and the Sibelius enthusiast who lets the greatness of the symphonies blind him to the worth of such works as this, lesser though it be, is foolish indeed.

ASHLAND, O.
TIMES GAZETTE

DEC 10 [illegible]

Among those who attended the concert presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall in Cleveland last night were Mrs. Charles Harrison, Mrs. Grant Long and Mrs. William McCorkle.

100

Brilliant Audience Attends Concert in Museum Peristyle

Toledo Times Dec. 9/38

By IDA TAYLOR

ONE of the most brilliant audiences of the season was assembled last evening in the Toledo Museum of Art peristyle for the annual members' concert which was given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

There were many out-of-town guests in the audience and numerous dinner and supper parties were given preceding and after the affair.

Mink and ermine coats were much in evidence with the popular black velvet evening wraps, with their fur collars and capes, leading in popularity.

Gleaming white satin fashioned with a short jacket banded in baum marten formed Miss Sally Libbey's beautiful costume. Her emerald necklace and bracelet accented her regal beauty.

Mrs. James Bentley looked stunning in a white satin gown, with which she wore a diamond necklace and a long white ermine coat.

Black bugles decorated the bodice of Mrs. William E. Levis' sophisticated frock of black satin, with which she wore a mink coat.

Mrs. Cornelia Colton Hollister was most effectively gowned in a handsome frock of black thread lace made over a peau de soie demi-hoop skirt. A corsage of large black velvet flowers marked one shoulder and pearl ornaments and a pearl comb in her hair completed her smart costume. Over her gown, Mrs. Hollister wore a long sealskin cape.

Mrs. John H. Wright's chic black gown of crepe was topped with black lace, the short puffed sleeves being formed of the same filmy material. Over her gown she wore a short boxy coat of mink.

Mrs. Charles S. Ashley looked very lovely in becoming black velvet.

Mrs. Carl B. Spitzer was in a black and gold gown over which she wore a knee length ermine coat, distinguished by a most unusual shoulder treatment. Delicate tracery of gold on rose-colored taffeta fashioned the gown worn by Mrs. Aaron C. Chesbrough.

Mrs. Thomas P. Goodbody's sapphire blue lace gown was most flattering, and Mrs. George S. Mills' gown of blue lame was marked by its loveliness for a concert or opera.

Mrs. W. W. Knight's gown of raisin colored crepe and Miss Betty Knight's red velvet frock made a lovely bit of color in the sea of black gowns and wraps.

Mrs. Leonard Phillipps had a modish white quilted box coat and muff and Mrs. Oscar Foster and her sister, Miss Julie France, also had white coats.

Mink banded the smart jacket of Mrs. Henry Dodge's white costume, and Miss Mary Grace Davis also was in a stunning white outfit.

Mrs. John D. Biggers whose gown was covered by a long white ermine coat, was accompanied by her daughter-in-law, Mrs. Reeve K. Biggers, whose black gown having a turquoise taffeta jacket was worn with a magenta bandeau of velvet, ending in two large rosettes in front.

Mrs. Walter Eversman's smart black velvet gown had short puff sleeves of ermine, and Mrs. Earl Newcomer's gown, black as slate had draped bands of white faille, forming the becoming V neckline.

Mrs. Zolton Sepecshy of the Cranbrook Academy of Fine Arts, had a chalk white gown which emphasized her blond beauty.

SACRAMENTO, CALIF.
BEE

DEC 10 1938

Among The New Records

SIBELIUS SYMPHONY NO. 5 in E Flat Major, Opus 82, and POHJOLA'S DAUGHTER, Opus 49; performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under ~~the direction~~ of Serge Koussevitzky; Victor Musical Masterpiece Series, M-474.

Sacramento music lovers whose interest was aroused or reawakened in this great contemporary Finnish composer by last Wednesday's concert in which the First Symphony had the place of honor will be especially eager to hear this superb recording of the Fifth.

Some commentators have written that the first symphony shows Sibelius under the influence of his predecessors, notably Tchaikowsky, and that in the Fifth he is more completely himself, which probably contains an element of truth. Whether this makes the latter a superior work is a question that can and will be argued either way. To this listener it seems a matter of minor importance since both are tremendous works, to be ranked as perhaps the greatest musical creations produced in the Twentieth Century.

The Fifth is extremely concise; there is no redundancy, no bleak, colorless area, no vague wandering. Every note, every phrase has a reason for being, and as a result it is a comparatively short symphony, covering only seven sides.

The reader who has not yet made Sibelius' acquaintance should, perhaps be warned. It is not "pretty music". It has at times the intolerable brilliance of a snow covered world glistening in the midday sun; it has the terrible grandeur of a glacier crumbling into icebergs; it has the solid strength of granite cliffs and irresistible force of a storm tossed sea. And then at times it has the warmth and tender beauty of a quiet, sheltered valley where nature is kind and man can "loaf and invite his soul."

It also has a perfection of structure and mastery of orchestration that will delight the trained musician and musical scholar.

Koussevitzky's interpretation and the Boston Orchestra's performance are superb in every respect. It is an album which can be fully enjoyed, however, only on a machine that can handle considerable volume and range without undue distortion, and it must be given generous volume and space. When muffled it loses much of its effectiveness.

Pohjola's Daughter, which covers the last three sides of the five discs in the album, is a delightful, exciting and intriguing work, more descriptive and fanciful than the symphony and offering interesting contrasts.

CLEVELAND, O.
PRESS

DEC 10 1938

Formal Attire at Boston Symphony

Tumultuous applause rose again and again as last night's Music Hall audience acclaimed Serge Koussevitzky and the 110 men in his famed Boston Symphony Orchestra. Sibelius' dynamic Second Symphony concluded the program presented by the masterful conductor, who was recalled time after time by his appreciative listeners.

Among them were many of Cleveland's own musicians, including Rudolph Ringwald, Arthur Quimby and Arthur Shepherd. Also seen in the formally attired audience were Mrs. Prentiss Hughes, wearing wine velvet; Mr. and Mrs. William Gates, the latter in a full-skirted white crepe, and Mrs. George Stevens of Elyria in a gown of black crepe.

A smart black satin was worn by Miss Phyllis Peckham, and Miss Phyllis Barrett wore a bouffant black taffeta. The latter was with her mother, Mrs. Darwin S. Barrett Jr., gowned in royal blue. Also in attendance were Mrs. Felix Eyle, Mrs. Henry John in a white formal studded with gold, and Mr. and Mrs. Jason Crane.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN - TELEGRAPH

DEC 10 1938

Symphony Here Tonight

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, 110 strong, with Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, arrived in the city today, and will complete a week's tour in Pittsburgh with a concert tonight and tomorrow afternoon at Syria Mosque. The orchestra has played to capacity audiences in every one of the cities visited, including Buffalo, Rochester, Ann Arbor, Toledo and Cleveland. Pittsburgh promises to be no exception.

The program tonight will feature two symphonies, the Beethoven No. 2 and Brahms No. 4, as well as Ravel's Concerto for piano and orchestra, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist. Tomorrow afternoon's program at 3 o'clock will include Haydn Symphony in B-flat, Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 4 and Debussy's "La Mer," three orchestral sketches.

The orchestra comes to Pittsburgh under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat-Chronicle

DEC 10 1938

SEEN & HEARD

BY HENRY W. CLUNE

PITCHED UP

THE coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to town early in the week had the people up at the Eastman running around in circles for a time. One of the features of the orchestra's concerts was the playing of Jesus Maria Sanroma, the youthful Puerto Rican pianist, who wanted the piano he used pitched to a frequency of 444 vibrations, to give added brillance to his playing, instead of 440 vibrations, the frequency of ordinary pianos.

This was an unusual request, and the Eastman Theater people were stumped for a moment. A tuning fork, by which the vibrations of a piano are trued, may be had for about $1 in almost any music store. But all of these are pitched for 440 pianos. So the Eastman people called Boston, found that the Boston orchestra had a tuning fork filed off to raise the pitch of a piano to 444 vibrations, and this was sent on.

Then another difficulty arose. It was learned that in stepping up a piano to 444 frequency a severe strain, which actually might ruin them, would be placed upon the strings, and that even if the strings survived, the piano would have to be retuned frequently to get it back to normal pitch and keep it there. The Eastman people were reluctant to subject their concert grand to these adjustments, and scoured the local music stores for a piano that was pitched to 444 vibrations. One was found, fetched over to the hall, and a piano tuner, with the Boston orchestra's tuning fork, was put to work getting it in shape for Sanroma. The job was done, shortly before concert time. The whole operation, including the rent of the piano, cost $40.

CAMDEN, N. J.
POST

DEC 10 1938

Sibelius 'Fifth' Given Beautiful Recording

Victor Captures Tonal Magnificence of Symphony, Tone Poem

The recorders have done right well by Sibelius in making available the encompassing eloquence of the last great symphonist on the horizon of music—but never before, it seems, have they done quite so well as has RCA Victor in capturing the tonal magnificence of the Finn's great Fifth Symphony. Enclosed within Albun M-474 is a recording by Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra that is breathtaking in beauty and fidelity. A recording of the Fifth has been available before—but here the Fifth itself is available on records.

The choice of Koussevitzky to do the recording is more than a happy one; it is the logical one of letting the best man do it. Old Sibelius himself has the erratic habit of telling most every conductor whom he hears perform one of his works that he, the current conductor, is the supreme interpreter thereof. The less talented but more critical listener can forgive the composer for being deafened by his own genius, and be thankful that this work is conducted by the man who, at the death of Kajanus, succeeded by universal acclaim to the place held by the Finnish conductor in the hearts of Sibelius lovers.

Included in the album is Sibelius' earlier tone poem, "Pohjola's Daughter." It is a worthy addition, and the Sibelius enthusiast who lets the greatness of the symphonies blind him to the worth of such works as this, lesser though it be, is foolish indeed.

GOOSSENS CONDUCTS BOSTON SYMPHONY

Musical America

Tchaikovsky 'Manfred' Dominates Unusual Program Given By Visiting Leader

Dec. 10/38

BOSTON, Dec. 5.—A visiting conductor in the person of Eugene Goossens, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony, has enlivened the regular Friday-Saturday series of concerts by the Boston Symphony this last week. Mr. Goossens took over the baton for the brace of concerts which fall on Nov. 25 and 26 and for program offered the following:

Overture to the 'Occasional Oratorio'..Handel
(First performances at these concerts)
'Carnaval' ....Schumann
(Orchestrated by Rimsky-Korsakoff, Liadoff, Glazounoff and Tcherepnin)
(First concert performances in the United States)
Two Nature Poems ....Goossens
(First performances at these concerts)
'Manfred' Symphony, Op. 58 (after Byron's Dramatic Poem) ....Tchaikovsky

Mr. Goossens is not wholly a stranger to Bostonians. He was welcomed as guest conductor of the symphony orchestra in 1926, and again in 1930. As composer, his works have found representation upon several local programs, therefore we looked forward to his reappearance among us, and the more eagerly since in the meanwhile he has won an enviable position in musical circles here and abroad. With all respect to his ability, it must be admitted that his choice of program was not as felicitous as upon former occasions. The Handel item, while interesting as a musical antique, holds slight material of worth. The work today suffers the same fate as numerous other "occasional" pieces, not alone in music but in the field of poetry and prose. Made-to-order works seldom exhibit the best facet of the creator's art, and Handel, seizing upon a national crisis fell victim to its deadening influence. Mr Goossens did well by the score but roused in us no desire for a repetition.

Once in a blue moon there appears an orchestration of a piano work which justifies its existence, such as that of 'Le Tombeau de Couperin', which reappeared upon local programs a few weeks ago. It was unfortunate that the Schumann 'Carnaval' did not offer the same justification as orchestral music. As a matter of fact, even the labor of arrangement is somewhat in doubt, for according to records available to anyone interested in such things, Rimsky-Korsakoff could have had only the sketchiest part in the orchestration and it therefore must have fallen largely to Glazounoff to arrange the score which was first used by Diaghileff in St. Petersburg in 1909. There are pianists whose imagination may still enhance a pianoforte performance of the 'Carnaval', but neither Mr. Goossens nor the superb instrument under his control could illumine the orchestral score.

Mr. Goossens's own two small pieces were selected from the 'Three Nature Poems for Pianoforte' written in 191 and orchestrated in 1937-38. The composer frankly acknowledges his preference for the emphasis of the more romantic in music and these slender works appear to exemplify his ideas The audience received them cordially.

While the Tchaikovsky symphony o this program is not one of his best, ye placed in juxtaposition to the number which formed the first half of the program, it proved by far the most interesting of the lot. Regardless of the composer's backward glances at preceding works, the symphony is soundly constructed and melodious in content. Students of orchestration may still learn from it, if they will but open their ears The orchestra gave Mr. Goossens the utmost cooperation and the performance came off with an eclat which provoke the enthusiasm of the audience.

GRACE MAY STUTSMAN

OBSERVER

Cleveland O

DEC 9 - 1938

Boston Symphony Plays in Cleveland

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting will be presented in Public Music Hall this Friday night at 8:45 under the auspices of The Cleveland Museum of Art and direction of Mrs. Emil Brudno.

The program will be divided into three parts: Symphony in B flat, No. 102 by Haydn; "La Mer," Trois Esquisses Symphoniques, by Debussy; Symphony No. 2 in D Major by Sibelius. The program is one of the Cleveland Concert Course series.

100

Brilliant Audience Attends Concert in Museum Peristyle

Toledo Times Dec. 9/38

By IDA TAYLOR

ONE of the most brilliant audiences of the season was assembled last evening in the Toledo Museum of Art peristyle for the annual members' concert which was given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

There were many out-of-town guests in the audience and numerous dinner and supper parties were given preceding and after the affair.

Mink and ermine coats were much in evidence with the popular black velvet evening wraps, with their fur collars and capes, leading in popularity.

Gleaming white satin fashioned with a short jacket banded in baum marten formed Miss Sally Libbey's beautiful costume. Her emerald necklace and bracelet accented her regal beauty.

Mrs. James Bentley looked stunning in a white satin gown, with which she wore a diamond necklace and a long white ermine coat.

Black bugles decorated the bodice of Mrs. William E. Levis' sophisticated frock of black satin, with which she wore a mink coat.

Mrs. Cornelia Colton Hollister was most effectively gowned in a handsome frock of black thread lace made over a peau de soie demi-hoop skirt. A corsage of large black velvet flowers marked one shoulder and pearl ornaments and a pearl comb in her hair completed her smart costume. Over her gown, Mrs. Hollister wore a long sealskin cape.

Mrs. John H. Wright's chic black gown of crepe was topped with black lace, the short puffed sleeves being formed of the same filmy material. Over her gown she wore a short boxy coat of mink.

Mrs. Charles S. Ashley looked very lovely in becoming black velvet.

Mrs. Carl B. Spitzer was in a black and gold gown over which she wore a knee length ermine coat, distinguished by a most unusual shoulder treatment. Delicate tracery of gold on rose-colored taffeta fashioned the gown worn by Mrs. Aaron C. Chesbrough.

Mrs. Thomas P. Goodbody's sapphire blue lace gown was most flattering, and Mrs. George S. Mills' gown of blue lame was marked by its loveliness for a concert or opera.

Mrs. W. W. Knight's gown of raisin colored crepe and Miss Betty Knight's red velvet frock made a lovely bit of color in the sea of black gowns and wraps.

Mrs. Leonard Phillipps had a modish white quilted box coat and muff and Mrs. Oscar Foster and her sister, Miss Julie France, also had white coats.

Mink banded the smart jacket of Mrs. Henry Dodge's white costume, and Miss Mary Grace Davis also was in a stunning white outfit.

Mrs. John D. Biggers whose gown was covered by a long white ermine coat, was accompanied by her daughter-in-law, Mrs. Reeve K. Biggers, whose black gown having a turquoise taffeta jacket was worn with a magenta bandeau of velvet, ending in two large rosettes in front.

Mrs. Walter Eversman's smart black velvet gown had short puff sleeves of ermine, and Mrs. Earl Newcomer's gown, black as slate had draped bands of white faille, forming the becoming V neckline.

Mrs. Zolton Sepecshy of the Cranbrook Academy of Fine Arts, had a chalk white gown which emphasized her blond beauty.

SACRAMENTO, CALIF.
BEE

DEC 10 1938

Among The New Records

SIBELIUS SYMPHONY NO. 5 in E Flat Major, Opus 82, and POHJOLA'S DAUGHTER, Opus 49; performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky; Victor Musical Masterpiece Series, M-474.

Sacramento music lovers whose interest was aroused or reawakened in this great contemporary Finnish composer by last Wednesday's concert in which the First Symphony had the place of honor will be especially eager to hear this superb recording of the Fifth.

Some commentators have written that the first symphony shows Sibelius under the influence of his predecessors, notably Tchaikowsky, and that in the Fifth he is more completely himself, which probably contains an element of truth. Whether this makes the latter a superior work is a question that can and will be argued either way. To this listener it seems a matter of minor importance since both are tremendous works, to be ranked as perhaps the greatest musical creations produced in the Twentieth Century.

The Fifth is extremely concise; there is no redundancy, no bleak, [illegible] area, no vague wandering. Every note, every phrase has a reason for being, and as a result it is a comparatively short symphony, covering only seven sides. The [illegible] who has not yet made Sibelius' acquaintance should, perhaps, [illegible]. It is not "pretty music". It has at times the intolerable brilliance of a snow covered world glistening in the midday sun; it has the terrible grandeur of a glacier crumbling into icebergs; it has the solid strength of granite cliffs and irresistible force of a storm tossed sea. And then at times it has the warmth and tender beauty of a quiet, sheltered valley where nature is kind and man can "loaf and invite his soul."

It also has a perfection of structure and mastery of orchestration that will delight the trained musician and musical scholar.

Koussevitzky's interpretation and the Boston Orchestra's performance are superb in every respect. It is an album which can be fully enjoyed, however, only on a machine that can handle considerable volume and range without undue distortion, and it must be given generous volume and space. When muffled it loses much of its effectiveness.

Pohjola's Daughter, which covers the last three sides of the five discs in the album, is a delightful, exciting and intriguing work, more descriptive and fanciful than the symphony and offering interesting contrasts.

CLEVELAND, O.
PRESS

DEC 10 1938

Formal Attire at Boston Symphony

Tumultuous applause rose again and again as last night's Music Hall audience acclaimed Serge Koussevitzky and the 110 men in his famed Boston Symphony Orchestra. Sibelius' dynamic Second Symphony concluded the program presented by the masterful conductor, who was recalled time after time by his appreciative listeners.

Among them were many of Cleveland's own musicians, including Rudolph Ringwald, Arthur Quimby and Arthur Shepherd. Also seen in the formally attired audience were Mrs. Prentiss Hughes, wearing wine velvet; Mr. and Mrs. William Gates, the latter in a full-skirted white crepe, and Mrs. George Stevens of Elyria in a gown of black crepe.

A smart black satin was worn by Miss Phyllis Peckham, and Miss Phyllis Barrett wore a bouffant black taffeta. The latter was with her mother, Mrs. Darwin S. Barrett Jr., gowned in royal blue. Also in attendance were Mrs. Felix Kyle, Mrs. Henry John in a white formal studded with gold, and Mr. and Mrs. Jason Crane.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

DEC 10 1938

Symphony Here Tonight

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, 110 strong, with Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, arrived in the city today, and will complete a week's tour in Pittsburgh with a concert tonight and tomorrow afternoon at Syria Mosque. The orchestra has played to capacity audiences in every one of the cities visited, including Buffalo, Rochester, Ann Arbor, Toledo and Cleveland. Pittsburgh promises to be no exception.

The program tonight will feature two symphonies, the Beethoven No. 2 and Brahms No. 4, as well as Ravel's Concerto for piano and orchestra, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist. Tomorrow afternoon's program at 3 o'clock will include Haydn Symphony in B-flat, Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 4 and Debussy's "La Mer," three orchestral sketches.

The orchestra comes to Pittsburgh under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat-Chronicle

DEC 10 1938

SEEN & HEARD
BY HENRY W. CLUNE

PITCHED UP

THE coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to town early in the week had the people up at the Eastman running around in circles for a time. One of the features of the orchestra's concerts was the playing of Jesus Maria Sanroma, the youthful Puerto Rican pianist, who wanted the piano he used pitched to a frequency of 444 vibrations, to give added brilliance to his playing, instead of 440 vibrations, the frequency of ordinary pianos.

This was an unusual request, and the Eastman Theater people were stumped for a moment. A tuning fork, by which the vibrations of a piano are trued, may be had for about $1 in almost any music store. But all of these are pitched for 440 pianos. So the Eastman people called Boston, found that the Boston orchestra had a tuning fork filed off to raise the pitch of a piano to 444 vibrations, and this was sent on.

Then another difficulty arose. It was learned that in stepping up a piano to 444 frequency a severe strain, which actually might ruin them, would be placed upon the strings, and that even if the strings survived, the piano would have to be retuned frequently to get it back to normal pitch and keep it there. The Eastman people were reluctant to subject their concert grand to these adjustments, and scoured the local music stores for a piano that was pitched to 444 vibrations. One was found, fetched over to the hall, and a piano tuner, with the Boston orchestra's tuning fork, was put to work getting it in shape for Sanroma. The job was done, shortly before concert time. The whole operation, including the rent of the piano, cost $40.

CAMDEN, N. J.
POST

DEC 10 1938

Sibelius 'Fifth' Given Beautiful Recording

Victor Captures Tonal Magnificence of Symphony, Tone Poem

The recorders have done right well by Sibelius in making available the encompassing eloquence of the last great symphonist on the horizon of music—but never before, it seems, have they done quite so well as has RCA Victor in capturing the tonal magnificence of the Finn's great Fifth Symphony. Enclosed within Albun M-474 is a recording by Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra that is breathtaking in beauty and fidelity. A recording of the Fifth has been available before—but here the Fifth itself is available on records.

The choice of Koussevitzky to do the recording is more than a happy one; it is the logical one of letting the best man do it. Old Sibelius himself has the erratic habit of telling most every conductor whom he hears perform one of his works that he, the current conductor, is the supreme interpreter thereof. The less talented but more critical listener can forgive the composer for being deafened by his own genius, and be thankful that this work is conducted by the man who, at the death of Kajanus, succeeded by universal acclaim to the place held by the Finnish conductor in the hearts of Sibelius lovers.

Included in the album is Sibelius' earlier tone poem, "Pohjola's Daughter." It is a worthy addition, and the Sibelius enthusiast who lets the greatness of the symphonies blind him to the worth of such works as this, lesser though it be, is foolish indeed.

GOOSSENS CONDUCTS BOSTON SYMPHONY

Musical America

Tchaikovsky 'Manfred' Dominates Unusual Program Given By Visiting Leader

Dec 10/38

BOSTON, Dec. 5.—A visiting conductor in the person of Eugene Goossens, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony, has enlivened the regular Friday-Saturday series of concerts by the Boston Symphony this last week. Mr. Goossens took over the baton for the brace of concerts which fall on Nov. 25 and 26 and for program offered the following:

Overture to the 'Occasional Oratorio'..Handel
(First performances at these concerts)
'Carnaval' ....Schumann
(Orchestrated by Rimsky-Korsakoff, Liadoff, Glazounoff and Tcherepnin)
(First concert performances in the United States)
Two Nature Poems ....Goossens
(First performances at these concerts)
'Manfred' Symphony, Op. 58 (after Byron's Dramatic Poem) ....Tchaikovsky

Mr. Goossens is not wholly a stranger to Bostonians. He was welcomed as guest conductor of the symphony orchestra in 1926, and again in 1930. As composer, his works have found representation upon several local programs, therefore we looked forward to his reappearance among us, and the more eagerly since in the meanwhile he has won an enviable position in musical circles here and abroad. With all respect to his ability, it must be admitted that his choice of program was not as felicitous as upon former occasions. The Handel item, while interesting as a musical antique, holds slight material of worth. The work today suffers the same fate as numerous other "occasional" pieces, not alone in music but in the field of poetry and prose. Made-to-order works seldom exhibit the best facet of the creator's art, and Handel, seizing upon a national crisis fell victim to its deadening influence. Mr. Goossens did well by the score but roused in us no desire for a repetition.

Once in a blue moon there appears an orchestration of a piano work which justifies its existence, such as that of 'Le Tombeau de Couperin', which reappeared upon local programs a few weeks ago. It was unfortunate that the Schumann 'Carnaval' did not offer the same justification as orchestral music. As a matter of fact, even the labor of arrangement is somewhat in doubt, for according to records available to anyone interested in such things, Rimsky-Korsakoff could have had only the sketchiest part in the orchestration and it therefore must have fallen largely to Glazounoff to arrange the score which was first used by Diaghileff in St. Petersburg in 1909. There are pianists whose imagination may still enhance a pianoforte performance of the 'Carnaval', but neither Mr. Goossens nor the superb instrument under his control could illumine the orchestral score.

Mr. Goossens's own two small pieces were selected from the 'Three Nature Poems for Pianoforte' written in 1919 and orchestrated in 1937-38. The composer frankly acknowledges his preference for the emphasis of the more romantic in music and these slender works appear to exemplify his ideas. The audience received them cordially.

While the Tchaikovsky symphony on this program is not one of his best, yet placed in juxtaposition to the numbers which formed the first half of the program, it proved by far the most interesting of the lot. Regardless of the composer's backward glances at preceding works, the symphony is soundly constructed and melodious in content. Students of orchestration may still learn from it, if they will but open their ears. The orchestra gave Mr. Goossens the utmost cooperation and the performance came off with an eclat which provoked the enthusiasm of the audience.

GRACE MAY STUTSMAN

OBSERVER
Cleveland-O

DEC 9 - 1938

Boston Symphony Plays in Cleveland

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, will be presented in Public Music Hall this Friday night at 8:45 under the auspices of The Cleveland Museum of Art and direction of Mrs. Emil Brudno.

The program will be divided into three parts: Symphony in B flat, No. 102 by Haydn; "La Mer," Trois Esquisses Symphoniques, by Debussy; Symphony No. 2 in D Major by Sibelius. The program is one of the Cleveland Concert [illegible] series.

101

CLEVELAND, O.
NEWS

DEC 10 1938

MUSIC

Bost
Szíg

BY ELMORE BACON

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a triumph at Music Hall last night.

The dynamic director and the virtuosic organization were given an ovation by an audience that came near being overflow. And the visitors from the East, playing Haydn, Debussy and Sibelius, displayed all facets of their glittering virtuosity.

It was the first time in several years that the orchestra has visited town. And the home folks surely made it welcome.

The virtues of this 52-year-old organization have often been recounted. It has a polish and a suavity—a refinement that revealed all the niceties of the Haydn Symphony in B Flat Major, No. 9 of the London series.

Koussevitsky has a marvelous way with his men. He doesn't demand. He smiles while he directs. Sings, too. And talks. His facial expression pictures the mood of the music he is directing. And flutterings of the hands—he uses a baton most of the time—and rapid movements of his arms mark the phrasing, indicate the shading reveal his desires. The response to his batoning is instant. The particular effect is forthcoming when he wants it.

The Haydn Symphony at his hands was a perfect gem. The beautiful Adagio, the delightful Menuetto and the stirring presto were notable in their purity, simplicity and Haydn charm.

The lovely "La Mer" sketches by Debussy further revealed the orchestra's high artistry. The shifting lights and colors, the rippling and surging of the waves, the passages of storm and stress were adroitly presented, and at times with an emotional warmth.

Emotional ebb and flow were more apparent in the romantic and rugged Sibelius work—his Second Symphony. In this earlier writing by the Scandinavian Master are the folk tunes, the happiness and despair of the folk who sang them, the brilliance and the gloom of the countryside and the surge of the sea.

And in the triumphant shoutings of the brass and the final glorious unfoldment, there was a fine emotional display. It was a tremendous climax, well sustained and most artistically built up.

TOLEDO, O.
TIMES

DEC 11 1938

Attend Concert

FASHIONABLY gowned, in ermine and mink coats, society folk were present in scores Thursday evening for the annual Museum of Art members' concert given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky directing.

With the peristyle as the setting, the orchestra's presentations were rivaled in brilliance only by the stunning costumes of the guests.

Miss Sally Libbey's choice of for the occasion was a gown of white satin, made with a short jacket banded in baum marten. Her emerald necklace and bracelet accented her regal beauty.

The bodice of Mrs. William E. Levis' black satin frock was accented with black bugles, and her coat was of mink.

White satin was worn by Mrs. James Bentley and her ensemble also included a long white ermine coat and a necklace of diamonds.

Thread lace of black was effectively worn by Mrs. Cornelia Colton Hollister. The frock was made over a peau-de soie demi-hoop skirt, and a corsage of large black velvet flowers marked one shoulder. Her accessories included a pearl hair comb and a long sealskin cape.

CLEVELAND, O.
PRESS

DEC 10 1938

12-10

Boston Symphony Is World's Finest

Cheering Greets End of Great Performance by Capacity Audience

By ARTHUR LOESSER
Music Editor

GREAT things were expected of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and it is pleasant to report that last night at Music Hall the expectations were amply fulfilled. A glorious concert was presented by Serge Koussevitzky and his men, a musical event of outstanding impressiveness that will linger in the memory longer than most.

A program was chosen that was calculated to provide the maximum of emotional variety: first came the firm, neat, ingratiating, classic little B flat Symphony of Haydn; then followed Debussy's triptych La Mer, with its sensuous, shimmering [illegible] of changing tone-color schemes, and the clangorous, chivalric Second Symphony of Sibelius brought the evening to a triumphant close.

The last movement of the Haydn allowed us to appreciate the marvelous precision of the orchestra's string sections. The lively little note-values were played with a razor-edged accuracy of ensemble that bespeaks high individual competence on the part of the men, plus the most painstaking, sensitive direction on the part of the conductor.

In the Debussy work all the tricky effects came out in their proper dynamic relationships; moreover, Mr. Koussevitzky held the orchestra in admirable restraint. Never did the louder passages degenerate into that violence which the composer detested.

In the Sibelius symphony, however, the full power of the various choirs was allowed to come forth. The woodwind cries in the second movement sounded properly bleak and grim; in the development section of the last movement a stupendous climax was worked up, coming to a magnificent fulfillment as the principal theme entered into its recapitulation.

At the close, the audience forgot about its hats and coats; it indulged itself in the pleasure of some vigorous and prolonged applause, which eventually broke into cheering.

We hope, however, that Mr. Koussevitzky and his men will not misinterpret this enthusiasm. It does not mean that we are unaccustomed to hearing the finest musical performances. If the Boston Symphony is probably the finest orchestra in the world, our own Cleveland Orchestra has everything to be proud of.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

DEC 11 1938

NBC Orchestra

The rumors of a concert tour by the Toscanini-conducted National Broadcasting Orchestra appear to have been well-founded. The first out-of-town event will be at the Mosque, Newark, under the Griffith Foundation in a program that is sponsored by members of various religious faiths.

The same orchestra will visit Boston for a single concert on January 10 in Symphony Hall. Interest, of course, centers in the great maestro, since the orchestra although fine, is hardly competition for the venerable Boston Symphony.

TOLEDO, O.
BLADE

DEC 10 1938

Along Pathways Of Art

BY LANX

THE performance of a piece of music is like a copy of a painting. Depending upon the performer, the result may be true to the original or untrue to it. It may be very literal or very free, inspired or uninspired.

In the apprehension of a visual work of art, like a painting, only two creators are involved, the artist and the observer. In music three people are generally involved, the composer, the performer, and the listener. Where the music is orchestral, and perhaps a concerto, the individual players and the soloist are also involved. Thus music has more possibility of misinterpretation, or, let us say, of reinterpretation than has painting or sculpture.

If Velasquez had made a copy of a painting of some inferior artist, Velasquez's copy might very easily have been an improvement on the original. Likewise a conductor with a very profound nature and great musical insight may be able to enlarge the expression of music by a composer of lesser stature.

* * *

This becomes something of a problem when dealing with composers of the greatness of Beethoven and Brahms. It is also highly subjective as to how the music shall be approached. Mr. Koussevitzky seemed to this writer to have a much more sympathetic feeling for the Ravel concerto which his orchestra played in the Museum's Peristyle, than for the works of the earlier masters. I would not characterize his performance of either the Beethoven or the Brahms as inspired whereas he seemed to squeeze the very last drop of brilliance from the Ravel. In this he was ably assisted by the exciting solo work of Mr. Sanroma.

To continue the parallel with the visual arts, Mr. Koussevitzky's approach to music seems to be about what one would expect to Hans Holbein, the younger, had the turn of the cosmic wheel enabled him to copy a portrait by Rubens. Holbein's copy would probably have made the details a little clearer, the lines a little more sharply defined. Some of the great energy and vitality of Rubens' painting would doubtless be sacrificed.

* * *

Even so it seemed to me that Mr. Koussevitzky's chief interest lies in clear outline, beauty of orchestral color, and precision of instrumentation rather than in any subjective approach. It is certainly the safer, because it deals more completely with the music as musical structure, avoiding the subjective problem of the music as emotional expression.

A conductor like Furtwangler who injects great fire and personal feeling into the music has the possibility for more inspired results but takes greater chances not only of failing to make his interpretation complete but of replacing the composer's own feeling for the music with something radically different.

It would seem logical that Koussevitzky should be at his best in works which, like the Ravel concerto, have great technical brilliance. That brings up another point. This concerto is in a musical way comparable to the modern painting now on temporary exhibit in the Museum. There is the same brilliance of performance, the same expansion of the use of tools of expression, the same art for art's sake approach, and the same lack of relation to the problem of living.

* * *

To insist on art's being this or that is to cut oneself off from what it has to offer. A beautiful example of this was observable at the public forum last Sunday, where the same art proved extremely unpleasant to some and extremely satisfying to others. Those who disliked it were looking for what there was to object to; those who liked it saw what there was to praise.

In these attitudes are bound up two diametrically opposed philosophies of life. Thus does the observer or the listener make his own creation.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

DEC 11 1938

FINNISH VIOLINIST IN SYMPHONY SERIES

Anja Ignatius, a young and highly praised violinist from Finland, will make her first appearances in this country when she appears with the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, in the Concerto of Sibelius, at the pair of concerts on Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon, Dec. 26 and 27, in Symphony hall. Miss Ignatius is said to play the Concerto with a special understanding, having studied its interpretation with the composer. For this, and the four remaining concerts in this series, subscription seats are still to be had at Symphony hall.

Events of the remaining concerts will be the appearance at one pair of Georges Enesco as guest conductor, and at another of Igor Stravinsky, conducting music of his own. There will be two piano soloists, Myra Hess and Frank Glazer.

Music News and Comment

The subscription books of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are being held open for those who may wish to buy season tickets for the remaining five monthly concerts in the Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon series. At the next pair, Dec. 26 and 27, Anja Ignatius, Finnish artist, will make her American debut as soloist in the Violin Concerto by Sibelius. Three of these five pairs will be conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, and a pair each by Igor Stravinsky and Georges Enesco. The list of soloists includes two pianists, Myra Hess and Frank Glazer.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

DEC 12 1938 RR

Arthur Fiedler

With Arthur Fiedler, of the Boston ~~Symphony~~ Pops, conducting, the Providence Federal Orchestra gave a concert in Hope High school last night.

It was curious that more persons did not attend. Mr. Fiedler is an able and popular conductor, the program was selected to please a varied audience, the orchestra played well, and the price of admission was about as low as possible. Yet the auditorium was scarcely half filled.

Mr. Fiedler knows what he is doing, and he made the orchestra feel that he did. They responded with a fine performance. The Beethoven second symphony, not heard often enough, was launched in good style, the tone of the orchestra being ample and clear, the attacks accurate, the shading sensitive and judicious. There are many beautiful melodies in this symphony, and they are presented in such agreeable harmonic settings that they seem always fresh and delightful. It was only in the scherzo that the performance faltered.

The Russian folk songs were very pleasant. They are short enough not to tire the unaccustomed listener and yet they are not abashed in the company of more pretentious music. The pizzicato in the "Dance-song" was brisk and precise. All the songs were read interestingly by Mr. Fiedler.

In "The Last Spring," by Grieg, the strings were notably smooth and refined in tone. The woodwinds did good work in the Enesco rhapsody; indeed, the whole orchestra caught the spirit of it and made it an exciting end to the evening. If it carried the orchestra away with it on occasion, the orchestra, nevertheless, carried the audience.

The program:

Cherubini .... Overture to "Anacreon"
Beethoven—Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 36
  Adagio molto; allegro con brio
  Larghetto
  Scherzo; trio
  Allegro molto
Liadow—Eight Russian folk songs: religious song: Christmas song; Complaint; "I Danced with the Mosquito"; Story of the Birds; Lullaby; Dance-song; Country Dance.
Grieg ...... The Last Spring, Op 34, No. 2
Enesco ...... Roumanian Rhapsody No. 1

G. Y. L.

* * *

Raoul Pineau, organist of St. John's Church, West Warwick, will play the following program tonight in the First Congregational Church (Unitarian), under the auspices of the Rhode Island Chapter of the American Guild of Organists:

1. Preludio (Third Sonata) .... Guilmant
2. Pastorale (Second Symphony) .. Widor
3. Berceuse .... Vierne
4. In Dulci Jubilo .... Bach
5. Toccata and Fugue in D-Minor. Bach
6. Minuet (Gothic Suite) ...... Boellman
7. Allegretto .... De Boeck
8. Organo Primitivo .... Yon
9. Marche Champetre .... Boex
10. Toccata (Fifth Symphony) .... Widor

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS SUPERBLY

Cleveland Plain Dealer

Koussevitzky Dynamic in Concert Here

Dec. 10/38

BY HERBERT ELWELL

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under its eminent leader, Serge Koussevitzky, presented a concert at Public Music Hall last night, appearing in the Cleveland Concert Course sponsored by the Cleveland Museum of Art and managed by Mrs. Emil Brudno.

This was the first time in many years music lovers here have had the pleasure of a visit from this veteran organization, headed by one of the most dynamic figures in the world of music. They were not slow to show their appreciation. If there was a vacant seat anywhere in the hall, it would have been hard to discover. And this throng, thrilled by a program of constantly mounting intensity, voiced its enthusiasm in unrestrained applause, recalling the conductor time and time again.

He and his 110 men rewarded their listeners with playing of superb quality and with music that moved by progressive degrees of intensity to a really stupendous climax in the Finale of Sibelius' Second Symphony.

Purity in Singing Strings

In the opening B Flat Major Symphony of Haydn one was conscious at once of the superior balance and finish of this orchestra, of the mellowness and purity of its singing strings, of the softness and precision of its attacks. Above all, one was aware of a guiding force so strongly self-composed and so completely in control of every element that details fell into place with utmost ease, leaving one with a sense of unity, compactness and integrity of direction that was simplicity itself.

To move from this radiant clarity and conciseness of outline into the highly diversified patterns and sensuous luxuriance of Debussy's Three Symphonic Sketches, "The Sea," was to discover another side to Koussevitzky's extraordinary temperament and another phase of many-sided interpretive nature, for here was music of almost voluptuous appeal and dazzling color.

What he made of it was something so strikingly at one with its essential character that one may perhaps be forgiven for speaking of it in rhapsodical terms. It took on an ethereal quality so vividly suggestive that one could fairly feel the light spray of water and the warm sunlight making rainbows through the luminous orchestral texture. And this magical effect was produced with such ease that one was led to conclude that a gigantic task of clearing away obstacles had been achieved in the preparation of this work, a task which left the conductor free in performance to transmit nothing but unadulterated feeling, nothing but the distilled essence of what had transpired in the fascinating realm of Debussy's fertile imagination.

Cellos Sing With Fervor

This same directness of contact with the inner spirit of the music was again in force in the Sibelius Symphony, though the change in style brought a corresponding change of approach from a delicate, evanescent blending of surface impressions to a type of phrasing that brought out the deep earnestness of a northern temperament and unearthed imposing realms of turgid and passionate expression. The cellos sang with magnificent fervor. There was no blaring brass nor strident intensity of strings, but an ever throbbing upward surge and unanimity of feeling in the entire orchestral body that brought the splendid architecture of this work to a focus with an impressiveness that has seldom been recognized in it here. Every nerve in the conductor seemed on fire with the emotional urgency of this music. And this high voltage was transmitted throughout every fiber of the instrumental texture until it reached an audience breathless with the excitement of its irresistible current.

Here is indeed an admirable orchestra and a conductor who knows how to show it off to advantage, but whose musicianship is so great that no mere act of showmanship arises to obstruct our view of or diminish our admiration for an imaginative force in full, free possession of tremendous communicative power.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

102

DEC 11 1938

ruth of Sibelius; 'Pohjola's Daughter'

Two Works by Great Finnish Composer Played by Boston Symphony Under Koussevitzky—A Creative Artist With No Financial Burden and Its Effect On His Output—Rimsky-Korsakoff's 'Le Coq o'Or'—'Three Cornered Hat' by de Falla—Separate Records

By BENJAMIN BUXTON

SIBELIUS'S Symphony No 5 in E-flat, Op 82, together with his tone poem, "Pohjola's Daughter," are included in a new Victor company album. Performed by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, these two works by one of the most distinguished creative personalities of the present day, are projected in brilliant style, and serve to complement an earlier album which included not only the symphony and "Pohjola's Daughter," but also "Tapiola." The latter was conducted by the late Kajanus, an authority on Sibelius, but no less satisfying is the reading of Koussevitzky, who has long been known as a strong supporter of the great Finnish composer.

In regarding the works of Sibelius it is necessary to understand one circumstance of his life that places him apart from most composers: namely, that since before 1900 he has enjoyed the steady patronage of the Finnish government and has been able, therefore, to perfect and expand his art without the fear and worry of economic pressure. While it is usually preferable to place the work of a creative artist apart from his personality and his manner of living, whether or not he is rich or poor, it is important to consider the economic side of Sibelius's life. Being completely independent of financial burden, with no thoughts of tomorrow's bread and butter, the effect on the creative output would naturally take a turn either for the better or for the worse. A lesser artist might lapse into the salon style; a great artist would perhaps retire into himself, become a universe unto himself and defy the rules and regulations of those who must abide by them.

A Hard Road

Being a great artist, Sibelius has chosen a hard road, and in few of his works can be seen evidence of any but the highest and most exacting standards. His musical speech is clipped, almost episodic, and startling in its abruptness. With the possible exception of the fourth symphony, which is mysterious, gloomy and probably the least immediately ingratiating of his scores, the main effect is free and positive. This is not to say that Sibelius lacks in nobility or breadth of line, for these two characteristics are everywhere noticeable. But there is about him a certain individuality that defies a minute description or an analysis that go beyond the picking to pieces of the harmonic structure and the measurement of the lines and phrases with their thematic development.

Beyond these technical considerations, Sibelius remains a unique figure in music. Although he is deeply conversant with his art in all forms, he is no borrower of idiom. He has evolved his own grammar, but in so doing has made no grammatical errors, according to accepted standards; he has set for himself a leisurely pace, yet has never lagged behind. The total number of his works is not large, and from one period to another they show a varying interest between program music and symphonic form. The tone-poems, however, although they may have suggested programs, can stand well by themselves, without names. The tales they tell are less pictorial than some of the Richard Strauss tone poems, and like the music cast in more formal style, they are interesting not only for their emotional pattern but for the designs themselves. As in his symphonies, Sibelius uses thematic material sparingly and embellishes it with briefest strokes of somber coloring.

The Fifth Symphony, written at the time of the World war, shows no connection with a world struggle—none of its cynicism and desperation. It is generally cheerful and lyrical—an excellent example of the composer's detachment. "Pohjola's Daughter," written around 1906, with its program taken from "The Kalevala," the Finnish epic, is highly descriptive in a subtle way, if one has taken the pains to read the story it portrays, and if not, an extraordinarily colorful score. For a work written 30 years ago it is very bold in its harmonies.

Taken together, the symphony and the tone-poem form a representative cross section of Sibelius. Hearing them, one after the other, gives further reason to believe that here is a striking type of genius—one that is almost impossible to define but one that must be experienced many times from sheer fascination.

PITTSBURG, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

DEC 12 1938

Koussevitsky Scores With Symphony

By J. FRED LISSFELT

It is always a gala occasion for Pittsburgh music patrons when Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra come to town. Saturday night and yesterday afternoon the enthusiasm of both players and audience rose to frenzy. It would indeed be a pity if we were ever prevented from hearing this organization which really sets world standards.

The second symphony of Beethoven opened Saturday's program which, I believe, was played in the purest possible style, devoid of the galanterie which finds its way into this music at the hands of other important conductors.

BRILLIANT READING

Koussevitsky's readings of contemporary music are always brilliant, and so we cannot wonder at the success of the Ravel piano concerto. With the help of a superb pianist, Jesus Maria Sanroma, we heard music of our times skillfully written and equally well played. Its effect was electric. The score of the solo instrument has all the trying devices of piano technique, with some of the newer ones invented since percussion is the means of expression. As to color, there was nothing lacking for the orchestra nor for Sanroma. There is melody which is a close relation of blues, syncopated rhythms abound, and the ensemble effect is that we are hearing music that speaks the spirit of the twentieth century.

BRAHMS' FOURTH

The Brahms fourth symphony closed that program. Only in such a reading, though it had little of the academic approach, could one find the intellectual Brahms. The clarity of its parts took on precise outlines which heretofore have been only suggested. Wanting was only the mellower tone of the Boston strings and brass, and that we can lay to the use of the sound shell which remained from a previous concert.

The Haydn B Flat Symphony No. 102 is not right with the full Boston Orchestra. Yesterday it became all the more clear that so rich a volume of sound obscures Haydn's purpose, that it makes the music seem pompous, which the composer never intended it to be, and which it never quite succeeds in being because Haydn's score needs but 40 men to play it.

SYMPHONIC SKETCHES

Debussy's symphonic sketches, "La Mer," on the contrary sound better than the score can prohesy, for here the nuances, possible with such players and so sympathetic a leader, make the music more splendid than it really is.

The climax came in Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony which brought the crowd to shouts of approval. A faster tempo finds no sluggish players here and Kousevitsky led his men to heroic heights that might seem an atonement for the martyred composer.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

DEC 11 1938 RR

GUEST CONDUCTOR

ARTHUR FIEDLER, noted conductor of the Boston "Pops," will direct the concert of Providence Federal Orchestra in the Hope High school auditorium tonight.

CLEVELAND, O.
PRESS

DEC 12 1938

Marriage or Music for Conductor, but Not Both

Marriage and a musical career do not mix—at least not for Dimitri Mitropoulos, conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Mitropoulos is in Cleveland today to be the guest conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra Thursday and Saturday nights.

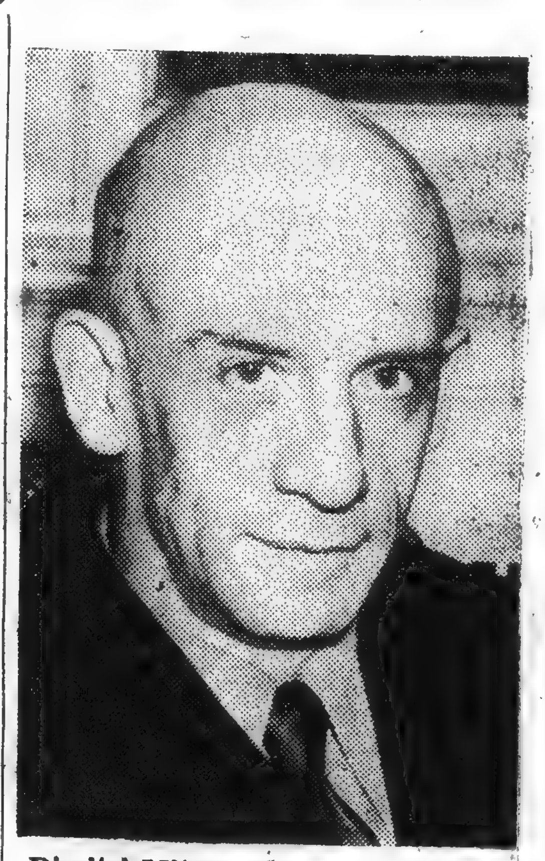
"From marriage, children result," he said, "and these children must have every opportunity parents can give them.

"In such a life as mine, where all my time is devoted to work, I could not devote my time to be a family man—and as a result the children and family life would be sadly neglected."

"I prefer not to be married because my conscience does not allow me. Most people do not realize the responsibilities of marriage, and I do."

Mr. Mitropoulos came to America in 1935 at the invitation of Sergei Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony. He became conductor of the Minneapolis Orchestra last year when Eugene Ormandy went to Philadelphia.

Mr. Mitropoulos said that Ernest Bloch's violin concerto, which will have its world premiere at Thursday's concert in Severance Hall, is a "marvelous work along classical lines and very melodic." Joseph Szigeti will be soloist.



Dimitri Mitropoulos . . . marriage not his career

The conductor's only hobby is mountain climbing and he has not much opportunity to pursue this form of exercise in America.

"This country demands much of an artist," he said, "and I have not had a chance to battle nature and the elements in climbing rocky cliffs and mountains here."

AMERICA HAS ORCHESTRAL LEAD

B.

Symphony Groups in This Country Are Called Best

Dec. /38

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

EUGENE ORMANDY, now conductor of the Philadelphia Symphony and formerly of the orchestra of Minneapolis, recently made the statement that there were 11 major orchestras in America, any one of which was 200 per cent better than any in Europe. This is a slight exaggeration, but it makes good reading for Americans. Perhaps the explanation lies in the not exactly novel declaration of another European-born conductor, now functioning in this country, Fritz Reiner: "The personnel of our best American orchestras is, with the possible exception of the bassoon group—mostly German—a Latin woodwind and a Teutonic brass section. This feature explains the versatility and technical efficiency of our orchestras; they can solve the tasks equally of a Ravel or a Wagner score."

* * * *

Truth may be stranger than fiction, but it is frequently much less picturesque. One can hardly blame the producers of the motion picture "Suez" for pretending that the world premiere of Verdi's "Aida" at Cairo took place in 1869, as an adjunct to the formal opening of the great canal. And they were only two years out of the way. At the behest of the Khedive of Egypt, and for a sum equivalent to $20,000, Verdi wrote his spectacular work for a new Italian opera house which had been opened in the Egyptian capital. The actual date of the premiere was Dec. 24, 1871. Two years later "Aida" reached New York, where, in the ensuing years, it has been sung more often than any other opera.

* * * *

The playing of transcriptions at symphony concerts is becoming almost to prevalent, and we of this city may congratulate ourselves that Dr. Koussevitzky, unlike some of his colleagues, exercises a certain discretion in the matter. He has made one of the most prominent exceptions to his general rule of sticking to legitimate orchestral music in the case of Ravel's orchestration of Moussorgsky's piano pieces, "Pictures at an Exhibition," a transcription made at his instigation and one that was really needed.

About a dozen years ago Felix Weingartner orchestrated, after long deliberation, Beethoven's Sonata, Opus 106, the "Grosse Sonate fuer das Hammerklavier." If memory serves, this transcription has never been played in the United States. The other day your correspondent was favored with the loan, both of Weingartner's score and of a recording of the work at the hands of the London Philharmonic Orchestra, with Mr. Weingartner conducting. To put it mildly, he was favorably impressed. It has long been recognized that the "Hammerklavier" contains music which no pair of hands can fully encompass. The dimensions of the music, its spirit and its complexity are intrinsically orchestral. There are two reasons why Beethoven himself did not turn his gigantic and lofty conception into a symphony: the adequate scoring of it would have lain outside his powers, and no orchestra of the day could have given such a score an acceptable performance.

Using the orchestra of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, minus certain percussion instruments, and adhering as nearly as possible to Beethoven's own method of scoring, Weingartner has accomplished his task superbly. (The valve-horns and trumpets, unknown in Beethoven's day, have of necessity been employed, although not chromatically in the modern sense.) And as a result we have an orchestral work, and the only one, that properly represents the third-period Beethoven. Of course, the Ninth Symphony is supposed to do that, but in the humble opinion of this writer, it does not. If nothing else, it is far too conservative harmonically.

* * * *

Because of the holiday complications, the evening Symphony Concert this week will fall on Thursday. Then, on Friday afternoon, Dr. Koussevitzky will introduce to Boston a Suite for strings by the American Gardner Read and the Symphonic Dances of Paul Hindemith. Jascha Heifitz will appear as soloist in the Violin-Concerto of Beethoven.

This afternoon and tomorrow evening the Handel and Haydn Society will offer at Symphony Hall its usual performance of Handel's "Messiah." This afternoon at the Museum of Fine Arts, Isabel French, soprano, and Claude Jean Chiasson, harpsichordist, will appear in joint recital, and the choir of the Perkins Institute will sing Christmas music at Jordan Hall.

After this week, save for the Symphony, there will be a lull in concert-giving. On the afternoon of Jan. 8, Richard Crooks will give a Lieder-recital in Jordan Hall. On the evening of Jan. 10, Toscanani brings his NBC Symphony Orchestra to Symphony Hall. And on the following evening, at Jordan Hall, Leonard Shure, pianist, and Paul Tortellier, 'cellist, will give a recital of sonatas for their two instruments.

At the supplementary Symphony Concerts of Dec. 15 and 27, Anja Ignatius, a Finnish violinist, will play the Concerto of Sibelius.

PITTSBURG, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

DEC 12 1938

Two Concerts of Scintillating Brilliance Given by Boston Symphony Orchestra

Highest Peak Reached By Dr. Koussevitzky In Conducting.

That incredible organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its distinguished leader, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, made its only Pittsburgh appearances of the year Saturday night and Sunday afternoon at the Mosque. Dr. Koussevitzky always gives us memorable programs, but this year he fairly outdid himself in his generous listing of two symphonies for each concert.

Saturday night the Beethoven Second and the Brahms Fourth were played, separated by a performance of the Ravel Piano Concerto with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist. Yesterday afternoon we heard the Haydn B Flat Symphony No. 102, the familiar Tschaikovsky Fourth Symphony and again a modern interpolation between the two symphonies, this time Debussy's La Mer.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is today one of the world's leading symphonic organizations. Its instant response to Dr. Koussevitzky's every mood, its supreme technical grasp of even the most difficult passages, its luminous tone and, above all, the excellence of its individual solo men, make for a combination which shows no sign of decreasing in efficiency as the years go on.

On Saturday night Dr. Koussevitzky chose to give us as his Beethoven, the rather seldom played Second Symphony. It was an excellent choice and for some of us it was the high light of the concert. The Second Symphony, is, of course, not the most inspired of the nine, but it is probably the most interesting, especially to students of the Symphony, for it is in this work that the genius of Beethoven really takes shape. Behind him lies the years of ground work in Mozart and Haydn, especially Haydn; ahead of him lies sublime immortality. Beethoven is to leave the influence of the Classicists forever after the Second Symphony, never to return. Less than a year after the first performance of the Second is to come the Eroica, probably the greatest of them all. The music of the Second Symphony is a curious blending that reveals the transition period. Much of it is along broad lyric lines, at times almost bucolic, and the final movement is a capricious scherzo. It is scarcely ever reflective and Dr. Koussevitzky was eminently correct in giving it strict classical treatment, with a pace that never lagged and vitality that was undiminished through the whole work.

In fact, this vigorous and vehement playing was to dominate the whole of Saturday night's concert and was apparent in the playing of the titanic Brahms' Fourth. We have come to expect from the Boston Symphony perfect readings of scores like this and we were not disappointed. It is intellectual abstruse music and the orchestra played it with a searing white-hot passion, yet with austerity that nearly approached stridency at times.

Excellence of Individual Soloists Adds Much To Program.

Between the two symphonies, Dr. Koussevitzky neatly tossed a bombshell in the ultra-modern Ravel Piano Concerto. The soloist was the young Puerto Rican-born pianist, Jesus Maria Sanroma. Sanroma, who is the official pianist of the Boston Symphony, is evidently a musician of considerable ability, but the Concerto gave little opportunity to display all his apparent talents. It is to be hoped that Dr. Koussevitzky will bring him back to us again in the future.

The Concerto itself is in the jazz idiom and is frankly syncopated. It is known that Ravel was an admirer of George Gershwin and this fact is very evident in the music. There are many pages reminiscent of that composer's American in Paris and his Concerto. It is effectively written as Ravel's music always is, and the orchestration is exotic. Calling for such bizarre instruments as the whip, tam-tam and wood block to secure the desired results, it is on the whole a disappointing piece, shallow in musical content and substance. The orchestra played its difficult accompaniment with scintillating exuberance.

For his Sunday program, Dr. Koussevitzky opened with Haydn's B Flat Symphony composed during the master's second London visit. It was played with all the elegance and ornamentation and embellishment of the period. Haydn loved spaciousness but was forced to work on a small scale. For this reason, the interpretation of Dr. Koussevitzky takes on new interest and the work sounds as fresh as the day it was written. It is robust music, rich, full-blooded and meaty and breathes vitality. The lovely slow second movement was particularly well-played with its broad flowing melody well-sustained.

Dr. Koussevitzky's programs are always masterpieces of contrast and no better foil for the classic Haydn Symphony could have been chosen than Debussy La Mer. These sketches are program music of the finest quality. They are impressionistic and highly imaginative. As the Boston Symphony plays La Mer, it becomes a rhapsody of shifting tonal color, changing as the moods of the sea change, now bright-colored as the sea under sunlight, now sombre as in gathering storm—always a moody work and always difficult to capture. Dr. Koussevitzky led his men through this musical imagery with captivating assurance.

Tschaikovsky's Fourth Symphony might well become, and is, in fact, often banal and trite in less competent hands. Under Dr. Koussevitzky it becomes sheer magnificence. The Boston Symphony rarely gives us Tschaikovsky, and this is our great loss. Tschaikovsky wrote from the innermost wellsprings of his heart, and thus Koussevizky conducts it. The depressive melancholy music, often feverish in its intensity, is made life-like when the Bostonians play it. The strings fairly glow, the brasses pulsate and the marvelous woodwind choir sings its unhappy glorious melodies. Altogether it is a stirring performance, as Sunday's audience can attest. The overflow crowd sat entranced and absorbed and at the end gave Dr. Koussevitzky and his men a well-earned tremendous ovation.

D. S. S.

NEWS

Wilmerding Pa

DEC 15 1938

Attend Concert

Miss Evelyn Mease, James Herbert, Earl McWilliams and W. Lester Carver enjoyed the two concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra at Syria Mosque last Saturday night and Sunday afternoon.

MUSICIANS IN NEED

The last eight years have been difficult ones for the average musician, the man who cannot call himself a great artist yet who cannot exist by any other means than music. Indeed, many of our leading performers have not escaped. There is some realization of this by the public. But most people do not know the situation is getting worse. Many older musicians are gradually sinking into helplessness. If age blurs their sight or hearing they are lost. Younger artists, competent graduates of conservatories, are crowding into a profession where the demand for their services is at its lowest ebb.

The Musicians Emergency Fund, with Walter Damrosch as chairman, was organized in 1931 by Mrs. Vincent Astor and other leading citizens to aid musicians temporarily in distress. Two years ago it was necessary to place the organization on a permanent basis. The critical state which affairs have now reached is illustrated by two minor activities of the fund. One is the constant effort to find studios for musicians no longer able to rent space in which to teach. Another is the redemption of instruments which have been sacrificed in pawnshops—the last desperate shift of the musician facing hard times. Those who would like to help the fund may send contributions to its headquarters at Steinway Hall, 113 West Fifty-seventh Street.

RUTLAND, VT.
HERALD

DEC 16 1938

Words Without Music

BY LOUIS REID.

The Boston Symphony orchestra is 58 years old, the Chicago 48, the Philadelphia 39 . . . John Charles Thomas has added Peter De Rose's ballad, "I Heard a Forest Praying" to his repertoire . . . Al Roth is preparing a Children's Symphony, made up largely of arrangements of nursery jingles . . . Rob Roy Peery is the only composer member of the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers to receive two degrees of Doctor of Music this summer. Midland college in Nebraska and Wittenberg in Ohio honored him . . . Dance band-leaders are using nicknames more and more to identify themselves; viz: Red Norvo, Skinnay Ennis, Sandy Williams . . . Debussy's "Clair de Lune" sounds most haunting when played by a full symphony orchestra . . . Ernest Krenek, composer of the first jazz-opera, "Johnny Spielt Auf," is coming to America this winter as a guest conductor, briefly, of the Boston symphony.

PITTSBURG, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

DEC 12 1938

Fritz Reiner Hears Boston Symphony

FRITZ REINER . . . conductor of Pittsburgh's Symphony Orchestra . . . and Mrs. Reiner were in the throng hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra play yesterday afternoon in Syria Mosque.

Among the most youthful concert-goers yesterday were Peggy and Virginia Berdan . . . little daughters of the John Berdans.

They arrived for the concert with their mother and their post-deb aunt Betty Evans.

* * *

In Intermission Throng

JOINING GROUPS of friends during intermission were Mrs. Howard Heinz, Mrs. J. Hanson Rose, Kitty Lou Taylor, Mrs. A. C. Succop, Mrs. Betty Brown, Mrs. T. C. Jenkins and her daughters Mrs. Edwin M. Rhea and Elizabeth Jenkins.

And we had a glimpse of Mrs. Simon T. Patterson, Mrs. John W. Lawrence, Mrs. Frederic Schaefer, Elizabeth Denny, Moorhead B. Holland, Mrs. Bennett Oliver, Mrs. Thomas C. Wurts, Miss Helen Rauh, Miss Marie Dermitt, Helen McCance.

Louise Reed arrived wearing a little black hat with a peaked crown and Persian lamb for trimming. The same fur was used for the tailored Peter Pan collar of her black wool coat.

* * *

Concert-Goers All

At the concert, too were the Joseph H. Bialases . . . with Mrs. Bialas wearing a black hat decorated with Persian lamb to match her fur coat.

Among those we saw in the boxes at the concert were debutante Virginia Witherow . . . post-deb Ann Berger . . . Mrs. H. C. Bughman, Jr. . . . Elizabeth Arbuthnot . . . Horace Forbes Baker.

Music-lovers there too were Mrs. C. S. Wunder, Margaret Rowe, Alice Rust, Mrs. Douglas Stewart, Dr. Thomas S. Baker, Mrs. C. L. Snowdon, Jr., Dorothy Jarvis.

UNION CITY, IND.
GAZETTE

DEC 13 1938

WORDS WITHOUT MUSIC

By LOUIS REID

(Music Features & Photo Syndicate, N. Y.)

CAN'T a more glamorous name than Music Shed be found for the new building which houses the Boston Symphony's annual summer festival in the Berkshires?

PITTSBURG, PA.
PRESS

DEC 12 1938

Ravel Music Stirs Crowd At Mosque

Bostonian Orchestra Turns To Cymbals and Whip In Colorful Novelty

By RALPH LEWANDO

That it is a flaming red letter occasion for local music lovers when the admirable Boston Symphony Orchestra, and its eminent leader, Serge Koussevitzky, come here for their annual brace of concerts, was further emphasized by the concerts they presented Saturday evening and yesterday afternoon in Syria Mosque.

Mr. Lewando

The outpouring of concert goers attending both events were moved to demonstrations of applause by performances replete in artistic achievement.

The evening concert brought to performance Beethoven's 2nd symphony, Ravel's concerto for piano and orchestra, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist, and Brahms' 4th symphony.

The 2nd Beethoven symphony, which will be played here later in the season by Mr. Reiner and the Pittsburgh Symphony Society, is one of the composer's rare lyric flights in happy mood. Here is music easy to listen to. For all the Mozartian and Haydnesque influences that abound therein, there are flashes of the later Beethoven who was to battle fate.

Mr. Koussevitzky and his players bestowed whole hearted interest in projection of this work which was heartily received.

First time in Pittsburgh was the performance of the Ravel piano concerto—not the one for left hand. Here is one of the most scintillant and deft works ever written for the piano and orchestra. Only Maurice Ravel could have composed it.

Full of color that runs the entire gamut of the orchestral and pianistic possibilities, and representing the Nth degree of instrumentation, this work proved a ravishing experience. The orchestration, of tremendous interest, consists of piccolo, flute, oboe, English horn, clarinets in B-flat and E-flat, two bassoons, two horns, trumpet, trombone, tympani, triangle, side drum, bass drum, cymbals, tam-tam, wood-block, whip, harp and strings: quite an assortment of instruments. But with this strange conglomeration the composer has achieved extraordinary results—and, in a highly musical way.

This exotic composition demands exceptional skill on the part of conductor, soloist and orchestra players. This was accorded it to the fullest degree. Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra collaborated magnificently—perfectly!

Mr. Sanroma proved his mettle both as an artist of resourcefulness as well as a technician of unusual attainment. His performance throughout the entire work was deft and dazzling. At its conclusion he was given an ovation which he generously shared with the orchestra.

The playing of the Brahms symphony revealed again the qualities of the conductor and his players that have long since won them their distinguished place in the realm of the world's foremost interpreters of this master's music.

The matinee concert yesterday programmed Haydn's B-flat symphony, No. 102; Debussy's three symphonic sketches—La Mer, and Tschaikowsky's 4th symphony. Old Papa Haydn bubbles over with melodic ardor and rhythmic punch in this work which, though written when he was in the sixties, is full of vitality and expressiveness. Its performance was characteristically neat and appealing.

The Debussy work although given a thoughtful performance that evoked approbation, has been played to better advantage by the Bostonese. There was nothing to find fault with yesterday, but it was evident that the long tour over the past week had somewhat tired both conductor and players, and, as a result, there was an absence of the spontaneity that usually marks their performance of this brilliant number.

A sterling projection of the Tschaikowsky symphony brought to an end a concert that the audience was loathe to leave, remaining to pay a further tribute in applause to a great conductor and a great orchestra.

NEWS

Wilmerding Pa.

DEC 15 1938

Attend Concert

Miss Evelyn Mease, James Herbert, Earl McWilliams and W. Lester Carver enjoyed the two concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra at Syria Mosque last Saturday night and Sunday afternoon.

Orchestra for the Ballet: Is It a Necessary Evil?

B. Mon. Dec. 17/38

Considerations, Aesthetic and Economic, Regarding a Familiar and Vexing Problem

Bidden by the energetic Efrem Kurtz, conductor of the Ballet Russe, the writer mounted two long flights of narrow stairs leading from the stage of the Philadelphia Academy of Music and found himself in the inner sanctum of the storied Stokowski. With the ideal vision of the stage still in his eyes and the splendid playing of the great orchestra still resounding in his ears, he was determined to seek some answer to the question recently propounded in these columns: "Is a bad orchestra a prerequisite of ballet in all but a few chosen cities?"

Mr. Kurtz had been granted the unusual right of inhabiting the holy of holies for his week's stay, and there he sat in the Stokowskian off-the-stage symphony. For the room may well be compared to a modern coloristic score with its orange walls, its structural furniture, and stylized tapestries. Upon the desk, well-lighted by a miniature spotlight, was the manuscript under consideration, its black binding in effective contrast to the skillfully designed orange surface. An adjoining room, painted sea-green, was magnificently and indirectly glowing with a deep blue light.

The Trouble

The ballet's case, it appeared, should be stated in this fashion: The expense of mounting dance productions is so enormous that a considerable chance must be taken in every city in which the organization appears. Even a few houses of less than capacity mean a deficit. Now to present ballet at anything like the standard set and maintained by that wizard of the theater, Serge Diaghilev, economy must not begin with the dancers. Reductions in the stage force mean an immediate descent to the level of the second-rate or worse. Audiences are not accustomed to regular performances of ballet; it is the stage action that interests them most. But to preserve the standard behind the curtain, why not economize in the pit? For audiences are familiar with much of the music used for the ballets; they know how it should sound and will supply whatever deficiency they may find with imagined performance of suitable power. Carrying a basic orchestra of twenty players from city to city, the company engages 20 or so more from the ranks of local theater musicians. Time for rehearsal, however, is so limited, and the amount of music to be studied so great that many of the ballets must be played without study, or virtually so. This accounts for the execrable performances of Tchaikovsky's magnificent "Swan Lake" music and other scores at the recent engagement in the Boston Opera House.

The ballet would rest its argument with the admonition that it is better to have ballet with a poor orchestra than no ballet at all. But that is only a superficial case. It does not consider the inexorable truth that ballet will cease altogether to draw an audience when that audience becomes sufficiently aware that it is being cheated out of the principal pleasure of the ballet—the music, which is the reason and the mainspring of the action. Diaghilev was able to keep his orchestral playing on a level with the resource of his stage, and Massine and certain other moving spirits in the present company must find a way to emulate his example in this most important part of their work. It is axiomatic that good results can never come from indifferent compromises. As much as good ballet is to be admired, it is only great ballet that can succeed. For great ballet, the finest orchestral performance is none too good.

The Solution

Several suggestions have been brought forward for the improvement of the Boston conditions. The most plausible one, and probably the most practicable, calls for the appearance of one of the local Federal orchestras in the ballet's pit. These orchestras have had time to acquire at least some of the good results of working together for a period of years; they have limitless time for rehearsal; they would be taking a real and important part in an artistic undertaking of primary importance—a moral consideration that would be an inspiration to any group of serious artists. If insuperable obstacles stand in the way of this possibility, a simpler suggestion may be advanced. The amount of time for rehearsal must be increased till results approaching the conductor's standards can be achieved. There are other solutions, more or less fantastic, but one of these two practical ones would at least insure the support of a public which will soon discover how badly it has been used during the last five years.

G. H. L. S.

What's Going On in the Arts

Monitor - Dec. 17/38

Boston Symphony Orchestra

One entirely new work and a pair of old symphonic friends comprise the program which Dr. Koussevitzky is placing before the patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week. The Haydn Symphony No. 102 in B flat opens the program, followed yesterday afternoon by the first performance of Vladimir Dukelsky's "Dedicaces" for Pianoforte, Orchestra and Soprano obbligato, the excellent Mr. Sanromá at the piano and Marguerite Porter supplying the soprano voice. The Sibelius Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 43, completes the program.

The program book of this concert, as well as various news columns have informed a presumably interested public that Mr. Dukelsky is a "dual personality of music." He has to his credit a number of works seriously composed for serious consideration, in addition to those in the field of musical comedy. These latter ones, of course, are set forth under the name of Vernon Duke, no doubt to avoid certain musically esthetic complications.

Boston Symphony Orchestra audiences have heard his "Zephyr et Flore" (1927), the Second Symphony (1930), and "Epitaph" (1932). Therefore his style of composition was not wholly unknown. As might be surmised, the new work is virtually key-less in the sense of the old idea of established tonality. The voice, for instance, with which the work is introduced, finds its amiable way through a labyrinth of varying tonal effects of remote connection, although the two meet occasionally; often enough to give the listener reassurance that "it really is written that way." Miss Porter has a melodious voice, but it was scarcely assertive enough for the demands of the opus, although commendably, she compassed the difficult part without score.

The orchestra really had the better of the bargain, and while it appeared to be playing a sort of musical tag, within its own ranks, there was nevertheless a certain coherence of idea which is not always in evidence in the newer scores. This is pictorial music of a sort, but when it is finished, the listener is likely to conclude that the picture was not very interesting.

Mr. Sanromá, however, gave such a brilliant account of himself in the pianoforte section as to win an ovation from the audience. To Dr. Koussevitzky and his men should also go more than passing commendation for an equally brilliant performance. The composer was present and bowed from the stage.

The thoroughly charming Haydn symphony was given a superb performance. Too seldom are its measures interpreted with the finesse which Dr. Koussevitzky exercises. As for Sibelius . . . well, it has been given upon other occasions with what one listener thought was as nearly flawless performance as possible, but there were qualities in evidence yesterday afternoon which show that Dr. Koussevitzky is still studying this score to excellent advantage. The tremendous reaction of the audience at the close of the performance should have satisfied the most exacting conductor.

G. M. S.

TRIBUNE

[illegible] Mass

DEC 8 - 1938

Concert Series Complete Success

The series of Young People's Concerts with Wheeler Beckett conducting an orchestra of Boston Symphony musicians comes to a close with Wednesday's concert. The brief season has been unusually successful, as the entire series was sold out, indicating a definite need for such musical activity in Boston.

Reports from schools which had blocks of seats for this series would indicate that a spring series would be way over-subscribed. The young listeners themselves have been vociferous in their enthusiasm for the first series, and have made innumerable requsts for continued concerts in the spring. This is Boston's opportunity to insure the musical education and intelligence of its younger generations by generously helping to make these concerts financially possible.

RADIO CRAFT

NOV - - 1938

Sales Helps & Deals

Wise dealers will use them; wise mfrs. will emulate them.

Good promotion stunt of release of disc by Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky; timed to hit market when same selection "Lieut. Kiji", was being played by Prof. K of the Symph at the Stockbridge, Mass., Berkshire Music Festival?

A 4-pp. folder describes a number of Philco sales helps, ranging from match books & duplicators to shop coats & decalcomanias. Also included is folder offering test equip't at dealer rates.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Led by Goossens as Guest

Musical Courier

Offers New Instrumental Version of Schumann Carnaval—Koussevitzky Conducts Missa Solemnis—San Carlo Opera Appears —Recitals by Notables

Dec. 15/38

BOSTON.—At each mid-November the musical season in Boston gains momentum for a few weeks until concert-giving is interrupted by arrival of the holidays. The present autumn has proved no exception. In addition to a ten-days' visit by the San Carlo Opera Company, subscription concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and other organizations, there has been a spurt of activity.

Eugene Goossens, leader of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, appeared as first guest conductor this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, November 24, 25 and 26. The week previous, the Boston Orchestra had made its initial trip of the season to New York.

A conductor of forthright temperament with evident fondness for bringing out the kaleidoscopic tints obtainable from the modern orchestra, Mr. Goossens was no stranger in Symphony Hall. Twice before, in 1926 and 1930, he had been guest leader with the Boston Orchestra.

His program this year was novel to most Bostonians, consisting as it did of items new to these concerts or unfamiliar by reason of infrequent performance. In the first category were the Overture to Handel's Occasional Oratorio, and Mr. Goossens' own colorful compositions in the impressionistic manner—Pastoral and Bacchanal. Tschaikowsky's Manfred, symphonic poem, had not been given here in some years. For American concert premiere, Mr. Goossens proffered the piano suite Carnaval by Schumann, as orchestrated by four Russians, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Liadoff, Glazounoff and Tcherepnine.

Missa Solemnis Sung

A notable event was the presentation, a week later by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis. Given only four times previously by the Boston orchestra on special occasions, the great choral score was thus included for the first times in the Friday and Saturday subscription series. The choruses were the Radcliffe Choral Society and Harvard Glee Club, trained by G. Wallace Woodworth. The soloists were Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Anna Kaskas, contralto; John Priebe, tenor, and Norman Cordon, bass. The part for organ was taken by E. Power Biggs. As was the case at the pension fund performance last April, Dr. Koussevitzky's conducting and the general excellence of orchestra, choruses and soloists resulted in an emotionally overwhelming experience. These performances were recorded.

JOURNAL

Fayette [illegible] Pa

DEC 16 1938

Attended Syria Mosque

As guests of May Beegle, manager of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association, Mrs. E. D. Steinman, Sr., and her daughter, Mrs. B. R. Strauser, were present at Syria Mosque last Saturday evening to hear the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra stage one of the finest musical entertainments ever given in the Steel City, according to the management.

The program consisted of the Symphony No. 2 in D major Op. 36 by Beethoven; Concerto for Piano and Orchestra with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist; and Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98 by Brahms.

The Mosque auditorium, as many of our people know is one among the largest in the city, was filled to capacity, every seat being occupied from the main floor to the top balcony.

The applause for the young piano player, Jesus Maria Sanroma, was stupendous. Coming to this country from Puerto Rico, where he was born, he attended the New England Conservatory of Music. He was sent here by the Puerto Rico Government to complete his musical education. He became the official pianist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1926. Since that time he traveled over Europe and America appearing in many recitals.

LOS ANGELES, CAL.
MORNING NEWS

DEC 13 1938

MUSIC

By Dr. BRUNO DAVID USSHER

I AM offering a prize to any one who will convincingly tell me why the Starokadomsky "Concerto for Orchestra" should have been broadcast on Saturday's NBC symphony program. Prokofieff can do so much better what this "new Russian" accomplished. I admit, Starokadomsky practices the virtue of brevity. I know that Koussevitzky played the concerto at a regular Boston symphony concert last season, but time on the air and large audiences are rather precious. I do not expect any answer why two weeks ago Toscanini should have exhumed the dust of a Martuci symphony. Toscanini's choice did not surprise me. He may have wished to pay tribute to his almost forgotten compatriot, but Rodzinski nearly always is an excellent judge of program selections.

PRESS

Norwood - Mass Dec. 16/38

MUSIC

By Philip M. Kravitz

This afternoon and tomorrow evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky will give the first performance of Vladimir Dukelsky's "Dedicaces," a concerto for piano and orchestra, in Symphony Hall. The soloist will be the noted pianist, Jesus Sanroma. The work is a fine bit of "program" music based upon the poem of Guillaume Appolinaise, which cherishes memory pictures of scenes in the city and in the country. A verse sung by a soprano obligato forms an introduction to the work. The soprano soloist will be Marguerite Porter. Other works to be included on this pair of concerts are Haydn's Symphony in B Flat and Sibelius Second Symphony in D Major.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

DEC 18 193

NOTES OF MUSICIANS

NADIA BOULANGER, eminent French musician and pedagogue, has been engaged for a series of lectures to be given Thursday afternoons during February and March in the Recital Hall of the Institute of Musical Art of the Juilliard School of Music. The talks will be concerned with recitatives and arias from the works of Bach; Schubert's sonatas; Chopin's mazurkas; French songs of the Renaissance; other French songs, and the compositions of Stravinsky. The public may register for the course.

The Detroit Symphony Orchestra, under Victor Kolar, at its concerts this Thursday night and Friday afternoon in Detroit, Mich., will be heard in a program composed of Handel's "Water Music," Strauss's "Don Quixote" and the Third symphony of Saint-Säens. In the last-named work Robert Elmore will preside at the organ.

Jacques Abram, Schubert Memorial Award winner, will appear as soloist in MacDowell's piano concerto in D minor at the concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra, under Eugene Ormandy, Dec. 27, in Carnegie Hall. A feature of the program will be Glière's Second symphony, written in 1907 and dedicated to Serge Koussevitzky, who directed the work at its world première in Berlin by the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. The list also contains Geminiani's "Andante," fo strings, harp and organ; the "Pastoral Prelude" from Handel's "Messiah" and Bach's Prelude and Fugue in B minor.

Orchestra for the Ballet: Is It a Necessary Evil?

Dec. 17/

Considerations, Aesthetic and Economic, Regarding a Familiar and Vexing Problem

Bidden by the energetic Efrem Kurtz, conductor of the Ballet Russe, the writer mounted two long flights of narrow stairs leading from the stage of the Philadelphia Academy of Music and found himself in the inner sanctum of the storied Stokowski. With the ideal vision of the stage still in his eyes and the splendid playing of the great orchestra still resounding in his ears, he was determined to seek some answer to the question recently propounded in these columns: "Is a bad orchestra a prerequisite of ballet in all but a few chosen cities?"

Mr. Kurtz had been granted the unusual right of inhabiting the holy of holies for his week's stay, and there he sat in the Stokowskian off-the-stage symphony. For the room may well be compared to a modern coloristic score with its orange walls, its structural furniture, and stylized tapestries. Upon the desk, well-lighted by a miniature spotlight, was the manuscript under consideration, its black binding in effective contrast to the skillfully designed orange surface. An adjoining room, painted sea-green, was magnificently and indirectly glowing with a deep blue light.

The Trouble

The ballet's case, it appeared, should be stated in this fashion: The expense of mounting dance productions is so enormous that a considerable chance must be taken in every city in which the organization appears. Even a few houses of less than capacity mean a deficit. Now to present ballet at anything like the standard set and maintained by that wizard of the theater, Serge Diaghilev, economy must not begin with the dancers. Reductions in the stage force mean an immediate descent to the level of the second-rate or worse. Audiences are not accustomed to regular performances of ballet; it is the stage action that interests them most. But to preserve the standard behind the curtain, why not economize in the pit? For audiences are familiar with much of the music used for the ballets; they know how it should sound and will supply whatever deficiency they may find with imagined performance of suitable power. Carrying a basic orchestra of twenty players from city to city, the company engages 20 or so more from the ranks of local theater musicians. Time for rehearsal, however, is so limited, and the amount of music to be studied so great that many of the ballets must be played without study, or virtually so. This accounts for the execrable performances of Tchaikovsky's magnificent "Swan Lake" music and other scores at the recent engagement in the Boston Opera House.

The ballet would rest its argument with the admonition that it is better to have ballet with a poor orchestra than no ballet at all. But that is only a superficial case. It does not consider the inexorable truth that ballet will cease altogether to draw an audience when that audience becomes sufficiently aware that it is being cheated out of the principal pleasure of the ballet—the music, which is the reason and the mainspring of the action. Diaghilev was able to keep his orchestral playing on a level with the resource of his stage, and Massine and certain other moving spirits in the present company must find a way to emulate his example in this most important part of their work. It is axiomatic that good results can never come from indifferent compromises. As much as good ballet is to be admired, it is only great ballet that can succeed. For great ballet, the finest orchestral performance is none too good.

The Solution

Several suggestions have been brought forward for the improvement of the Boston conditions. The most plausible one, and probably the most practicable, calls for the appearance of one of the local Federal orchestras in the ballet's pit. These orchestras have had time to acquire at least some of the good results of working together for a period of years; they have limitless time for rehearsal; they would be taking a real and important part in an artistic undertaking of primary importance—a moral consideration that would be an inspiration to any group of serious artists. If insuperable obstacles stand in the way of this possibility, a simpler suggestion may be advanced. The amount of time for rehearsal must be increased till results approaching the conductor's standards can be achieved. There are other solutions, more or less fantastic, but one of these two practical ones would at least insure the support of a public which will soon discover how badly it has been used during the last five years.

G. H. L. S.

What's Going On in the Arts

Monitor – Dec. 17/38

Boston Symphony Orchestra

One entirely new work and a pair of old symphonic friends comprise the program which Dr. Koussevitzky is placing before the patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week. The Haydn Symphony No. 102 in B flat opens the program, followed yesterday afternoon by the first performance of Vladimir Dukelsky's "Dedicaces" for Pianoforte, Orchestra and Soprano obbligato, the excellent Mr. Sanromá at the piano and Marguerite Porter supplying the soprano voice. The Sibelius Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 43, completes the program.

The program book of this concert, as well as various news columns have informed a presumably interested public that Mr. Dukelsky is a "dual personality of music." He has to his credit a number of works seriously composed for serious consideration, in addition to those in the field of musical comedy. These latter ones, of course, are set forth under the name of Vernon Duke, no doubt to avoid certain musically esthetic complications.

Boston Symphony Orchestra audiences have heard his "Zephyr et Flore" (1927), the Second Symphony (1930), and "Epitaph" (1932). Therefore his style of composition was not wholly unknown. As might be surmised, the new work is virtually key-less in the sense of the old idea of established tonality. The voice, for instance, with which the work is introduced, finds its amiable way through a labyrinth of varying tonal effects of remote connection, although the two meet occasionally; often enough to give the listener reassurance that "it really is written that way." Miss Porter has a melodious voice, but it was scarcely assertive enough for the demands of the opus, although commendably, she compassed the difficult part without score.

The orchestra really had the better of the bargain, and while it appeared to be playing a sort of musical tag, within its own ranks, there was nevertheless a certain coherence of idea which is not always in evidence in the newer scores. This is pictorial music of a sort, but when it is finished, the listener is likely to conclude that the picture was not very interesting.

Mr. Sanromá, however, gave such a brilliant account of himself in the pianoforte section as to win an ovation from the audience. To Dr. Koussevitzy and his men should also go more than passing commendation for an equally brilliant performance. The composer was present and bowed from the stage.

The thoroughly charming Haydn symphony was given a superb performance. Too seldom are its measures interpreted with the finesse which Dr. Koussevitzky exercises. As for Sibelius . . . well, it has been given upon other occasions with what one listener thought was as nearly flawless performance as possible, but there were qualities in evidence yesterday afternoon which show that Dr. Kousevitzy is still studying this score to excellent advantage. The tremendous reaction of the audience at the close of the performance should have satisfied the most exacting conductor.

G. M. S.

TRIBUNE

Hyde Park - Mass

DEC 8 - 1938

Concert Series Complete Success

The series of Young People's Concerts with Wheeler Beckett conducting an orchestra of Boston Symphony musicians comes to a close with Wednesday's concert. The brief season has been unusually successful, as the entire series was sold out, indicating a definite need for such musical activity in Boston.

Reports from schools which had blocks of seats for this series would indicate that a spring series would be way over-subscribed. The young listeners themselves have been vociferous in their enthusiasm for the first series, and have made innumerable requsts for continued concerts in the spring. This is Boston's opportunity to insure the musical education and intelligence of its younger generations by generously helping to make these concerts financially possible.

RADIO CRAFT

NOV - - 1938

Sales Helps & Deals

Wise dealers will use them; wise mfrs. will emulate them.

Good promotion stunt of release of disc by Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky; timed to hit market when same selection "Lieut. Kiji", was being played by Prof. K of the Symph at the Stockbridge, Mass., Berkshire Music Festival?

A 4-pp. folder describes a number of Philco sales helps, ranging from match books & duplicators to shop coats & decalcomanias. Also included is folder offering test equip't at dealer rates.

LOS ANGELES, CAL.
MORNING NEWS

DEC 13 1938

MUSIC

By Dr. BRUNO DAVID USSHER

I AM offering a prize to any one who will convincingly tell me why the Starokadomsky "Concerto for Orchestra" should have been broadcast on Saturday's NBC symphony program. Prokofieff can do so much better what this "new Russian" accomplished. I admit, Starokadomsky practices the virtue of brevity. I know that Koussevitzky played the concerto at a regular Boston symphony concert last season, but time on the air and large audiences are rather precious. I do not expect any answer why two weeks ago Toscanini should have exhumed the dust of a Martucci symphony. Toscanini's choice did not surprise me. He may have wished to pay tribute to his almost forgotten compatriot, but Rodzinski nearly always is an excellent judge of program selections.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

DEC 18 1938

NOTES OF MU

NADIA BOULANGER, eminent French musician and pedagogue, has been engaged for a series of lectures to be given Thursday afternoons during February and March in the Recital Hall of the Institute of Musical Art of the Juilliard School of Music. The talks will be concerned with recitatives and arias from the works of Bach; Schubert's sonatas; Chopin's mazurkas; French songs of the Renaissance; other French songs, and the compositions of Stravinsky. The public may register for the course.

The Detroit Symphony Orchestra, under Victor Kolar, at its concerts this Thursday night and Friday afternoon in Detroit, Mich., will be heard in a program composed of Handel's "Water Music," Strauss's "Don Quixote" and the Third symphony of Saint-Säens. In the last-named work Robert Elmore will preside at the organ.

Jacques Abram, Schubert Memorial Award winner, will appear as soloist in MacDowell's piano concerto in D minor at the concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra, under Eugene Ormandy, Dec. 27, in Carnegie Hall. A feature of the program will be Glière's Second symphony, written in 1907 and dedicated to Serge Koussevitzky, who directed the work at its world première in Berlin by the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. The list also contains Geminiani's "Andante," for strings, harp and organ; the "Pastoral Prelude" from Handel's "Messiah" and Bach's Prelude and Fugue in B minor.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Led by Goossens as Guest

Musical Courier

Offers New Instrumental Version of Schumann Carnaval—Koussevitzky Conducts Missa Solemnis—San Carlo Opera Appears—Recitals by Notables

Dec. 15/38

BOSTON.—At each mid-November the musical season in Boston gains momentum for a few weeks until concert-giving is interrupted by arrival of the holidays. The present autumn has proved no exception. In addition to a ten-days' visit by the San Carlo Opera Company, subscription concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and other organizations, there has been a spurt of activity.

Eugene Goossens, leader of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, appeared as first guest conductor this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, November 24, 25 and 26. The week previous, the Boston Orchestra had made its initial trip of the season to New York.

A conductor of forthright temperament with evident fondness for bringing out the kaleidoscopic tints obtainable from the modern orchestra, Mr. Goossens was no stranger in Symphony Hall. Twice before, in 1926 and 1930, he had been guest leader with the Boston Orchestra.

His program this year was novel to most Bostonians, consisting as it did of items new to these concerts or unfamiliar by reason of infrequent performance. In the first category were the Overture to Handel's Occasional Oratorio, and Mr. Goossens' own colorful compositions in the impressionistic manner—Pastoral and Bacchanal. Tschaikowsky's Manfred, symphonic poem, had not been given here in some years. For American concert premiere, Mr. Goossens proffered the piano suite Carnaval by Schumann, as orchestrated by four Russians, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Liadoff, Glazounoff and Tcherepnine.

MISSA SOLEMNIS SUNG

A notable event was the presentation, a week later by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis. Given only four times previously by the Boston orchestra on special occasions, the great choral score was thus included for the first times in the Friday and Saturday subscription series. The choruses were the Radcliffe Choral Society and Harvard Glee Club, trained by G. Wallace Woodworth. The soloists were Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Anna Kaskas, contralto; John Priebe, tenor, and Norman Cordon, bass. The part for organ was taken by E. Power Biggs. As was the case at the pension fund performance last April, Dr. Koussevitzky's conducting and the general excellence of orchestra, choruses and soloists resulted in an emotionally overwhelming experience. These performances were recorded.

JOURNAL

Fayette City - Pa.

DEC 16 1938

Attended Syria Mosque

As guests of May Beegle, manager of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association, Mrs. E. D. Steinman, Sr., and her daughter, Mrs. B. R. Strauser, were present at Syria Mosque last Saturday evening to hear the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra stage one of the finest musical entertainments ever given in the Steel City, according to the management.

The program consisted of the Symphony No. 2 in D major Op. 36 by Beethoven; Concerto for Piano and Orchestra with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist; and Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98 by Brahms.

The Mosque auditorium, as many of our people know is one among the largest in the city, was filled to capacity, every seat being occupied from the main floor to the top balcony.

The applause for the young piano player, Jesus Maria Sanroma, was stupendous. Coming to this country from Puerto Rico, where he was born, he attended the New England Conservatory of Music. He was sent here by the Puerto Rico Government to complete his musical education. He became the official pianist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1926. Since that time he traveled over Europe and America appearing in many recitals.

PRESS

Norwood - Mass Dec. 16/38

MUSIC

By Philip M. Kravitz

This afternoon and tomorrow evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky will give the first performance of Vladimir Dukelsky's "Dedicaces," a concerto for piano and orchestra, in Symphony Hall. The soloist will be the noted pianist, Jesus Sanroma. The work is a fine bit of "program" music based upon the poem of Guillaume Appolinaise, which cherishes memory pictures of scenes in the city and in the country. A verse sung by a soprano obligato forms an introduction to the work. The soprano soloist will be Marguerite Porter. Other works to be included on this pair of concerts are Haydn's Symphony in B Flat and Sibelius Second [illegible]

105

A LAMENT FOR THE STOLEN

Tribune Dec. 1938

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

A NEW work of remarkable character, for orchestra and women's voices, will have its first performance anywhere at the concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra falling on the last two days of the old year, in Philadelphia. Since the work is extraordinary, and since it is unlikely to be heard in New York, some description of it on this page seems in order.

The work was composed by Harl McDonald, whose scores have been made known to us in recent years at concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra under Mr. Stokowski and Mr. Ormandy.

William J. Henderson once remarked of Harl McDonald that he is "as American as Pike's Peak." The characterization is just. McDonald was born on his father's cattle ranch in the high Rockies, divided his boyhood existence between music and horses, became a church choirmaster while he worked for a degree, and, on the side, took up boxing. Later, he became teacher of composition and choral conductor at the University of Pennsylvania, wrote many works in various forms, and (in order that he might never have to reproach himself with being idle) undertook research work at the University in the field of electrical engineering and musical physics.

His latest work is the most unusual that he has undertaken. I shall let Professor McDonald tell of it in his own words.

* * *

A Protest Against Kidnaping

"THIS new work of mine," he says, "is entitled 'Lament for the Stolen.' It is a voicing of the universal maternal protest against kidnaping.

"The plan and subject-matter originated with Mrs. Henry S. Drinker jr., member of the well known Philadelphia family whose activities in the fields of musicology, chamber music, choral music, etc., have attracted wide attention. In the course of their varied musical activities and studies the Drinker family have become convinced that too much of the literature for Women's Chorus is based upon texts that are inappropriate to women, or in which women's chorus is used as a poor substitute for mixed voices.

"Mrs. Drinker believed that a poem which touched, in one way or another, on the maternal instinct, would provide a foundation for a composition that was entirely of and for women. After discussing the matter with Katherine Garrison Chapin (Mrs. Francis Biddle), the subject was decided upon, and Miss Chapin wrote the poem. It is primarily a feminine protest against the horror of kidnaping; and the fact that the outline follows that of the Lindbergh tragedy is of secondary importance.

* * *

The Anguish of Mothers

"THE theme of the poem is a sympathetic lament of women all over the world for the mother of a child who has been stolen and killed. It is more than a simple lament or dirge, because it rises to dramatic heights in an impassioned protest against a monstrous wrong. The material is handled with simplicity and directness. Like a Greek chorus, it both tells the story and voices the emotion of those who suffer with the victims.

"Some have questioned the wisdom of choosing for musical treatment a kind of subject-matter that is closely related to contemporary life. The fact that this tragedy touches closely the lives and sympathies of the average American parents, and that it has already become part of the folk history of this country, influenced me greatly in my work.

"Perhaps I should say that I do not believe it is necessary to employ an orchestra and chorus to proclaim humanity's abhorrence of child-killing; and that I do not think a concert-hall performance of such a work will do anything to rally the mothers of America to further condemnation of kidnaping. I am primarily concerned with the fact that such a subject is of more immediate and vital concern to me than, let us say, the tragedy of Oedipus; and that it is one of the very few subjects that can be regarded as essentially appropriate for expression in a major work for women's chorus and orchestra."

* * *

Women and Choral Singing

MRS. DRINKER, who suggested the subject of "Lament for the Stolen," has expressed her concern about the lack of suitable choral works for intelligent women to sing. "Some years ago," says Mrs. Drinker, "I undertook the absorbing task of making a catalogue of the music published for women's voices, and discovered, to my surprise and dismay, that, although a vast quantity of material is available, the quality of it is manifestly inferior to the great works for mixed chorus, or to the religious music intended for liturgical choirs of men and boys. The reasons why really great music has not been written for women seem to me to be based upon much more profound causes than the usual excuses of the natural limitations of women's voices.

"For one thing, the texts selected by composers are not related to the noblest aspects of women's lives. The reasons they are not so related is because of the attitude of the church toward women. In the Middle Ages every artistic impuse found its outlet in the worship of the Holy Mother and her Child Jesus, and every composer used the church service as his medium of expression and for the development of art forms. In this great stream of liturgic music women were denied participation, their places in the choir being taken by boys and castrati. The Magnificat, the Ave Maria, and the Stabat Mater, expressions of the deepest emotions of women, which should be the basis of a rich, classical literature for women's voices, have always been sung by men and boys. And when the creative imagination of musicians was finally turned into secular channels, the social status of women had been firmly established by centuries of repression. Themes of grandeur and nobility did not seem appropriate for creatures who perhaps had no souls, and certainly did not enjoy minds.

"The desire of the girl for womanhood, the instinctive loyalty of mothers; the grief of women in war time; their joy at the safe return of the soldiers—these are motives which command the respect of every one; and yet composers have passed them by in silence and have chosen instead trivial texts about angels, fairies, the bevy of young girls, or the most sentimental aspect of the Madonna and the Child. It has been clearly demonstrated that all through the Romantic period men did not respect the imagination, the intelligence, or the spiritual qualities with which women are endowed by nature. Composers who happened to fancy some particular group took a musical holiday, as it were, and transcribed simple, charming folk-tunes, although at the same time they were planning great oratorios and operas. They 'wrote down' to women, and frequently ignored possibilities for the women's chorus in its legitimate field. . . .

* * *

A Collective Expression

"'THE LAMENT FOR THE STOLEN' fulfills every requirement for choral music for women's voices. Katherine Chapin's beautiful and moving poem expresses the collective emotions of women, regardless of race, creed, or station of life. Harl McDonald's perception of the agony endured by these tragic figures is reproduced in stirring and noble music which is absolutely appropriate for the subject, and which features the voices of women. The piece could not be sung by men or boys. It is for mothers—or for those who may become mothers.

"It is, therefore, by the use of such subjects as are related to women's inner lives, and which are treated with artistic imagination, that a classical literature for women's voices may be built up, and that the women's chorus—their organ for collective expression—may be an integral part of the musical life of our time."

EASTON, PA.
EXPRESS
DEC 14 1938

Symphony and Miss Wysor Acclaimed in Concert Here

Lehigh Valley Orchestra Under Weingartner Gives Charity Performance Before Enthusiastic Large Audience at High School

The Lehigh Valley Symphony and Elizabeth Wysor, contralto, shared notable honors last night in the presentation of a concert for the benefit of the Northampton County Association for the Blind, probably the most ambitious musical event in this section since the days of the old Lehigh Valley Symphony. The audience was large and its appreciation was obvious and abundant.

The occasion was a triumph for the orchestra, headed by A. M. Weingartner, veteran master of the podium, because the program last night was the most comprehensive attempted since its organization last year and it was performed magnificently. Last night's music would have been an artistic achievement and a musical event had it been played to an empty auditorium. That it was heard by a large and enthusiastic audience heightened immediate reaction and should go far toward providing the orchestra with the type of consistent support essential to its continuance on its present basis.

Investment?

Of the orchestra's work as a whole, of the purity of its string choir, its split-second response to direction and the unified approach to difficult scores which brought the best audience response it has yet encountered, it is enough to say that this is very close to the brand of entertainment which music patrons are accustomed to travel from sixty to seventy miles to enjoy and to buy at prices approximately six times as great as last night's admission. If last night's concert aids Mr. Weingartner, who has produced the orchestra mostly from faith and a knowledge of the ability present and usable in this community, the effort which went into it will not have been in vain.

The occasion was an important one in relation to the soloist because it represented Miss Wysor's first appearance here with a symphonic accompaniment. The Easton of her school days knew her as a young musician with a voice of almost incredible vibrancy and depth. The audience which heard her recital here last Winter had the opportunity to see what study abroad and several seasons of concert work had done for her stage presence and technical efficiency.

Symphonic Setting

But Miss Wysor needs a symphonic accompaniment to reach her highest degree of artistic expression, and it is significant that some of her most important successes have been in appearances with symphonies—the Boston Symphony, the Cincinnati Symphony, and the Toronto Symphony. Last night she had the proper setting for the higher registers of her three-octave voice, an effective contrast for the cello-like low tones which make her almost unique among the younger singers of the current concert stage, and the orchestral stimulus to the sort of dramatic interpretation for which she is fitted and which should be a part of her ultimate destiny. The result was a supremely enjoyable expeience.

Mr. Weingartner was at his best. With enough actual playing time behind his organization to fit the student players into the stride of the seasoned veterans, he was master of the situation, daring to call for the sort of interpretation possible only when a conductor knows and understands his men. The work of the first violins in the "Dance of the Comedians," the second violins and cellos in "Kamennoi-Ostrow," and the brass in Rossini's rollicking "Thieving Magpie" overture were particular tributes to his genius in leadership.

'Silent Night'

Both of Miss Wysor's scheduled numbers, and her encore, "Annie Laurie," were well received. The aria from "Samson and Delilah" was performed with more assurance. The Wolf number, however, is more suited to her gradual approach to intense feeling, and would be more enjoyable with a less eccentric orchestration.

The program:

"Dream Music" and "Hymn," from "Haensel and Gretel" (Humperdinck); "Dance" from "Rustic Wedding" Symphony (Goldmark); "Amour Viens Aider" from "Samson and Delilah" (Saint-Saens); "Praeludium" (Jarnefelt); "Dance of the Comedians" from "The Bartered Bride" (Smetana); "A Musical Snuff Box" (Liadow); "Mignon" (Wolf); "Kamennoi-Ostrow" (Rubinstein);

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER - CITIZEN
DEC 14 1938

MOMENTS MUSICAL

By SIDNEY R. FLEET

To Whom Announcements and Communications on Musical Matters May Be Addressed at This Office.

Boston Programs.

Back from a tour, the Boston Symphony Orchestra resumes the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts this week. The program will include a first performance of Vladimir Dukelsky's "Dedications," a concerto for piano and orchestra in which J. M. Sanroma will be the pianist; Haydn's Symphony in B flat and the Second Symphony of Sibelius.

Next week by reason of the Christmas season, it should be noticed that the evening concert is set for Thursday instead of Saturday. The two concerts in the supplementary series come on Monday evening, Dec. 26 and Tuesday afternoon, Dec. 27 when the guest artist will be Anja Ignatius, young Finnish violinist, in the Sibelius concerto.

CORSICANA, TEX.
SUN
DEC 14 1938

NEVIN CLUB MET IN REGULAR SESSION ON SATURDAY AFTERNOON

MISS EMMA DORCAS MORGAI PROGRAM CHAIRMAN SESSION IN KING HOME

Members of the Nevin Club enjoyed the last meeting of 1938 on Saturday afternoon at the home of Mrs. Louise Pace King on West Third avenue. Mrs. Joel Trimble, president, called the meeting to order, and Mrs. R. W. Gross read minutes of the last meeting.

Mrs. Trimble read a letter from Mrs. R. T. Craig, Athens, president of the State Federation of Music Clubs, which urged all music club members to invest in Federation Christmas seals, the proceeds of which go for the progress of musical art in the state and nation.

Mrs. Howard Allen was introduced and welcomed into the club as a new member.

As a pleasing prelude to the program for the afternoon, those present had the pleasure of hearing a symphonic presentation on the handsome new Capehart machine of the King home, and it was thoroughly enjoyed by all. The recording was Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Koussevitsky.

At the conclusion of this feature, the program chairman for the day, Miss Emma Dorcas Morgan, took charge of the meeting. The subject of Miss Morgan's discussion was "Early Christian Art—the Romanesque and Gothic Period," the text for same having been taken from "The Arts" by Willem Hendrik Van Loon, the club's study course for the year.

Effect of Christianity.

Miss Morgan spoke of the effect of Christianity upon early art, and of its adaptation to the needs of worship. Early Christian art is said to have begun soon after the spread of Christianity, and lingered at Rome until the advent of the Renaissance in the 15th century.

The leader discussed Byzantine architecture of the Eastern empire, as distinguished from the early Christian of the western, stating that its principal characteristic was the development of domical structures. Glittering mosaic decoration of interiors was said to have been another striking feature of Byzantine art.

Characteristics of the Romanesque and Gothic periods in the world of art were presented in an informational manner by the speaker, whose discourse was well prepared, and proved an interesting resume of the highlights of early Christian art.

Mrs. Boyce Martin opened the musical program with a splendid interpretation of "My Desire" by Nevin, which brought forth much applause. Edward French Hearn was accompanist for the number.

"Romance D' Amour"

As a pianistic contribution to the program, Mrs. Jimmie Mansfield played in an effective manner, "Romance D'Amour" by Schuett, which was well received.

Miss Hortense Davant was responsible for the dramatic presentation of the afternoon, "Four Measures in the Key of "G," which proved to be a stirring Christmas story well told, and for which she was rewarded with enthusiastic applause.

The concluding number on the program was an original piano selection, by Edward French Hearn, "Autumn Reverie" which was received with such hearty approval that those present agreed that more original work should be encouraged and presented by Nevin Club members.

The next regular meeting o the club will be held on January 7th at the home of Mrs. Edward M. Polk with Mrs. M. S. Dockum as program chairman for th day. The subject for discussion at that time will be "The Spirit of the Renaissance" (Floren and the Italian Picture F[illegible]ory

106

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

DEC 15 1938

Federal Subsidy For Arts Urged

NEW YORK, Dec. 14 (AP).—Walter Damrosch has evolved still another plan for a Federal Bureau of the Fine Arts, and has incorporated his suggestions into a bill to be presented the next Congress. His aid has been N. Henry Josephs, the attorney who acted as counsel against the recent Pepper-Coffee bills at a Senate subcommittee hearing.

The bill has no connection with relief, Dr. Damrosch explained. Neither does it contemplate establishing a federal conservatory of music, a national theater, nor any of the other frequently mentioned projects.

A National Bureau of Fine Arts would be created, to be administered by a board of eleven unpaid trustees appointed by the President. Nine of these would be directly connected with the arts and not employes of any governmental agency.

These would appoint directors and secretaries, one each for five departments: music, theater and dance, literature, graphic and plastic arts, architecture. The directors would formulate plans for advancing their respective arts, using first existing agencies and advancing farther as money and material became available.

Dr. Damrosch's plan would include such activities, he explained, as subsidizing the really fine orchestras, such as the Boston Symphony, in shorter seasons ~~in lesser cities,~~ subsidizing such organizations as the Metropolitan Museum of Art, so they might place their works on exhibition through the country, and the arranging of competitions which would advance the interest of the arts.

SPRINGFIELD, O.
SUN

DEC 16 1938

FEDERAL BUREAU OF ARTS PLANNED

Walter Damrosch Incorporates Idea Into Bill For Congress

NEW YORK, Dec. 15. — Walter Damrosch has evolved still another plan for a federal bureau of the

---

PRESS
Dearborn, Mich

DEC 15 1938

Ghione To Offer Two New Works

Fifth Symphony Concert Marked By First Performances

The Detroit Symphony Orchestra conducted by Maestro Franco Ghione, will play the fifth subscription concert of its silver jubilee season in Orchestra Hall at 8:30 p.m. tonight.

Four numbers will comprise the program, two of which, Ernest Bloch's "Four Episodes", and Albert Roussel's "Le Festin de l'Araignee," (The Spiders Banquet) will be given first performances in Detroit. The two other compositions will be Wagner's Siegfried Idyll and the Fifth Symphony in E minor, Op. 95 (From the New World) of Antonin Dvorak.

Bloch's work, for chamber orchestra, is made up of four independent musical moods, best explained by the titles to the several sections —Humoresque Macabre, Obsession, Calm and Chinese. The composition was awarded the Carolyn Beebe, New York Chamber Music Society prize, including publication, given by C. C. Birchard through the National Federation of Music Clubs. Its first performance was by the society and shortly afterward, in December 1927, it was played from manuscript by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"Le Festin de l'Araignee," by the French composer whose death occurred last year, is music for a ballet which was inspired by Fabre's "Studies of Insect life". The music at the concert will be in the form of a suite, published in 1913, and first performed in New York in 1914.

RADIO GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.

DEC 17 1938

RECORDS OF THE WEEK

A department reviewing the recordings of your radio favorites

Classical:

SIBELIUS AGAIN—Sibelius, mighty Finn, greatest of living composers, receives further attention this week with an album recorded by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony of his Fifth Symphony and the musical saga, Pohjola's Daughter.

The album duplicates one issued a couple of years ago by Victor, imported from the Sibelius Society of London, which includes both of the above, plus another tone poem, Tapiola. (Album 333. Robert Kajanus and the London Symphony.)

But Mr. Koussevitzky's versions are to be preferred—stronger and more colorful and vital. The symphony is in three movements, and albeit magnificent, not quite as pungent as the Fourth or Seventh, to our ears. It was written during the World War and is full of the richness that is Sibelius. Pohjola's Daughter is one of the numerous legends of Finnish mythology which Sibelius has set to music, and in which he is at his greatest.

All in all, a fine release. (Victor 474. $10.)

CLEVELAND, O.
NEWS

DEC 15 1938

Symphony Prodigy Here

THE newest sensation of the music world, Dimitri Mitropoulos, is conducting the Cleveland orchestra at Severance hall tonight. Minneapolis, whose orchestra he regularly leads, is at his feet. He is the only guest conductor of the Olympian Boston symphony who ever was called back for a second concert, and he is one of the rare conductors who can double as a soloist and leader.

This feat he did first one night in Paris when the pianist-soloist failed to appear. Conductor Mitropoulos sat down and played the piano score, occasionally waving a conductor's hand toward the orchestra, which responded perfectly. It was a success and he has repeated it since.

Dr. Mitropoulos is under contract to Minneapolis expiring next year, and in music circles there is much excitement as to whether he is headed for a larger orchestra. That Conductor Eugene Ormandy did two years ago when he left Minneapolis to take the Philadelphia orchestra.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

DEC 16 1938

At Worcester, the Roth String quartet, composed of Feri Rith, Jeno Antal, Ferenc Molnar and Janos Scholz began this past Sunday an inviting series of free public concerts at the Worcester Art museum. Next to be head on January 22 is the Pasquier trio, so popular last year with the Tuesday Morning Music club here that a return engagement is scheduled this year.

The Boston Society of Ancient Instruments will be heard February 19. Pierre Luboshutz and Genia Nemenoff will be heard in a joint recital for two pianos, March 19.

This year the museum concert program will include a special group of three Wednesday evening concerts of chamber music for museum members only. They have been arranged by Nicholas Slonimsky and will be presented in the court at 8.30 o'clock. A string ensemble will be heard January 25; a chamber orchestra composed of Boston Symphony orchestra members, March 22; and chamber music by Alfredo Saint-Malo of Panama, violinist, and Gerard Haft of Holland, 'cellist, with Mr Slonimsky at the piano, February 15.

COLUMBUS, O.
CITIZEN

DEC 18 1938

Koussevitzky Records Sibelius

Without breathing a word even in very small type about Christmas gifts elsewhere on this page, we break down in this corner with more than a word about a recent release of Victor's that would make many a record player very, very happy.

It's the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius as performed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and, everything considered, it's probably one of the most important releases in many months.

Whether or not Sibelius ranks with or outranks his symphonic predecessors, Beethoven and Brahms, he is the composer in whom American music-lovers are most interested at present, according to numerous polls and surveys.

His Symphony No. 5 in E-flat major is one of his greatest works. The exacting Dr. Koussevitzky is one of his most sensitive interpreters. The Boston Symphony's position is one of unquestioned preeminence. That makes a combination that's hard to beat.

This is not the first recording of the work—the London Symphony directed by Robert Kajanus has done it before—but it is considered the finest. Here are dramatic sweep, melodic interest and exciting orchestra color, all sensitively conceived and brilliantly executed.

Mechanically it's of the finest. The set number is M-474.

Included among Victor's recent single record releases are Marian Anderson's singing of "Komm Susser Tod" of Bach and Handel's "Siciliana" (No. 1939). The contralto's voice records beautifully, and the poignancy of the Bach piece is an ideal expression for it.

There's also that great favorite with radio and concert audiences alike: John Charles Thomas' rendition of "I Heard a Forest Praying," with the equally dramatic "Children of Men" cut on the disc's other side. (No. 1940).

Single records of the standby carols, "Silent Night" and "Hark the Herald Angels Sing" as done by a chorus with Lew White at the organ are adequate but not a "must" addition to your collection. —GSH.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
ENQUIRER

DEC 18 1938

SYMPHONY DATED 1907

The Gliere Symphony, written in 1907, was dedicated to Serge Koussevitzky, now conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The first performance was by the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra in 1908 when Koussevitzky conducted. The work is numbered Opus 25 and is in four movements.

Reinhold Moritzovich Gliere was born at Kiev, Russia, Jan. 11, 1875. He is now teacher of composition at the Moscow Conservatory, where years before he was awarded the gold medal as the best student in the composition class. Several of his works, notably his Third Symphony entitled "Ilia Mourometz," his "Sailors' Dance," from the ballet, "Red Poppy," and a symphonic poem, "The Sirens," have been performed by the Orchestra.

CAMDEN, N. J.
COURIER

DEC 16 1938

Orchestra Will Play Christmas Music In Change of Schedule

Geminiani, Haendel, Bach, and Gliere on Program; Pianist is Soloist

Christmas concerts by the Philabeen moved forward to avoid a performance on Christmas Eve, Dec. 24.

For the eleventh pair of concerts Eugene Ormandy has programed Gliere's Symphony No. 2 in C Minor for Large Orchestra for a performance that is the first in this country.

He will pay deference to the holiday season with Haendel's Christmas Music from "The Messiah" and a composition by Dr. Herbert J. Tily, entitled "Christmas Morning" which will be played as an after-piece. The program will open with Geminiani's "Andante for Strings, Harp and Organ" and offer also Bach's Prelude and Fugue in B minor.

Soloist for the occasion is a young American pianist, Jacques Abram, winner of the Schubert Memorial Award, the greatest prize offered to youthful artists, which carries with it two appearances with the Philadelphia Orchestra in this city and one in New York. Mr. Abram will play Edward MacDowell's Concerto Number Two in D minor for Piano and Orchestra which was performed first with the orchestra by the composer himself at a concert on February 6, 1901. Fritz Scheel conducted. Subsequently the work was offered by Teresa Carreno and John Powell, and was played last with the orchestra by Leo Ornstein at the concerts of March 7 and 8, 1919.

Jacques Abram, born in Houston, Texas, began his serious study of piano at the age of six. One of his first teachers was Arthur Shattuck. He was awarded a scholarship at the Curtis Institute of Music where he studied with David Saperton and Josef Hofmann. Another fellowship took him to the Juilliard Graduate School in New York with Ernest Hutcheson as his teacher.

In addition to winning the Schubert Memorial Award, Mr. Abram was the national winner at the Federation of Music Clubs contest at Indianapolis in April, 1937.

Jacques Abram has played in public since childhood. He has appeared as soloist with the Houston Symphony Orchestra, the Chatauqua Symphony Orchestra under Albert Stoessel and Georges Barrere.

The Gliere Symphony, written in 1907 and published in Leipsic five years later, was dedicated by the composer to Serge Koussevitzky, now conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The first performance of the work was by the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra in 1908 when Koussevitzky conducted. The work is numbered Opus 25 and is in four movements.

Reinhold Moritzovich Gliere was born at Kiew, Russia, Jan. 11, 1875. He is now teacher of composition at the Moscow Conservatory. The composer was educated at the Moscow Conservatory which he entered in 1894 as a pupil of Johann Hrjimaly in violin and in musical theory of Taneiew and Ippolitow-Ivanow. His career at the conservatory was distinguished; he was awarded the gold medal as the best student in the composition class. Gliere lived for some years in Berlin, but shortly before the Russian revolution returned to his home city of Kiew where he became director of the Conservatory of the Imperial Musical Society. Several of his works, notably his third symphony entitled "Ilia Mourometz," his "Sailor's Dance" and a Symphonic Poem, "The Sirens," have been performed by the orchestra.

Francesco Geminiani, born at Lucca, Italy, in 1667, was eminent not only as a violinist and composer, but also as a pedagogue. He published treatises on the art of accompaniment, on the art of playing the violin, the 'cello, the harpsichord, the guitar and the flute, and he threw in for good measure, a "Treatise on Good Taste."

When Geminiani went to England in 1714 he had studied violin in Rome with Corelli and is supposed to have had instruction in composition from Alessandro Scarlatti. Acquiring a reputation as a virtuoso, Geminiani was invited to play at a Court concert. He consented only on the condition that Haendel, whom he greatly admired, should provide the accompaniment.

The composer's most valuable contribution to the literature of the violin is his treatise "The Art of Playing the Violin," Opus 9, the first of its kind, anticipating by 22 years the "Violinschule" of Leopold Mozart. Geminiani's work has the particular merit of preserving the principles of violin playing as they were finally established by Corelli.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

DEC 18 1938

THE ORCHESTRAS

CHARLES HAUBIEL'S Passacaglia in A minor, "The Plane Beyond," one of the two works which shared the Philharmonic-Symphony Society's latest prize for a short orchestral American composition, will be played for the first time in this afternoon's Philharmonic concert in Carnegie Hall under John Barbirolli's direction.

Hortense Monath, American pianist, will be this afternoon's soloist in Beethoven's concerto in C major, with the Franck symphony completing the program. Tomorrow night Josef Hofmann, who has contributed his services, will be the soloist in the annual special concert for the Philharmonic-Symphony pension fund, playing Beethoven's "Emperor" piano concerto. Mr. Barbirolli also will conduct Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and second symphony. Nineteen former members of the orchestra are now receiving annual pensions from this fund, which is sustained by dues of members of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society (who are entitled to tickets for the special pension fund concerts), the proceeds of these special concerts, income from investments and private contributions.

Mr. Barbirolli's program for next Thursday night, Friday afternoon and Sunday afternoon (Christmas Day) in Carnegie Hall will be of a duly seasonal character, with the chorus of the Art of Musical Russia, whose conductor is Eugene Fuerst, and Germaine Bruyere, soprano, and Fritz Lechner, barytone, as assisting artists. The chorus will sing Tchaikovsky's "Legende," one of sixteen songs for children with a poem by Plesheyeff, in an arrangement by Mr. Fuerst, three carols by the late Peter Warlock (Philip Heseltine), Vaughan Williams's Fantasia on Christmas Carols and three chorales from Bach's Christmas Oratorio. The orchestra will play Handel's overture to the "Messiah" and Beethoven's fourth symphony. The Vaughan Williams work is founded on four traditional English carols and fragments of other carol tunes.

Mr. Haubiel, who was born in Delta, Ohio, studied the piano with Rudolph Ganz and the Lhevinnes. He has been assistant professor of composition and theory at New York University for fifteen years, and was for eight years a member of the Institute of Musical Art piano faculty. The Passacaglia, which takes about fifteen minutes to play, is in two large divisions and consists of seventeen variations on a ground bass.

Next Philadelphia Program

In the fourth concert of its regular Carnegie Hall series, on Tuesday night, December 27, the Philadelphia Orchestra will introduce to New York Reinhold Moritzovitch Glière's second symphony in C minor, which was written in 1907 and dedicated to Serge Koussevitzky. Glière's third symphony, "Ilya Mourometz," was introduced here by this orchestra on March 20, 1934. Eugene Ormandy's program also will include MacDowell's second piano concerto, with Jacques Abram, a young American artist, who is appearing with this orchestra in Philadelphia and New York as a winner of the 1937 Schubert memorial award; an andante by Geminiani for harp, strings and organ, a prelude and fugue in B minor by Bach and the Pastoral Symphony from Handel's "Messiah." Glière was born in Kiev in 1875, and is now a teacher of composition at Moscow Conservatory.

Concerts Out of Town

On the same evening the N. B. C. Symphony Orchestra, under Arturo Toscanini, will give its second concert outside of New York at the Lyric Theater in Baltimore under the auspices of the Baltimore Opera Club. While Artur Rodzinski is conducting the N. B. C. regular Saturday night radio series here, Rudolph Ringwall, associate conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra, will direct the Cleveland Orchestra's concerts next Friday and Saturday nights. Ruth Slenczynski will play Beethoven's piano concerto in C minor, and Edwin Stringham's first nocture for orchestra will have its Cleveland premiere.

LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
MORNING NEWS

[illegible] 1938

MUSIC

By Dr. BRUNO DAVID USSHER

RAIN is the final test of the popularity of music and musicians in Los Angeles. I have seen entire opera companies washed down Jefferson boulevard from the Shrine in two different seasons. Beethoven, Klemperer, the Philharmonic orchestra and the Oratorio society combined in the "Ninth" can weather any storm, it seems. The dramatic, cloud shrouded skies and hills really furnish a more fitting setting for the last symphony of this super lord of symphonies than smiling sunshine or star glittering heavens, notwithstanding the fact that the "Ninth" ends happily with a profession of brotherhood of man.

Other duties have kept me from attending last night's concert for which, despite the inclement weather, a capacity house was indicated. Judging from the final rehearsal something akin to a capacity performance should have taken place. The Philharmonic is a Beethoven orchestra. The chorus, trained by Dr. Richard Lert and Einar Nilson, sounded very well, enunciation, too, having been improved. The solo quartet, Ann Jamison, soprano; Clemence Gifford, alto; John Heinz, tenor, and Emery Darcy, bass, seemed finely suited for an occasion which practically coincides with the 168th birthday of the composer.

* * *

KLEMPERER preceded Beethoven's ninth with his first symphony. Some persons think that is too much Beethoven. I do not have that reaction, no more than I agreed with those who thought "Elektra" by Richard Strauss was not enough for one evening because it lasted only one hour and 40 minutes. The last named must have either an elephantine digestion for music or remain untouched, otherwise 100 minutes of "Elektra" with Rose Pauly in the name role should have proved heart and imagination filling. Nor can one argue with those who prefer music other than Beethoven prior to the "Ninth." There is not much music which would rightly fit into the presence of that spirit that created and still inhabits this marvelous enormity.

All that is a matter of taste. To set up a defense for Klemperer's program choice is superfluous because it would prove nothing to those who cannot hear in the "First" an overture to the "Ninth." The first symphony is neither one of Beethoven's finest nor most original works, although significant of his style as a whole. It was a daring thing for the 30-year-old composer to do (in the year 1800), to commence on a dissonance or unresolved harmony which had no place in the avowed tonality of the symphony. Beethoven declared himself then as he did 23 years later in the "Ninth."

* * *

IT SPEAKS well for Los Angeles ,which loves an outwardly dry skin, to muster a capacity audience for the ninth performance of the "Ninth" during the last five years, not counting some remarkable broadcasts of the work by Toscanini and Koussevitzky. To voice mere praise of Beethoven of the last symphony borders on the absurd and on conceit. And yet, one speaks of the "greatness of God." Whatever continues to keep the wells of inspiration flowing from this magic mountain of music for 115 years, that is part of such divine greatness.

To be sure, the "Ninth" is not a "clever" work. It cost Beethoven too much creative pain to be called even his most clever. In the "Ninth" the socially thinking Beethoven turns mystic. Those wide spanned descending intervals (fourths, fifths and octaves), with which the first movement starts and which play up and down in due course, are like Mosaic gestures asking and receiving instruction from the beyond above. The scherzo stamps and romps in "divine drunkenness." One thinks of Nietzsche's Zarathustra dancing.

* * *

NOTHING is more difficult than the longspun Adagio of the "Ninth." Here a mystic Beethoven turns contemplative. The breath of melodic cadences moves with almost dangerous slowness. It is as if a great inner muteness could hardly be put even into speech of tone. To speak here of utmost serenity and nobility is not enough. I think there also is tragedy. At least the pagan divinities were sad at times, and Beethoven is such a pagan god, a Prometheus.

When he does strike fire from heaven and earth in the gloriously rejoicing, choral finale he is careless of how the sparks fly. He is not a contrapuntally correct minded, goosestepping Prometheus. He asks from soloists and choristers the well nigh impossible. A wise composer would not have proceeded thus, but Beethoven was not wise. He was and remains wonderful. The wonders of his inspired "Ninth" can be pointed out in part. They can never be explained fully. He had heard the tocsin of the French revolution, and he believed in its reality. But only a mystic could have sought to preach its meanings with a choral finale in which he acclaims joy as the harbinger of the brotherhood of man.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
DESERET NEWS

DEC 17 1938

Balokovic Back For Tour In U. S.

ZLATKO BALOKOVIC, international violinist has returned to the United States after touring Europe. He closed his 1937-38 season here with two appearances as soloist with the Clevelanu Symphony Orchestra, last February with Dr. Rodzinski conducting.

Balokovic's European tour began on March 18th as soloist with the Zagreb Philharmonic. This occasion also marked the continental premiere of John Alden Carpenter's Concerto for Violin and Orchestra. From that date until March 24th last, Balokovic played fifteen orchestral concerts and twenty recitals.

Balokovic's-1939 tour begins with a recital in Halifax, Nova Scotia. Next spring he will be soloist for three appearances with the Vermont Symphony, February 12th, 1t4h, and 16th; Boston Symphony on March 3rd and 4th; Detroit Symphony, March 18th, and Youngstown Symphony, April 10th.

SPOKANE, WASH.
SPOKESMAN REVIEW

DEC 21 1938

"MUSIC CAPITAL" PLAN FOR N. Y.

NEW YORK, Dec. 20. (AP)—A $1,200,000 project to make New York city the "music capital of the world" through an elaborate six-month festival next summer received the support of 300 prominent New Yorkers today.

The tentative program, to be conducted during the New York 1939 world's fair, was outlined by Mayor LaGuardia, Grover Whalen, president of the fair, and Olin Downes, fair director of music.

Opera, ballet and symphony and choral, folk and solo music by world-famous groups and individuals will have parts in the festival, to be presented in the Metropolitan opera house and Carnegie hall.

Those expected to appear include the Metropolitan Opera company, the Paris opera, the Glyndebourne opera and others from Europe, the Leningrad ballet, the Ballet Russe, the Philharmonic Symphony, Philadelphia symphony, Boston symphony and Minneapolis symphony, Kirsten Flagstad, Lawrence Tibbett, Rachmaninoff and Josef Hofmann.

PITTSBURG, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

DEC 18 1938

Sewickley Women to Hear Eunice Norton in Recital

Eunice Norton, celebrated pianist, who will appear in recital before the Sewickley Valley Woman's Club tomorrow afternoon, has been heard in all parts of the United States as well as in Europe, both in recital and with many famous orchestras.

EUNICE NORTON

She gave her first concert when she was only five years of age and her orchestral debut in this country was made at an early age in New York City with the Boston Symphony under the baton of Serge Koussevitsky, whom she now counts among her intimate friends. Another friend, with whom she studied, Artur Schnabel, once introduced her as "a second Carenno".

In all matters pertaining to her art Miss Norton is an idealist. Art to her is a serious expression of the innermost meaning of life itself and admits of nothing that is devoid of the greatness intended for it. Greatness, however, Miss Norton feels, can find expression in many idioms and it is not surprising, therefore, to find her an enthusiastic interpreter both of the great classics and some of the more promising modern works.

Miss Norton finds time for reading, which, with sports, is an avocation. Leisure hours have been spent mountain climbing in Europe.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

DEC 18 1938

Yuletide Music Fills Programs for Week

Concert by Providence Federal Orchestra Tonight to Include Work by Ruth Tripp. Several Choral Groups Are Listed.

CHRISTMAS music and a work by a Rhode Island composer, Ruth Tripp, will be items of unusual interest on the program of the Providence Federal Orchestra's concert tonight in Hope street high school, with Edouard Caffier returning as conductor.

The symphony will be Haydn's 102nd in B-flat major the popularity of which has received new impetus in Boston by frequent playings in recent seasons by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. This will be the last of the orchestra's Sunday evening series before the holidays. The concerts will be resumed on Jan. 8.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR

DEC 19 1938

Franklin Miner Attends Conference of Managers

Franklin Miner, manager of the Indianapolis Symphony Orchestra went by plane yesterday to Washington, D. C., to attend the three-day annual conference of managers of the country's leading symphony orchestras.

Among those who will attend the convention are the managers of the Philadelphia, Cleveland, New York, Kansas City, Boston, Rochester, Detroit, Cincinnati, St. Louis, Chicago, Minneapolis and Pittsburgh symphony orchestras. Problems of business management and promotion are discussed and concerted action taken on mutual problems.

PITTSBURG, PA.
PRESS

DEC 18 1938

The passionate music of Wagner's Tristan and Isolde has always greatly attracted the attention of Leopold Stokowski, who has deftly combined in sequence the Prelude, Liebesnacht and Liebestod from this music drama. In lieu of the conventional ending of the Liebestod, Mr. Stokowski has contrived a conclusion with a short vigorous coda. In giving this "symphonic synthesis" utterance Mr. Stokowski has the aid of the brilliant Philadelphia Orchestra and the result is a performance of surpassing beauty.

Arthur Fiedler, who has come to the fore in recent years as conductor of the famous "Pop" Concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, leads it in a recording of Tschaikowsky's stentorian Ouverture Solennelle, enthusiasm marking the performance.

On separate Red Seal discs Mr. Stokowski leads the Philadelphians in playing two of his arrangements of works of William Byrd, the ancient English composer. These are a Pavane and Gigue.

The inimitable harpsichordist, Yella Pessl, gives further evidence of her skill and musicianship in the playing of a Scarlatti Sonata in A-major.

On two other records, respectively, Tiana Lemnitz sings with good voice and exquisite style two arias from Mozart's Marriage of Figaro with orchestra accompaniment, and that incomparable basso, the late Feodor Chaliapin, leaves as a record of his great artistry a recording of the prayer from the Moussorgski opera, Boris Godounoff, which was recorded at an actual performance at the Royal Opera, London.

BURLINGTON, VT.
NEWS

DEC 21 1938

NEW YORK WILL BE CAPITAL OF MUSIC IN SUMMER MONTHS

World's Fair Fete to Bring Outstanding Stars for Engagements in Metropolis

NEW YORK, Dec. 21. (AP)—A $1,200.000 project to make New York City the "musical capital of the world" through an elaborate six-month festival next summer had the support of 300 prominent New Yorkers today.

The tentative program, to be conducted during the New York 1939 World's Fair, was outlined by Mayor La Guardia, Grover Whalen, president of the Fair, and Olin Downes, Fair director of music.

Opera, ballet and symphony and choral, folk and solo music by world famous groups and individuals will have parts in the festival, to be presented in the Metropolitan Opera House and Carnegie Hall.

Those expected to appear include the Metropolitan Opera Company, the Paris Opera, the Glyndebourne Opera and others from Europe, the Leningrad Ballet, the Ballet Russe, the Philharmonic-Symphony, Philadelphia Symphony, Boston Symphony and Minneapolis Symphony, Kirsten Flagstead, Lawrence Tibbet, Rachmaninoff, and Josef Hofmann.

NASHUA, N. H.
TELEGRAPH

DEC 20 1938

EDITOR'S MAILBAG

Editor, Telegraph:

The development of a subsidized first rank symphony orchestra involves the same method as that of a major league ball club. Both are the result of the sifting process; the gradual acquisition of young blood replacing perhaps the more experienced man, but one who has lost interest in his work.

Boston is properly termed a musical and art center, but to be fair, we should include New England, and particularly New Hampshire, because its people gave the world Denman Thompson in "The Old Homestead"; Ezra Bagley, premier cornet soloist of the great Gilmore Band, and trumpeter during the first five years of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; and Bagley's brother, Edward, who wrote the immortal band march "The National Emblem," which not only is played, but whistled and hummed by millions of people all over the world. Then, too, New Hampshire was for years the home of Edward A. MacDowell, who is buried at Peterboro, where he loved to live and roam among the pines. MacDowell gave to the world his celebrated A Minor Piano Concerto with full orchestra accompaniment, the plaintive song "To a Wild Rose," and the "Indian Suite" for full orchestra.

Great musicians and athletes come from the country, the soil, streams, brooks, hills, and plains, where a healthy mind is developed in a healthy body. The pure country air was reproduced in the fine playing last night by the Nashua Symphony Orchestra, and the splendid singing of the chorus.

Henry Woelber
11 Parley Vale
Jamaica Plain, Mass.
December 18.

ST. PAUL, MINN.
PIONEER - PRESS

108

DEC 18 1938

Orchestras' Budgets Over $4,750,000

By John Selby

NEW YORK, DEC. 17. — (AP) — The sixteen leading symphony orchestras of the country are spending more than $4,750,000 to give their communities the music they want this season.

This figure does not include the budgets of the many excellent secondary orchestras. Thanks to music project efforts, there now is no city of the United States of 50,000 or better without some sort of orchestra. Many smaller cities also have them.

It does not touch the money spent on hundreds of college orchestras nor the cost of the high school orchestras which now number in the thousands.

The total spent for symphonic music in America has been estimated as high as 40 millions. Whatever it is, the record shows the communities like it.

Only one American city, Seattle, has reduced its symphony budget—and that is because of a peculiar local situation which may be changed by the new Seattle conductor, Dr. Nikolai Sokoloff.

FOUR INCREASE BUDGETS

Most budgets remain the same, although four cities, Washington, Pittsburgh, Indianapolis and Rochester, are spending more money on soloists.

Eleven of the sixteen key cities report better ticket sales than last season, when most found attendance had improved over the preceding winter. Cleveland, where a new women's organization has got into the field, reports the largest early sale in the orchestra's history, and even Boston, where big audiences have been the rule more than 50 years, is 5 per cent ahead.

Only Philadelphia reports a decrease, and that is "slight, and not alarming," according to Alfred Reginald Allen, manager. Philadelphia is one of three cities reporting changes in the status of its conductor. Eugene Ormandy is now "musical director," which means that he controls absolutely the personnel and the programs; Stokowski will appear as guest only, next spring.

In Pittsburgh Fritz Reiner becomes permanent conductor, his first similar berth since his days with the Cincinnati symphony. In Seattle Dr. Sokoloff replaces Dr. Basil Cameron, and although Eugene Goossens remains permanent conductor in Cincinnati, he was late arriving, and Jose Iturbi, conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic, directed the first three programs of the twenty comprising the season. Longest tenure among practicing conductors goes to Frederick Stock, now in his thirty-fourth season in Chicago.

FOUR WEEKS ON TOUR

Philadelphia will have the longest season—30 weeks of which four will be spent on tour. Seattle has the shortest, twelve concerts. Kansas City, where Karl Krueger has built an excellent orchestra since 1933, adds ten concerts to its season; Pittsburgh adds three weeks.

The only major departure from standard symphony practice is at Rochester, where the 50 men of the well-known "civic" orchestra are engaged for a 28-week season, and are augmented by 35 more players for a concentrated symphony season of twelve weeks.

Twenty men have been added to four orchestras—fewest additions being at Boston where one more double bass will be found; most in Washington, where Hans Kindler will have ten new men. Only one orchestra has reduced personnel. This is St. Louis, where three men have resigned, and have not been replaced as yet.

Philadelphia will play the most concerts, 118. Seattle plans fewest, only thirteen. But Boston, where the symphony has not only its regular season, but a spring popular season and several weeks of free concerts out of doors, as well as a festival in the Berkshires, will do, all told, more than 200 concerts, a unique record in American music. More than half will be directed by the permanent conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

The sixteen orchestras plan 1,315 concerts in their regular season. The budget total is $4,782,605. This is exactly $3,636.96 a concert. Approximately a quarter of this is returned through ticket sales; some orchestras are lucky, and have fairly extensive endowments, or (as in Detroit) fat radio contracts.

For most orchestras, however, each new season is the beginning of a new battle. On one side is symphonic music, which the nation demands in larger and larger quantities. On the other is the big, bad wolf. The deficit.

PORTLAND, ME.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

DEC 18 1938

E. Power Biggs To Play Kotzschmar Organ At Second Concert Of Series

E. Power Biggs of Boston, organist for the second musical organ of the season, Tuesday evening.

The second concert in the series of organ recitals at City Hall on the Kotzschmar Memorial Organ will be held Tuesday evening at 8:15 o'clock with E. Power Biggs of Boston, guest organist, and Collette Lionne, French pianist, as guest soloist. The program will include organ numbers appropriate to the Christmas season and will conclude with the Symphonic Variations" by Cesar Franck for piano and organ.

These conserts are planned to give an opportunity for all to hear the famous Kotzschmar Organ, the gift to Portland of the late Cyrus H. K. Curtis. The admisson is free and the expenses are met by donations from a list of patrons.

Mr. Biggs, the English-American organist, has taken a leading place among the great organ virtuosi of America as well as Europe. Last year he created a sensation in Boston by his extraordinary performance of the entire works of Bach in 12 recitals at the Germanic Museum organ. Late in the season Mr. Biggs appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Koussevitsky in a brilliant first performance of the concerto for organ and orchestra written for him by the widely known composer, Leo Sowerby.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
RECORD

DEC 18 1938

SYMPHONIC music that stirs the emotions is re-created in the home as played by the great symphonic orchestras directed by such conductors as Stokowski, Koussevitzky and Toscanini. "Higher Fidelity" recording is the secret.

RADIO WEEKLY
NEW YORK CITY

DEC 21 1938

NEW BALLET MUSIC BROCHURE ISSUED BY RCA VICTOR COMPANY

AVAILABLE THRU DEALERS

Presents Comprehensive History of Ballet and Listing of Victor Recordings of Music as Interpreted by Famed Artists.

CAMDEN, N. J., Friday—An attractive brochure of music for the ballet on Victor records, prepared especially for the enthusiastic millions whose acclaim has brought this art unprecedented popularity in recent years, is now available through RCA Victor musical merchandise dealers.

The brochure presents a brief but comprehensive history of the ballet and a complete listing of Victor recordings of ballet music as interpreted by world-famed artists.

Richard Gilbert, eminent music critic, has written for the booklet a treatise on this ancient art and the development of its subtle blending of music, color and movement. He also prepared notes on the ballets, their artists and their music for the record list.

The albums and individual recordings catalogued in the brochure place within easy reach of all a varied repertoire of music that each year wins countless new followers. The amazing success of the Ballet Russe De Monte Carlo now touring the country and the growth of similar ballet troupes are evidence of the increasingly wide following.

Such outstanding Victor artists as Leopold Stokowski, Serge Koussevitsky, John Barbirolli and Eugene Ormandy, and such orchestra groups as the London Symphony, the London Philharmonic, and the Philadelphia Orchestra are heard on the records.

The brochure's catalog of selections includes such works as the complete ballet "Les Sylphides," Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," the ballet from Alexander Borodin's "Prince Igor," and Stravinsky's "L'Oiseau de Feu."

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER EXPRESS

DEC 21 1938

GOTHAM PLANS MUSIC FESTIVAL

$1,200,000 project laid out for next summer

New York, Dec. 20 (AP)—A $1,200,000 project to make New York City

ETC.

WEST PA M BEACH, FLA.
TIMES

DEC 21 1938

New Yorkers Backing Music Festival

NEW YORK, Dec. 20. (AP)—A $1,200,000 project to make New York City the "music capital of the world" through an elaborate six-month festival next summer received the support of 300 prominent New Yorkers today.

The tentative program, to be conducted during the New York 1939 World's Fair, was outlined by Mayor La Guardia, Grover Whalen, president of the fair, and Olin Downes, fair director of music.

Opera, ballet and symphony and choral, folk and solo music by world famous groups and individuals will have parts in the festival, to be presented in the Metropolitan Opera House and Carnegie Hall.

Those expected to appear include the Metropolitan Opera Company, the Paris opera, the Glyndebourne opera and others from Europe, the Leningrad ballet, the Ballet Russe, the Philharmonic-Symphony, Philadelphia Symphony, Boston Symphony, and Minneapolis Symphony, Kirsten Flagstead, Lawrence Tibbet, Rachmaninoff, and Josef Hofmann.

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

DEC 21 1938

MUSIC PLANS

Would Include Best Artists In All Fields, Cost $1,200,000, Fair Officials Say.

New York, December 20—(AP)—A $1,200,000 project to make New York City the "music capital of the

ETC. like

DURHAM, N. C.
SUN

DEC 21 1938

Would Make N. Y. Capital of Music

Prominent New Yorkers Support Project Outlined By Mayor and Fair Chief

NEW YORK, Dec. 21.—(AP)—A $1,200,000 project to make New York

ETC.

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

DEC 22 1938

New York Plans To Be Musical Center of World

NEW YORK, Dec. 21 (AP).—A $1,200,000 project to make New York City the music capital of the world

ETC.

108

ST. PAUL, MINN.
PIONEER - PRESS

DEC 18 1938

Orchestras' Budgets Over $4,750,000

By John Selby

NEW YORK, DEC. 17. — (AP) — The sixteen leading symphony orchestras of the country are spending more than $4,750,000 to give their communities the music they want this season.

This figure does not include the budgets of the many excellent secondary orchestras. Thanks to music project efforts, there now is no city of the United States of 50,000 or better without some sort of orchestra. Many smaller cities also have them.

It does not touch the money spent on hundreds of college orchestras nor the cost of the high school orchestras which now number in the thousands.

The total spent for symphonic music in America has been estimated as high as 40 millions. Whatever it is, the record shows the communities like it.

Only one American city, Seattle, has reduced its symphony budget—and that is because of a peculiar local situation which may be changed by the new Seattle conductor, Dr. Nikolai Sokoloff.

FOUR INCREASE BUDGETS

Most budgets remain the same, although four cities, Washington, Pittsburgh, Indianapolis and Rochester, are spending more money on soloists.

Eleven of the sixteen key cities report better ticket sales than last season, when most found attendance had improved over the preceding winter. Cleveland, where a new women's organization has got into the field, reports the largest early sale in the orchestra's history, and even Boston, where big audiences have been the rule more than 50 years, is 5 per cent ahead.

Only Philadelphia reports a decrease, and that is "slight, and not alarming," according to Alfred Reginald Allen, manager. Philadelphia is one of three cities reporting changes in the status of its conductor. Eugene Ormandy is now "musical director," which means that he controls absolutely the personnel and the programs; Stokowski will appear as guest only, next spring.

In Pittsburgh Fritz Reiner becomes permanent conductor, his first similar berth since his days with the Cincinnati symphony. In Seattle Dr. Sokoloff replaces Dr. Basil Cameron, and although Eugene Goossens remains permanent conductor in Cincinnati, he was late arriving, and Jose Iturbi, conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic, directed the first three programs of the twenty comprising the season. Longest tenure among practicing conductors goes to Frederick Stock, now in his thirty-fourth season in Chicago.

FOUR WEEKS ON TOUR

Philadelphia will have the longest season—30 weeks of which four will be spent on tour. Seattle has the shortest, twelve concerts. Kansas City, where Karl Krueger has built an excellent orchestra since 1933, adds ten concerts to its season; Pittsburgh adds three weeks.

The only major departure from standard symphony practice is at Rochester, where the 50 men of the well-known "civic" orchestra are engaged for a 28-week season, and are augmented by 35 more players for a concentrated symphony season of twelve weeks.

Twenty men have been added to four orchestras—fewest additions being at Boston where one more double bass will be found; most in Washington, where Hans Kindler will have ten new men. Only one orchestra has reduced personnel. This is St. Louis, where three men have resigned, and have not been replaced as yet.

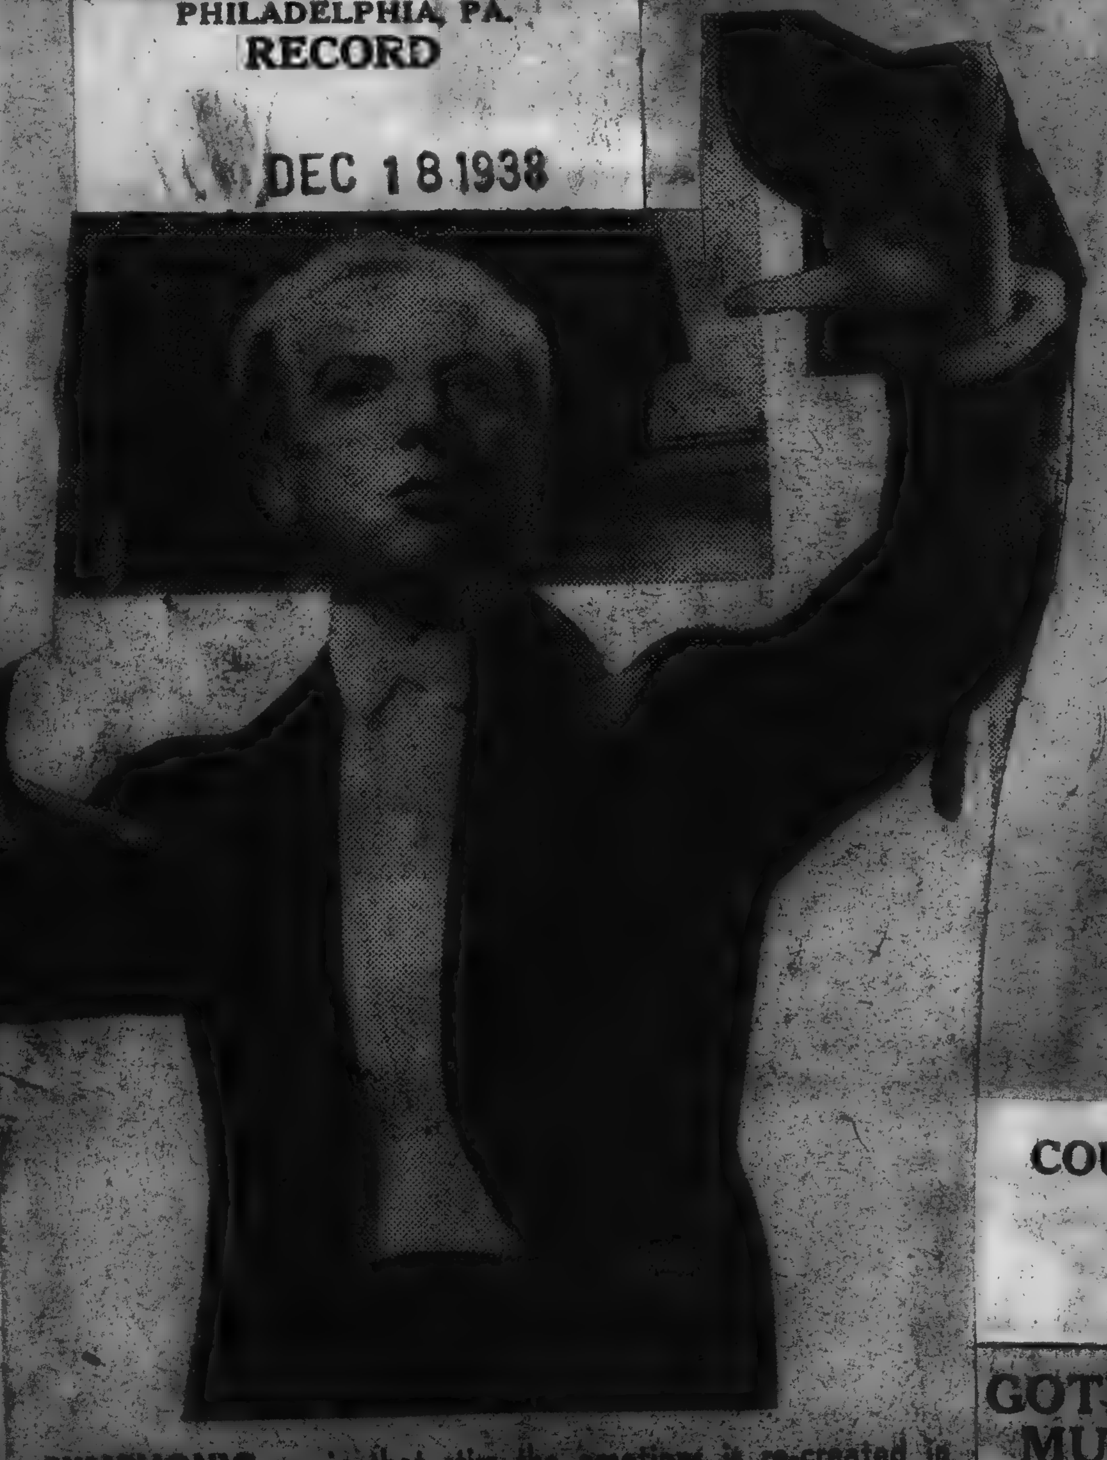
Philadelphia will play the most concerts, 118. Seattle plans fewest, only thirteen. But Boston, where the symphony has not only its regular season, but a spring popular season and several weeks of free concerts out of doors, as well as a festival in the Berkshires, will do, all told, more than 200 concerts, a unique record in American music. More than half will be directed by the permanent conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

The sixteen orchestras plan 1,315 concerts in their regular season. The budget total is $4,782,605. This is exactly $3,636.96 a concert. Approximately a quarter of this is returned through ticket sales; some orchestras are lucky, and have fairly extensive endowments, or (as in Detroit) fat radio contracts.

For most orchestras, however, each new season is the beginning of a new battle. On one side is symphonic music, which the nation demands in larger and larger quantities. On the other is the big, bad wolf. The deficit.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
RECORD

DEC 18 1938



SYMPHONIC music that stirs the emotions is re-created in the home as played by the great symphonic orchestras directed by such conductors as Stokowski, Koussevitzky and Toscanini. "Higher Fidelity" recording is the secret.

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

DEC 22 1938

New York Plans To Be Musical Center of World

NEW YORK, Dec. 21 (AP).—A $1,200,000 project to make New York City the music capital of the world

ETC.

DURHAM, N. C.
SUN

DEC 21 1938

Would Make N. Y. Capital of Music

Prominent New Yorkers Support [illegible] Outlined By M[illegible] [illegible] Chief

NEW Y[illegible] —A $1,200,000 project [illegible] York

ETC.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER EXPRESS

DEC 21 1938

GOTHAM PLANS MUSIC FESTIVAL

$1,200,000 project laid out for next summer

New York, Dec. 20 (AP)—A $1,200,000 project to make New York City

ETC.

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

DEC 21 1938

MUSIC PLANS

Would Include Best Artists In All Fields, Cost $1,200,000, Fair Officials Say.

New York, December 20—(AP)—A $1,200,000 project to make New York City the "music capital of the

ETC. like —

PORTLAND, ME.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

DEC 18 1938

E. Power Biggs To Play Kotzschmar Organ At Second Concert Of Series

E. Power Biggs of Boston, organist for the second musical organ [illegible] of the season, Tuesday evening.

The second concert in the series of organ recitals at City Hall on the Kotzschmar Memorial Organ will be held Tuesday evening at 8:15 o'clock with E. Power Biggs of Boston, guest organist, and Collette Lionne, French pianist, as guest soloist. The program will include organ numbers appropriate to the Christmas season and will conclude with the Symphonic Variations" by Cesar Franck for piano and organ.

These conserts are planned to give an opportunity for all to hear the famous Kotzschmar Organ, the gift to Portland of the late Cyrus H. K. Curtis. The admisson is free and the expenses are met by donations from a list of patrons.

Mr. Biggs, the English-American organist, has taken a leading place among the great organ virtuosi of America as well as Europe. Last year he created a sensation in Boston by his extraordinary performance of the entire works of Bach in 12 recitals at the Germanic Museum organ. Late in the season Mr. Biggs appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Koussevitzky in a brilliant first performance of the concerto for organ and orchestra written for him by the widely known composer, Leo Sowerby.

WEST PA[illegible]M BEACH, FLA.
TIMES

DEC 21 1938

New Yorkers Backing Music Festival

NEW YORK, Dec. 20. (AP)—A $1,200,000 project to make New York City the "music capital of the world" through an elaborate six-month festival next summer received the support of 300 prominent New Yorkers today.

The tentative program, to be conducted during the New York 1939 World's Fair, was outlined by Mayor La Guardia, Grover Whalen, president of the fair, and Olin Downes, fair director of music.

Opera, ballet and symphony and choral, folk and solo music by world famous groups and individuals will have parts in the festival, to be presented in the Metropolitan Opera House and Carnegie Hall.

Those expected to appear include the Metropolitan Opera Company, the Paris opera, the Glyndebourne opera and others from Europe, the Leningrad ballet, the Ballet Russe, the Philharmonic-Symphony, Philadelphia Symphony, Boston Symphony, and Minneapolis Symphony, Kirsten Flagstad, Lawrence Tibbet, Rachmaninoff, and [illegible]

RADIO WEEKLY
NEW YORK CITY

DEC 21 1938

NEW BALLET MUSIC BROCHURE ISSUED BY RCA VICTOR COMPANY

AVAILABLE THRU DEALERS

Presents Comprehensive History of Ballet and Listing of Victor Recordings of Music as Interpreted by Famed Artists.

CAMDEN, N. J., Friday—An attractive brochure of music for the ballet on Victor records, prepared especially for the enthusiastic millions whose acclaim has brought this art unprecedented popularity in recent years, is now available through RCA Victor musical merchandise dealers.

The brochure presents a brief but comprehensive history of the ballet and a complete listing of Victor recordings of ballet music as interpreted by world-famed artists.

Richard Gilbert, eminent music critic, has written for the booklet a treatise on this ancient art and the development of its subtle blending of music, color and movement. He also prepared notes on the ballets, their artists and their music for the record list.

The albums and individual recordings catalogued in the brochure place within easy reach of all a varied repertoire of music that each year wins countless new followers. The amazing success of the Ballet Russe De Monte Carlo now touring the country and the growth of similar ballet troupes are evidence of the increasingly wide following.

Such outstanding Victor artists as Leopold Stokowski, Serge Koussevitsky, John Barbirolli and Eugene Ormandy, and such orchestra groups as the London Symphony, the London Philharmonic, and the Philadelphia Orchestra are heard on the records.

The brochure's catalog of selections includes such works as the complete ballet "Les Sylphides," Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," the ballet from Alexander Borodin's "Prince Igor," and Stravinsky's "L'Oiseau de Feu."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
DEC 21 1938

Fair Will Offer Music Festival For Six Months

Mayor, Saying It Will Top Any in History, Seeks Business Men's Support

New York will have a musical festival, "the like of which has never been presented anywhere, at any time, in the world," during the New York World's Fair 1939, Mayor F. H. LaGuardia announced yesterday at a luncheon conference of more than 300 business men in the Bankers' Club, 120 Broadway.

Mayor LaGuardia and Grover A. Whalen, president of the fair corporation, called the meeting to align financial support for the project. The Mayor requested business executives to make provision in their 1939 advertising budgets for advertisements in "The History of Music in America," a publication that will provide a large part of the $1,200,000 backing of the program.

The festival, which will last six months, will begin with a Wagner cycle by the Metropolitan Opera Company. The Metropolitan's complete Wagnerian cast, headed by Kirsten Flagstad and Lauritz Melchior, will sing "Die Meistersinger," "Tristan und Isolde," the complete Ring cycle and "Parisfal." Artur Bodanzky and Erich Leinsdorf will conduct.

As a supplement to the Metropolitan, the entire companies of the Paris Opera, the Glyndebourne Opera and the Budapest Opera will be brought from Europe. An attempt also is being made to obtain several other European companies.

Ballets and Concerts

The Leningrad Ballet is to make its first appearance in the United States. Besides several American companies, the Polish Ballet and the Ballet Russe also will give performances. Concerts will be played by the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra under John Barbirolli; the Philadelphia Symphony under Leopold Stokowski, Eugene Ormandy and Georges Enesco; the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky, and the Minneapolis Symphony under Dmitri Mitropoulos.

Individual recitals have been scheduled for Mme. Flagstad, Lawrence Tibbett, Jascha Heifetz, Fritz Kreisler, Sergei Rachmaninoff, Josef Hofmann, Yehudi Menuhin and many other artists. Besides performances of the Cincinnati May Festival Chorus and Orchestra, there will be appearances of choral societies, folk dancers and diverse choreographic groups and soloists from the United States and Europe.

Exact dates of the various performances have not yet been determined. The program was planned by Olin Downes, director of music for the exposition, but it will be supplementary to the fair's program and will be staged principally in Manhattan. Both the Metropolitan Opera House and Carnegie Hall will be air-conditioned.

"It occurred to the executive committee of the World's Fair corporation," said Mayor LaGuardia, "that it was not only fitting but highly desirable that we should have a musical festival, the like of which has never been presented anywhere, at any time, in the whole world."

Mayor Lists Committee

Organization of the artistic aspects of the festival, the Mayor explained, presented no particular difficulties, but the practical considerations were important. Although the fair corporation had imagination, he said, its members were "hard-headed business men, and Grover is trying to run the World's Fair as I am trying to run the city—within the revenues."

To arrange the financial details of the festival, Mayor LaGuardia said, a special committee was appointed, including Winthrop W. Aldrich, Mortimer M. Buckner, Thomas H. McInnerney, Percy S. Straus and the Mayor himself. "These four men, being rather progressive and radical," he smiled, "I was put there as the conservative to balance the committee.

"The suggestion has been offered that we appeal directly to business, industry and finance of the city," the Mayor added, "not in the nature of passing around the hat, but as a business proposition. It is the intention of the World's Fair corporation to publish its music book and, of course, we must have our programs for each of the performances that will be given.

"The plans offer to you gentlemen the opportunity and privilege of advertising in our programs and in our music book. We thought we would get you early, so that you could include this expense in your regular budget for advertising in 1939."

The festival, the Mayor declared, would be a tremendous attraction in itself. It would be, he said, an educational opportunity and a "life opportunity" for every musical student in the country. Without this supplemental program, he added, the fair would be unthinkable.

"We do not expect any one or any firm who ordinarily never advertises to make a contribution. We do not expect a smaller company to take a full page, but we do ask business and industry and finance in the City of New York who have provided for publicity or advertising for the year 1939 to set aside or allocate an amount to take advantage of the opportunity which this plan offers to you."

Full pages in the book, it was announced, would be sold for $2,500. The book, which will be printed in limited editions, will be distributed to libraries throughout the country. No details of the programs or their advertising were disclosed.

Former Governor Alfred E. Smith was among those who indorsed the project and pledged support. At the conclusion of the meeting Mr. Aldrich, who also is chairman of the fair's national advisory committee, announced that a number of subscriptions already had been received.

Jersey Fund for Fair Provided

TRENTON, N. J., Dec. 20.—Governor A. Harry Moore signed today a bill making available $75,000 to finance a New Jersey exhibit at the New York World's Fair and indicated he would approve another appropriating $17,500 to pay the expenses of the Assembly committee which investigated voting conditions in Hudson County in the 1937 gubernatorial election. A third bill, allotting $10,000 for the purchase by the state of pneumonia serum for free distribution, awaits executive action.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
DEC 25 1938

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has no [illegible] programs for its Carnegie Hall programs for January 5 and 7, but on Friday night, January 6, Serge Koussevitzky will conduct Haydn's symphony in B flat, No. 102, Ravel's piano concerto and Brahms's fourth symphony at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Jesus Maria Sanroma will be the soloist.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
DEC 23 1938

BEING A MUSICAL BOOB

[Catchall in the Lowell Courier Citizen]

Since the departure from the earthly scene of such men as Philip Hale H. T. Parker, W. F. Apthorp and Louis Elson I can't help feeling that Boston newspapers fall short of finding adequate successors for them. The one idea of the younger generation is to parade a liking (which I hope rather than believe is sincere) for weird and cacophonous music, such as too many Koussevitzky programs include. If I have been bored to extinction by a piece which sounded like bedlam let loose in a nursery, I know perfectly well that either the Herald man or the Transcript man will rave enthusiastically about it.

If I didn't like it, apparently, I'm a boob. Well, I'd like to live a hundred years to discover whether or not people a century hence will waste any time listening to this fantastic drip, as they listen to Brahms and Beethoven! If they do, I'm a boob all right. But my guess is that they won't.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
RECORD
DEC 25 1938

World Premiere.

The Philadelphia-La Scala Opera Company will present the world premiere of a new opera, "Horus," on January 5, at the Academy. This will be the first Philadelphia operatic world premiere of a full-length work since Victor Herbert's "Natoma" in 1910.

The composer, Camile de Senez, in private life the Baron Gabriel Wadjitsch von Verhovac, has a wide European reputation. This opera, his eighth, is in three acts, and will be sung in English.

The Metropolitan Opera Company will present it first "Ring" opera, "Das Rheingold," on January 3, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky will be here January 4 under Philadelphia Forum auspices.

A double treat will be offered local music-lovers on January 12 when Rose Bampton, the Met's mezzo-soprano, and Nino Martini, Met tenor, appear here in joint recital in Emma Feldman's all-star concert series.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUN
DEC 22 1938

1-2

RIGHT STRAIGHT FROM THE HEART...

JEANNE CLARK:Frank Case's "Tales of a Wayside Inn"...Gladys Murphy:Serge Koussevitzky-Boston Symphony orchestra's complete recordings of Ravel's Bolero...Grace Mountford:Guerlain's Coque d'Or...Peach Roane:A complete cure for his sinus...Don Shanahan:The 24 latest books on Europe Today...Mildred Welch:Lanvin's Arpege and My Sin...Florence Houpis:A recording of Tschaikowsky's Piano concerto No.1(By Egon Petri and the London Philharmonic)...Althea Spalding: The Man Of Her Dreams...

2-4

CHARLESTON, W. VA.
MAIL
DEC 25 1938

The Newest Recordings

* * * *

The Season's Summary

THE MOZART "Concerto in C Major" for piano and orchestra, with Arthur Schnabel and the London Philharmonic doing beautifully and cunningly everything that should be done.

The Prokofieff "Lieutenant Kije" Suite, excerpts from the incidental music to the Russian movie; amusing and musical modern orchestral fare and perhaps the best recording job of the season for full symphonic ensemble; the opening and closing pianoissimos are good for trying out the phonograph.

The Bloch "Sonate," a tumultous modern work for piano and violin which strains at music's limits, but remains at this writing a tremendous thing, frightening in a way, vivid and alive.

"Pictures at an Exhibition" by Moussorgsky in a new transcription by Lucien Cailliet displays the famous Philadelphia Orchestra in its best role so far this season. Cailliet's job is a good one, comparable with Ravel's, and the recording is better.

* * *

BACH'S "CHACONNE" in the piano arrangement by Busoni; heroic musical literature which does not seem to bother Johana Harris, who makes with it a recording debut.

Sibelius' Fifth Symphony in a Boston Symphony-Koussevitzky performance that should be definitive recorded diversion for years to come; "Pohjola's Daughter" is included for good measure.

YLEINEN JOULUNUMERO -- CHRISTMAS SPECIAL

Ainoa kansanvaltaisen sosialismin atteita ajava suomenkielinen päivälehti Amerikassa

RAIVAAJA

(THE PIONEER)

THE LEADING FINNISH DAILY IN THE UNITED STATES—ESTABLISHED 1905

Ainoa työväenliikkeen yleisetuja ja edistystä seuraava suomenkielinen päivälehti Amerikassa

Keskiviikkona, Jouluk. 21 p. - Wednesday, Dec. 21

34:jäs vuosikerta - Vol. XXXIV - No. 297 - 1938

Anja Ignatius solistina Bostonin sinfonian konsertissa

(By United Press) Sähkösanoma

Boston, jouluk. 21 p. Serge Kousevitzky, Boston Symphonyorkesterin johtaja, tänään viimeisteli suunnitelmaansa erikoista jouluiuhlaohjelmaa varten maanantai-iltana ja tiistaina iltapäivällä. Näissä tilaisuuksissa erikoisuutena tulee olemaan huomatun suomalaisen viulutaiteilijan Anna Ignatiuksen ensi esiintyminen Amerikassa.

Anja Ignatius tulee soittamaan soolon Sibeliuksen viulukonserttiin ja hän tulee olemaan ensimmäinen suomalainen taiteilija joka tässä sävellyksessä on kuultu Bostonin sinfonian kanssa, jonka kanssa sen ensiksi soitti Maud Powell tri Karl Muckin johtaessa 1907.

Miss Ignatiuksen tulosta Sibelius itse on lähettänyt orkesterin johdolle seuraavan lausunnon:

"Miss Ignatius minun mielestäni on parhaimpia viulu-virtuooseja. Minun vakaumukseni on, että Miss Ignatius soitollaan voittaa itselleen ja maalleen kunniaa ja mainetta."

Correspondence

To the Music Editor:

Jan. 11, 1939, is the 88th birthday of George W. Stewart, formerly one of the most noted of baritone and trombone players. Mentally alert, though somewhat slow of speech, Mr. Stewart is quite active, and is up and dressed every day at his home in Brighton. Never fully recovered from a shock suffered on Jan. 4, 1934, he still retains an interest in world affairs, and especially in the wide subject of bands and orchestras, so many of which he was instrumental in creating. . . .

As music commissioner of the two World's Fairs at St. Louis, in 1904, and San Francisco in 1915, he made [illegible] ope in order to bring [illegible] o America for those [illegible] meant conferences [illegible] h Cabinet, the ex[illegible] land, the chamber[illegible] r, and the German [illegible] addition, he brought [illegible] ductors Saint-Saens [illegible] lso that master of the organ, Guilmant, and Paderewski, the greatest pianist of his day.

Indeed it was a far cry from a village musician who played with Robinson's Circus, Washburn's "Sensations" and Green's "Mocking Birds Minstrels" to the famous Boston Germania Band, from which he graduated into the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its beginning in 1881, and where he remained for the first ten years. From then on he gradually developed his own touring Boston Festival Orchestra and the Boston Band, which for years was a feature on the Boston Common.

Mr. Stewart, prior to 1890, became known as the pioneer May Festival organizer, his orchestra playing nearly every major festival in the entire eastern half of the United States and Canada during 25 consecutive tours from 1889 to 1913. He carried the torch of Boston's musical fame, and through his efforts thousands of students came to Boston to study.

Mr. Stewart never used liquor or tobacco, but used his enormous physical energy in helping others to attain prominence by becoming conductors of symphony orchestras and placing promising young players in lucrative positions, and, just as a side issue, he mastered French and German and has a smattering of Italian and Russian.

There are younger managers of symphony orchestras on the musical horizon, but no one has sat in the ranks, nor been on the firing line, having played under the greatest of conductors, who finally achieved the success of Mr. Stewart. Boston claims him, and is proud to do so.

HENRY WOELBER
Jamaica Plain, Jan. 1.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

DEC 2 1 1938

Fair Will Offer Music Festival For Six Months

Mayor, Saying It Will Top Any in History, Seeks Business Men's Support

New York will have a musical festival, "the like of which has never been presented anywhere, at any time, in the world," during the New York World's Fair 1939, Mayor F. H. LaGuardia announced yesterday at a luncheon conference of more than 300 business men in the Bankers' Club, 120 Broadway.

Mayor LaGuardia and Grover A. Whalen, president of the fair corporation, called the meeting to align financial support for the project. The Mayor requested business executives to make provision in their 1939 advertising budgets for advertisements in "The History of Music in America," a publication that will provide a large part of the $1,200,000 backing of the program.

The festival, which will last six months, will begin with a Wagner cycle by the Metropolitan Opera Company. The Metropolitan's complete Wagnerian cast, headed by Kirsten Flagstad and Lauritz Melchior, will sing "Die Meistersinger," "Tristan und Isolde," the complete Ring cycle and "Parisfal." Artur Bodanzky and Erich Leinsdorf will conduct.

As a supplement to the Metropolitan, the entire companies of the Paris Opera, the Glyndebourne Opera and the Budapest Opera will be brought from Europe. An attempt also is being made to obtain several other European companies.

Ballets and Concerts

The Leningrad Ballet is to make its first appearance in the United States. Besides several American companies, the Polish Ballet and the Ballet Russe also will give performances. Concerts will be played by the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra under John Barbirolli; the Philadelphia Symphony under Leopold Stokowski, Eugene Ormandy and Georges Enesco; the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitsky, and the Minneapolis Symphony under Dmitri Mitropoulos.

Individual recitals have been scheduled for Mme. Flagstad, Lawrence Tibbett, Jascha Heifetz, Fritz Kreisler, Sergei Rachmaninoff, Josef Hofmann, Yehudi Menuhin and many other artists. Besides performances of the Cincinnati May Festival Chorus and Orchestra, there will be appearances of choral societies, folk dancers and diverse choreographic groups and soloists from the United States and Europe.

Exact dates of the various performances have not yet been determined. The program was planned by Olin Downes, director of music for the exposition, but it will be supplementary to the fair's program and will be staged principally in Manhattan. Both the Metropolitan Opera House and Carnegie Hall will be air-conditioned.

"It occurred to the executive committee of the World's Fair corporation," said Mayor LaGuardia, "that it was not only fitting but highly desirable that we should have a musical festival, the like of which has never been presented anywhere, at any time, in the whole world."

Mayor Lists Committee

Organization of the artistic aspects of the festival, the Mayor explained, presented no particular difficulties, but the practical considerations were important. Although the fair corporation had imagination, he said, its members were "hard-headed business men, and Grover is trying to run the World's Fair as I am trying to run the city—within the revenues."

To arrange the financial details of the festival, Mayor LaGuardia said, a special committee was appointed, including Winthrop W. Aldrich, Mortimer M. Buckner, Thomas H. McInnerney, Percy S. Straus and the Mayor himself. "These four men, being rather progressive and radical," he smiled, "I was put there as the conservative to balance the committee.

"The suggestion has been offered that we appeal directly to business, industry and finance of the city," the Mayor added, "not in the nature of passing around the hat, but as a business proposition. It is the intention of the World's Fair corporation to publish its music book and, of course, we must have our programs for each of the performances that will be given.

"The plans offer to you gentlemen the opportunity and privilege of advertising in our programs and in our music book. We thought we would get you early, so that you could include this expense in your regular budget for advertising in 1939."

The festival, the Mayor declared, would be a tremendous attraction in itself. It would be, he said, an educational opportunity and a "life opportunity" for every musical student in the country. Without this supplemental program, he added, the fair would be unthinkable.

"We do not expect any one or any firm who ordinarily never advertises to make a contribution. We do not expect a smaller company to take a full page, but we do ask business and industry and finance in the City of New York who have provided for publicity or advertising for the year 1939 to set aside or allocate an amount to take advantage of the opportunity which this plan offers to you."

Full pages in the book, it was announced, would be sold for $2,500. The book, which will be printed in limited editions, will be distributed to libraries throughout the country. No details of the programs or their advertising were disclosed.

Former Governor Alfred E. Smith was among those who indorsed the project and pledged support. At the conclusion of the meeting Mr. Aldrich, who also is chairman of the fair's national advisory committee, announced that a number of subscriptions already had been received.

Jersey Fund for Fair Provided

TRENTON, N. J., Dec. 20.—Governor A. Harry Moore signed today a bill making available $75,000 to finance a New Jersey exhibit at the New York World's Fair and indicated he would approve another appropriating $17,500 to pay the expenses of the Assembly committee which investigated voting conditions in Hudson County in the 1937 gubernatorial election. A third bill, allotting $10,000 for the purchase by the state of pneumonia serum for free distribution, awaits executive action.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

DEC 2 5 1938

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has no[redacted] programs for its Carnegie Hall programs for January 5 and 7, but on Friday night, January 6, Serge Koussevitzky will conduct Haydn's symphony in B flat, No. 102, Ravel's piano concerto and Brahms's fourth symphony at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Jesus Maria Sanroma will be the soloist.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

DEC 2 3 1938

BEING A MUSICAL BOOB

[Catchall in the Lowell Courier Citizen]

Since the departure from the earthly scene of such men as Philip Hale H. T. Parker, W. F. Apthorp and Louis Elson I can't help feeling that Boston newspapers fall short of finding adequate successors for them. The one idea of the younger generation is to parade a liking (which I hope rather than believe is sincere) for weird and cacophonous music, such as too many Koussevitzky programs include. If I have [redacted] bored to extinction by a piece which sounded like bedlam let loose in a nursery, I know perfectly well that either the Herald man or the Transcript man will rave enthusiastically about it.

If I didn't like it, apparently, I'm a boob. Well, I'd like to live a hundred years to discover whether or not people a century hence will waste any time listening to this fantastic drip, as they listen to Brahms and Beethoven! If they do, I'm a boob all right. But my guess is that they won't.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
RECORD

DEC 2 5 1938

World Premiere.

The Philadelphia-La Scala Opera Company will present the world premiere of a new opera, "Horus," on January 5, at the Academy. This will be the first Philadelphia operatic world premiere of a full-length work since Victor Herbert's "Natoma" in 1910.

The composer, Camile de Senez, in private life the Baron Gabriel Wadjitsch von Verhovac, has a wide European reputation. This opera, his eighth, is in three acts, and will be sung in English.

The Metropolitan Opera Company will present it first "Ring" opera, "Das Rheingold," on January 3, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra under [redacted]zky will be here January 4 under Philadelphia Forum auspices.

A double treat will be offered local music-lovers on January 12 when Rose Bampton, the Met's mezzo-soprano, and Nino Martini, Met tenor, appear here in joint recital in Emma Feldman's all-star concert series.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUN

DEC 2 2 1938

1-2

RIGHT STRAIGHT FROM THE HEART...

JEANNE CLARK: Frank Case's "Tales of a Wayside Inn"...Gladys Murphy: Serge Koussevitzky-Boston Symphony orchestra's complete recordings of Ravel's Bolero...Grace Mountford: Guerlain's Coque d'Or...Peach Roane: A complete cure for his sinus...Don Shanahan: The 24 latest books on Europe Today...Mildred Welch: Lanvin's Arpege and My Sin...Florence Houpis: A recording of Tschaikowsky's Piano concerto No.1 (By Egon Petri and the London Philharmonic)...Althea Spalding: The Man Of Her Dreams...

2-4

CHARLESTON, W. VA.
MAIL

DEC 2 5 1938

The Newes

*

The Seas

nas Nightingal
rol) by Misse
Olga Austin;
" (Harker) by
Had Lived in ckman) by Mi
; "All That Wo
igh," (Portugue
orace Morgan;

THE MOZART "Concerto in C Major" for piano and orchestra, with Arthur Schnabel and the London Philharmonic doing beautifully and cunningly everything that should be done.

The Prokofieff "Lieutenant Kije" Suite, excerpts from the incidental music to the Russian movie; amusing and musical modern orchestral fare and perhaps the best recording job of the season for full symphonic ensemble; the opening and closing pianoissimos are good for trying out the phonograph.

The Bloch "Sonate," a tumultous modern work for piano and violin which strains at music's limits, but remains at this writing a tremendous thing, frightening in a way, vivid and alive.

"Pictures at an Exhibition" by Moussorgsky in a new transcription by Lucien Cailliet displays the famous Philadelphia Orchestra in its best role so far this season. Cailliet's job is a good one, comparable with Ravel's, and the recording is better.

* * *

BACH'S "CHACONNE" in the piano arrangement by Busoni; heroic musical literature which does not seem to bother Johana Harris, who makes with it a recording debut.

Sibelius' Fifth Symphony in a Boston Symphony-Koussevitsky performance that should be definitive recorded diversion for years to come; "Pohjola's Daughter" is included for good measure.

Anja Ignatius solistina Bostonin sinfonian konsertissa

(By United Press) Sähkösanoma

Boston, jouluk. 21 p. Serge Kousevitzky, Boston Symphony-orkesterin johtaja, tänään viimeisteli suunnitelmaansa erikoista jouluiuhlaohjelmaa varten maanantai-iltana ja tiistaina iltapäivällä. Näissä tilaisuuksissa erikoisuutena tulee olemaan huomatun suomalaisen viulutaiteilijan Anna Ignatiuksen ensi esiintyminen Amerikassa.

Anja Ignatius tulee soittamaan soolon Sibeliuksen viulukonserttiin ja hän tulee olemaan ensimmäinen suomalainen taiteilija joka tässä sävellyksessä on kuultu Bostonin sinfonian kanssa. jonka kanssa sen ensiksi soitti Maud Powell tri Karl Muckin johtaessa 1907.

Miss Ignatiuksen tulosta Sibelius itse on lähettänyt orkesterin johdolle seuraavan lausunnon:

"Miss Ignatius minun mielestäni on parhaimpia viulu-virtuooseja. Minun vakaumukseni on, että Miss Ignatius soitollaan voittaa itselleen ja maalleen kunniaa ja mainetta."

YLEINEN JOULUNUMERO -- CHRISTMAS SPECIAL

Ainoa kansanvaltaisen sosialismin aatteita ajava suomenkielinen päivälehti Amerikassa

RAIVAAJA

(THE PIONEER)

THE LEADING FINNISH DAILY IN THE UNITED STATES — ESTABLISHED 1905

Ainoa työväenliikkeen yleisetuja ja edistystä seuraava suomenkielinen päivälehti Amerikassa

eskiviikkona, Jouluk. 21 p. - Wednesday, Dec. 21

34:jäs vuosikerta - Vol. XXXIV - No. 297 - 1938

Correspondence

To the Music Editor:

Jan. 11, 1939, is the 88th birthday of George W. Stewart, formerly one of the most noted of baritone and trombone players. Mentally alert, though somewhat slow of speech, Mr. Stewart is quite active, and is up and dressed every day at his home in Brighton. Never fully recovered from a shock suffered on Jan. 4, 1934, he still retains an interest in world affairs, and especially in the wide subject of bands and orchestras, so many of which he was instrumental in creating. . . .

As music commissioner of the two World's Fairs at St. Louis, in 1904, and San Francisco in 1915, he made two trips to Europe in order to bring famous bands to America for those events. That meant conferences with the French Cabinet, the exchequer of England, the chamberlain to the Czar, and the German ambassador. In addition, he brought over as guest conductors Saint-Saens and Komzak; also that master of the organ, Guilmant, and Paderewski, the greatest pianist of his day.

Indeed it was a far cry from a village musician who played with Robinson's Circus, Washburn's "Sensations" and Green's "Mocking Birds Minstrels" to the famous Boston Germania Band, from which he graduated into the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its beginning in 1881, and where he remained for the first ten years. From then on he gradually developed his own touring Boston Festival Orchestra and the Boston Band, which for years was a feature on the Boston Common.

Mr. Stewart, prior to 1890, became known as the pioneer May Festival organizer, his orchestra playing nearly every major festival in the entire eastern half of the United States and Canada during 25 consecutive tours from 1889 to 1913. He carried the torch of Boston's musical fame, and through his efforts thousands of students came to Boston to study.

Mr. Stewart never used liquor or tobacco, but used his enormous physical energy in helping others to attain prominence by becoming conductors of symphony orchestras and placing promising young players in lucrative positions, and, just as a side issue, he mastered French and German and has a smattering of Italian and Russian.

There are younger managers of symphony orchestras on the musical horizon, but no one has sat in the ranks, nor been on the firing line, having played under the greatest of conductors, who finally achieved the success of Mr. Stewart. Boston claims him, and is proud to do so.

HENRY WOELBER
Jamaica Plain, Jan. 1.

110

Koussevitzky With a Novelty From the Pen of Hindemith

First hearing in Boston of the composer's new Symphonic Dances, in a program that includes Beethoven and Handel—Heifetz as soloist with the orchestra in peak performance.

B. Trans. Dec. 22/38

An unfamiliar work and a pair of favorites were set before Boston Symphony Orchestra patrons for the concerts of this week. For novelty, Dr. Koussevitzky selected Hindemith's Symphonic Dances in first performances at these concerts. For opening item he offered the Handel Concerto Grosso in D minor Op. 6, No. 10, for String Orchestra. For finale came the Beethoven Concerto in D, Op. 61, for Violin and Orchestra, with Jascha Heifetz as soloist.

It seems almost inconceivable that the Handel Concerto Grosso had not been heard at these concerts since 1932, but for that date one must take the authority of the program book. Another interesting sentence in the program book recalled the fact that the tenth concerto (one of twelve) is in seven parts, for four violins, a tenor (in our day the viola), a violoncello and a harpsichord. With so few instruments in performance, great flexibility was possible, and it might be supposed that with so full a complement of strings as was utilized last night, the edge might be taken from the work, but such was not the case. Few orchestras, perhaps, may summon such flexibility, but the Boston orchestra is one of the few, and last night's performance, while dealing in greater sonorities than Handel could have thought possible, was one which would doubtless have gladdened his heart. Apparently Dr. Koussevitzky had made himself and his orchestra one with the composer with felicitous results.

Upon other occasions it has been observed that the music of Hindemith appears to be inevitable. Last night, the Symphonic Dances confirmed that impression. It is not our intention to explore the history of the work . . . various articles in the daily press and in the program book have supplied that information. The point we wish to make is that this composer continues to be a musical force to reckon with.

He claims attention at the outset with a not too dissonant chord and lively orchestration. From then on, he reveals an inventive genius which compels serious consideration. As in other scores, his invention lags and we find him more or less marking time, yet if patience is not too easily exhausted, we find further measures of great interest and piquancy, both in thematic material and in orchestration.

The dances are in four definite movements, corresponding to symphonic movements. Having trained his orchestra to flawless performance of andante and adagio, Dr. Koussevitzky offered, as might be surmised, a sustained and well controlled performance of the third movement. Although these dances are not to be taken too seriously as symphonic music in the strict sense of the word, they nevertheless present a picture of a composer who has not been above catering to more than one group of auditors, and they were an acceptable novelty. Needless to say, both conductor and orchestra were at the top of their bent during the performance.

Mr. Heifetz recently gave a recital in Symphony Hall during which we missed something of his usual form. Last night his skill had returned in full measure, and from the violinist we heard some of the finest playing he has ever done in Boston. Tones that were suave, shimmering, or robust, each in turn served the concerto well and won for the player an ovation well deserved. G. M. S.

HEIFETZ AT SYMPHONY

B. Post Dec. 23/38

Offers Beethoven Concerto, Symphonic Dances

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

With Jascha Heifetz playing at the concerts of last evening and this afternoon and Rudolph Serkin appearing at those of next Friday and Saturday, the Symphony Orchestra, so to speak, is offering its most important soloists of the season's first 11 concerts as Christmas and New Year's presents, respectively, to its subscribers. Beside the Violin Concerto of Beethoven, Mr. Heifetz' chosen number, the programme of this week's concerts lists Handel's Concerto in D minor, Opus 6, No. 10, and the new Symphonic Dances of Hindemith.

It is hardly necessary to remark that the evening concert this week was put ahead to Thursday so that it might not fall on Christmas Eve. Next week, New Year's Eve, or no New Year's Eve, the regular schedule remains in force. At least, the change in date did not diminish the size of the audience. There was virtually a full house last evening, a circumstance for which the presence of Mr. Heifetz may have been partly responsible.

The Concerto of Handel stood on last evening's programme in place of a modern work for strings which has now been postponed until the next pair of concerts, a Suite by the American, Gardner Read. Two novelties on a single programme were perhaps in Dr. Koussevitzky's opinion too much of a good thing, and the substitution of Handel's familiar music for that of Mr. Read was probably a wise move. There was enough in Hindemith's Dances for any audience to digest.

Originally planned as music for a ballet, these Dances, by token of last evening's performance, seem better adapted to their present purely orchestral status. Distinctly they are more symphonic than terpsichorean, although less polyphonic than some of Hindemith's earlier music. It is a dangerous thing to call music austere. Already compositions by Brahms, D'Indy and Sibelius have been so described and, as has later been discovered, quite erroneously. However, it is still safe to say that Hindemith's Dances are more interesting than exciting, more stimulating than alluring. And, as though the mood of "Mathis der Maler" were still upon him, Hindemith gives us here more neo-medievalism.

A few years ago the slogan was "back to Bach," but nowadays Bach is becoming a point of departure in the other direction. Possibly when composers have retraced their steps to Perotinus, or even to Hucbald, they will turn the other way. But such jesting aside, these Symphonic Dances are music of substance if not exactly of charm from the pen of a composer who has written most prolifically, but never idly. They were cordially received by last nigh''s audience, and they deserve to be heard again.

While admitting the beauty of the slow movement, one of Beethoven's noblest lyric utterances, it is difficult to see how the Violin Concerto was once held to be the equal of the Symphonies. There are tiresome repetitions in both the first movement and the Rondo, but made endurable last evening by the finished, exquisitely proportioned performance on the part of Mr. Heifetz and the orchestra. Here was perfection, albeit a somewhat cold perfection. A great virtuoso, a superb musician, Mr. Heifetz yet has his limitations as interpreter.

SAN ANTONIO, TEX.
EXPRESS

DEC 25 1938

HORTENSE MONATH HERE JANUARY 10

The second of the series of four Tuesday Musical Teas will be presented in San Pedro Playhouse on the afternoon of Jan. 10 when Hortense Monath, concert pianist, will be heard.

Coming from a gifted family, Hortense Monath first studied with her mother, then with Ernest Hutcheson in New York. Later she went to Berin to work under Artur Schnabel, who regards her as one of his star pupils. Her debut in Hamburg was followed by concerts in Rome, Florence, Bologne, Milan and other European cities. She also appeared as guest artist with the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra.

On her return to this country one of her first appearances was as solo artist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Koussevitzky.

MUSIC

B. Her. Dec. 23/38

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 10th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given last night in Symphony Hall. Jascha Heifetz, violinist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Handel. . .Concerto Grosso in D minor for strings
Hindemith. . . . . .Symphonic Dances
Beethoven. .Concerto for Violin in D Op. 61

Hindemith's music, let us hope, is finally coming to be appreciated here as it should be. There is not too much modern music that possesses its vigor, intellectual content and rhythmic vitality. We recently saw what intellectual formalism, unanimated by rhythmic skill and variety, could do to vitiate a work such as the Krenek Concerto. Hindemith has, however, always remained stoutly independent of systems and he is now in the full tide of his career—somewhat affected,, to be sure, by official unpopularity at home—reaping a reward of sincere praise where his music is sympathetically performed.

The present work, which is almost a symphony in its own right and fully as much a symphony as half the works that are labelled concertos are concertos, is a singularly interesting and attractive composition. It offers no departure from the style that the composer has of recent years found to be his own. He bows quite distinctly in the direction of tonality and delights in concluding chords and even cadences that are perfectly conventional. Such a work as the admirable Flute and Piano Sonata shows this, and the Symphonic Dances continue the habit.

It makes little difference what a [illegible] extent and skill does with conventional practices once he has found his feet. While he still has something to say he can usually be trusted to use available material to the best and most original advantage. This was demonstrably the custom of Bach and Handel, for not all composers are bold innovators. Hindemith has surely achieved in this score music of real distinction and impressive quality. There will be an opportunity to examine it further after the performance today.

We must own to a personal feeling of grievance that Mr. Heifetz did not play, as he previously announced in the program of his own recital a month ago here, the Prokofieff Second Concerto and a Mozart. The former, since it was so remarkable a work, and any of the latter under his perfectionist's fingers would have formed an irresistible combination. At the same time it is perhaps ill-natured to sulk at what did not occur when so fine and sensitive a performance of the Beethoven was under way. It was superb playing that we heard, but it is not too much to say that in one or two details the performance this afternoon ought to be even better.

The Hindemith Symphonic Dances came off admirably as far as one has a right to judge after a first hearing. The splendid sonority of the orchestra and the clarity with which the counterpoint was delineated were the result of Dr. Koussevitzky's penetrating sympathy with the score. The Handel Concerto Grosso was played on a somewhat lower level of excellence. In particular the exceeding slowness of the Air or second movement was a bit exaggerated. Handel was glad of the science of effect and hardly desired, in his commercial ups and downs, to put his audience to sleep.

The concert will be repeated this afternoon. Next week Rudolph Serkin, pianist, will be the soloist in the First Concerto of Brahms. Gardner Read's Suite for strings and the Tchaikovsky 4th Symphony will also be heard.

MUSIC

B. Globe Dec. 23/38

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The evening concert this week by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was set ahead to Thursday in order to avoid conflict with the pre-holiday activities that occupy most people on Christmas Eve. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky altered slightly the program first announced, postponing until the next concerts the Suite for String Orchestra by Gardner Read, and substituting as opening piece Handel's D minor Concerto Grosso, No. 10. Otherwise, the original list stands, with Hindemith's "Symphonic Dances" receiving first Boston performances, and with Jascha Heifetz as soloist in the Violin Concerto of Beethoven.

The title of Hindemith's music, which was composed in 1937, should not be taken literally. Far from furnishing a background for dancing, it does not suggest dancing at all. When the work was first performed in London, a program annotator ingeniously compared its four sections with the movements of a conventional symphony. There is some justification for this, because Hindemith's treatment of his material is symphonic.

Hindemith evidently has cast off the "radical" tendencies of his postwar music, and now finds more to his purpose a mixed style in which can be found counterpoint in more than one key simultaneously, themes deriving from the 12-tone scale, and a discreet proportion of good old diatonic harmony. In these respects "Symphonic Dances" resembles his suite from the opera "Matthias the Painter." In fact, there are definite reminiscences, such as the quasi-recitative passages for unison strings, followed by terse chords low in the brass.

Dissonant and hearty, but not rancid, "Symphonic Dances" is skillfully contrived, healthy music, occasionally noisy but never confused; perhaps rigorous to sensitive ears, yet substantial. Both individuality and brilliance characterize the instrumentation. One is continually impressed that Hindemith has something to say.

Last night's audience received the work with marked cordiality. Since most novelties are once played and then forgotten, this reviewer hopes that "Symphonic Dances" will escape that fate. Here is a score deserving to be heard again.

As he always does, Mr. Heifetz gave a glorious account of Beethoven's masterpiece, beautifully supported by Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra. Exceptionally, for one whose technical prowess is proverbially perfection itself, two or three entrances seemed for a split second to be tentative, and elsewhere a blurred harmonic or two were observed. These were, however, as nothing in the prevailing beauty both of execution and interpretation. All concerned in this glowing performance were, at the end, rewarded with applause of the utmost warmth.—C. W. D.

Bklyn

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

DEC 26 1938

Boston Orchestra to Play Jan. 6

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will give its second Brooklyn concert of the current season on Jan. 6, at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Jesus Maria Sanromá will be guest soloist in Ravel's Concerto for piano and orchestra. The rest of the program will be Haydn's Symphony No. 102 in B flat and Brahms Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98.

The Brooklyn concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are under the joint sponsorship of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn committee.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

DEC 29 1938

Colt to Review Work Of Boston Symphony

The work of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be reviewed by Harold G. Colt, Jr., at the fourth meeting of the symphony appreciation series conducted by the Music Lovers Club at the Hartford YMCA this evening. The meeting will be held in Room 200 and commences at 8 o'clock. The Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to the Bushnell Memorial Auditorium the following week.

Novelty From Hindemith For the Symphony Concerts

The composer's Symphonic Dances to be played by Dr. Koussevitzky at impending pair of concerts—Collaboration with Massine in work for the ballet.

Monitor - Dec. 23/38

Although Paul Hindemith is chiefly known in America as composer for the concert hall, the theater has occupied an increasing place of importance in his experiments. As long ago as 1921 he contrived a play for Burman marionettes called "Das Nusch-Nuschi." "Cardillac" of 1926 and the celebrated "Neues vom Tage" of 1929 have taken their places in the contemporary repertory, as has the opera, "Mathis der Maler," a suite from which has been played twice at concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It is not surprising then that the composer should have been moved to write an extended work for the use of Leonide Massine and the Ballet Russe. It received his major attention during the early part of 1937 and was set aside only when Massine communicated his choregraphic intention of devising a ballet on the subject of St. Francis of Assisi and his vow of poverty. Fired by the striking similarity between his train of musical thought and Massine's desire to evoke so picturesque and inspired a figure by means of music and the dance, Hindemith set aside his projected score and wrote a new work in collaboration with Massine. The ballet was to bear the title "Nobilissima Visione."

Hindemith, with the stage work completed, returned to the music he had projected for Massine and directed it into more purely orchestral channels under the title Symphonic Dances. The first performance took place in London under the composer's direction on Dec. 3, 1937. Hindemith has conducted his score in America at concerts of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, during the first week in March, 1938.

For Large Orchestra

Unlike the ballet, which is designed for practical purposes of the theater, and requires only single woodwind instruments and a string section based on a unit of six first violins, the Symphonic Dances are scored for large modern orchestra with a full percussion section containing triangle, tambourine, glockenspeil, cymbals, bass drum, and snare drum in addition to the usual kettle drums

In its final form, the work has acquired a close relationship to the general plan of the symphony. Although somewhat freer in style than a symphony, and more given to episodic than symphonic development, the Symphonic Dances are set in a four movement scheme with an opening movement preceded by a slow introduction, a scherzo not unfamiliarly placed before the slow movement, and a finale of climax and culmination.

Opens with Martial Theme

Once again Hindemith's composing maturity is to be noted. The long line of development begun in such works as the "Marienleben" that flowered in "Mathis der Maler" and "Nobilissima Visione" is again in evidence.

There is a slow introduction with a theme, somewhat martial in character, that leads briefly into the main body of the movement, Mässig bewegt, ¾. Three lyric themes are heard in quick succession at the beginning. Of similar character, they form the material upon which Hindemith's contrapuntal structure is built. The march-like theme from the introduction returns near the end of the movement and combines with the main subjects in producing an intense climax. The tonality of this movement, as of the second and fourth is mainly that of A major. The slow movement is in F-sharp major.

The scherzo and slow movements are in reasonable straightforward song forms, with contrasting sections and restatements of the opening sections of the movements. The scherzo, based on a propulsive theme that throws itself down the notes of a chord, has a recitative-like middle section punctuated by repetitions of a fortissimo common chord. The slow movement rises in its developed middle part to a climax of great intensity. The finale is in sectional style with a broad theme that dominates the whole movement. G. H. L. S.

Reminder

Due to the holiday the Symphony concert which regularly falls on Saturday night will be given this evening at 8:15. The Friday afternoon concert will be given as usual tomorrow at 2:30.

Next week the schedule of week-end concerts will resume its usual course.

Symphony Concert

Familiar Handel, Novel Hindemith, And a Strange Heifetz for Beethoven

B. Trans. By MOSES SMITH Dec. 23/38

It is once more becoming fashionable for a chronicler of events in the concert-hall and opera house to stress the composer and his music, not the performer and his interpretation. It is a good fashion; that is to say, I am heartily in favor of it. But even the best fashions need not be followed slavishly. And so an exception is in order today, in reporting the tenth evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, because of the approaching holiday, was played last night instead of tomorrow. It was a remarkable concert, in which the orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky made magnificent music out of the notations of two giants, Handel and Beethoven, and disclosed similarly an engrossing new work, Symphonic Dances, by Paul Hindemith. Yet that which demands first attention is what has happened to Jascha Heifetz, who was the soloist in the Beethoven Violin Concerto.

* * *

Ever since, as a youth of sixteen, Heifetz came out of Russia to bewilder incredulous ears with the perfection of his violinism more than 20 years ago there have been, for many of us, two kinds of violinists—Heifetz and all the others. The others could be compared among themselves and rated as top-flight, mediocre or dubs, as the case might be. Heifetz could be compared only with himself, with how he played a day, or a month, or years before. But last night, unless I am unintentionally weaving a fantasy, we listened to a new violinist-musician.

The familiar perfection of violinism remained, as did that extraordinarily fine musical instinct which has made it virtually impossible in the past for Heifetz to play an unmusical phrase or tone. These things, the possession of which in rare degree has set Heifetz off in a class by himself, produced, in connection with Beethoven's beautiful music and an eloquent orchestral accompaniment, the expected result at the end of the Concerto: a demonstration of applause of exceptional volume and duration, not to say variety—foot-stamping and cheering almost drowned out the clapping of hands.

But the thing which most compelled attention, at least for some of us, was that for the performance of last night Heifetz had passed out of the class of violinists—even his own class—and of musicians (again, even of his own class) and had become a poet, or a philosopher, or something for which a name does not come easily to mind. If you have heard Schnabel or Casals in the slow movement of a Beethoven sonata, or the Boston Orchestra under Koussevitzky in the end of the Ninth Symphony of Mahler, my meaning may be a little clearer. It is a philosophical approach to music which renders the factual intervention of an instrument and even of the performer of no appreciable account.

* * *

It is something which comes not only to few performers but even in their case only with advancing age. That it should appear in Heifetz, still a young man, was astonishing. You could hardly believe that a man of 37 could bring to this Concerto, and especially to the slow movement, that supra-mundane quality that is in it. Consistently with this approach the very physical manifestations of Heifetz's playing seem to have changed. The sensuous tone, the Auer mannerisms were gone. The tones were scarcely of this earth, their connection not apparent. The flow was no longer tonal; it was ideational.

Presumably the change in Heifetz has been going on, as such things do, right under our noses for years. I confess I have not noticed it, though I have been hardly remiss in singing the praises of this superlative violinist in the past. Very likely it was the music of Beethoven, inviting the kind of approach I have attempted feebly to indicate, that made the change, hitherto unsuspected, so apparent. But if I am right, Heifetz's new future and duty become clear. He has got to give up entirely pretending to be a virtuoso, a field in which there is not (as there has not been for years) anything for him to conquer, anyway. He has got to restrict his activities and thoughts entirely to the masterworks of music—of the part necessarily, of the present if he can bring himself to it.

* * *

There is not left much room for a discussion of the other elements of an exciting concert. But it does not take much space in which to say that the Handel Concerto Grosso in D minor was played by the marvellous string section of the Boston Orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky with characteristic excellence. Nor that the Orchestra sounded magnificently in the Hindemith Dances. Nor that, despite the current preoccupations which discourage attendance in concert hall and theater, an audience filling almost every place listened with the closest attention and applauded enthusiastically at the end of each of the several numbers.

The new music of Hindemith, however, cannot be despatched so casually. Fortunately it is being played again this afternoon and again and again next Monday night and Tuesday afternoon. On all counts it is the sensible thing to postpone a discussion of the Dances to another day.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST
DEC 24 1938

Words and Music

By SAMUEL CHOTZINOFF

Christmas Greetings

(with apologies to Mr. Frank Sullivan and The New Yorker)

On this merry day this department is in receipt of numberless Christmas greetings,
It therefore takes this opportunity, in lieu of presents and personal meetings,
To thank one and all, the violinists, 'cellists, and singers
The good and so-so performers, as well as the top-notch humdingers,
For their telegrams, cards, letters and other varieties of felicitations
That arrived in this office from artists of this happy and from some other not-so-happy nations.
I wish the best Christmas cheer to the Messrs. Johnson, Ziegler and Lewis
And to every other operatic office in every State of the U. S.
I send my best holiday greetings to Elisabeth Rethberg, Lily Pons and Martinelli
To Bodanzky, Papi, Riedel, and to the genial cherubic "Pelley."
Let the rest of the season be a specially good one for the Messrs. Graf, Wenker and Cleva,
Who play such an important part in the life of every Metropolitan Diva.
Especially do I send best ishes to the erudite Dorothea Manski
Who is said to know every note of every opera, the same as Artur Bodanzky.
To Thorberg, Jessner, Farell, Morel, who were so (in the opinion of nearly every local critic) nice
In the extremely difficult singing and acting roles in "Orfeo ed Euridice."
To Melchior, Huehn, Lizt, Vogel, Altglass and the melodiously named Laufkoetter
Whose singing in the Wagnerian repertoire some thought could not possibly have been better.
To the Mmes. Antoine, Olheim, Caniglia, Castagna, and to the town's latest Mignon.
Miss Stevens—acclaimed an important addition to the Met's French pinion.
I should like very much to enumerate every inhabitant of Mr. Johnson's musical mansion,
But other matters on this page absolutely forbid any further operatic expansion.
So I make haste to salute those artists who happen not to be strictly operatic,
Those who do their stuff in Carnegie and Town Halls and who cause some of radio's static.
I send messages of the best cheer to Stokowski, Ormandy and Koussevitzky
To Jacobsen, Heifetz, Feuermann, and the Gordon String Quartet's Naoum Benditzky.
To Rubinstein, Rachmaninoff, Hofmann, to Horowitz, Brailowsky and Paderewski,
And to all key-board wizards on the Seine, on the Thames or on the remote, refrigerated Nevsky.
But stay! I almost left out the Menuhins—Hepzibah, Yalta and Yehudi,
I certainly hope that the New Year will bring to them every variety of "goody."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
DEC 25 1938

RECENT RECORDS

By JEROME D. BOHM

VICTOR has released a new version of Leopold Stokowski's "Symphonic Synthesis" of Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde," performed by the Philadelphia Orchestra and conducted by Mr. Stokowski. The conductor has fashioned a potpourri from Wagner's matchless score, which links the prelude in its entirety, with portions of the second act, including the introduction, a section of the love duet, bringing with it conclusion with the conventional ending," but "with a short and fiercely powerful coda." This "coda" is nothing less than the final measures of the second act of the music-drama. It would be difficult to match this act of impiety with any committed by any conductor of modern times and Mr. Stokowski has made matters worse by his inappropriate pacing of both the climactic portions of the prelude, and of the "Liebestod," both of which are unconscionably a touch of meretricious theatricalism to the music, and utterly disregarding Wagner's indications in the printed score. It is of little avail that the Philadelphia Orchestra has set forth these excerpts with tonal magnificence; indeed it only adds to one's annoyance, that such superb playing should be so tastelessly directed.

Victor set No. M 517 contains Jose Iturbi's effective transcription for two pianos of Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," which he plays brilliantly with the able assistance of Amparo Iturbi at the second piano. Set M 515 holds Arthur Fiedler's interpretation of Tchaikovsky's "1812" overture, with the Boston "Pops" Orchestra, which will please those who still retain an affection for this bombastic composition.

Boston Symphony Faces Busy Week

By Ruth Marsters
Music Editor

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will be busy with divers music-making during the coming week for the benefit of holiday audiences.

On Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon, Anja Ignatius, young Finnish violinist, will make her first appearances in this country in Sibelius' Violin Concerto.

Dr. Koussevitzky will also conduct repeat performances of Hindemith's Symphonic Dances, heard for the first time here in last week end's concerts. The concluding number will be Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor.

Incidentally, of the four remaining pair of concerts in the subsidiary series, Georges Enesco will conduct one, Igor Stravinsky another, Koussevitzky the other two.

* * *

PIANIST Rudolph Serkin will make his first appearances with the Orchestra in the First Piano Concerto of Brahms in D minor at the regular pair of concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

Dr. Koussevitzky will open the program with Gardner Read's Suite for Strings. The closing work will be Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony.

Aaron Richmond announces an extraordinarily fine assortment of music events for the New Year.

Scheduled for Jordan Hall appearances on Friday evening and Saturday afternoon, January 6 and 7, is Argentinita and her Spanish Ensemble; for Sunday afternoon, January 8, Richard Crooks, Metropolitan tenor in lieder program.

* * *

One of the most important concerts of the month is, of course, that to be given by Toscanini and the NBC Symphony Orchestra in their single Symphony Hall appearance of the season on Tuesday evening, January 10.

On the evening following, Leonard Shure, pianist, and Paul Tortellier, 'cellist, will appear in sonata recital in Jordan Hall.

Kirsten Flagstad will give a Symphony Hall recital on Sunday afternoon, January 15, Trudi Schoop to appear with her Comic allet on Friday evening, January 27.

And in Jordan Hall ursday evening, 19, Eugenia in piano renifred Chrisstrating the ouble Keyno on Saturrnoon, Jan-

---

CLEVELAND, O.
NEWS

clubs—

Dec. 26/38

By Dorothy Harmon

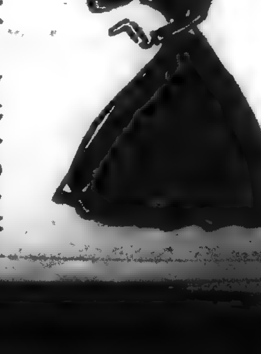
Mlle. Nadia Boulanger Will Give Course Of Lectures in Harkness Chapel of W. R. U.

AFTER-CHRISTMAS conversation at the Women's City Club will be mostly about the appearance in Cleveland of Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, who comes here January 13, under auspices of the division of music at Western Reserve University in collaboration with the Women's City Club.

Tickets for Mlle. Boulanger's course of four lectures in Harkness Chapel are popularly priced and are on sale at the club. The course will cover such subjects as tradition in music, social and popular aspects of the modern school, and the place of romanticism. It includes a gala concert by the university choir and orchestra, conducted by Mlle. Boulanger.

International Federation of Business and Professional Women's bulletin once lauded Mlle. Boulanger thus:

"She conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra without a baton, using only her eloquent and beautiful hands, sometimes with a broad, sweeping movement, sometimes with clenched fists. So expressive are her hands that she scarcely needs to speak at all. But speak she can—and does on occasion. It is whispered that she administered a stiff scolding to the orchestra, which was inclined to take the Faure composition as child's play. It certainly sat up and gave its best after her rebuke.



"Mlle. Boulanger is casual about these new honors. When asked how it felt to be the first woman to conduct the Boston Symphny, she replied, "I've been a woman for over fifty years, so I've got over my initial astonishment. As to conducting an orchestra, that's a job. I don't think sex plays much part."

Symphony Concert

Familiar Handel, Novel Hindemith, And a Strange Heifetz for Beethoven

B. Trans ·By MOSES SMITH Dec. 23/38

It is once more becoming fashionable for a chronicler of events in the concert-hall and opera house to stress the composer and his music, not the performer and his interpretation. It is a good fashion; that is to say, I am heartily in favor of it. But even the best fashions need not be followed slavishly. And so an exception is in order today, in reporting the tenth evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, because of the approaching holiday, was played last night instead of tomorrow. It was a remarkable concert, in which the orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky made magnificent music out of the notations of two giants, Handel and Beethoven, and disclosed similarly an engrossing new work, Symphonic Dances, by Paul Hindemith. Yet that which demands first attention is what has happened to Jascha Heifetz, who was the soloist in the Beethoven Violin Concerto.

* * *

Ever since, as a youth of sixteen, Heifetz came out of Russia to bewilder incredulous ears with the perfection of his violinism more than 20 years ago there have been, for many of us, two kinds of violinists—Heifetz and all the others. The others could be compared among themselves and rated as top-flight, mediocre or dubs, as the case might be. Heifetz could be compared only with himself, with how he played a day, or a month, or years before. But last night, unless I am unintentionally weaving a fantasy, we listened to a new violinist-musician.

The familiar perfection of violinism remained, as did that extraordinarily fine musical instinct which has made it virtually impossible in the past for Heifetz to play an unmusical phrase or tone. These things, the possession of which in rare degree has set Heifetz off in a class by himself, produced, in connection with Beethoven's beautiful music and an eloquent orchestral accompaniment, the expected result at the end of the Concerto: a demonstration of applause of exceptional volume and duration, not to say variety—foot-stamping and cheering almost drowned out the clapping of hands.

But the thing which most compelled attention, at least for some of us, was that for the performance of last night Heifetz had passed out of the class of violinists—even his own class—and of musicians (again, even of his own class) and had become a poet, or a philosopher, or something for which a name does not come easily to mind. If you have heard Schnabel or Casals in the slow movement of a Beethoven sonata, or the Boston Orchestra under Koussevitzky in the end of the Ninth Symphony of Mahler, my meaning may be a little clearer. It is a philosophical approach to music which renders the factual intervention of an instrument and even of the performer of no appreciable account.

* * *

It is something which comes not only to few performers but even in their case only with advancing age. That it should appear in Heifetz, still a young man, was astonishing. You could hardly believe that a man of 37 could bring to this Concerto, and especially to the slow movement, that supra-mundane quality that is in it. Consistently with this approach the very physical manifestations of Heifetz's playing seem to have changed. The sensuous tone, the Auer mannerisms were gone. The tones were scarcely of this earth, their connection not apparent. The flow was no longer tonal; it was ideational.

Presumably the change in Heifetz has been going on, as such things do, right under our noses for years. I confess I have not noticed it, though I have been hardly remiss in singing the praises of this superlative violinist in the past. Very likely it was the music of Beethoven, inviting the kind of approach I have attempted feebly to indicate, that made the change, hitherto unsuspected, so apparent. But if I am right, Heifetz's new future and duty become clear. He has got to give up entirely pretending to be a virtuoso, a field in which there is not (as there has not been for years) anything for him to conquer, anyway. He has got to restrict his activities and thoughts entirely to the masterworks of music—of the part necessarily, of the present if he can bring himself to it.

* * *

There is not left much room for a discussion of the other elements of an exciting concert. But it does not take much space in which to say that the Handel Concerto Grosso in D minor was played by the marvellous string section of the Boston Orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky with characteristic excellence. Nor that the Orchestra sounded magnificently in the Hindemith Dances. Nor that, despite the current preoccupations which discourage attendance in concert hall and theater, an audience filling almost every place listened with the closest attention and applauded enthusiastically at the end of each of the several numbers.

The new music of Hindemith, however, cannot be despatched so casually. Fortunately it is being played again this afternoon and again and again next Monday night and Tuesday afternoon. On all counts it is the sensible thing to postpone a discussion of the Dances to another day.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

DEC 2 4 1938

Words and Music

By SAMUEL CHOTZINOFF

Christmas Greetings

(with apologies to Mr. Frank Sullivan and The New Yorker)

On this merry day this department is in receipt of numberless Christmas greetings,
It therefore takes this opportunity, in lieu of presents and personal meetings,
To thank one and all, the violinists, 'cellists, and singers
The good and so-so performers, as well as the top-notch humdingers,
For their telegrams, cards, letters and other varieties of felicitations
That arrived in this office from artists of this happy and from some other not-so-happy nations.
I wish the best Christmas cheer to the Messrs. Johnson, Ziegler and Lewis
And to every other operatic office in every State of the U. S.
I send my best holiday greetings to Elisabeth Rethberg, Lily Pons and Martinelli
To Bodanzky, Papi, Riedel, and to the genial cherubic "Pelley."
Let the rest of the season be a specially good one for the Messrs. Graf, Wenker and Cleva,
Who play such an important part in the life of every Metropolitan Diva.
Especially do I send best ishes to the erudite Dorothea Manski
Who is said to know every note of every opera, the same as Artur Bodanzky.
To Thorberg, Jessner, Farell, Morel, who were so (in the opinion of nearly every local critic) nice
In the extremely difficult singing and acting roles in "Orfeo ed Euridice."
To Melchior, Huehn, Lizt, Vogel, Altglass and the melodiously named Laufketter
Whose singing in the Wagnerian repertoire some thought could not possibly have been better.
To the Mmes. Antoine, Olheim, Caniglia, Castagna, and to the town's latest Mignon.
Miss Stevens—acclaimed an important addition to the Met's French pinion.
I should like very much to enumerate every inhabitant of Mr. Johnson's musical mansion,
But other matters on this page absolutely forbid any further operatic expansion.
So I make haste to salute those artists who happen not to be strictly operatic,
Those who do their stuff in Carnegie and Town Halls and who cause some of radio's static.
I send messages of the best cheer to Stokowski, Ormandy and Koussevitzky
To Jacobsen, Heifetz, Feuermann, and the Gordon String Quartet's Naoum Benditzky.
To Rubinstein, Rachmaninoff, Hofmann, to Horowitz, Brailowsky and Paderewski,
And to all key-board wizards on the Seine, on the Thames or on the remote, refrigerated Nevsky.
But stay! I almost left out the Menuhins—Hepzibah, Yalta and Yehudi,
I certainly hope that the New Year will bring to them every variety of "goody."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

DEC 2 5 1938

RECENT RECORDS

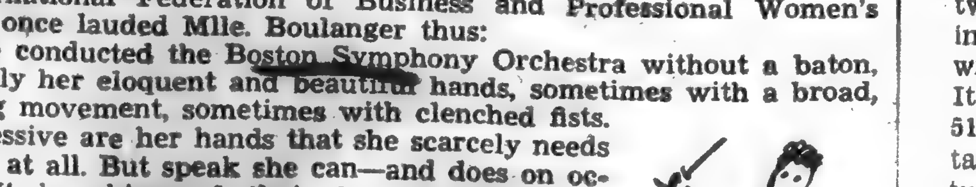
By JEROME D. BOHM

VICTOR has released a new version of Leopold Stokowski's "Symphonic Synthesis" of Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde," performed by the Philadelphia Orchestra and conducted by Mr. Stokowski. The conductor has fashioned a potpourri from Wagner's matchless score, which links the prelude in its entirety, with portions of the second act, including the introduction, a section of the love duet, bringing with it Brangane's warning call, suddenly interrupting the natural flow of the music by leaping without rhyme or reason to Tristan's "Und drauf Isolde, wie sie winkt," in the third act, then just as arbitrarily returning to the love music of the second act, following this with a snatch of the "Liebestod," which as the booklet which accompanies the set ingenuously states is not brought to a conclusion with "the conventional ending," but "with a short and fiercely powerful coda." This "coda" is nothing less than the final measures of the second act of the music-drama. It would be difficult to match this act of impiety with any committed by any conductor of modern times and Mr. Stokowski has made matters worse by his inappropriate pacing of both the climactic portions of the prelude, and of the "Liebestod," both of which are unconscionably a touch of meretricious theatricalism to the music, and utterly disregarding Wagner's indications in the printed score. It is of little avail that the Philadelphia Orchestra has set forth these excerpts with tonal magnificence; indeed it only adds to one's annoyance, that such superb playing should be so tastelessly directed.

Victor set No. M 517 contains Jose Iturbi's effective transcription for two pianos of Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," which he plays brilliantly with the able assistance of Amparo Iturbi at the second piano. Set M 515 holds Arthur Fiedler's interpretation of Tchaikovsky's "1812" overture, with the Boston "Pops" Orchestra, which will please those who still retain an affection for this bombastic composition.

CLEVELAND, O.
NEWS

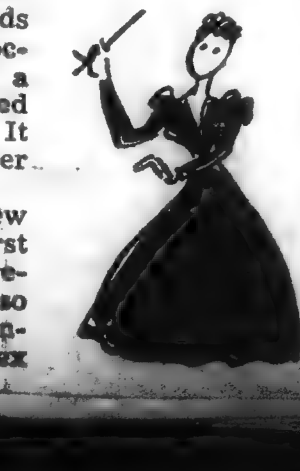
C



AFTER-CHRISTMAS conversation at the Women's City Club will be mostly about the appearance in Cleveland of Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, who comes here January 13, under auspices of the division of music at Western Reserve University in collaboration with the Women's City Club.

Tickets for Mlle. Boulanger's course of four lectures in Harkness Chapel are popularly priced and are on sale at the club. The course will cover such subjects as tradition in music, social and popular aspects of the modern school, and the place of romanticism. It includes a gala concert by the university choir and orchestra, conducted by Mlle. Boulanger.

International Federation of Business and Professional Women's bulletin once lauded Mlle. Boulanger thus:



"She conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra without a baton, using only her eloquent and beautiful hands, sometimes with a broad, sweeping movement, sometimes with clenched fists. So expressive are her hands that she scarcely needs to speak at all. But speak she can—and does on occasion. It is whispered that she administered a stiff scolding to the orchestra, which was inclined to take the Faure composition as child's play. It certainly sat up and gave its best after her rebuke.

"Mlle. Boulanger is casual about these new honors. When asked how it felt to be the first woman to conduct the Boston Symphny, she replied, "I've been a woman for over fifty years, so I've got over my initial astonishment. As to conducting an orchestra, that's a job. I don't think sex plays much part."

Boston Symphony Faces Busy Week

By Ruth Marsters
Music Editor

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will be busy with divers music-making during the coming week for the benefit of holiday audiences.

On Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon, Anja Ignatius, young Finnish violinist, will make her first appearances in this country in Sibelius' Violin Concerto.

Dr. Koussevitzky will also conduct repeat performances of Hindemith's Symphonic Dances, heard for the first time here in last week end's concerts. The concluding number will be Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor.

